I should be either murdered or captivated?" To escape such a fate, Crève cœur develops an intricate plan to take his family to join an Indian settlement in the uncultivated wilderness (a plan which he never actually carried out) It is, of course, tragically ironic that this mild Frenchman's absolute certainty of the blessings of life in the colonies should be so violently shattered after nineteen years of expending all his energies to make a decent life possible But it is also ironically appropriate that his final impulse is to immerse himself deeper into nature by joining the Indians Whatever flaws it may have, Letters from an American Farmer is the most sympathetic and thoughtful of all eighteenth century analyses of frontier life and its shaping influence on the emerging American character

THE LETTERS OF WALPOLE

Type of work Letters

Author Horace Walpole (1717-1797)

Collected editions published Letters edited by Peter Cunningham 1857-1859 (9 vols.), Letters edited by Mrs Paget Toynbee 1903-1905 (16 vols.) The Yale Edition of Horace Walpole's Correspondence, edited by W S Lewis, 1937 continuing

No student, not even a general reader, interested in the eighteenth century and its culture in England can afford to overlook Horace Walpole and his works Walpole's life spanned eighty years of that century, and the man himself engaged in most of the activities of the times in one way or another His interests lay in many areas—political, literary, artistic, antiquarian, horticultural, architectural, and social He was novelist, playwright, historian, member of Parliament, the son of a prime minister, an arbiter of artistic excellence, a publisher, a collector, and, among other things, an inveterate letter writer It is anticipated that the monumental collected edition of the letters, the Yale edition now in progress, will eventually reach a total of fifty volumes

In the realm of literature alone, Walpole had an amazing record of production, even for an age notorious for its prolific writers Walpole wrote a novel, a comedy, a tragedy, some poetry, memoirs of the eighteenth century Hanoverian kings of England, a volume on the career of the infamous Richard III, a catalogue of royal and noble English authors, a work on painting in England, and other writings Although his novel, The Castle of Otranto, has always had some vogue, his letters have received more attention in the past hundred years Walpole would probably approve, for he himself said that letters were the best key to the history of an age Indeed, it seems that he wrote his correspondence with posterity in mind and according to something resembling a plan That the letters have had continued popularity is due to their intrinsic worth, as well as their historical significance Walpole had a pleasant style, and it must have been a pleasure to have been a recipient of his letters, as Horace Mann was for example, over a period of more than forty years

The language of Walpole's letters seems modern, for the idiom is attractive and anything but dated And they are never boring One reason for their effect is the fact that the letters are seldom about the author himself Walpole wrote, rather, about the world, its main outlines as he knew them and its details as he observed them He saw the world in its larger relationships, but he also had an eye and mind that were cognizant of little things A chronic victim of the gout in later life, he seldom used his letters to indulge in self pity Though a thoughtful man, he did not inject into the letters a mass of subjective philosophizing, though an active man, he did not ex-patiate upon his activities from a personal point of view. There is always a conversational tone to the letters. They read much the same way that an eighteenth century salon conversation probably sounded. Occasional improprieties, slight bursts of anger, the gossip, the wit, even the diction, are those which one probably would have heard among the well bred people with whom Walpole was familiar.

The subject matter of the letters is almost universal though centered in the strata of the world that Walpole knew, the world of the Whig aristocracy of eighteenth century England, a gay, intelligent, if somewhat superficial world from the twentieth century viewpoint.

Certain letters have achieved eminence above others. In the main, they are those letters frequently referred to as "set pieces." They include the letters describing the trial of rebellious Jacobite peers, after the abortive revolution of 1745, of which Walpole gives an almost day to day account. They include a description of the executions, which Walpole apparently did not witness, of Balmorino and Lord Kilmarnock. Two funerals are also famous in Walpole's correspondence: one the funeral of George II of England, the other the funeral in Paris of the Duke de Tresmes, governor of Paris and a marshal of France.

While the "set pieces" have their place, it is the very bulk and scope of subject matter that is most important in Walpole's letters, a bulk which is impossible merely to catalogue, for some where in the letters Walpole seems to have hit upon almost every subject significant (and some not so significant) in his time. Highwaymen, prisons, slavery, Strawberry Hill, the ins and outs of politics, London gossip, dueling, Benjamin Franklin, George Washington, General Howe and his army, marriages, divorces, masquerades, dinner parties, the weather (usual and unusual), balloons, Captain Cook's voyages, sea bathing, the French Revolution—all these and many more are to be found as subjects in the letters. Some readers may argue that the correspondence is too large in bulk and too slightly organized, but perhaps those supposed weaknesses are the very strength of the Letters. Plato wrote his philosophy in the form of dialogues so that the reader would have to participate and learn actively, in somewhat similar fashion the reader of Walpole's letters must in a sense participate in the writer's account of eighteenth century life, filling in the larger outline from the smaller items presented.

Walpole's purposes in writing the letters now seems clear. He was reporting the age to selected friends, many of whom were recipients of his letters for many years. At the same time Walpole seems to have been careful to write so that a larger audience might eventually appreciate what he wrote. He lived in an age when letter writing was decidedly an art, and yet the polish of his letters, the careful selection of details, and the superb control of the prose rhythms in many of them indicate that extraordinary care was lavished upon his correspondence, so that it became in Walpole's mind the best means for presenting a history of his time, being immediate, flexible, and open to varying levels of formality and tone. The letters were written in the main to selected people, a circumstance which made it easier for him to write what he did and as he did. And scholars have pointed out, in a sense Walpole's correspondence substituted space for time. The largest number of letters went to Horace Mann, British envoy at Florence. Writing to a man he met but once, a man who lived at considerable distance, culturally as well as geographically, Walpole had a fine recipient for letters containing what may be termed the main strand of his social history.

In the letters to Mann, the outlines of the social history could be given, while specific areas of interest could be, and apparently were, allotted to other recipients of portions of the correspondence.

The various friends who received large numbers of Walpole's letters were each written to from a somewhat different viewpoint. Thomas Gray, the poet, a life long friend of Walpole (despite occasional differences), received letters on matters of artistic and antiquarian interest. When Gray died, the man who became his biographer, the Reverend William Mason, became the recipient, so that the thread was not broken. Lady Ossory received letters containing gossip, especially after the death of George Montagu, who had for some years been a Walpole correspondent.

Although there is a certain element of satire in the letters Walpole was almost never bitter. He had the well bred man's ability to see the humor and the absurdity in human conduct without having to regard foolishness as wickedness. For more than fifty years Walpole recorded what he saw, and in such a manner that the reader feels the immediacy of what happened long ago. On the scene himself at the time, Walpole was able to write for the modern reader, as well as for the eighteenth century recipients of the correspondence, and in such fashion that the glow of reality lights up the history.

LETTERS TO HIS SON

Type of work Courtesy letters

Author Philip Dormer Stanhope, Lord Chesterfield (1694-1773)

First published 1774

On the periphery of literature exists a valuable and fascinating genre, the personal letter which, like the private diary, reveals a man and an age far more intimately than any other form of writing. Probably no era practiced the epistolary art more widely than the eighteenth century and no man more skillfully than the fourth Earl of Chesterfield. Though the good earl had served his country unimpeachably as a member of Parliament, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and ambassador to Holland, and though his name designates an overcoat and a couch, it is generally conceded that Lord Chesterfield would have remained an inconspicuous figure in the eighteenth century historical scene had it not been for the unintended publication of some four hundred letters to his illegitimate son, Philip Stanhope. No doubt the very fact that these letters were strictly private, intended to develop the education and manners of a young man who was expected to take a significant place in government and cultivated society, endows them with a frankness and honesty that betrays the cultivated self seeking and the hypocritical morality of the upper-class society of the time. Eugenia Stanhope, whose secret marriage with young Philip was only one of the many disappointments Lord Chesterfield suffered at the hands of his intractable son, was so incensed at being excluded from the earl's will that against the family's wishes she sold the Letters to Dodsley for £1,575, thus infuriating English society and securing for Lord Chesterfield minor but recognized importance in the history of English prose.

The early letters are charmingly didactic essays addressed to a pre adolescent mind, expected to become "not only the best scholar but the best bred boy in England of your age." "Dear boy," they all begin, and then proceed to shape little lessons on language, literature, geography, history, and good manners. They conclude with admonitions to obey Maittaire, his seventy year old tutor, and promises of "very pretty things" to reward him for industrious study. There is irony in Lord Chesterfield's explanation of irony—"Suppose that I were to commend you for your great attention to your book, and for your retaining and remembering what you have once learned, would you not plainly perceive the irony, and see that I laughed at you?' Reasons for such laughter were to come, but it was never bitter or audible ("there is nothing so illiberal, and so ill bred as audible laughter") Lord Chesterfield's optimism and faith in rationalism may have diminished somewhat, but it was never extinguished completely. After his failure in making an outstanding figure of young Philip, in 1761 he began the whole process over again with his godson, to whom he wrote almost three hundred letters in a decade.

It is not the early letters to his son but the later ones—addressed to "My Dear Friend"—that have aroused controversy. A strong believer in Locke's educational theory that a man's mind is wax to be molded into shape by environmental influences, Lord Chesterfield sent his son at fourteen not to a university but on the grand tour accompanied by a new tutor, the Reverend Walter Harte, supplied with letters of introduction into the highest social circles of great European cities, spied upon by the earl's agents, and pursued by affectionate but earnest epistles from an anxious father. How earnest they were can be gauged from this excerpt written to Lausanne in 1746: "I do not so much as hint to you how absolutely dependent you are on me, and that, as I have no womanish weakness for your person, your merit must and will be the only measure of my kindness." Nevertheless, it would be unfair to observe that even if the father never displayed warmth, love, or understanding, his kindness far exceeded the boy's merit.

The controversy concerns Lord Chesterfield's realistic observations on those aspects of life that he constantly urges his son to explore.

Search, therefore, with the greatest care, into the characters of those whom you converse with endeavor to discover their predominant passions, their prevailing weaknesses, their vanities, their follies, and their humours, with all the right and wrong, wise and silly springs of human actions, which make such inconsistent and whimsical beings of us rational creatures. This is the true knowledge of the world, and the world is a country which nobody ever yet knew by description: one must travel through it oneself to be acquainted with it.

Having well traveled that country, Lord Chesterfield could advise his son with a somewhat cynical sophistication. A man who never knew love and who married for a dowry that would repair his fortunes, he wrote "Women are merely children of a larger growth. A man of sense only trifles with them.

They will greedily swallow the highest [flattery], and gratefully accept the lowest. [but] They have, from the weakness of men, more or less influence in all courts. It is therefore necessary to manage, please and flatter them." It is this worldly self-interest that constitutes the dominant tone of the letters, "with out some dissimulation no business can be carried on at all." There was no trace of mysticism or sentimentality about him, "religion must still be allowed to be a collateral security, at least, to Virtue." But virtue, apparently, was not an end in itself. Rather, it was a means to worldly success, a dependable means, if Lord Chesterfield's own career based on honesty and integrity is any measure. Nevertheless, worldly success was the goal and though "learning, honour, and virtue are absolutely necessary to gain you the esteem and admiration of mankind, politeness and good breeding are equally necessary to make you welcome and agreeable in conversation and common life." Elsewhere he urges his son to be neat and clean, to avoid obesity, to care for his teeth, and never under any circumstances to stick his finger into his nose.

The ultimate purpose was that young Stanhope should become—at the very least—a successful diplomat, but the principal objective of that occupation was "to get into the secrets of the court at which he resides" through any means including flattery or intimacy with a king's or minister's mistresses

On the Continent, publication of the Letters was met with acclaim, their great est admirer probably being Lord Chesterfield's old friend Voltaire. I am not certain that it is not the best book on education which has ever been written." But in England the reaction was sternly condemnatory, even virulent. One periodical declared that as a man, he was "certainly solely actuated by pride, vanity, and ambition," and in her own letters Mrs. Montagu expressed her belief that "though many admired, no one ever esteemed Lord Chesterfield."

LEVIATHAN

Type of work: Philosophy of politics
Author: Thomas Hobbes (1588-1679)
First published: 1651

To appreciate the range of Hobbes' subject matter in the Leviathan, one may first consider the entire title: Leviathan, or the Matter, Form, and Power of a Commonwealth Ecclesiastical and Civil. In considering the "matter, form, and power" of the commonwealth or state, Hobbes was doing far more than describing governments as he found them. His goal was to explain the origin of political institutions and to define their powers and right limits. To this end he thought it necessary to draw an analogy between the art of nature, productive of man, and the art of man, productive of the commonwealth. In drawing the analogy he first explained man himself, giving to the description a thoroughly mechanistic bias. He then proceeded to explain the state as man's artificial creation, designed to put an end to the war of all against all.

The state, "that great Leviathan," is but an "Artificial Man," wrote Hobbes. The sovereign is an artificial soul, the officers of the state are artificial joints, reward and punishment are nerves, wealth and riches are strength, the people's safety is the business of the artificial man, the laws are its reason and will, concord, its health, sedition, its sickness, and civil war, its death.

All of men's ideas originate in sense, according to Hobbes—that is, they are derived from sense impressions. All sensation is a result of external bodies pressing upon the sense organs. Imagination is "nothing but decaying sense," the effect of sense impressions after the external body has ceased to press upon the organs. If we want to emphasize the past cause of the impression, we call the fading image a "memory" image, but if we want to emphasize the image as one not now related to any present cause, we call it "fancy" or "imagination."

Hobbes was led by his mechanistic psychology to deny content to such a term as "infinite." He argued that when we say something is infinite we merely show that we cannot conceive its boundaries. Consequently, such a term as "God" is used not to conceive any being, but only to honor something incomprehensible.

Common names, such as "man," "horse," and "tree" may be applied to a number of individual things, yet there is nothing universal but names. In making this claim Hobbes was denying the Platonic belief that individual objects share a certain common character, or universal, in virtue of which they are similar. According to Hobbes, then, reasoning is simply the manipulation—the addition and subtraction—of names.

The passions are the "interior beginnings of voluntary motions," writes Hobbes. Since he argued that everything can be understood in terms of bodies in motion, it is not surprising that even the emotions are simply notions inside the body Motion toward something is desire, motion away, aversion In terms of these two basic motions Hobbes defined the other passions

After considering the intellectual virtues and defects, the two kinds of knowledge (knowledge of observed fact, and the conditional knowledge of science), and the powers and manners of men, Hobbes turned his analytical mind to religion Religion, he writes, is man's invention, the result of his ignorance and fear Religious power and dogma are used to serve the interests of the priests It is not surprising that, with these views, Hobbes was constantly in trouble both at home and abroad

When Hobbes finally comes to the point of declaring that men are by nature equal, he does so with no tone of ringing idealism He means only that the differences between men are not so marked as the similarities, and he means also that there is no natural sanction for one man's assuming authority over another Because men are similar, they sometimes come to desire the same thing, and if they cannot both enjoy the object of their desire, they become enemies and war over the object There are three principal causes of fights between men competition, diffidence, and glory While men have no common power over them to keep them all in check, they are in "that condition which is called Warre, and such a warre, as is of every man, against every man" There are many inconveniences to war, and the fact that in a state of war there is no injustice (since there is no natural law governing action) in no way makes that state of affairs satisfactory In order to secure peace men enter upon certain agreements by which they bring about a transferring of rights It is possible for men to make such agreements, or contracts, because they have certain natural rights to use their power however they choose in order to preserve themselves

Having discussed men, their nature, and their rights, Hobbes argued, in the second part of Leviathan, that the commonwealth is brought into being in order to enable men to escape from the state of war Loving liberty and dominion over others, men agree to make some person sovereign over them all to work for their peace and benefit The sovereign is not bound by the contract or covenant, the contract is among those who are to be ruled If the ruler turns out to be a despot, it must be remembered that it is better to be ruled in a commonwealth than to be in a state of nature and, consequently, a continual state of war

Hobbes considers three kinds of commonwealth monarchy, democracy, and aristocracy, the latter being ruled by an assembly of part of the commonwealth There are certain advantages to the monarchical form of government, according to Hobbes a monarch combines the private and public interest, he is better able to consult with men who have knowledge he needs, the only inconstancy the monarch has to put up with is his own, he cannot disagree with himself, and although it is sometimes inconvenient to have power vested in one man, particularly when the monarch may be an infant because of succession, the disadvantages are no greater than they are in other forms of government

The subjects in a commonwealth are not entirely subject to the sovereign The basic principle is that they cannot be compelled to act against that natural inclination toward self preservation which the commonwealth is supposed to serve They cannot be bound to injure themselves or to wage war—although this is a dubious right since the sovereign is free to imprison or execute them for disobedience If the sovereign is not able to protect his subjects, the subjects are absolved of obedience to him

The civil law of a commonwealth is made up of all those rules which prescribe what is right and wrong for the subjects, and since the commonwealth itself is no lawmaker, the sovereign must be the legislator He is not subject to civil law, and only he can abrogate the law. Since an undeclared law is no law at all, and since law is not binding unless it is clearly commanded by the sovereign, the sovereign must make the law known and understood, and he must see to it that it be known as his law. The only laws that need not be published are laws of nature, and they can be contained in one sentence: "Do not that to another, which thou thinkest unreasonable to be done by another to thy self."

Hobbes regarded crime as resulting from some defect of the understanding, or from some error of reasoning, or from some force of the passions. He declares that "No law, made after a Fact done, can make it a Crime," and that although ignorance of natural law is no excuse, ignorance of civil law may excuse a man provided he had not the opportunity to hear the law declared. Punishment is not fundamentally retributive in Hobbes scheme. "A Punishment, is an Evill inflicted by publique Authority, on him that hath done, or omitted that which is Judged by the same Authority, to be a Transgression of the Law, to the end that the will of men may thereby the better be disposed to obedience."

Like anything made by men, a commonwealth can perish. Its infirmities result from what Hobbes calls an "Imperfect Institution"—errors in the creation of the commonwealth. Perhaps the sovereign is not given enough power, or every man is allowed to be a judge, or conscience is authoritative in moral judgment, or supernatural inspiration is given precedence over reason, or the sovereign is held to be subject to civil law, or it is supposed that every man has some absolute property which the sovereign can not touch, or it is supposed that sovereign power can be divided. Other difficulties, such as the lack of money, the presence of monopolies and corrupt politicians, the popularity of certain subjects, the greatness of a town, or the invasion by a foreign power can lead to the dissolution of the commonwealth.

Part III of Leviathan is concerned with showing the relations between a Christian commonwealth and commonwealths in general. Hobbes uses hundreds of Biblical references, as interpreted by him, to support his conclusion that it is possible to reconcile our obedience to God with our obedience to a civil sovereign, for the sovereign is either a Christian or he is not. If he is a Christian, then, even if he may sometimes err in supposing that some act is God's will, the proper thing for the subject, who has no right to judge, is to obey. If the sovereign is an infidel, then the subject must obey because the law of nature justifies the sovereign's power in a commonwealth and to disobey would be to disobey the laws of nature which are the laws of God. No church leader, even a Pope, can rule the sovereign, and this situation is not contrary to God's law, for the Church works through civil government.

The concluding section, "Of the Kingdom of Darknesse," argues that spiritual darkness has not been completely eliminated from the Church—by which Hobbes means the Church of Rome. His principal attack on the Church of Rome is based on his claim that the Scripture is misinterpreted in order to justify the assumption of temporal power by the Popes.

Although Hobbes maintains that his entire argument is based upon a study of nature and of man's natural inclinations, it is clear that a large part of his discourse is an expression of his own preference for absolute monarchy. On this account he tends to overlook the possibility of restraining the power of a sovereign by democratic procedures. Nevertheless, the Leviathan is a remarkable attempt to explain and justify the institution of government, and it remains one of the masterpieces of political thought.

LIBER AMORIS

Type of work An autobiographical account of a love affair

Author William Hazlitt (1778 1830)

Time 1820 1822

Locale London and Scotland

First published 1823

Principal personages

H (WILLIAM HAZLITT), the lover, a writer

S (SARAH WALKER) the beloved

M W (MICAIAH WALKER), her father a landlord and tradesman

C P (PETER GEORGE PATMORE), Hazlitt's friend

J S K (JAMES SHERIDAN KNOWLES) another of Hazlitt's friends

Since William Hazlitt was a writer, it was not enough that he found himself passionately attracted to his landlord's daughter, he had to write about it Liber Amoris, or, The New Pygmalion appeared in 1823, slightly disguised by initials in place of names, as the anonymous account of a writer's foolish passion but it was not long before the secret was out. A reviewer for John Bull claimed that the review in the Times, favorable to the book, had been written by Hazlitt himself, and an effort was made to picture the girl of the account as a young, innocent child and Hazlitt as an "impotent sensualist."

The fact is that Liber Amoris was properly subtitled The New Pygmalion, for Hazlitt allowed his quite natural passion for an attractive and compliant young lady to lead him into flights of creative imagination whereby he sought to give her traits of character and depth of feeling to match her physical charms. His conversations with the landlord's daughter, delightfully transcribed at the beginning of the work, show Hazlitt to have been as much dazzled by his own literary facility in expressing her charms as he was with the charmer herself, seated upon his lap day after day and returning his kisses. By the end of the affair, after he had discovered that she was no more than a flirt—and not an innocent one at that—what impressed him most of all was that she was not what she had seemed. What she seemed to be is what, in his writer's imagination, he made her, and what he discovered, when he realized her true nature, was that reality does not bother to copy the images of poets, even when they write a Liber Amoris.

The Pygmalion theme is never explicitly developed in the book, but Hazlitt speaks of Sarah as "the statue." In the first of his letters to C P, Esq. written from Scotland, Hazlitt wrote in a footnote, "I have begun a book of our conversations (I mean mine and the statue's) which I call Liber Amoris." Later, in Letter XIII, the next to last letter of Part II of the Liber Amoris, he wrote to Patmore again concerning Sarah: "Since I wrote to you about making a formal proposal, I have had her face constantly before me, looking so like some faultless marble statue, as cold as fixed and graceful as ever statue did."

The book begins with a series of conversations, apparently the result of Hazlitt's attempt to recreate the substance and feeling of amatory moments spent with Sarah. Then a series of letters to Patmore carry the narrative forward, telling of Hazlitt's hopes and doubts while in Scotland awaiting a divorce from his wife. The book closes with some letters to J S K which, unlike the letters to Patmore, were never actually sent but were composed to complete the book.

Hazlitt became acquainted with Sarah Walker after his separation from his wife Sarah, the second daughter of his landlord, Micaiah Walker, a tailor, was in her late teens when he met her. Ac cording to the Liber Amoris account, Sarah let him kiss her the first time they met, and during the first week of their acquaintance she sat upon his knee, and, in his words to her, "twined your arms round me, caressed me with every mark of tenderness consistent with modesty."

Later Hazlitt was to tell her father that Sarah had made a habit of sitting on his knee and kissing him. The father had supposed that the occasion upon which he had surprised the two lovers together was perhaps the only time such a thing occurred, but Hazlitt, trying to win sympathy for himself when he could not convince Sarah to marry him, assured Walker that "It was a constant habit it has happened a hundred times since, and a thousand before I lived on her caresses as my daily food, nor can I live without them."

The conversations are convincing and lively more self-revealing than Hazlitt probably supposed. They show a man convinced of his ability to charm with language one whom he had so often kept busy with embraces. By the brief answers which Sarah gives we can guess that she found him something of a chatterbox and wished that he would pay more attention to the physical side of love and less to the spiritual and literary aspects of the experience.

For Hazlitt the overwhelming problem of his affair with Sarah was how to reconcile their hours of intimacy with her refusal to marry him or, at least to live with him "in friendship." He asks her for an answer, he asks his friends, he asks her mother and father. But Sarah had the answer all along, only he lacked the ability to recognize its truth. "I told you my regard could amount to no more than friendship." Of course, it was the friendship of a healthy girl who enjoyed nothing more than being fondled by the lodgers in her father's house, but Hazlitt had the conventional notion that a girl who seems innocent and demure makes love only because she wishes to signify an intention to accept a proposal of marriage.

The course of the affair is simply told. Hazlitt met the tailor's daughter, kissed her on their first meeting, and held her on his lap. The entertainment continued for hundreds of performances. Hazlitt, as a writer, spent a good part of the time expressing his love in elaborate, literary ways which, for the most part, Sarah failed to appreciate. He kept making the effort to win from her a declaration of love to match his own, but she insisted that he could never be more than a friend to her. He gave her various books, including several he had written—and a small bronze figure of Napoleon which she treasured because it reminded her of a man she had cared for, a nobleman who considered the social distance between himself and Sarah too great to be overcome.

After Hazlitt went to Scotland to await a divorce from his wife, he wrote entreating letters to Sarah which were either not answered or were answered perfunctorily. His doubts and hopes were expressed at great length in letters to his friend Patmore.

Upon returning to London, after the divorce, Hazlitt again tried to persuade Sarah to marry him, but on the pretext that he had insulted her in a quarrel before his journey, when he had suggested vaguely that she was easy in her favors, she not only refused to marry him but returned the books and the statuette, which he promptly smashed. He finally discovered that she was playing the same game with another gentleman, C—, and that she had been doing so during the very period when he thought he had her embraces to himself alone. His final opinion of her, contrasting with the image of her as she seemed to be, was that she was "a practiced, callous wile, a regular lodging-house decoy, played off by her mother upon the lodgers, one after another, applying them to her different purposes, laughing at them in turns, and herself the probable dupe and victim of some gallant in the end"

Despite Hazlitt's literary flights shown in both the conversations and the letters, Liber Amoris is a convincing and compelling account of an ordinary love affair. The style is mannered, in the fashion of a time when literary elaboration of ordinary passion was as much a sport as holding the landlord's daughter on one's knee. Yet beneath the poetry and the banter there is something of the English spirit and attitude which gives a dignity to what would otherwise be too trivial to be worth writing about, whatever the joys and pains of the participants. Hazlitt shows himself to be a divided man, worldly enough to realize that the girl, for all her demureness, allowed him liberties which she could not have allowed were she all she seemed to be, yet romantic enough and idealistic enough to suppose that somehow the fault was in himself and that all he had to do was to make himself worthy of her love and esteem. In this division of self Hazlitt shows himself to be the romantic Englishman—cynical and hopeful at the same time.

It is not enough to say that the portrait of Hazlitt and his "statue" is convincing and typical. Considered as a piece of literary work, Liber Amoris is remarkable in that it sustains interest with material so slight. What accounts for Hazlitt's success is the spirit of the piece, it is amusing, lively, sophisticated and revealing of human foibles—all at once. It is a minor piece, and perhaps it is better to remember Hazlitt as a critical essayist, but it is from such minor pieces that English literature acquires its distinctive flavor and enduring charm.

LIEH KUO CHIH

Type of work Novel

Author Feng Meng lung (1574? 1645?)

Type of plot Historical romance

Time of plot 770-220 B C

Locale China

First published Probably early seventeenth century

Principal personages

KING YU, the last king of the Western Chou dynasty
KING P'ING, the first king of the Eastern Chou dynasty
DUKE HUAN OF CH'U, the first overlord
KUAN CHUNG, a philosopher and statesman
DUKE WEN OF CHIN, an overlord
KING CHUAN OF CHU, an overlord
DUKE HSIAO OF CH'IN, a powerful feudal lord
SHANG YANG, a statesman and political reformer
SU CH'IN, a diplomat
CHANG I, a diplomat
CHING K'UO, an assassin
SHIH HUANG TI, "The First Emperor" of Ch'in, a tyrant

Critique

A popularized history, based entirely on Chinese classics, the Lieh Kuo Chih or Tung Chou Lieh Kuo Chih (Chronicles of Divers Feudal States under the Eastern Chou Dynasty) contains no fictitious figures. Its dramatis personae are numerous, including almost all the kings, princes, feudal lords, heroes, and villains throughout China from the early eighth century to the end of the third century B C. This period of 550 years is probably the most important in Chinese history. We see how feudalism flourished, how the seven "contending kingdoms" fought bloody wars, and how China was reunified under the tyrant Ch'in Shih Huang. Much of the political institutions and strategic ideas of the succeeding centuries had their origins in the statesmen and generals of this period, just as Lao tzu, Confucius, and leaders of other schools, all of whom appear in the text, marked the beginnings of systematic philosophical thought in China. Side by side with the shocking accounts of political assassination, incest, and massacre, heroic actions and noble deeds are recounted, to be remembered by posterity as the supreme lessons of practical morality. The classic version of this novel is credited to Feng Meng lung, a prolific anthologist who edited and rewrote earlier fiction and drama, interspersing them with original work of his own.

The Story

For hundreds of years the kings of Chou ruled China. King Yu wang (781-771 B.C.) had a beautiful concubine whom he loved dearly. But the girl always looked depressed. The king would pay any price to make her smile. One day he lighted the fire beacon, a signal to announce the approach of an enemy. As the feudal lords with their troops hurried to the rescue, they found the king drinking with his concubine. They were forced to lead their troops back. The concubine enjoyed the practical joke so much that for the first time she gave a hearty laugh.

The Marquis of Shen, father of the lawful queen, resented the treatment of his daughter and grandson by the king, and he allied himself with the barbarians. Together they marched on the capital. The fire beacon was again lighted, but this time no rescuing troops appeared. King Yu wang was killed and the beautiful concubine carried away by the barbarians.

The capital was also sacked and destroyed. When the heir apparent, P'ing Wang, was raised to the throne, he moved the government to Loyang, a city to the east. This was the beginning of the Eastern Chou dynasty (770 B.C.). From that time on, the royal house was weakened, and several feudal states rose to unprecedented power. The territory in the west, the present province of Shensi, was given up to the State of Ch'in, which gradually aggrandized itself as a result of the conquest of the neighboring tribes of barbarians, and became the force to reunify China centuries later.

The first feudal lord to attain to imperial importance was Duke Huan of Ch'i (685-643 B.C.) who occupied the northeast of the present province of Shangtung. His prime minister, Kuan Chung, on whom the duke relied heavily, launched a program of economic reconstruction. With his people enjoying economic prosperity at home and placing full confidence in him, the duke began a series of diplomatic moves which successfully bound various other states by treaty and he became an overlord, the leader of the feudal lords, defender of the royal house, and protector of weaker states.

The great menace to the allied states, with the King of Chou as their nominal head, was Ch'u, occupying, roughly, the present provinces of Hupeh and Hunan, a mere viscountship in the south, generally considered barbarous, but grown so formidable in its military strength and vast in its territory that its rulers defied the royal house and called themselves kings. The utmost Duke Huan of Ch'i accomplished with regard to the potential enemy in the south, though he had chased the barbarians in the northeast up to the border of Manchuria during a military campaign to help the much harassed state of Yen, was to bring about a pact of amity. The smaller states, under the pressure of circumstances, were often compelled to choose between joining the allies led by Ch'i or paying allegiance to Ch'u.

The first severe blow to Ch'u was dealt by Duke Wen of Chin, another prince who had become an overlord. Nearly a thousand chariots of war on either side, each with its allies, were engaged in a battle at a place called Ch'engpu (632 B C) and Ch'u was defeated. This was the first great battle in Chinese history, and it is said to have saved Chinese civilization. Chin (occupying the present province of Shansi) for two centuries remained a great state in the north, but the power of the duke was usurped by his hereditary ministers until he had as little authority over his retainers as did the King of Chou over the feudal lords. The retainers fought fiercely among themselves and the houses of Wei, Han, and Chao emerged as the victors. These three retainers were recognized as hereditary feudal lords by the king, in 403 B C. In 376 B C they divided among them the territory of Chin.

The power and prestige of Ch'u reached its zenith under King Chuan (613-591 B C), who defeated Chin. A hundred years later two other states in the south, hitherto obscure, extended their influence to the north. The first was Wu (now Kiangsu) whose armies in one campaign reached as far as the capital of Ch'u (506 B C) but were forced to withdraw before the intervention of Ch'in from the northwest. Though it had also defeated Ch'i, the glory of Wu soon faded, it was conquered by Yueh (now Chekiang) in 473 B C, and in 334 B C Yueh was annexed by Ch'u.

After endless internal disturbance within most of the states and wars among them, seven "great powers" were left: Ch'in, Ch'u, Ch'i, Wei, Han, Chao, and Yen. The smaller and weaker states gradually became extinct, to the aggrandizement of the powers. The authority of the royal house was now utterly disregarded. The potentates of the great powers followed the once detested example of Ch'u to assume kingship in the fourth century B C. It was an age of the test of strength, when each state had to fight with every possible resource, military, diplomatic, material, and ideological, for survival if not to win supremacy.

Of the seven, Ch'in was considered geographically unassailable. Having annexed a large territory in the west, it was ready to bid for supremacy in China. Under Duke Hsiao (361-338 B C), organization of the peoples, which had been remarkable, was further strengthened by the policies of the prime minister, Shang Yang. The foundations of a totalitarian empire had been laid.

The military strength of Ch'in having struck such terror into the other states, their main problem was how to deal with the power in the west. At one time an alliance of six was formed to contend against Ch'in acting upon the strategy of the diplomat Su Ch'in, who also became the chancellor of the confederation. But Su's scheme was obstructed by his former fellow student, Chang I, who was working hard for Ch'in. With crafty maneuvers, bribery, and threats Ch'in succeeded in dividing the allies who were either to accept defeat or to place their inter-allied jealousy above their common cause. In 317 B C Su Ch'in was assassinated.

The conquest of the six states by Ch'in was delayed by the efforts of the Four Statesmen of Ch'i, Ch'u, Chao, and Wei. Able administrators and diplomats, they also gained great fame as patrons who threw open their doors to the scholars and men of ability who were wandering all over China seeking employment. Their popularity and ability enabled their states to hold out against Ch'in while they lived, after their deaths, none was able to stop the advance of the conqueror.

Ching K'o of Yen made a heroic attempt to assassinate the man then sitting on the throne of Ch'in (227 B C). His effort failed, however, and the king of Ch'in was crowned as Shih Huang ti, "The First Emperor," known to posterity as the builder of the Great Wall and the burner of the books, after the conquest of his six rivals (220 B C). The last shadow monarch of the Chou Dynasty died in 256 B C.

THE LIFE AND DEATH OF MR BADMAN

Type of work Allegorical dialogue
Author John Bunyan (1628-1688)
First published 1680

Principal characters

MR BADMAN, a sinner
MR WISEMAN, who tells about Badman's career
MR ATTENTIVE, a listener

Practically every literate speaker of English has heard of The Pilgrim's Progress and its author, John Bunyan. Less well known to readers, however, are Bunyan's other writings including The Life and Death of Mr Badman. There are reasons, of course, for modern neglect of Bunyan's other works. For one, there are relatively few readers attracted to the vast bulk of seventeenth-century religious writings in our time. For another, The Life and Death of Mr Badman, being a didactic work, seems to the modern reader sententious and dull. Thirdly, the moral viewpoints expressed by Bunyan in The Life and Death of Mr Badman sound strange in this century, so foreign are the writer's ideas to those prevalent in our time.

Yet in one sense The Life and Death of Mr Badman is a companion piece to The Pilgrim's Progress. The latter work shows the Christian, devoted and obedient, winning his way to the rewards of righteousness, while the former illustrates what happens to the sinner who steadfastly refuses to acknowledge his evil ways and insists upon leading a depraved existence throughout a life that can be characterized only as evil, regardless of whether one agrees wholeheartedly with Bunyan's code of ethics in its entirety. The protagonist of the story, as it is related in dialogue, is Mr Badman. He has all the evil in his heart one could possibly ask. Unlike the typical hero of picaresque fiction, Mr Badman has no aspect which can endear him to the reader. Bunyan expected his readers to feel that the sooner Mr Badman received punishment the better, there is no need to shed tears over such a character.

Bunyan's technique in presenting the story of Mr Badman is to have Mr Wiseman, the author's spokesman, relate the story of Badman's life shortly after the sinner's death. Mr Wiseman's listener, aptly named Mr Attentive, not only listens carefully but also draws out the details of the narrative when Mr Wiseman lags. The dialogue form is an old one, used for ages to bring edifying material to the reader and force him into the role of a passive participant.

Possibly the most striking characteristic in The Life and Death of Mr Badman is the insistence upon moral free choice and the assurance on the part of John Bunyan that all moral responsibility rests with the individual. Bunyan had no room in his theories for environmental determinism. The idea that the environment—family, the community, society in general—could be blamed for an individual's wrongdoing could not be fitted into Bunyan's moral philosophy. In the early pages of the dialogue between Mr Wiseman and Mr Attentive, putting the words into Mr Wiseman's mouth as he speaks of Mr Badman, Bunyan wrote:

"I will tell you that from a child he was very bad. His very beginning was ominous and presaged that no good end was in likelihood to follow thereupon. There were several sins that he was given to when he was but a little one, that manifested him to be notoriously infected with original corruption, for I dare say he learned none of them of his father or mother, nor was he admitted much to go abroad among other children that were vile, to learn to sin of them, nay, contrariwise, if at any time he did get abroad amongst others, he would be as the inventor of bad

words and an example in bad actions
To them all he used to be as we say,
the ringleader and master sinner from a child”

To this kind of theory voiced by Mr Wiseman, Mr Attentive agrees whole heartedly, saying that certainly evil ways come from within the individual rather than, as most people believe today, from without

The burden of the career of Mr Badman is that one sin begets another As a small child Badman, who has, says Bunyan, a host of equivalents in every generation, begins by lying and stealing from other members of the household, and he goes on to invest himself with almost the entire catalogue of sinfulness Swearing, whoring, drinking, faithlessness in marriage, hypocrisy, and many other sins are committed by Badman during his life time

Each mention of a new sin as the story of Mr Badman's life progresses sends Mr Wiseman or Mr Attentive off into a kind of sermon or into a series of examples

Scholars have pointed out that the examples Bunyan used in the dialogue were often borrowed from other writers in whose books Bunyan had found them during his own reading Bunyan accepted the stories he used as examples as fact, just as Cotton Mather was willing to accept signs of “Divine Providences” when they helped him to prove a point to his congregation or his readers

There is no need to wonder why Bunyan wrote this dialogue of a sinner's progress, for he makes his purpose abundantly clear in an address to the ‘Courteous Reader’ The world, says Bunyan again and again, is full of sinful people, and Mr Badman has his relatives in every family and household Convinced that there are so many sinners, Bunyan hopes to spread a word that may either convert or confound Even Bunyan's Courteous Reader is viewed by the author as a possible (even probable) sinner, and he is asked to consider carefully whether he is treading in Mr Badman's path to perdition

LIFE OF NELSON

Type of work Biography

Author Robert Southey (1774 1843)

Time 1758 1805

Locale England the British colonies, the Continent, the high seas

First published 1813

Principal personages

VISCOUNT HORATIO NELSON English naval hero

EDMUND NELSON his father

LADY EMMA HAMILTON, his mistress

LADY FRANCES NELSON, his wife

MAURICE SUCKLING, Nelson's uncle, a naval captain, later Comptroller of the Navy

SIR WILLIAM HAMILTON, English ambassador to Naples

THOMAS TROUBRIDGE,

ALEXANDER BALL,

SAMUEL HOOD,

BENJAMIN HALLOWELL,

HYDE PARKER,

THOMAS GRAVES,

EARL ST VINCENT (SIR JOHN JERVIS), and

CUTHBERT COLLINGWOOD, English naval officers

“What has poor Horatio done, who is so weak, that he, above all the rest [of your children], should be sent to rough it out at sea? But let him come, and the first time we go into action, a cannon ball may knock off his head, and provide for him at once "

Had Nelson's uncle, Captain Maurice Suckling, been prophetic in this letter to Nelson's father, the course of English history subsequent to the Napoleonic Wars (1803 1815) might well have been quite different from what it has been. The weakness of the twelve year old Hero that Captain Suckling referred to was only physical. Weak though he was, Nelson had already given proof of the resoluteness of heart and nobleness of mind that were to characterize his distinguished career.

Always a stranger to fear and a companion of honor, Nelson led the exemplary life that his father foresaw for his son. Nelson's father had always marked him for success in whatever profession he might follow. Through his indomitable spirit, his seafaring abilities, and his acumen in personal relationships, Nelson was a lieutenant at nineteen, a captain at twenty one, and an admiral before he was thirty.

From his maiden voyage to India early in his career, Nelson, reduced almost to a skeleton by tropical disease, was returned home. Dejected by his physical condition and the diminished promise of success in his career, he considered suicide for a time. But from this state of mind he suddenly rallied with a feeling bordering on the religious, so obsessed was he by the "sudden glow of patriotism presented by king and country as my patron."

Southey's explanation of this fervor and determination that spurred Nelson on to become a hero is compatible in its beauty with the exquisite qualities of a man who surmounted obstacles to have his name become as well known as that of the country for which he achieved heroism.

He knew to what the previous state of dejection was to be attributed: that an enfeebled body, and a mind depressed, had cast this shade over his soul, but he always seemed willing to believe that the sunshine which succeeded bore with it a prophetic glory and that the light which led him on was light from heaven."

Though heroes are often seen in an aura of celestial light and divine guidance, Nelson was most cognizant of mundane matters that need attending to even though one confides in Providence. His readiness in political strategy was a factor in the first of his three greatest naval successes, the defeat of Napoleon's fleet at Aboukir in 1798. For more than a month Nelson's fleet had sought the French fleet in the Mediterranean. Thwarted at every attempt to get information concerning the French position or to secure supplies, Nelson turned at last to Lady Emma Hamilton, the wife of the English ambassador to Naples. Through her influence with the Queen of Naples, Nelson secured supplies at Syracuse and began again his pursuit of the French.

Contrary to his command to his men that they obey orders implicitly without questioning their propriety, Nelson, sometimes seeing circumstances in a different light from that of his superiors, did not always obey orders. In the victory at Copenhagen, in 1801, against the armed neutrality of the Baltic, Nelson, second in command, ignored his commander's order to cease action. Putting his telescope to his blind eye when he was told the signal giving the order had been raised (Nelson had lost the sight of one eye in battle at Calvi), he continued the attack, saying he could not see the signal.

Acting without orders from his commander, Sir John Jervis, Nelson was largely responsible for the defeat of the Spanish fleet at Cape St Vincent (1797). In that engagement the enemy fleet far outnumbered the English ships, twenty seven to fifteen. This victory destroyed a threatened invasion of England.

Another practical personal qualification contributing to Nelson's success was his ability as a leader, especially his attention to effective communication. He had marked confidence in his officers' abilities, but he was sure in every case possible that everyone knew his principles of tactics.

In keeping with his confidence in Providence, Nelson seemed obsessed with the assurance of victory. This attribute was inculcated into his men. Quite pleased with the scope of the plan of an attack against the French, one of Nelson's captains asked, "If we succeed, what will the world say?" "There is no if in the case," Nelson exclaimed. "That we shall succeed is certain—who may live to tell the story is a very different question."

After destroying thirteen French ships at Aboukir, making useless the French army in Egypt, placed there in preparation for Napoleon's projected conquest of the East, Nelson became an international hero. He was showered with congratulations, rewards, and honors by all countries which, because of his military success, had escaped Napoleon's aggression. Such accolades, received before he was thirty, were to become commonplace to England's greatest naval hero.

Southey's biography is no mere chronological recital of events. His descriptions of naval battles are sufficiently developed and detailed enough to provide the excitement of adventure stories. But in these, as in the more ordinary incidents, emphasis is on persons—their abilities and weaknesses, their hopes and disappointments. The writing has a poet's tone and spirit without poetic devices. This quality in the prose serves to convey the spirit of self-reliance, nonconformity, and courage that constitutes a hero. Clarity and conciseness are the keynotes of the style.

In his choice of biographical detail, Southey never lost sight of the fact that Nelson was first a man and then a naval hero. The strong bond of love and admiration between Nelson and his father, for example, is a warming thread throughout the book. The son's deliberate adherence to his father's counsel and the father's pride in the son's accomplishments add to the stature of the hero. It was fitting, in the light of this lifelong devotion between Nelson and his father, that a few months before the father's death the older Nelson came to accept Nelson's affair with Lady Hamilton. Perhaps in blind love for his son, he saw in his son's mistress a woman described by Southey as "a character which, both in its strength and in its weakness, resembled his own." This reconciliation meant much to Nelson because his association with Lady Hamilton had brought sorrow and displeasure to his father, especially when Nelson was separated from Lady Nelson.

Southey treats Nelson's marital situation in a matter-of-fact manner as another facet of the admiral's life. This is no love idyll, developed by a poet.

The affair began in Naples, where Sir William Hamilton was English ambassador and Nelson was in charge of a squadron during the French occupation of Naples (1798-1799). Nelson and the Hamiltons became inseparable friends; they returned to England together in 1800. At Sir William's death, he was holding Nelson's hand and entrusting Lady Hamilton to his care.

Nelson did arrange a pension for Lady Hamilton and Horatia Nelson Thompson, "believed to be his [Nelson's] daughter," as Southey discreetly identified the child, born to Lady Hamilton about the time Nelson was separating from Lady Nelson.

Nelson's third and last great victory was the sea battle fought off Cape Trafalgar, where in 1805 he destroyed both the French and Spanish fleets. This success culminated two years of strategic naval maneuvering and warfare, with Nelson in command of the fleet in the Mediterranean. During that time he blockaded the French fleet at Toulon for twenty-two months. The English victory at Trafalgar resulted in the capture of twenty enemy ships—not an English vessel was lost—and the end of Napoleon's power of the sea. But in that battle Nelson lost his life. His immortal words "England expects that every man will do his duty" were among his last

Nelson's stature is admirably established in Southey's description of his death

The most triumphant death is that of the martyr, the most awful that of the martyred patriot the most splendid, that of the hero in the hour of victory and if the chariot and the horses of fire had been vouchsafed for Nelson's translation he could scarcely have departed in a brighter blaze of glory He has left us not indeed his mantle of inspiration, but a name and an example, which are at this hour inspiring hundreds of the youth of England a name which is our pride, and an ex ample which will continue to be our shield and our strength

The eminence of the subject and the cogency of Southey's writing make it easy to see why the American government published a special edition of the Life of Nelson and issued a copy to every seaman and officer in the American navy

Although Southey was poet laureate of England for thirty years, he is remembered for only a few of his vigorous short poems, "The Battle of Blenheim" being one of his best Ironically, the poet is best known today for his prose writing, this model among short biographies and a classic in English literature

THE LIFE OF SAMUEL JOHNSON, LL D

Type of work Biography

Author James Boswell (1740 1795)

Time The eighteenth century

Locale England

First published 1791

Principal personages

SAMUEL JOHNSON author critic, and lexicographer

JAMES BOSWELL, the biographer, Johnson's friend

DAVID GARRICK,

SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS,

MR AND MRS THRALE

DAVID HUME, and

OLIVER GOLDSMITH members of the Johnson circle

James Boswell's life of Samuel Johnson has usually been considered the greatest biography yet produced in the English language, and it has undoubtedly commanded more readers than any other biography written in English There are more massive biographies in our literature, such as David Masson's Life of Milton and J G Lockhart's Memoirs of the Life of Sir Walter Scott, but none has ever achieved the critical acclaim or the popularity or the prestige lavished justly upon Boswell's biography of Samuel Johnson

During his lifetime Boswell published three great works The Life of Samuel Johnson, LL D, The Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides with Samuel Johnson,

LL D, and An Account of Corsica The Journal of a Tour to That Island, and Memoirs of Pascal Paoli Of these three works, the Life of Johnson stood out as the greatest for almost a century and a half Within the last thirty years, however, a new estimate of James Boswell's work has had to be taken, for much of Boswell's writing was lost in manuscript until the 1920's During the period between 1927 and 1949 Colonel Isham, an American and a collector, brought together the papers which had been stored at Malahide Castle, near Dublin, Ireland, and the Forbes collection, which had accidentally passed into the hands of one of Boswell's executors and descended to the latter's heirs. Some of the papers were published by Isham, who sold the entire collection to Yale University in 1949 and 1950. The university has published several volumes of the papers under the general title of The Yale Editions of the Private Papers of James Boswell. Through such volumes of Boswell's writing as Boswell's London Journal, 1762-1763 (1950), Boswell in Holland, 1763-1764 (1952), and Boswell on the Grand Tour: Germany and Switzerland, 1764 (1953), Boswell has emerged as a splendid writer of journals. This fact, however, does not yet detract from his stature as the author of the biography of Johnson, nor will these newer works replace the biography as the most important of Boswell's books, even though critical opinion may be modified to grant him greater stature in literature than he once had.

We now know that the Life of Johnson was based upon what Boswell had recorded in copious journals which he kept during the greater part of his adult life. This is not to say, however, that the biography was merely a transcription of materials from those journals. From present knowledge of the papers it can be seen that Boswell was an artist in biography, choosing carefully what suited his needs and goals. Even those who feel that Boswell intruded himself too much into the biography must now recognize that he was at some pains to omit much material about Johnson in which he himself figured. Those who felt that Boswell intruded too much into the work possibly overlooked the fact that during Johnson's life Boswell was Johnson's friend and spent from four hundred to five hundred days with his subject, thus becoming himself a part of Johnson's life and the Johnsonian environment.

Boswell's method was to record materials about Johnson in his journals. Sometimes the material was recorded daily, but on occasion Boswell fell behind and had to rely upon his memory—a phenomenal one—to recall materials he had garnered in a period of four or five days and evenings. It is notable, too, that Boswell was careful to prompt Johnson into conversation, often asking what seem to be obvious or absurd questions in order to goad Johnson into making remarks worthy of record. One such question noted by critics is that in which Boswell asked Johnson what he would do if given the solitary care of a small infant, the question, seemingly absurd, led Johnson to reply in such fashion as to comment on rearing and educating children and to set forth a philosophy of education. The more we learn about Boswell and his work, the more we understand that he was not a mere transcriber, as critical legend held for some time, but that he was a skillful writer who shaped his materials in every way he could, instead of accepting them as he found them. The casual reader may even miss some of the more obvious points of care and artistry, such as notations on how Johnson looked and spoke when delivering comments and opinions.

Johnson was a man of many achievements. He single handedly brought forth the first recognized dictionary of the English language, he also made himself famous as a writer by means of The Rambler papers, his tragedy Irene, his poetry, and his moral essays. As a moralist Johnson also won fame as the author of the didactic novel, The History of Rasselas, Prince of Abyssinia. As a critic he was famous for his Lives of the Poets and his preface to an edition of Shakespeare's plays. People great and small admired Johnson, including many of the famous and remarkable Englishmen of his time, men like Hume, Reynolds, Goldsmith, and Garrick. In addition, he was a picturesque, at times even ludicrous, figure, and this fact Boswell did not attempt to hide, taking to himself the task of writing "not his panegyric, which must be all praise, but his Life, which great and good as he was, must not be supposed to be perfect." In further defense of his way of writing biography, Boswell wrote near the beginning of his biography

I am fully aware of the objections which may be made to the minuteness on some occasions of my detail of Johnson's conversation and how happily it is adapted for the petty exercise of ridicule by men of superficial understanding and ludicrous fancy but I remain firm and confident in my opinion that minute particulars are frequently characterstuck and always amusing when they relate to a distinguished man I am therefore exceedingly unwilling that anything however slight, which my illustrious friend thought it worth his while to express with any degree of point, should perish

Boswell realized, as we know from what he himself said and wrote, that the function and art of biography is to focus on the subject and keep him constantly before the reader This Boswell did in his biography of Johnson To do so he carefully gathered together more than what he knew at first hand of the man who was his friend and subject He exercised diligence and care in collecting letters written by Johnson, including the text of the famous letter to Lord Chesterfield He collected, too, letters written about Johnson, as well as anecdotes about his subject's life trying at the same time to establish the authenticity of these reports he had of Johnson These materials are presented in the biography in chronological order If the results have some defects, the defects are more or less forgiv-

able in view of their sparseness Seldom did Boswell record facts which later biographers needed to correct

If the account of Johnson's life before meeting Boswell is relatively short, this fact may be excused on the ground that Boswell used only what information about Johnson's early life that he could gather and trust Naturally he had a much larger fund of materials from the period during which he knew Johnson personally Some critics have noted Boswell's reluctance to interpret Of this reluctance, it must be said that interpretation was not Boswell's way Upon occasion he generalized upon Johnson perceptively, but he preferred, as he carefully stated, to present the particulars, rather than the generalizations The result is that Johnson is "alive" in the Life as few biographical subjects are, with his personality and character borne out by his own spoken and written words On occasion the reader may feel that Johnson's written words, usually letters, have been inserted where they fit none too well, seeming to interfere with the flow of the book And yet they are a part of the scheme Boswell worked out and put together

Samuel Johnson has been the subject of many biographies, five, for example appeared after Johnson's death and before Boswell's work Others have been written since, but none has ever equaled in merit Boswell's Life of Samuel Johnson, LL D

THE LINK

Type of work Drama

Author August Strindberg (1849-1912)

Type of plot Social criticism

Time of plot Late nineteenth century

Locale Sweden

First presented 1893

Principal characters

BARON SPRENGEL

BARONESS SPRENGEL his wife

THE JUDGE

THE PASTOR

ALEXANDERSSON a farmer

TWELVE JURORS

THE LINK by August Strindberg from PLAYS BY AUGUST STRINDBERG Translated by Edwin Bjorkman By permission of the publishers Charles Scribner's Sons Copyright 1912 by Charles Scribner's Sons Renewed All rights reserved

Critique

The Link, a one act play in sixteen scenes, is one of Strindberg's briefer attempts to deal dramatically with the problems of marriage and divorce—problems which concerned him personally throughout his adult life (He had experienced the first of his three divorces in 1891, and there are undoubtedly autobiographical connections here.) The "link," which gives the play its title, is the child of the two people who wish to be separated. The child holds them together when everything else is gone between them, the desire to prevent the child from becoming a ward of the court unites them, their old antagonisms still alive, in a common bond of enmity against the unfeeling powers of the state. In this, the play becomes something more than merely a commentary on divorce. It becomes an expose of modern justice. Once the conflict of Baron Sprengel and his wife is placed before the court, it is no longer theirs. In the hands of the youthful Judge and the callous jurors, it is stripped of its human qualities and reduced to the cold terms of abstract argument. This is a social evil, but the ever present moralist in Strindberg seems to imply that it is fit punishment for the sins of the erring husband and wife.

The Story

The courtroom was crowded, for popular interest in the two cases about to be heard—a false accusation charge brought against the farmer Alexandersson by his servant girl, Alma Jonsson, and a separation suit between Baron and Baroness Sprengel—was running high. The young Judge, only twenty seven years old, was uneasy. He was taking the bench for the first time. He conferred at length with the Pastor before opening the proceedings.

The Alexandersson Jonsson case was first. The old farmer admitted accusing the girl of theft, he had, he claimed, caught her red handed. There were, however, no witnesses, and, as the charges could not be proved, his accusations were false—so the girl's lawyer asserted. While the court was cleared, Judge and jury conferred. All agreed that the farmer, though actually in the right, was nevertheless technically guilty. Had he denied accusing the girl, nothing could have been done to him, by being honest, however, he had lost his case. Finally the Judge called Alexandersson in and sentenced him to a fine of a hundred crowns—enough, Alexandersson claimed, to cause the loss of his farm.

The divorce case came next. The Sprengels had planned to handle things as amicably as possible. The baron was to bring the complaint against his wife, charging her with a disposition incompatible with his. She was to have a sizable annuity and the custody of their one child, a son. The baron, however, was to retain the right to supervise the child's education. These were to be the terms, and none of the personal details of their quarrel were to be brought out.

Such was their agreement, but, once the proceedings began, they found that the agreement was not to be honored. The court, the young Judge curtly informed them, would decide the disposition of the child. Meanwhile, the separation case must be decided. The husband, as complainant, must substantiate his claim.

Confused by the attitude of the court and sensing the possibility of losing her child, the baroness responded emotionally to the planned charges of her husband. The baron, realizing that his right to have charge of the boy's education was threatened by the attitude of the court, asserted that the baroness, by her feminine methods of child rearing, was undermining the boy's masculinity.

Here the agreement for an amicable settlement broke down completely. Under the goading of the court, the two became overt enemies. All of the sordid details were dragged into the open. The baroness, turning complainant, charged the baron with adultery and produced letters to prove her accusation. The baron met this charge with a stream of vilification, which the baroness emotionally returned. Enraged, the baron announced a countercharge of adultery. The baroness defied him to prove his accusation. The baron promised that he would.

At that point the young Judge adjourned the proceedings and sought help from the elderly Pastor. The Judge, despairing of doing justice, threatened to give up his profession. The Pastor advised him always to adhere to the strict, abstract letter of the law and never to consider the human involvements in a case—else he would go mad. Meanwhile, the baron and the baroness were exchanging personal vituperations.

When the proceedings resumed, the baroness agreed to testify under oath that she was not guilty of adultery. Technical quibblings on her right to testify followed. Then the farmer Alexandersson, probably as a false witness, piqued by the injustice done him, arose and claimed that he had actually observed the baroness' infidelities. While the validity of his testimony was being argued, the baron produced copies of incriminating letters, the originals of which the baroness had seen him destroy.

Again the court was cleared so that Judge and jury could confer. As they waited, the husband and wife realized that they both had lost: that they both had been defeated by the inhuman forces of a hostile society. Their child, they knew, would be taken from them and brought up ignobly in the name of peasant morality. This realization brought them temporarily together. The baron left to take the child to his mother, out of the court's hands.

He returned just in time to hear the verdict. The two were to be separated for a year and the child placed in the custody of a peasant couple. The baron informed his wife that he had not spirited the child away but had left him at the Pastor's house in preparation for appeal. In the verdict to a higher court. He predicted the wranglings and heartaches they would endure in the course of the appeal and suggested that it all was a judgment of God upon them for the years that they had lived together unmarried before the child had been born.

THE LION OF FLANDERS

Type of work Novel

Author Hendrik Conscience (1812-1883)

Type of plot Historical romance

Time of plot 1298-1305

Locale Flanders

First published 1838

Principal characters

PETER DECONINCX dean of the clothworkers' guild at Bruges

JAN BREYDEL dean of the butchers' guild at Bruges

COUNT ROBERT DE BETHUNE called the Lion of Flanders

COUNT GUY OF FLANDERS Count Robert's elderly father

LADY MATILDA, Count Robert's daughter

ADOLF OF NIEWLAND, a Flemish knight in love with Lady Matilda

Critique

Hendrik Conscience is regarded as the father of modern Flemish literature, for it was he who first used the Flemish language in his fiction, thus reviving what was a dying literary language. Writing soon after Belgium had become a nation, before his death Conscience gained recognition as a leader of culture in that country, honored by his government in many ways. His books, including The Lion of Flanders, his first great success, have been translated into other languages. Like other novels by Conscience, this work presents a period in the history of Flanders and the Flemish speaking people in a manner similar to that of Sir Walter Scott in his fiction and in its ample historical detail and pageant like descriptions, it is typical of Conscience's work. Students of Flemish culture assert that the pictures of medieval life in Flanders are highly accurate. Others will find that plot and atmosphere combine to give the book a romantic sweep that adds to the interest and pleasure of the reader.

The Story

At the beginning of the fourteenth century Philip the Fair ruled as King of France, along with his queen, Joanna of Navarre. At the time the French treasury was almost depleted from the cost of many wars, and Philip hoped to refill it with treasure and tax money from the rich cities of Flanders. The burghers, jealous of their privileges, refused to pay, even when asked to do so by Count Guy of Flanders, who was Philip's vassal. Count Guy found himself the victim of the king's displeasure, with his lands confiscated and his daughter Philippa imprisoned in the Louvre. In hopes of aiding Count Guy, Charles de Valois, King Philip's brother, took the Flemish barons to the king to effect a reconciliation. Despite the safe conduct guaranteed by his brother, the king imprisoned the nobles. He was led to that unworthy deed by his queen, who hated the Flemings, nobles and commoners alike. Chagrined by his royal brother's unknighly conduct, Charles de Valois broke his sword and vowed not to serve France until his brother's reign was ended.

Only one Flemish noble, Sir Diederik die Vos, nicknamed the Fox, escaped. Disguising himself as a palmer, he set out to return to his native province where he hoped to lay plans to help his fellow Flemings. The French took over Castle Wynandael, the home of Count Guy's daughter, Lady Matilda, Count Robert's daughter, fled to Bruges and found asylum in the home of Adolf of Nieuwland. Another of her protectors was Peter Deconinck, powerful dean of the great clothworkers' guild in the city.

At the time the Flemings were divided into three groups. One, the Liliards, favored collaboration with the French. Another, made up chiefly of commoners, favored supporting Count Guy and independence, even though the count was the French king's prisoner; this group was known as the Clawards, after the claws of the heraldic device of Flanders, a lion. The third group, made up of nobles, held back from participation in the disagreements, because the commoners were involved they did not consider this a conflict in which they could become involved with honor.

Determined to subjugate the Flemings, Philip the Fair entered Bruges with a military force and appointed his queen's uncle governor of Flanders. After the king left a per capita tax was laid on the citizens to pay for the cost of the visit. Peter Deconinck advised his clothworkers not to pay the tax, for his rebellious counsel he was placed in prison. To Deconinck's rescue went Jan Breydel, dean of the butchers, and freed him. In retaliation the Liliards and the French governor planned to hang both Deconinck and Breydel as the first step in forcing the guilds and the people to submit entirely. The two deans of the guilds made battle plans and met force with force. The Liliards were forced into the confines of the castle, but at last the threat of pillage by the French forces outside the city forced the Clawards to submit. The French entered the city, freed the Liliards, and held the people of Bruges at their mercy.

One day as Adolf of Nieuwland walked in the countryside outside the city walls he met Sir Diederik die Vos in the disguise of a friar. The nobleman brought word that the French vassal who guarded Count Robert de Bethune, called the Lion of Flanders, was willing to grant Count Robert freedom for a time if some one else would take his place Adolf of Niewland agreed to do so

Some weeks later the French, led by a disloyal clothworker, arrested Lady Matilda and prepared to take her off to prison in France Lady Matilda had displeased Queen Joanna, and this was the queen's revenge As soon as he learned what had happened, Jan Breydel set off to rescue Lady Matilda Captured, he managed to escape Returning with several hundred followers, he burned the castle at Male A small band of French knights escaped, taking Lady Matilda with them A short time later they met a knight in black armor who rescued the girl The knight was Count Robert in disguise He was so pleased with the conduct of Deconinck and Breydel that he left word that they were to be knighted at the first opportunity

On his return to Bruges, Breydel found that many citizens were fleeing to the country, the Clawards deeming it unsafe to remain in the city They were led by Deconinck, who hoped to join forces with some nobles who were ready to support actively the cause of Count Guy of Flanders At a council of war Count Robert advised that they prepare as quickly as possible as large a force as they could, for the French king was gathering an army of seventy thousand men to subdue Flanders He also brought word that his sister Philippa had been poisoned in prison

Meanwhile, the Clawards left in Bruges were badly mistreated On May 13, 1302, in an attempt to cow the population, the French governor and the Lilyards picked out eight men to be hanged Only one of the eight was saved—the father of Jan Breydel, rescued by his son at the last minute In immediate retaliation the French killed all the Clawards they could find and pillaged their homes, among the victims were the mother and sister of Jan Breydel Then the Clawards returned to the city in force and killed seven thousand Frenchmen and many Lilyards Only a handful of the French escaped When the city was restored to order, Lady Matilda and Adolf of Niewland returned to the latter's home Soon after, Lord Guy, the younger brother of Count Robert, arrived with a body of troops to help protect the city

Philip the Fair, undaunted by the setback at Bruges, raised a large army for the invasion of Flanders The Flemings, seeing that their land must be laid waste by the French or defended to the utmost, took an oath to stand together and gathered their forces to resist the French Soon the two armies, each in excess of sixty thousand men, advanced to meet in battle The Flemish took up a defensive position before the city of Courtrai There, in full view and hearing of all, Lady Matilda and Lord Guy, her uncle, invested Peter Deconinck and Jan Breydel with knighthood, as Count Robert had commanded The French army, meanwhile, had camped near Lille The French leader, Count Robert d'Artois, was so eager to do battle that he failed to reconnoiter the Flemish position His vows of bloody revenge were so terrible that part of his force deserted, preferring to fight with the Flemings rather than dishonor themselves

The French advanced from Lille to the attack At first the advantage was on their side, but their failure to make a reconnaissance left a trap for their cavalry Before the city of Courtrai was a large, deep marsh, into which wave after wave of the French horsemen sank, to be ridden over by their comrades who followed and to be decimated by weapons of the Flemish forces Even so, for a time the battle seemed to go against the Flemings, until a knight in gold appeared He was Count Robert, the Lion of Flanders, freed again from his prison for a time and hurrying to the aid of his people Under his leadership the Flemings won the victory After the battle Count Robert returned to his prison, knowing that the French would not dare kill him, lest hostages held by the Flemish army be killed in reprisal Before he left, Count Robert promised that Lady Matilda should become the bride of Adolf of Niewland. The young knight had fought bravely in the battle. Badly wounded, he was recovering in the monastery in which Lady Matilda had taken refuge.

After the battle at Courtrai, called the Battle of the Golden Spurs, Flanders was safe, trade and commerce flourished again. The French still tried to subdue the Flemish people, but several such attempts ended in failure. Philip the Fair dishonored himself in one truce to write a treaty, but additional French defeats forced him finally to give up all hope of subduing the stubborn, independent Flemish. Old Count Guy of Flanders died while waiting for the treaty to be signed and so was never released from his prison. But Count Robert, the Lion of Flanders, was set free after the signing of the treaty in 1305, and until his death seventeen years later he ruled over his free people

THE LITTLE CLAY CART

Type of work Drama

Author Shudraka (fl. 100 B.C.)

Type of plot Tragic comedy

Time of plot Fifth century B.C.

Locale Ancient Hindu city of Ujjayini

First presented Unknown

Principal characters

CHARUDATTA an impoverished young Brāhmana

VASANTASENĀ a courtesan in love with Chārudatta

MAITREYA a poor Brāhmana Chārudatta's friend

SAMSTHĀNAKA King Palaka's brother-in-law

ĀRYAKA an exiled prince

SARVILAKA a Brāhmana and a thief

MADANIKĀ, Vasantasena's slave and confidante

Critique

The Little Clay Cart is regarded by students of literature in the Western world as one of the two best extant Sanskrit plays, the other being Kālidāsa's Sakuntala. Many critics have pointed out that The Little Clay Cart is more like Western drama than any other Sanskrit play, in structure, characterization, and tone. This similarity to Occidental drama may account for the fact that its Indian critics have been less enthusiastic than those of the Western world. The Little Clay Cart is noteworthy for being the only known Sanskrit play to show a courtesan in love with a Brāhmana, as it is the only known one also to contain important characters from various strata of Hindu society, not from the upper castes only. It is the seemingly realistic and vivid presentation of these characters which probably has appealed most to Western readers. In the original the title is Mrcchakatikā.

The Story

Charudatta was a Brāhmana who had impoverished himself by spending his substance on the public welfare and in helping those individuals who sought his aid. Though dwelling in poverty in a broken-down house, he still enjoyed a fine reputation in Ujjayini as an honest and upright man of rare wisdom. This reputation eased somewhat the fact that he had been deserted by most of his friends and was embarrassed by his lack of wealth.

Although married happily and the proud father of a small son, Rohasena, Charudatta was enamored of Vasantasena, a courtesan of great wealth and reputation who, having seen him at a temple, was also in love with him. One evening as Chārudatta and his friend Maitreya sat discussing Charudatta's misfortunes and the efficacy of devotion to the gods, Vasantasenā found herself pursued by Samsthānaka, a half mad brother in law of King Palaka, and one of his henchmen. The men offered to do violence to Vasantasena, but she escaped from them in the darkness and found safety in the house of Chārudatta, where a meeting between the two increased the love they already felt for each other. The courtesan, before she left to return to her own palace, entrusted a casket of jewelry to Chārudatta, as an excuse to see him again.

During the night a thief, Sarvilaka, entered Chārudatta's house and stole the jewelry to buy his love, Madanikā, who was Vasantasena's slave and confidante. The courtesan accepted the jewels and freed Madanikā to marry Sarvilaka, intending to see that Chārudatta should learn that the jewels had been recovered. In the meantime, Chārudatta sent a rare pearl necklace of his wife's to Vasantasena to recompense the courtesan for the loss of the less valuable jewels. His friend Maitreya, fearing that Vasantasena's attentions could bring only bad luck and disaster, cautioned Chārudatta against doing so. Maitreya, knowing courtesans, believed that Vasantasena was merely scheming to take from Charudatta the few possessions he still had.

After leaving Vasantasena's palace with his newly freed bride, Sarvilaka learned that his friend, Prince Āryaka, had been arrested by King Palaka and placed in a dungeon. The king, neither a popular nor a just monarch, feared that the people might rise up, as a soothsayer had predicted, to place Prince Āryaka on the throne. After Sarvilaka succeeded in freeing the prince from prison, Āryaka sought help from Chārudatta, who aided him in escaping the pursuing guards.

Vasantasena, having proved her love for Charudatta by becoming his mistress, met his small son and gave him some jewels with which to purchase a golden toy cart to replace the unsatisfactory clay cart Charudatta had been able to afford. She made arrangements to meet Charudatta in Pushpakarandaka Park, outside the city, for a day's outing, but by mistake she entered the wrong vehicle and found herself in the gharn belonging to Samsthānaka, who still pursued her and was madly jealous of the love and favors she bestowed freely upon Chārudatta. When Vasantasena arrived at the park, she was discovered in the gharn by Samsthānaka, who at first was overjoyed at seeing her because he thought she had come to him voluntarily. When she spurned him and declared her love for Charudatta, Samsthānaka tried to make his henchmen kill her, but they refused. Samsthānaka sent his followers away and choked her himself. Believing her dead, he hid the body under a pile of leaves. Then, hoping to escape the penalty for his crime, Samsthānaka decided to go to a court and accuse Chārudatta of murdering Vasantasena.

When Samsthānaka first appeared at court, the judges, who knew him to be somewhat mad, refused to see him or take him seriously, but when he threatened to go to King Palaka, the judges became frightened and sent for Chārudatta. Falsely accused, Charudatta proclaimed his innocence. But circumstances were against him. He admitted having been in the park, and the jewels of Vasantasena were found at his home, offering a motive for the poverty stricken man to have killed the girl. The judges, in spite of his previous reputation, were forced to find Charudatta guilty. Although his status as a Brāhmana exempted him from the death penalty for any crime, King Palaka ordered Chārudatta put to death. No one knew that the body identified as Vasantasena's was that of another woman or that Vasantasena, befriended by a Buddhist monk, was recovering near the park from Samsthānaka's attack.

Charudatta was taken through the city by two executioners, who stopped several times to announce the name of the condemned man and the nature of his crime.

Although the people of the city loved Charudatta, they dared not intervene on his behalf, even though he steadfastly maintained his innocence. Samsthana's slave tried to tell that his master had really committed the crime, but no one believed him, and so Charudatta and his executioners, accompanied by a crowd, continued on their way to the place of execution, a cemetery south of the city.

The executioners, thinking to be merciful, offered to decapitate Charudatta, but a miracle prevented their sword from touching him, and so they prepared the victim for the slow, agonizing death by impalement upon a pike. Fortunately, Vasantasena, seeing the excited crowd as she made her way back to the city, intervened in time. When she told who had really attacked her, though unsuccessfully, Samsthana was arrested. The excitement was not ended, however, for word came that Chārudatta's wife, believing herself a widow, was about to cast herself upon a funeral pyre. Chārudatta reached her in time to prevent her death, and she and Vasantasena met and accepted one another. Word came, too, that Prince Aryaka had deposed King Palaka and was now king. One of his first deeds was to restore Charudatta's fortune and make him an important official of the court. Chārudatta, still a man of conscience and charity, forgave Samsthana's villainy and caused him to be set free.

THE LITTLE FOXES

Type of work Drama

Author Lillian Hellman (1905)

Type of plot Social realism

Time of plot 1900

Locale The Deep South

First presented 1939

Principal characters

REGINA GIDDENS, a predatory woman

BENJAMIN HUBBARD and

OSCAR HUBBARD, her brothers

HORACE GIDDENS, her husband

ALEXANDRA, daughter of Regina and Horace

BIRDIE HUBBARD, Oscar's wife

Critique

The Little Foxes is usually considered the major achievement of Lillian Hellman, and many critics place it high on the list of American plays. In the first place, it is technically a well-knit piece of writing: her dialogue crackles and her characters convince, there is no extraneous matter present, so that The Little Foxes is brilliantly compact and effective theater. Secondly, in the chicanery of the Hubbard family, we have what is probably an accurate picture of one aspect of the rise of industrialism in the post-Civil War South.

The Story

William Marshall, a Chicago business man, came South to negotiate with Benjamin and Oscar Hubbard and their sister, the striking Regina Giddens, over matters concerning the construction of a cotton mill. The Hubbard brothers and Regina foresaw a glittering future for them all. No longer would the cotton have to come to the machines, instead, at long last, it would be the other way around. They firmly believed that millions awaited them: the Hubbards would be the richest family in the South. Benjamin foresaw a stable of race horses, Oscar speculated on a new home, and the hapless Birdie, whom Oscar had married for her father's cotton fields, longed to see Lionnet, her old family home, restored to its former grace and beauty. Birdie continually sought a return to the genteel, refined behavior of earlier days, before the rise of materialistic ruthfulness.

THE LITTLE FOXES by Lillian Hellman. By permission of the publishers Random House Inc. Copyright, 1939 by Lillian Hellman.

Later, certain difficulties arose. The brothers lacked seventy five thousand dollars, Regina's third of the sum which the Hubbards were to put up. Presumably this amount would come from Horace, Regina's husband, who lay in a Baltimore hospital with a fatal heart ailment. Though Regina had given Ben and Oscar her promise that Horace would put up the money, no word had yet reached them. Horace, away five months, had failed to acknowledge Regina's demands for his return. Regina suggested, however, that he was possibly holding out for a larger share of the profits, when one's money was badly needed, one should be entitled to a bigger share of the eventual returns. After crafty manipulation, Regina extracted from Ben a promise of a greater share of the profits if she could get Horace home within two weeks. Regina immediately dispatched Alexandra, her daughter, to Baltimore.

When Horace arrived a week later, in response to his daughter's summons, the Hubbards and Regina descended on him. No one in his right mind, the argument ran, would refuse a seventy five thousand dollar investment that would garner a million. Ben explained how water power would be cheap and how the men of the mountains and small towns would be happy to work for low wages. Thus the profits would be tremendous. But Horace, though sourly admitting that the venture was a good deal for the Hubbards, stated that he and Regina had enough money already. The truth was that Horace had had enough of his scheming wife and her equally conniving family, who, having made a sizable sum already through their exploitation of the poor, were now on their way to greater fortune in identical fashion.

Regina protested furiously, but to no avail. However, Ben and Oscar were not too upset. Oscar's son Leo, through a young banking employee, had discovered that Horace had eighty eight thousand dollars in bonds in his safe deposit box, securities which he checked only once in six months. Assuming that Horace would never miss them for a few months, Ben had Oscar seize the bonds—more than enough to meet the sum required by Marshall—and leave for Chicago to complete negotiations. Regina, after a fierce argument with Horace, learned that Oscar had gone. Ben now held the upper hand, he simply told Regina that everything had been settled. Horace, an onlooker, was quietly amused. Now, he thought he would not be a party to the wrecking of the town. He would at least die honestly. To the watching Alexandra's horror, Regina calmly informed him that she hoped he would indeed die as quickly as possible.

Two weeks later, Horace went to his now estranged wife's part of the house. Knowing that he was to be short lived, he had had his deposit box brought to him, and had discovered the theft. This he told Regina, along with his accurate suspicions as to the thieves' identity. To Regina's surprise, however, he stated that he intended to say nothing unless forced to, and then he would simply call the theft a loan. Horace planned to make a new will, leaving Regina eighty eight thousand dollars in bonds. Thus she would eventually inherit his bonds, but she would not receive a single cent of the millions. Ben and Oscar prophesied for the Hubbard family. For once Horace had tied the hands of his cunning wife.

Recalling their unhappy married life, Regina shrewishly revealed her contempt for Horace from the start. Horace, feeling an attack coming on, broke his bottle of medicine. Regina, hoping that his efforts to climb the stairs would prove fatal, cruelly refused to go upstairs for his second bottle. Horace staggered from his wheelchair and collapsed on the stair landing

In an interview with her brothers after Horace was carried to his room, Regina revealed what she had learned from her husband. Should he die, she would black mail them for a seventy five percent share of the profits in exchange for the bonds. Soon word came, in the person of the silent Alexandra, that Regina's plan had worked. Horace was dead. Regina then announced her plans for seeing the judge the next day. Any jury would be swayed by a woman whose brothers had stolen from her. Regina also declared that there were not twelve men in the state whom the brothers had not cheated. A philosophical Ben gave in to Regina's demands, but as he left he was wondering what Horace, who had been in a wheelchair, was doing on the landing. Perhaps in the future he might find out. And when he did, he would let Regina know.

Realizing that Alexandra loved her father very much, Regina tried to be sympathetic. However, her saddened, sickened daughter defied her plans for their future in Chicago. Alexandra announced her final departure from Regina and the Hubbards because she believed that her father would have wanted it that way.

LIVES OF THE CAESARS

Type of work Biography

Author Gaius Suetonius Tranquillus (c 70 c 140)

Time c 86 B C A D 96

Locale The Roman world

First transcribed c 120

Principal personages (in historical order)

JULIUS CAESAR (CAIUS JULIUS CAESAR), c 102 44 B C

AUGUSTUS (CAIUS OCTAVIUS), 63 B C A D 14

TIBERIUS (TIBERIUS CLAUDIUS NERO), 42 B C A D 37

CAIUS CALIGULA (CAIUS CAESAR GERMANICUS) 12 41

CLAUDIUS (TIBERIUS CLAUDIUS DRUSUS), 10 B C A D 54

NERO (NERO CLAUDIUS CAESAR) 37 68

GALBA (SERVIUS SULPICIUS GALBA), 3 B C A D 69

OTHO (MARCUS SALVIUS OTHO), 32 69

VITELLIUS (AULUS VITELLIUS), 15 69

VESPASIAN (TITUS FLAVIUS VESPASIANUS), 9 79

TITUS (TITUS FLAVIUS SABINUS VESPASIANUS), 41 81

DOMITIAN (TITUS FLAVIUS DOMITIANUS), 51 96

Perhaps Suetonius, like other biographers and historians, made mistakes perhaps he retained anecdotes and bits of gossip that a less lively writer would have discarded, but he made the Caesars mortal men, though some of them carried the title of god, and he showed them in defeat and victory, virtue and vice, as they were or, at least, as some men reputed them to be. So colorful are the details of murders and lustful acts that even the most extravagant of Hollywood representations of ancient Rome are calm and temperate by comparison.

The beginning of the life of Julius

Caesar is missing, the account beginning in his sixteenth year, but otherwise the book is complete. Like the other biographies there is more emphasis on Julius the person and on his relationships with the people about him than there is on the great historical moments of his life. But the major events were bound to be reported in great detail in ordinary works, Suetonius performs the service of filling out the cold lines of history with an unpartial account of the personal traits of the Caesars.

After the death of his father, Julius married Cornelia, daughter of the consul

Cinna, who bore him a daughter, Julia. Since by this act—which allied Julius with the popular party—he irritated the dictator Sulla, he was forced to go into hiding, but Caesar's friends interceded for him and at last he was forgiven. Sulla warned, however, that Caesar would "one day deal the death blow to the cause of the aristocracy."

Brief statements are made about Caesar's campaigns in Asia and about his service in Cilicia under Servilius Isauricus. Julius then returned to Rome and began his political career by bringing a charge of extortion against Cornelius Dolabella. After Dolabella had been acquitted, Caesar went to Rhodes to study oratory under Apollonius Molon. On the way he was kidnapped by pirates, after being freed upon payment of ransom, he returned to capture and punish the pirates.

Julius became military tribune and gained an increasing reputation as an orator. After the death of his wife he married Pompeia, but he divorced her on suspicion that she had committed adultery with Publius Clodius.

By his political acts Caesar made himself popular with the masses, an advantage he made secure by arranging gladiatorial shows and stage plays for their amusement. By resorting to bribery, he won the election to the office of pontifex maximus. His efforts to secure mercy for Catiline after the conspiracy was detected almost cost him his life, for the address of Marcus Cato kept the Senate committed to the extreme penalty and Julius was threatened by the Roman knights who stood as guards in the Senate.

After becoming consul in 60 B.C., Caesar made a compact with Gnaeus Pompeius and Marcus Crassus, thus securing power over the Senate.

Suetonius carefully describes the political moves by which Julius continued to increase his own power while battling for the popular party against the Senate. After the nine-year campaign in Gaul, Caesar decided that only civil war could settle the political dissension. Crossing the Rubicon, he marched on Rome. After his victory he rewarded his troops, entertained the masses with shows, and undertook a reform of the Senate and of the calendar. His victory over Pompey, who had led the opposition, made the subsequent defeat of the senatorial party an easier task. As dictator, Caesar began with reforms but ended with such an assumption of power and infallibility, together with complete disdain of the Senate, that a conspiracy was formed against him which included Brutus, Cassius, Cimber, Casca, and other friends of Caesar who had turned against him. He died by their daggers on the Ides of March, after being warned by a series of signs.

Suetonius devotes the bulk of his essay on Julius to an account of Caesar's personal characteristics. Julius is described as having been "tall of stature with a fair complexion, shapely limbs, a somewhat full face, and keen black eyes." He was somewhat overnice in the care of his person, being not only carefully trimmed and shaved, but even having superfluous hair plucked out. Lengthy consideration is given to the charge that Julius had been intimate with King Nicomedes. Suetonius writes that he will take no account of various invectives and reproaches made against Caesar on this matter, he then proceeds to quote, with great detail, all gossip he disdains. Julius drank very little wine, according to Suetonius, he seduced many women, had love affairs with queens—including Cleopatra—excelled in the art of war, wrote his memoirs with simplicity and skill, rode a horse that was "almost human," treated his friends with kindness and consideration, and was so merciful that when he captured the pirates who had kidnapped him, he cut their throats before crucifying them. Suetonius declares that Julius Caesar "was numbered among the gods, not only by a formal decree, but also in the conviction of the common people."

The life of Augustus, like that of Jul ius, is first summarized by Suetonius, who then proceeds to tell of Augustus the man. Born Caius Octavius, he inherited power from Julius, although he had to join with Antony and Lepidus and fight a series of battles in order to become undisputed ruler of the Empire. The name "Augustus" was a title conferred by the Senate to honor him.

Suetonius mentions some of the acts Augustus committed while triumvir, deeds by which he incurred "general detestation." He ordered a Roman knight stabbed to death for taking notes, he so abused Tedi-us Afer, consul elect, that Afer "hurled himself headlong," committing suicide, he tortured Quintus Gallius because of the suspicion that Gallius had a sword under his cloak, and he tore out the man's eyes with his own hands after ordering his execution.

On the more constructive side, Augustus is credited with having built many public works, revising the wards of the city and the system of night watches, building up a library of Sibylline books after burning prophetic writings of little repute, adding to the public security, revising existing laws, rebuilding roads, and surpassing his predecessors in the magnificence of public shows.

He won the affection of the people and the Senate, and was named "Father of his Country" by the latter. He had few friends, but he was faithful to them. He gambled and made love to other men's wives, although this latter practice is partly excused by Suetonius on the ground that it was pursued not from passion but from a desire for information about the ladies' husbands. In other respects he was temperate, furnishing his house simply and eating simple food. He is described as handsome, although he had teeth that were "wide apart, small, and ill kept." Augustus died painlessly and without disturbance, as he had wished, from an illness.

Suetonius' treatment of the lives of the other Caesars is similar to that of Julius and Augustus, although with most of the Caesars, beginning with Tiberius, murders and sexual excesses were so common that most of the accounts are taken up with a recital of monstrous deeds. Although Nero is the most infamous of the Caesars—and probably deserves to be remembered as almost entirely depraved—it would be difficult to decide which of the others was the worst.

After a few years of attention to the duties of emperor, Tiberius openly gave way to his vices, drowning himself in wine, consorting at banquets attended by nude girls, killing those who offended him or who were about when something angered him, and finally arranging matters so that every day was execution day and every crime a capital one. He drove his sister in law to suicide by starvation. He devised elaborate systems of torture and, to insure the death of his victims, had them thrown over a cliff to the rocks where guards broke up the bodies with boathooks. When he died there was general rejoicing and cries of "Tiberius to the Tiber!"

After writing of some of Caligula's accomplishments—great public games, the building of public works—Suetonius comments, "So much for Caligula as emperor we must now tell of his career as a monster." He demanded that he be worshipped as a god, he built temples to himself and invited the moon to his embraces. He lived in incest with his sisters, stole the wives of other men, and had a series of wives. He murdered his friends and those who helped him to power. He matched worthless gladiators against wild beasts, and in random fashion chose prisoners to be devoured by savage animals in the arena. He enjoyed watching executions while eating his lunch, and at a banquet he ordered the hands of a slave cut off and hung about his neck so that the wretched man could be led about the banquet hall as a warning against stealing. These are simply samples of Caligula's deeds. He was stabbed to death when he was twenty-nine years old, after almost four years of rule.

Claudius began his rule in such manner that he won the love and devotion of his subjects, and he accomplished many worthwhile objectives, but he was a cruel and suspicious man, and he died by poison

Even a summary statement of Nero's crimes is difficult. He was cruel, vain, and lustful. Ordinary entertainment and ordinary modes of sexual intercourse were displaced by extravagant orgies of various sorts. Regarding himself as a musician and singer, he forced great audiences to listen to him for hours on end, forbidding anyone to leave, so that women sometimes gave birth to children while he performed. He enjoyed fires and burned great sections of Rome. He wandered the streets in disguise, indulging in revels and fights. Boys, men, married women, prostitutes and wives—all fed his lust, sometimes in violent and dramatically contrived ways. He murdered his mother after several attempts, and it was Suetonius' opinion that he had something to do with the poisoning of Claudius. Hundreds of other persons—his family, his companions, and others—died by his hand or by his orders. Suetonius writes that Nero "showed neither discrimination nor moderation in putting to death whomsoever he pleased on any pretext whatsoever." When the Senate finally sent men to capture him for execution, he killed himself by cutting his own throat, but only after considerable wailing and postponement.

Nero was the last Caesar by family connection; the others bore the name "Caesar" as a designation of rank. Suetonius' account of the remaining Caesars—Galba, Otho, Vitellius, Vespasian, Titus, and Domitian—gives considerably less space to their exploits, but the style continues to be lively and informative.

THE LONGEST JOURNEY

Type of work Novel

Author E. M. Forster (1879)

Type of plot Social criticism

Time of plot Early twentieth century

Locale England

First published 1907

Principal characters

RICKIE ELLIOT, a student at Cambridge

AGNES PEMBROKE, an old friend

HERBERT PEMBROKE, her brother

STEWART ANSELL, a friend of Rickie at Cambridge

EMILY FALLING, his aunt

STEPHEN WONHAM, his half brother

Critique

In this novel Forster is primarily concerned with the story of a sensitive young man and the problems he encounters on his introduction into the world. The author is somewhat satiric as he views his characters but, as usual, he does not present the world as a completely dreary and uninteresting place. Men, in general, are portrayed as rather weak individuals who are fighting against superior forces, but the reader is not meant completely to lose his love and respect for them. Here in a novel which is probably autobiographical in part, we see several characters who try without success to live happily in a world of weak and misguided ideals.

THE LONGEST JOURNEY by E. M. Forster. By permission of the publishers, Alfred A. Knopf, Inc. Copyright 1922 by Alfred A. Knopf, Inc. Renewed. All rights reserved.

The Story

Frederick Elliot, who was a student at Cambridge and almost alone in the world had finally attained some degree of contentment in his life after a rather unhappy childhood. He had been born with a lamed left foot which kept him from most of the normal activities of children, and he had grown up virtually without friends. Early in his life his father had begun to call him Rickie because of its close similarity to rickety, and the name had stayed with him. Besides his deformity there was another, more serious, difficulty. He found out quite early that his father and mother did not love each other and that he was loved not at all by his father and only a little by his mother. Both his parents died when he was fifteen, leaving him comfortably well off so far as finances were concerned but without anyone who wanted to give him a home.

At Cambridge he had shown himself to be a capable student but one without any scholarly pretensions. He had made several friends among the non athletic groups and spent much of his time in long discussions on topics of literary or philosophical interest. One day, during such a discussion, he was interrupted by the arrival of his old friends Agnes and Herbert Pembroke, whom he had invited for the weekend. In the meantime he had completely forgotten about them. Because these two people were part of that very small group which took an interest in Rickie's career, they spent a great part of their time at Cambridge encouraging him to decide on a particular course for his life, even if he did nothing more than write, the only thing he admitted having an interest in. They pointed out that money was not important as long as he met a certain standard of ideals.

At Christmas of that same year Rickie saw his friends again. He had stayed several days with Stewart Ansell, a friend from Cambridge, but felt it was necessary to spend a part of his vacation with the Pembrokes as well. He rather dreaded this part of his vacation because Agnes' fiance, a man whom Rickie had known at public school, was to be there. Rickie not only disliked Gerald Dawes but he also hated to witness the lovers' happiness, he felt that such happiness was forever to be denied him because of his lame foot which he considered a hereditary disorder. During this time Gerald was killed while playing football and it was Rickie who was able to offer the most comfort to Agnes by convincing her that she should suffer since her love for Gerald had been the greatest thing she could ever experience.

Two years later, when she came again to visit him at Cambridge, Rickie realized that he was also in love with Agnes, although he still felt that he could never marry because of his deformity. She convinced him, however, that they should be married. Rickie was about to finish his work at Cambridge, but they felt a long engagement was necessary for him to settle himself. Ansell immediately opposed the marriage because he sensed that Agnes was not a sincere person. She laid constant claim to honesty and forthrightness, but Ansell could not be convinced that these qualities revealed the true Agnes. He knew immediately that she would force Rickie into a dull and conventional life, convincing him at the same time that he was taking the proper step.

Soon after their engagement Rickie and Agnes visited his aunt, Mrs. Emily Failing, at her country home. Rickie had never particularly liked his aunt, but since she was his only known relative he and Agnes felt that they should go to see her. Mrs. Failing was a woman who liked for people to do what she wanted and she was never happier than when they were obviously uncomfortable while carrying out her desires. While there they also saw Stephen Wonham, a young man whom Rickie had met before but whose relation to Mrs. Failing had never been made clear. However, after Rickie had been so bold as to engage in an argument with his aunt, she informed him that Stephen was actually his brother. It was not until later that Rickie found out that Stephen was the son of his mother, whom he had loved very much, and not of his father. Not even Stephen himself knew who he was, but the matter had never greatly concerned him.

After their marriage Rickie and Agnes went to live with Herbert at Sawston School. The arrangement had been worked out between Herbert and Agnes because Herbert needed help in his duties as a house master. Although Rickie soon realized that Herbert was basically stupid and that they disagreed on many points, he adapted himself to whatever course Herbert and Agnes chose. His marriage, in which he had hoped to find certain spiritual ideals, never reached a very intimate level, and before long his life became a shell. Ansell would have no more to do with him, and he was cut off from the one intellect at the school because of Herbert's feelings and aspirations.

Two years later, after Rickie had apparently succumbed completely to the forces playing on him, Stephen Woonham again entered his life. It became apparent immediately that Agnes, who had kept up a connection with Mrs. Failing, had been instrumental in having Stephen thrown out of her house, all because of her desire to inherit the money from the estate. Rickie was furious but again he submitted Stephen, who had finally been told the truth about himself, came to Sawston expecting to find the kind of love which he had never known before. But when Rickie refused to see him and Agnes offered him money never to say anything about his parentage, he left immediately.

Stephen wandered around London for several days doing odd jobs and supporting himself as well as he could. Before long he had saved enough money for a drunken spree. During his drunkenness, determined to wreck Rickie's house, he returned to Sawston. In the process he might have killed himself if Rickie had not saved him. By this time Rickie, under the influence of Ansell, had begun to see how foolish he had been. Now he decided to give Stephen a home. Although Stephen would have none of this idea, he managed to convince Rickie that they should go away together.

Thus Rickie began the regeneration of his soul. Unfortunately it was of short duration. On a subsequent visit to his aunt, at which time Stephen insisted on accompanying him, he again saved Stephen's life but lost his own. Stephen, who had promised not to drink, got drunk and collapsed on the railroad crossing. Rickie managed to get him off, but he himself was killed. Just before he died he realized that he had been betrayed a second time by his belief in the individual.

LOVE IN A WOOD

Type of work Drama

Author William Wycherley (1640-1716)

Type of plot Comedy of manners

Time of plot Seventeenth century

Locale London

First presented 1671

Principal characters

MR. RANGER, a young man about town

LYDIA, his cousin and betrothed

MR. VALENTINE, a gallant lately returned to London

CHRISTINA, his betrothed

MR. VINCENT, a confidant of all the lovers

ALDERMAN GRIPE an elderly usurer
 MISTRESS MARTHA his daughter
 LADY FLIPPANT his sister, in London to find a husband
 SIR SIMON ADDLEPLOT an indomitable fortune hunter
 MR DAPPERWIT, a fop and a would be gentleman
 MRS JOYNER a matchmaker and procuress
 MRS CROSSBITE a blackmailer and procuress
 LUCY her daughter

Critique

The first of three satiric comedies, Love in a Wood, or, St James's Park, as it was popularly known, shows brilliantly the genius of William Wycherley, who gained his insight as an intimate in high society on both sides of the Channel. It was this play which gained for the young man the favor of a king and the love of the king's mistress, the Duchess of Cleveland.

The Story

Lady Flippant, a widow disappointed in her efforts to find a new husband, berated her matchmaker, Mrs Joyner, for not finding a wealthy young man to relieve her impecunious position. The lady's brother, Alderman Gripe, had grown tired of her foppish visitors, especially the witless Mr Dapperwit.

Sir Simon Addleplot, at the suggestion of the cozening Mrs Joyner and the double dealing Dapperwit, disguised himself and gained employment as a clerk to the miserly Gripe in order to woo the usurer's daughter Mistress Martha and through her to secure her father's fortune. Not realizing that he had been gulled into becoming Jonas the clerk, Sir Simon was again duped into believing that he was loved by Lady Flippant, who was really enamored of Dapperwit.

Mr Ranger, with Mr Vincent, his friend and confidant, was about to go into St James's Park in search of some amorous adventure when his cousin and betrothed, Lydia, discovered his whereabouts. He avoided her, however, and dined for diversion with the gulled Sir Simon, Dapperwit, and Lady Flippant in order to watch the work of Mrs Joyner, who had already made twenty crowns through introductions and would obtain a hundred if Sir Simon got Mistress Martha or fifty if he got Lady Flippant. The widow spurned Sir Simon, flirted with Dapperwit, and hinted at matrimony to both the young gallants, Ranger and Vincent.

Later, all promenaded through St James's Park in the hope of discovering one another's intrigues. Lydia, recognizing Ranger, ran into the house of her friend Christina in order to avoid a compromising meeting with her betrothed. Ranger pursued her, only to become enamored of Christina, who was faithfully waiting the return to London of Mr Valentine, her fiancé. Christina, in order to help Lydia, had pretended to be the young woman he had pursued from the park. Her little act quickly over, she sent the impertinent Ranger away. Ranger, in despair because he had not learned the fair unknown's name, did not know that Lydia had heard his gallant speeches to Christina.

Ranger went to the home of his friend Vincent Valentine, in danger of his life from a rival, was in hiding there, he wished no one else to know of his return from France before his loved one did. Valentine, concealed, overheard Ranger ask the name of the young woman whom he pursued into her apartment. When Vincent named the apartment as Christina's, Valentine became convinced that his beloved one had been untrue to him.

In contrast to this sequence of mistaken and confused identities, the busy Mrs Joyner was more positive in identifying Lucy, the daughter of her friend Mrs Crossbite, as the object of hypocritical old Gripe's lust. The solicitous mother, pleased with this development, ordered her recalcitrant daughter to give up her love for Dapperwit. When Dapperwit, thinking to cure Ranger's melancholy over Christina, brought him to see Lucy, the girl repulsed him for his infidelity and what she thought was his intention of procuring her for Ranger. The jilted fop recovered his spirits, however, when he received a message delivered by Jonas, the supposed clerk. The message held out the promise of a later assignation which might lead, Dapperwit hoped, to a wedding.

As the gallants departed, the ever-busy Mrs. Joyner brought furtive Alderman Gripe to see Lucy. His hasty lust frightened the lass, however, and she screamed. Though he dickered for the sake of salving his miserly conscience, Gripe was coerced into paying five hundred pounds of hush money to Mrs. Crossbite. Lady Flippant, at the same time, was making advances to the defenseless Dapperwit, and the numble-footed lovers, Ranger and Lydia, were busy at double deception. Lydia denied that she had been in the park jealously searching for him, Ranger assured her that he had called for her as he had promised.

The Gripe household was at this time in an uproar. The sly old man was busily attempting to hide his shame and regain his money, and Mrs. Joyner virtuously pretended horror at the treatment he had received at the hands of Mrs. Crossbite. Jonas, meanwhile, made love to Lady Flippant, who protested only after she learned that her seducer was really Sir Simon Addleplot, the man she hoped finally to marry. So the poor man, undone by his own deceit, lost Mistress Martha through his dissembling ways and Dapperwit's roguery.

Lydia, desirous of testing Ranger, sent him a letter to which she signed Christina's name, asking the gallant to meet her that evening at St. James's Gate. The wronged Christina, however, had since learned of her lover's return, and Valentine was at that time trying to reassure himself of her innocence. Over hearing Ranger's new plans unsettled him again, though his eavesdropping on a conversation between Christina and Vincent and then on one between Christina and her supposed lover finally set his mind at rest. Lydia also confessed her part in this lovers' plot and counterplot. The two couples, thus reunited, decided that matrimony was the only sure solution to love's equation.

But the false lovers found no such easy solution, so addle-witted and dapper-plotted had their intrigues become. Sir Simon, still passing as Jonas, escorted Mistress Martha to Dapperwit; he thought their embraces inopportune and inappropriate. But Sir Simon's arrangements for a parson, a supper, and a reception in nearby Mulberry Garden were not completely wasted. Propelled to the same garden by the two scheming procuresses, Alderman Gripe married Lucy to be revenged on his son-in-law, that Dapperwit who took a bride six months pregnant. Sir Simon took widowed Lady Flippant as his wife, just as she had intended.

Thus were all the honest ladies made wives and all the bawds made honest, up in St. James's Park.

THE LUCK OF ROARING CAMP AND OTHER SKETCHES

Type of work Short stories

Author Bret Harte (1836-1902)

Time 1850-1865

Locale California

First published 1870

Relatively few authors ever achieve the astonishing literary success that Bret

Harte did during his lifetime. His stories of California life, enormously popular, were in great demand by magazine editors all over the country, and the Atlantic Monthly bid the unheard of amount of ten thousand dollars for the sole rights to one year of Harte's literary production.

However, this flash in the pan popularity is seldom consistent with a lasting literary reputation, and in Harte's case the line between literary value and entertainment is often thin. That Harte reached his artistic maturity at the age of thirty one and began to decline five years later indicates this fact. During these few years Harte produced some stories of genuine literary value. The majority of them are collected in The Luck of Roaring Camp and Other Sketches, and it is mainly on this volume that Harte's literary reputation rests.

Harte's vision of life goes far to explain the meteoric popularity of his stories. The local color, the picturesque characters, and the trick endings all added to Harte's attraction, certainly, but they were surface attractions. The heart of his success lay in his particular vision of life and his ability to convey that vision to his readers.

Harte was, essentially, an optimist and an uplifter. This does not mean that Harte believed in a shallow doctrine of social or moral reform. Rather, he believed in the potential goodness of man and in the possibility of redemption for every sinner. Harte saw life as a purgatory for the human soul. He saw life as a test for men, as a trial in which the ultimate goal is salvation. Salvation, however, was to be achieved in this life, although, paradoxically, it was frequently to be gained at the cost of death. In other words, death, rather than being an end of the trial, was to be seen as the final consummation of the trial, as a selfless act of devotion on the part of his heroes. Redemption for Harte was an act of selfless heroism, of love, of devotion. Such an act lifted one above the petty world of grasping self-interest and redeemed one from the sin of self-involvement. This is the spirit that pervades Harte's most memorable stories.

This spirit raises Harte's best characters from local stereotypes and picturesque caricatures to people of real feelings and semi-heroic stature, and it helps to explain Mark Twain's statement that "Bret Harte got his California and his Californians by unconscious absorption, and put both of them into his tales alive." He wove the experiences of his people into his private theme of redemption and thereby gave them life.

The people Harte wrote about were people seeking salvation from themselves, people who longed to wipe their past clean, and people who had come West to lose their identity, as is indicated by the fact that very few of his characters retained their given names. His characters have had their identities and pasts wiped clean with names like Cherokee Sal, Kentuck, Yuba Bill, Tennessee's Partner, and the Duchess. People like these were ripe material for redemption by virtue of their self-dissatisfaction. In order to be saved, one must first have sinned.

This theme is the core of Harte's most successful stories. In the title story of the collection, "The Luck of Roaring Camp," which first appeared in the Overland Monthly in 1868, a dissolute prostitute works out her salvation by giving birth to a baby and dying. The miners in the camp work out their salvation by giving the baby love and generous gifts in the absence of a mother.

One miner in particular, Kentuck, works out his salvation by giving his life in a futile attempt to save the baby. The baby, of course, is incidental because of its innocence. What matters is that the baby brought out the generous qualities of the people involved and thereby redeemed them from their own pettiness. In the second story of the collection, "The Outcasts of Poker Flat," the theme is the same. A gambler and two prostitutes are saved from themselves by virtue of their devotion to a pair of innocent youngsters who had eloped. In the third story, "Miggles," a pretty young woman is redeemed by virtue of her devotion to a helpless invalid

The theme of love's power to save turns Harte's best stories into human interest tales, which Harte did a good deal to popularize. This theme was the source of Harte's uplift, optimism, and popularity.

Harte's vices as well as his virtues can be attributed to this same theme. It quickly lapses into sentimentalism, and it also tends to gloss over the sharp frictions and discordances of everyday life with a nonexistent glamor and romance. In "Brown of Calaveras" the image of gambler Jack Hamlin riding off into the rosy sunset after having handsomely refused to run away with a man's beautiful young wife certainly strikes one as unnecessarily romantic and sentimental. Again, this theme of redemption through love and death lends itself too easily to theatrical endings in which death seems to be an easy way to end the story.

At his best, however, Harte avoids these tendencies. The sentimentality of the story is balanced frequently by an ironic, humorous narrative style. In his most memorable stories Harte employs an ironic prose that maintains a distance between himself and his subject matter. This prose is clear and restrained, giving his fiction a sweet-sour flavor that blends well with his vision of things. Thus his skillful prose gives the reader the impression that his characters do not deserve one's full sympathy until they succeed in redeeming themselves. It reminds us that his characters are human and, as such, are subject to human failings. This fact does not mean that Harte is ever self-righteous. On the contrary, he was always humane in his treatment of character. It was just that he realized human limitations as well as human virtues. In his preface to The Luck of Roaring Camp he wrote

I might have painted my villains of the blackest dye. I might have made it impossible for them to have performed a virtuous or generous action, and have thus avoided that moral confusion which is apt to rise in the contemplation of mixed motives and qualities. But I should have burdened myself with responsibility of their creation which I did not care to do.

Even in his preface Harte's use of irony is skillful. Actually, he was a shrewd judge of character with a talent for "the contemplation of mixed motives and qualities."

Harte put this talent to good use in his sketches. He was an admirable craftsman in blending virtue and vice, humor and pathos, the ridiculous and the sublime. He had a good eye for contrasts, particularly for the contrast between nature and man. Nature, like man, was ambivalent for Harte. On the one hand, he saw nature as serene, remote and passionless; on the other, it could be violent, deadly, and passionate. In Harte's stories the moods of nature are usually in juxtaposition to the moods of his people. In "The Luck of Roaring Camp," for example, nature becomes still for a moment at the birth and the first cry of the baby. Later, when everything in the human realm seems calm and settled, nature in the form of a flood overwhelms the mining camp and takes several lives, including the baby's. The same occurs in "The Outcasts of Poker Flat." When the gambler, the thief, and the two prostitutes are driven out of town, everything is calm, but when these four begin to find some measure of peace, a snowstorm overwhelms them and their two innocent companions.

It has been pointed out that Harte's literary techniques were borrowed from writers like Irving and Dickens. To be sure, Harte did adapt his techniques from the Eastern writers and from Europeans. Also, he had a romantic tradition behind him. Harte was essentially, an Easterner who had come West for his literary materials. But to hold the fact that Harte borrowed from other writers against him is to miss the point. Harte transformed these techniques with his own personal merits.

and limitations. He transmuted them with his own personal vision of life.

Both Harte's virtues and vices as a storyteller derive from his optimistic vision of human redemption. On the debit side, his bitter-sweet endings are patently stylized, and there is a tendency to coat his situations with sentiment. On the asset side, Harte's endings have a good measure of dramatic impact. Then, too, he frequently balances the sentiment and glamor with a healthy humor and irony. Again, Harte was an effective stylist and his sentences are sharp and lucid. Furthermore, Harte opened the field for human interest and local color stories, thus paving the way for a flourishing school of regional fiction. Finally, Harte's happy talent for characterization and caricature blended very well with his style of writing and his personal outlook on life, thus forming a fortunate fusion of form and content. For these reasons he retains an assured place in a minor tradition.

THE MABINOGION

Type of work Tales

Author Unknown

Type of plots Heroic romances

Time of plots The Middle Ages

Locale Arthurian Britain, mainly Wales

First transcribed Twelfth and thirteenth centuries, first translation published, 1838-1849

Principal characters

PWYLL, Prince of Dyfed

RHIANNON, his wife

PRYDERI, their son

KICVA, Pryden's wife

BENDIGEID VRAN, King of the Island of the Mighty, Llyr's son

BRANWEN, Llyr's daughter

MATHOLWCH, King of Ireland, Branwen's husband

MANAWYDAN, another of Llyr's sons, Pryden's stepfather

KING MATH

GWYDION, one of King Math's warriors

LLEW LLAW GYFFES, Gwydion's favorite son

BLODEUWEDD, Llew Llaw Gyffes' elfwife

MACSEN WLEDIG, Emperor of Rome

LLUDD, King of Britain

LLEVELYS, his brother, King of France

KING ARTHUR

KILHWCH, one of King Arthur's knights

YSBADDADEN, a crafty giant

OLWEN, his daughter, loved by Kilhwch

RHONABWY, a dreamer

OWAIN, the new Knight of the Fountain

PEREDUR, one of King Arthur's knights

GERINT, another of King Arthur's knights, later a king

ENID, his wife

Critique

Paradoxically, the title of this collection of Welsh tales, written in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries and preserved in the fourteenth-century manuscript titled Red Book of Hergest, is a relatively modern one. When Lady Charlotte Guest, the translator, called these tales The Mabinogion she used a misnomer for the most part, for her title applies only to the first four stories. These tales, among the finest of medieval literature, represent the best of Celtic culture. The world they disclose to our modern eyes is one of great heroes, black villains, incomparable battles, women of great beauty, old crones, magnificent splendor, wretched squalor, landscapes of matchless glamour, wizards, and warlocks—a world of chivalric romance and harsh brutality. Undoubtedly, this world and these stories have their roots in primitive Celtic mythology that was translated into folklore and eventually into romantic tales. Although the poet authors are unknown, they show considerable artistry and craftsmanship in the treatment of their subjects.

THE MABINOGION. Translated by Gwyn Jones. By permission of the translator. Published by J. M. Dent & Sons Ltd. Copyright 1949. All rights reserved.

The Stories

PWYLL, PRINCE OF DYVED

Pwyll, the Prince of Dyved, was caught stealing a dying deer. In order to redeem himself Pwyll agreed to exchange lands and appearances with the chieftain who had caught him and to slay the chieftain's enemy after a year's time. That year each prince ruled the other's land wisely and well, and each remained faithful to his own true wife. At the year's end Pwyll slew the enemy, returned home on good terms with the other prince, and eventually gained the other's lands. From a hill one day Pwyll saw a lovely lady ride by. She eluded him three times, but on the fourth he spoke to her. She told him that her name was Rhiannon and invited him to her castle a year from that day. Pwyll went with his men, subdued her other suitor, and won the lady. Some time thereafter Rhiannon bore a son who disappeared the first night after his birth. The women on watch accused her of killing it, and so Pwyll made her pay a heavy penance. Meanwhile, a farmer had taken the baby from a monster. Eventually he restored the boy to Pwyll, who then released his wife from her penance and named his son Pryderi.

BRANWEN, DAUGHTER OF LLYR

Bendigeid Vran, son of Llyr and King of the Island of the Mighty, made a pact with Matholwch, King of Ireland, and gave him his sister Branwen to wed. When the King of Ireland suffered an insult at the hands of one of Bendigeid Vran's men, Bendigeid Vran made good the loss but because of the insult Matholwch and Branwen were made to suffer heavily at the hands of the Irishmen. Bendigeid Vran learned of their treatment, sailed to Ireland, and made war on the Irish. Both sides suffered great losses. Bendigeid Vran was killed by a poisoned spear, his last request was that his head be buried in the White Mount in London. Branwen died of sorrow. Finally, only seven of Bendigeid Vran's men were left alive to bury the heads of their chief, and only five pregnant Irish women.

MANAWYDAN, SON OF LLYR

Two of the men left living after the war in Ireland were Pryderi and Manawydan, the brother of Bendigeid Vran. These two went to live on Pryderi's lands, and Manawydan married Pryderi's mother. The two men and their wives, for Pryderi had a wife named Kicva, lived pleasantly until the country side was magically laid desolate and everyone else had disappeared. They left their lands and tried to earn a living at various trades, but were always driven off by their envious competitors. When they returned to their own lands, Pryderi and his mother entered a magic castle that vanished with them. Manawydan then tried farming, and again his crops were magically desolated. Determined to get to the bottom of the mystery, Manawydan stayed up to watch his last field. When he saw thousands of mice ravaging the field, he caught one and declared that he would hang it. Pryderi's wife tried to dissuade him along with three churchmen, but he was still determined to hang the mouse. At last the third churchman disclosed himself as the one who had cursed Manawydan and his friends in revenge for an insult from Pryderi's father years before. He promised to restore everything, including Pryderi and his mother, if Manawydan would release the mouse. Manawydan insisted that the magician never touch his lands again, and he returned the mouse, who happened to be the churchman's wife. Everything was restored, and the four companions returned to their former happiness.

MATH, SON OF MATHONWY

Gwydion's brother, Gilvaethwy, loved King Math's footmaiden, Goewin. Hoping to secure the maiden for his brother, Gwydion tricked Pryderi into exchanging some pigs for twelve phantom steeds and twelve phantom greyhounds. Pryderi and his men pursued them. While King Math and his men were preparing to fight this army, Gwydion and his brother raped the footmaiden before they returned to the fight and won the battle for King Math. The king then punished the brothers by turning them into animals for three years. After his penance Gwydion had two sons. Their mother cursed Gwydion's favorite son, named Llew Llaw Gyffes, by saying that he would never have a human wife. To thwart this curse King Math and Gwydion created for him an elfwife, Blodeuwedd, out of flowers. The wife proved unfaithful by taking a lover. Determined to get rid of her husband, she asked him how he might be killed. Foolishly, he told her and she told her lover, who tried to kill Llew Llaw Gyffes. Gwydion's son did not die, however, but was turned into an eagle. Gwydion then searched for his son, found him and restored him to his former shape. Gwydion and Llew Llaw Gyffes then took revenge on the wife and her lover by turning her into an owl and killing him.

THE DREAM OF MACSEN WLLEDIG

Macsen Wledig, the Emperor of Rome, dreamed one night of a lovely maiden in a strange and wonderful land. Awakening he sent his messengers all over the world in search of her. After wandering in many lands they found her in a castle in Britain, and they guided the emperor to her. He found everything as it had been in his dream. The maiden accepted him and for her maiden portion he gave her father the island of Britain and caused three castles to be built for her. Macsen Wledig lived with his wife in Britain for seven years. Meanwhile, the Romans had chosen a new emperor, who sent a note to Wledig warning him not to return. Wledig then marched on Gaul, fought his way through Italy, and reconquered Rome.

LLUDD AND LLEVELYS

Three plagues ravaged Britain. The first was a crafty foreign people, the second was a yearly midnight scream that made everything barren, and the third was the habitual disappearance of food at the king's court. Lludd, the great King of Britain, asked help from his wise and well-beloved brother, Llelvelys, who was King of France. Llelvelys told him to mash insects in water and sprinkle the solution over the foreigners to kill them. To get rid of the screaming dragon Lludd would have to lure it with mead, put it in a sack, and bury it in a stone coffer. To keep the food Lludd would have to capture a magician who put everyone to sleep. The king performed these tasks and Britain was rid of the plagues.

KILHWCH AND OLWEN

Kilhwch's stepmother had spitefully prophesied that Kilhwch would not have a woman until he won Olwen, the daughter of Ysbaddaden, a crafty and powerful giant. Straightway, Kilhwch, who had fallen in love with Olwen without having seen her, set out for King Arthur's court, where King Arthur accepted the young man as his knight Kilhwch then set out to seek Ysbaddaden, with him went all of King Arthur's gallant warriors. After a long journey Kilhwch met Olwen, the most beautiful woman he had ever seen. He and King Arthur's men proceeded to Ysbaddaden's court to ask for Olwen. After fighting for three days and wounding the giant three times, Kilhwch learned that he could win Olwen and slay her father after performing forty nearly impossible tasks for the giant. By dint of brute force, cunning, and magic, Kilhwch, King Arthur, and his men succeeded in completing the tasks. Kilhwch then slew Ysbaddaden, married Olwen, and lived happily ever after.

THE DREAM OF RHONABWY

While seeking a man who had ravaged the land, Rhonabwy and his companions found themselves in a dark hall where the floors were covered with dung. After trying to talk to the strange people inhabiting the hall and failing, Rhonabwy lay down on an ox skin and began to dream. He dreamed of the heroic Arthurian age when men were demigods who lived in splendor in a land where life was full. He found himself in King Arthur's court watching a game between King Arthur and Owain. While the game was in progress, three servants informed Owain that his ravens were being killed by King Arthur's men, but the king insisted that the game continue. Owain told his men to raise his banner, whereupon the ravens revived and began to slaughter the men. Three servants came to tell King Arthur how his men were being killed, but Owain insisted that the game continue. At last the king begged Owain to call off the ravens. He did so and there was peace. Many men then brought tribute to King Arthur. At that point Rhonabwy awakened.

THE LADY OF THE FOUNTAIN

While at King Arthur's court Owain learned from Kynon of a powerful Knight of the Fountain who overthrew all challengers. Upon being taunted by Kai, Owain went in search of this knight, challenged him, and slew him. Then with the help of a maiden Owain escaped the angry townsmen who were seeking to avenge the death of their lord and he married the dead knight's wife. He ruled the land well for three years. Meanwhile, King Arthur and his knights had come in search of Owain. Upon arriving at the fountain, King Arthur's men all challenged the new Knight of the Fountain and were overthrown by him. The king and Owain were finally reunited, and Owain returned to King Arthur's court after promising his wife that he would return at the end of three years. Owain was reminded of his promise when his wife came to King Arthur's court and removed the ring which she had given him as a token by which to remember her. Then Owain went in search of his wife. After restoring a lady's kingdom, killing a serpent about to destroy a lion, saving the maiden who had aided him six years earlier, and killing her tormentors, Owain was restored to his wife. Another feat was defeating and transforming the Black Oppressor. Thereafter Owain and his wife lived happily at King Arthur's court.

PEREDUR, SON OF EVRAWG

Peredur lived a sheltered life with his mother, nevertheless he grew up strong and swift. Although his mother did not want him to become a knight, nothing could keep him from fulfilling his desire. When he prepared to leave his mother and journey to King Arthur's court, she instructed him in the chivalric code. Peredur was an ungainly sight as he entered King Arthur's court, for he was still awkward and naive. However, he soon showed his prowess in battle, and through many adventures he acquired polish and skill in the arts of hunting, war, and love. Many reports of his strength and bravery reached King Arthur's ears. Peredur spent his time defending and loving maidens, restoring kingdoms to the wronged avenging insults, killing monsters and evil men, protecting the weak, and ridding the land of plagues. In short, he was a matchless knight. When, in the course of his adventures, he inadvertently caused a kingdom to wither and grow barren, he restored it to fertility by dint of strength and courage. In the end he rid the land of seven evil witches.

GERINT, SON OF ERBIN

While King Arthur and his men were hunting, Gerint rode with the queen and her maids. When a dwarf insulted Gerint and one of the maids, the knight challenged the dwarf's lord to a contest and defeated him. Afterward Gerint restored a kingdom to its proper lord and won the king's daughter, Enid, as his wife. Gerint then traveled back to King Arthur's court and received a stag head for his reward. In time Gerint, having inherited a kingdom from his father, went with Enid to rule the land. Because he devoted more time to his wife than he did to jousts or battles, his subjects complained bitterly. When Enid learned of their grievance, she inadvertently told him. In anger, Gerint set out on a journey with his wife to prove his strength and valor. He performed superhuman feats and slaughtered belligerent knights and catiffs in vast numbers, but he nearly died in the attempt. Finally, having proved himself to his wife and subjects, he returned home to rule once more.

THE MADRAS HOUSE

Type of work Drama

Author Harley Granville Barker (1877-1946)

Type of plot Social criticism

Time of plot Early twentieth century

Locale London

First presented 1910

Principal characters

HENRY HUXTABLE

KATHERINE, his wife

CONSTANTINE MADRAS, Katherine's brother

AMELIA MADRAS, his wife

PHILIP MADRAS, their son

JESSICA, Philip's wife

MAJOR HIPPISLY THOMAS, Philip's friend

MARION YATES, an employee at the Madras House

EUSTACE PERRIN STATE, an American, a prospective buyer of the Madras House

MISS CHANCELLOR and

MR. BRIGSTOCK, also employees at the Madras House

Critique

The Madras House is a dramatic work still interesting in the contemporary theater. A problem play of the type popularized by Ibsen and Shaw at the turn of the century, it attempts to deal realistically with several related themes: the contrast between sexual honesty and sexual hypocrisy, the contrast between bourgeois respectability and real honesty in human dealings, the inevitability of social change even in connection with a long established commercial institution like the Madras House, and the contrast in all personal relations between expressed motive and real motive. As in his other works, the playwright asked his audiences to think about themselves and the standards of the world which they at the time were far too likely to take for granted. If Granville Barker's dramas seem a little old-fashioned to some persons today, the causes are simple: we enjoy certain freedoms because the characters on his stage talked about them at length. Further, we have had full experience of enjoying those freedoms and find that pursuit of them may at one and the same time free us from old restrictions and plunge us into new ones, ambiguities of human action that the author of The Madras House did not foresee.

THE MADRAS HOUSE by Harley Granville-Barker. By permission of Field Roscoe & Co., Trustees of the Estates of Harley and Helen Granville Barker. Copyright 1911 by Harley Granville-Barker. Renewed. All rights reserved.

The Story

Henry Huxtable, his wife, and six spinster daughters lived in dreary middle-class respectability, supported by the income from a great store, the Madras House. Their lives were in sharp contrast to that of the sales persons who were required to "live in" at store dormitories closely supervised to make sure that the store was actually as respectable as it seemed to be. Another owner was Constantine Madras, Katherine Huxtable's brother, who had retreated from England and respectability and had lived for many years in Moslem countries.

The time had come for the sale of the Madras House, such a sale had been necessitated by confusion in family affairs. On an October Sunday, Philip Madras, Constantine's son, heard that his father had returned to England, and he was distressed by this news of the reappearance of the elderly black sheep. But this was not the only problem that Philip wished to discuss with his uncle, Henry Huxtable. The morale of the store had been upset by the discovery that one of the closely supervised girls at the store, Marion Yates, was pregnant. It was suspected that her betrayer was Mr Brigstock, another sales person, for he had been seen kissing the disgraced girl. The old immorality of Constantine—who, it was soon learned, had lived as the master of a harem in Arabia—and the current immorality of Marion were threats to what the Huxtables called decency.

First, the Marion Yates situation was inquired into. It was immediately apparent that the young woman would refuse to name the father of her child. Instead, she planned to bear it and bring it up as her nephew or niece, the child, at least, would not be affected by family pressures for which the Huxtables stood.

Another problem that came up concerned the prospective buyer of the store, an American named State. Mr State distressed everyone by talking in excessively naive terms. All his phrases—such as "the Needs of the Gentler Sex" and "Woman's Noble Instinct to Perpetuate the Race"—seemed to come from his mouth in capital letters; he was a grotesque representative of an early stage of modern advertising. Furthermore, he insultingly believed that his methods were in advance of British ones and that his presence in England would change for the better the English system of merchandising.

To State's unconscious hypocrisy and to the self-conscious respectability of the Huxtables, Constantine Madras opposed himself and his own nature. At great length he defended his own pattern of life, one in which man was free to do what he liked and in which woman learned to like what man did. He pointed out that Arabian culture had not been feminized and intellectualized as, he claimed, had happened in England. To all such remarks, his hearers lent a shocked ear.

A further complication arose when Philip learned that he had a problem of his own: his wife Jessica felt neglected and was ready to fall in love with Philip's best friend, Major Thomas. For the first time Philip was forced to recognize that his wife was a woman and an individual as well as a wife. His reaction to Jessica's problem was complicated by the fact that he felt contempt for sentimentalities displayed during his mother's fruitless interview with her estranged husband Constantine.

Philip's moderately respectable soul was still more disturbed when he learned that his father was the father of Marion Yates's unborn child. But Constantine did not blush at this revelation, he merely demanded care and protection for Marion and favored the company with a discourse on English priggishness. But Constantine, in turn, was distressed when Marion refused any assistance from him. Confused by her lack of social docility and feminine meekness, Constantine retreated to a cab and, eventually, to his Arabian household.

Still unresolved was the relationship between Philip and his wife. He finally recognized her as a person. To please her as well as himself, he gave up his interest in the Madras House, leaving it to Mr. State, the American. His plan was to talk matters over with his wife and to engage in activities useful to society. Both he and Jessica found themselves united by a hope that they could work together to improve the conditions of a faulty society which the sale of the Madras House had called to their attention.

THE MADWOMAN OF CHAILLOT

Type of work. Drama

Author Jean Giraudoux (1882-1944)

Time A little before noon in the spring of next year

Locale The Chaillot District of Paris

First presented 1945

Principal characters

COUNTESS AURELIA, the Madwoman of Chaillot
 MME. CONSTANCE, the Madwoman of Passy
 MME. GABRIELLE, the Madwoman of St. Sulpice
 MME. JOSEPHINE, the Madwoman of La Concorde
 THE RAGPICKER
 THE PRESIDENT
 THE BARON
 THE BROKER
 THE PROSPECTOR

In The Madwoman of Chaillot, Jean Giraudoux orchestrates three of his most constantly recurring themes: the inscrutability of woman, the love of humanity, and the abhorrence of materialism. For one who is familiar with all of Giraudoux's plays, the anti-war theme is implied in the latter. Stylistically, Giraudoux employs two of his favorite devices: the fantastic parable and the duality of character. The resulting impact of The Madwoman of Chaillot is that it possesses a remarkable unity of both form and idea, the unifying theme being the writer's love and faith in the triumph of the human entity in a time of despair.

As in several of Giraudoux's other plays, The Madwoman of Chaillot extends into the realm of fantasy, leaving irritating reality far behind. It differs from his other plays, however, in that it involves some forty acting parts and depends to some extent upon mere motion rather than upon typical plot complications for its effect.

The basic framework of the plot is simple. A mighty syndicate of financiers wishes to exploit the untouched deposits of oil under the streets of Paris, and they ignore humanity, beauty, and truth in the process. The free souls of Paris oppose them and eventually triumph by literally removing them from the scene.

In depicting the opposing forces in the battle for humanity, Giraudoux has weighted the scales in favor of the human element. On the one side are Presidents, Prospectors, Barons, Press Agents, Brokers, and Ladies of the Street. On the other side are the Waiter, the Little Man, the Street Singer, the Flower Girl, the Shoelace Peddler, the Ragpicker, and other folk. In the middle, and significantly devoted to the gentle souls, is the Madwoman of Chaillot, aided by her compatriots, the Madwomen of Passy, St Sulpice, and La Concorde. The capitalist forces are stereotypes who function as well oiled machinery, they are devoid of characteristics which would set them apart or elicit for them the least bit of empathic reaction. The people of Paris are all recognizable types, but each possesses some quality of individuality. Their vocations are of little concern; what matters is their love of life and mankind. The situation is basically mad, for the forces are utterly extreme.

The Madwoman tips the scales. She is both mad and frighteningly sane. Hers is an almost obligatory characterization, and Giraudoux has constructed the fabric of Countess Aurelia in such a fashion as to envelop the viewer in the sheer logic of her reasoning, making him captive of her every move. At the same time he suspends his belief in the situation through its sheer madness so that a detachment from reality is effected. (Giraudoux's plays usually abound in understated truths made in situations of extreme agitation or tension.) He endows Countess Aurelia with telling powers of observation. Her comments are frequently so simply and mercilessly clear and true that we wish we might have said them ourselves. But our sanity renders us incapable of such guileless simplicity.

A less facile playwright than Giraudoux might easily have succumbed to the practice of constructing the parable with idealized characters lacking reality and acting within a metaphysical framework. Or another writer might have developed the situation realistically, carefully couching his thesis among the intricacies of plot and character relationships. Although The Madwoman of Chaillot is not exactly a compromise between these two extremes, Giraudoux employs the best techniques of both. In this play he shows the value of revealing two levels of thought within the same character.

Countess Aurelia's very insanity is sane, for she is caught up in a moment of fantastic ideals, of powerful and inhuman forces, of incredible economic stratagems which require sanity of a kind. Success ignores life and beauty in a headlong momentum toward some undefinable goal. The mad countess has captured and held her sanity in an attempt to love life and beauty to the fullest. For this gentle woman, time has stopped when life was at its loveliest.

The Madwoman encounters the menace in the form of the President, the Baron, the Prospector, and the Broker at a sidewalk cafe in the Chaillot district. Her friends are all aware that something terrible is afoot and inform her of the plot to drill for oil beneath the streets. The Prospector has sent his agent with a bomb to destroy the city architect, the only obstacle to the drilling. Pierre, the young assassin, is rescued by the Police man as he is about to throw himself into the river rather than carry out his task. He is revived and convinced by the Mad woman that life is really worth living.

It is apparent to the Madwoman that the only way to combat the encroachment of the materialistic interests is to annihilate them. Because she and her friends have little chance of opposing them if commonly interpreted methods of justice were used, she decides upon an infallible plan and sends her confederates scurrying about on errands to help her carry it out.

She retires to her quarters in the Rue de Chaillot where she will receive the delegation of capitalists. They dare not resist her invitation, for she has informed them that a large deposit of oil rests under her basement. To prove it, she has prepared a sample, a bottle of mixed kerosene and mangle cure is waiting for the Prospector, who professes to be able to detect the existence of oil deposits by merely sniffing the air.

Some years before, the Madwoman had rescued a Sewer Man who promised to show her a secret entrance from her basement into the sewers of Paris She summons him now and he willingly presses the stone concealing the entrance The other Madwomen, Mme Constance, who takes her invisible lap dog with her everywhere, Mlle Gabrielle, who talks to nonexistent friends and Mme Josephine, who is an expert at jurisprudence because her brother in law was a lawyer, all arrive for a delightful tea scene They are in deed mad, but this in no way prejudices the trial which follows

Mme Josephine is called upon to conduct a court, for it is only just and proper that the financiers have a fair hearing before they are sent to oblivion The Rag picker agrees to speak in their defense, and a damning testimony it is, with money at the root of this materialistic evil The verdict of the tribunal is unanimous the accused are guilty on all charges The Madwoman may proceed with the ex

termination

The guests begin to arrive, and in a wonderful scene of comic irony each group in turn is sent through the door into the sewer First come the Presidents, next the Prospectors, then the Press Agents, and so on until all, like sheep, have followed the infallible nose of the Prospector down the dark stairway, never to return again

Immediately all the wrongs of the world are righted Giraudoux ends his play with a paean to the Madwoman of Chaillot and to life itself The pigeons fly again, the air is pure, the sky is clear, grass sprouts on the pavements, complete strangers are shaking hands Humanity has been saved, and the friends of friendship thank the Madwoman, the triumphant feminine force, who expresses Giraudoux's philosophy in a simple statement that any sensible woman can set right in the course of a single afternoon whatever is wrong in this muddled world

MAGNALIA CHRISTI AMERICANA

Type of work History

Author Cotton Mather (1663 1728)

Time 1620 1698

Locale New England

First published 1702

Cotton Mather's Magnalia Christi Americana, or The Ecclesiastical History of New England from Its First Planting, in the Year 1620, Unto the Year of Our Lord 1698 is commonly referred to, and dismissed, as a fairly authoritative and substantial picture of the Puritan theocracy in New England It is a history of Puritanism in the New World and much of it is true, but it is the product of a dogmatic, neurotic, tyrannical clergyman who failed to discriminate between facts and legends, the laws and the superstitions, of the early colonial period Mather gives as much prominence and weight to accounts of witches and repentant criminals as he does to the biographies of church leaders, and the entire history is conditioned by the belief that God's will was done in early New England

If the book is taken not as a history but as an impassioned product of the Puritan character in all of its dedication and its blindness, the experience of reading the book becomes a time experiment by which one can gaze into the working of a mind three hundred years removed from our own Great writers do not allow such strange, backward glimpses, their comments have a timelessness that makes their minds contemporary But Mather is no great writer, and when he speaks he reveals himself as his times made him pedantic, intemperate, and superstitious, yet an educated, religious man From such personalities much of the distinctive character of America developed, and if the historian uses the Magnalia as source material for a study of the early American character and its formative influence, more will be gained than if the book is taken as simply an account of New England Calvinism in its beginnings

Mather was pastor of the North Church in Boston only after the book appeared, during its writing he was as sistant minister He was a prolific writer, and critics generally agree in recognizing the quantity of his work without granting any worth, other than ordinary, to its literary quality

The Magnalia is divided into two volumes the first contains three books, the second, four The first book, titled "Antiquities," reports, in Mather's words, "the design where on, the manner where in, and the people where-by the several colonies of New England were planted" The second book contains the lives of the governors and the names of the magistrates of New England, and the third presents the lives of "sixty famous divines" Volume II begins with an account of the history of Harvard College, proceeds to an account of the "acts and monuments" of the New England churches, their discipline and principles, then records a number of "illustrious discovenes and demonstrations of the Divine Providence"—including "sea deliverances

remarkables done by thunder an history of criminals, executed for capital crimes, with their dying speeches,"—and concludes with "the wonders of the invisible world, in preternatural occurrences" The last book, "A Book of the Wars of the Lord," deals with early religious controversies, with the "molestations given to the churches of New England by that odd sect of people called Quakers," with impostors who pretended to be ministers, and with an account of the Indian wars

The historical account of the discovery and founding of New England begins with a critical consideration of the claims of various countries as discoverers of the

New World Mather finally gives the Cabots of England the credit for the discovery of the North American continent, but he declares that regardless of who first discovered America, it was the English who did the most for the new colonies

Mather writes of the early settlements in Florida and Virginia and of their difficult days He then provides a dramatized recital of the voyage of the May flower The landing at Cape Cod is taken by Mather as a sign of God's providence, had the voyagers landed somewhere along the Hudson River, he declares, they would have been massacred by the Indians

Mather's story of the founding of the various colonies is enlivened by zestful and partly imaginary accounts of Indian raids, of storms and droughts, and of quarrels with England and among the colonists themselves The difficulties of the early settlers are interpreted as signs of God's providence working to produce men of strong faith in a new land To the history of the establishment of the colonies and of churches within the colonies Mather attaches an "ecclesiastical map" which is a list of the congregations and ministers in the Plymouth, Massachusetts, and Connecticut colonies in 1696 The churches were erected, Mather writes, "on purpose to express and pursue the Protestant Reformation"

After some "historical remarks" on Boston, a lecture given in 1698 and designed to warn the Bostonians that their town had fallen on evil ways and that only with the help of God could it be returned to its former state of power and piety, Mather presents the lives of the governors of the colonies, commencing with William Bradford, governor of Plymouth colony Other governors whose lives are included are John Winthrop, governor of Massachusetts colony, Edward Hopkins, the first governor of Connecticut colony, Theophilus Eaton, governor of New Haven colony, John Winthrop (the son), governor of Con necticut and New Haven, and other successors

His stories of the clergy are so punctuated with moralizing passages and anecdotes that it is difficult to distinguish one divine from another. Despite Mather's pious tone, it is possible to appreciate the courage and religious devotion of the colonial ministers.

Mather is at his informative best in recording the decisions of the early churchmen concerning matters of faith. He objected to the opinion that the churches of New England simply followed the doctrines professed in England. A copy is given of the "Confession of Faith" agreed upon at Boston on May 12, 1680. The predominant feature of the document is the declaration of reliance on Holy Scripture, which is taken to be the word of God, interpretable by reference to the Scripture itself. Man's corruption is definitely admitted and is related to the fall of Adam, as seduced by Satan. Christ is the mediator between God and man. Man has free will, but since he does not always will the good, he is a sinner, to be saved only by the grace of God. The laws of God are for the direction of man, but they do not bind God Himself. The report of these points of dogma is supplemented by an account of the practices of the churches concerning such matters as church membership, election of officers, ordination, and the communion of churches with one another.

Mather becomes more human, almost gay, in the section titled "Remarkables of the Divine Providence." He begins with sea deliverances. "I will carry my reader upon the huge Atlantick, and, without so much as the danger of being made sea sick, he shall see 'wonders in the deep'." The first story concerns Ephraim Howe, who lost two sons during a voyage from New Haven to Boston, was buffeted by storms for weeks, was shipwrecked and forced to live on gulls, crows, and ravens, and was rescued only after his friends had died and he had been isolated on an island near Cape Sables for over three months. Other tales of deliverances after prayer include the story of a man preserved on the keel of an overturned boat, an incident of "twelve men living five weeks for five hundred leagues in a little boat" and several incidents of rescue at sea involving the calming of storm-tossed waters, the changing of wind, or the chance passage of a rescuing boat.

To his accounts of sea deliverances Mather adds stories of other acts of God—of flocks of birds arriving to end a plague of caterpillars, of the relief of droughts and floods of persons rescued from drowning or other dangers. Mather was impressed by wounds which would have been fatal, in his opinion, had not Divinity intervened. He tells, for example, of Abigail Eliot.

One Abigail Eliot had an iron struck into her head which drew out part of her brains with it. A silver plate she afterwards wore on her skull where the orifice remain'd as big as an half crown. The brains left in the child's head would swell and swage, according to the tides. Her intellectuals were not hurt by this disaster, and she liv'd to be a mother of several children.

In the hope of correcting ordinary sinners, Mather included a number of dying speeches of criminals. A verbatim report is given of the conversation between Hugh Stone, who cut his wife's throat, and a minister. The conversation was lengthy, but the criminal continued his confession of sins in a discourse and prayer almost as long as the conversation. He directed his remarks to "young men and maids," and warned that "If you say, when a person has provok'd you 'I will kill him,' 'tis a thousand to one but the next time you will do it'."

In writing of witches, Mather had few reservations concerning the truth of the charges against them. He believed in molestations from evil spirits, as directed by Satan, and he regarded the evidence of such possession as beyond any reason.

able doubt He wrote of women who claimed to have made pacts with the devil, who rode on broomsticks and put curses on others, causing endless trouble Execution was the proper punishment for such persons, according to Mather—although he did admit that there was “a going too far in this affair”

Perhaps the wonder is that the Christian spirit survived the passionate dogmatism and superstitions of colonial days Mather's Magnalia is a curious and fascinating hodgepodge of history, didacticism, and fatal error combining to give an authentic reflection of a seventeenth century American mind

THE MAHABHARATA

Type of work Poem

Author Unknown

Type of plot Heroic epic

Time of plot Remote antiquity

Locale Ancient India

First transcribed Fifth century B C (?)

Principal characters

KING DHRTARASHTRA, father of the Kauravas

KING PANDU his brother and father of the Pandavas

YUDHISHTHIRA,

BHIMA,

ARJUNA,

NAKULA, and

SAHADEVA the five sons of King Pandu

DRAUPADI, wife of the Pandavas

DURYODHANA, oldest son of Dhrtarashtra

Critique

This tremendous poetic effort is one of two national epics of the Hindu peoples, the second being the Ramayana In its present form in Sanskrit, the Mahabharata runs to some 200,000 verses in couplets (slokas), in eighteen sections or books, though there is credible evidence to assume that earlier versions were considerably less extensive Of the present version, only about one third to one quarter of the whole relates to the central story, that of a civil war between two great royal houses of India Not a unified epic poem in the sense that the Iliad and the Odyssey were conceived, the Mahabharata is a massive collection of fascinating heroic and mythological legends, sermon like essays, worldly and spiritual advice to the warrior class on appropriate conduct for military prowess and reverential duties, material constituting codes of law, popular apothegms and proverbs, and moral tales for the edification of its reader audience Authorship of the poem is nominally attributed to Vyasa, but since this name means “the arranger” or “the reviser” it seems evident that the identity of the original poet or poets has been long since lost From the state of the poem as it now exists, it is readily apparent that succeeding minstrels, copyists, and zealous adapters have worked conscientiously to include records, fables, favorite stories of mythological characters, rules for conduct, and the like as a means of preserving whatever they deemed most appealing and valuable for their contemporaries and posterity to know and understand about the glorious past For these reasons the Mahabharata is both a history of prehistoric times and a compendium of materials that throw light on the religious, social, political, ethical, and moral ideals and practices of an old and memorable people

The Story

Among the descendants of King Bharata (after whose name India was called Bharata-varsha, land of the Bharatas)

there were two successors to the throne of Hastinapura. Of these, the elder, Dhritarashtra, was blind and gave over the reins of government to his younger brother Pandu. But Pandu grew weary of his duties and retired to hunt and enjoy himself. Again Dhritarashtra took control, aided by the advice and example of his wise old uncle, Bhishma. Upon Pandu's death, his five sons were put under the care of his younger brother, who had one hundred sons of his own.

At first the king's household was peaceful and free from strife, but gradually it became apparent that Pandu's sons were far more capable of ruling than any of Dhritarashtra's heirs. Of the Pandavas, the name given to the five descendants of Pandu, all were remarkably able, but the oldest, Yudhishthira, was judged most promising and therefore was chosen heir apparent to the throne of the old blind king. To this selection of their cousin as the future king, the king's own sons took violent exception. Accordingly, they persuaded their father to allow the Pandavas to leave the court and live by themselves. From a trap set by the unscrupulous Duryodhana, leader of the king's sons, the five brothers escaped to the forest with their mother. There they spent some time in rustic exile.

In the meantime King Drupada had announced that the hand of his daughter, Princess Draupadi, would be given to the hero surpassing all others in a feat of strength and skill, and he had invited throngs of noblemen to compete for his daughter's hand. In disguise, the Pandavas set out for King Drupada's court.

More than two weeks were spent in celebrating the approaching nuptials of the princess before the trial of strength which would reveal the man worthy of taking the lovely princess as his wife. The test was to grasp a mighty bow, fit an arrow, bend the bow, and hit a metal target with the arrow. Contestant after contestant failed in the effort to bend the huge bow. Finally Arjuna, third of the sons of Pandu, came forward and performed the feat with little effort to win the hand of the princess. But in curious fashion Princess Draupadi became the wife of all five of the brothers. At this time, also, the Pandavas met their cousin on their mother's side, Krishna of Dwaraka. This renowned Yadava nobleman they accepted as their special counselor and friend, and to him they owed much of their future success and power.

Hoping to avert dissension after his death, King Dhritarashtra decided to divide his kingdom into two parts, giving his hundred sons, the Kauravas, one portion and the Pandavas the other. Thus it came about that Dhritarashtra's sons ruled in Hastinapur and the five sons of Pandu in Indraprastha.

The dying king's attempt to settle affairs of government amicably resulted in peace and prosperity for a brief period. Then the wily Duryodhana, leader of the Kauravas, set another trap for the Pandavas. On this occasion he enticed Yudhishthira, the oldest of the brothers, into a game of skill at dice. When the latter lost, the penalty was that the five brothers were to leave the court and spend the next twelve years in the forest. At the end of that time they were to have their kingdom and holdings once again if they could pass another year in disguise, without having anyone recognize them.

The twelve year period of rustication was one of many romantic and heroic adventures. All five brothers were concerned in stirring events, Arjuna, in particular, traveled far and long, visited the sacred stream of the Ganges, was courted by several noble ladies, and finally married Subhadra, sister of Krishna.

When the long time of exile was over, the Pandavas and Kauravas engaged in a war of heroes. Great armies were assembled, mountains of supplies were brought together. Just before the fighting began, Krishna stepped forth and sang the divine song, the Bhagavad Gita, in which he set forth such theological truths as the indestructibility of the soul, the necessity to defend the faith, and other fundamental precepts of the theology of Brahma. By means of this song Arjuna was relieved of his doubts concerning the need to make his trial by battle.

The war lasted for some eighteen consecutive days, each day marked by fierce battles, single combats, and bloody attacks. Death and destruction were everywhere—the battlefields were strewn with broken bodies and ruined weapons and chariots. The outcome was the annihilation of all the pretensions of the Kauravas and their allies to rule over the kingdom. Finally Yudhishtira came to the throne amidst great celebrations, the payment of rich tribute, and the ceremonial horse sacrifice.

Later the death of their spiritual and military counselor, Krishna, led the five brothers to realize their weariness with earthly pomp and striving. Accordingly, Yudhishtira gave up his duties as ruler. The five brothers then banded together, clothed themselves as hermits, and set out for Mount Meru, the dwelling place of the gods on high. They were accompanied by their wife Draupadi and a dog that joined them on their journey. As they proceeded, one after the other dropped by the way and perished. At last only Yudhishtira and the faithful dog remained to reach the portals of heaven. But when the dog was refused admission to that holy place, Yudhishtira declined to enter without his canine companion. Then the truth was revealed—the dog was in reality the god of justice himself, sent to test Yudhishtira's constancy.

But Yudhishtira was not content in heaven, for he soon realized that his brothers and Draupadi had been required to descend to the lower regions and there expiate their mortal sins. Lonely and disconsolate, he decided to join them until all could be united in heaven. After he had spent some time in that realm of suffering and torture, the gods took pity on him. Along with his brothers and Draupadi, he was transported back to heaven, where all dwelt in perpetual happiness.

THE MAID OF HONOUR

Type of work Drama

Author Philip Massinger (1583-1640)

Type of plot Tragic comedy

Time of plot The Renaissance

Locale Palermo and Siena, Italy

First presented c. 1623

Principal characters

ROBERTO, King of Sicily

FERDINAND, Duke of Urbino

BERTOLDO, a natural brother of Roberto and a Knight of Malta

GONZAGA, a Knight of Malta, general to the Duchess of Siena

ASTUTIO, a counselor of state to the King of Sicily

FULGENTIO, the favorite of King Roberto

ADORNI, a Sicilian gentleman, in love with Camiola

AURELIA, Duchess of Siena

CAMIOLA, the 'Maid of Honour'

Critique

In The Maid of Honour Massinger wrote a play which, though by no means great, contains perhaps two memorable characters and a certain amount of dramatic poetry of at least the second rank.

The figure of Camiola has been much admired for her noble unselfishness, and the self-sacrificing lover, Adorni, has also received a measure of praise. Although the play contains many of the improbabilities common to the drama of the period, the author's skill in dramatic construction is apparent. As Arthur Symonds phrased it, Massinger was so unfortunate as to appear "at the ebb of a spent wave," after the great Elizabethans; nevertheless, his plays have experienced a certain revival of popularity as the result of the renewed interest in the Jacobean and Caroline dramatists.

The Story

At the court of Roberto, King of Sicily, at Palermo, where the arrival of an ambassador from the Duke of Urbino was momentarily expected, the conversation of those waiting had turned to discussion of the sinister influence of Fulgentio, the king's unworthy favorite, and of the soldierly qualities of Bertoldo, the king's illegitimate half brother. Upon the arrival of the ambassador, the political situation was explained: the Duke of Urbino, in love with the Duchess of Siena but rejected by her, had attacked her territories. On the verge of defeat at the hands of the Sienese, he was appealing to Sicily for aid on the basis of a treaty of mutual assistance. King Roberto, however, maintained that the treaty had been rendered void by the aggressive action of the duke and that Sicily was not obligated to come to the rescue. This pacifistic attitude was abhorrent to the king's half brother Bertoldo, who in a fiery speech accused the king of cowardice, claimed that Sicily's honor demanded intervention, and urged the nobles to follow him to the relief of the duke. The king, angered by the speech, replied that any might volunteer who wished, but that they would then cease to be his subjects and could expect no protection from him if fortune went against them.

On that same day, at the house of Camiola, the maid was being plagued by the suit of one Syllio, a man of almost unbelievable conceit. He, however, left upon the arrival of Bertoldo, who had come to say farewell and to declare his own love. But in spite of her evident love for Ber-toldo, Camiola rejected his suit because, as a Knight of Malta, he was vowed to celibacy; nor could she be moved by his suggestion that a dispensation could be obtained. He left for the war with the determination to have honor as his only mistress.

The next day King Roberto learned of Bertoldo's departure with his volunteers and was displeased at the news. Fulgentio, however, was delighted, for with Bertoldo gone he could pursue his own wooing of Camiola. On his arrival at her house he behaved in an overbearing manner toward all present, particularly her other suitors, Syllio and Adorno. Syllio fainted, but Adorno was prepared to fight until restrained by Camiola. In a series of frank and witty speeches, Camiola told Fulgentio exactly what she thought of him and outlined his despicable character. He left, vowing to avenge himself by ruining her reputation by spreading scandal about her.

Meanwhile, in the territories of Siena, the forces of the Duke of Urbino were still faring badly. Bertoldo and his Sicilian volunteers had arrived, but they could not change the fortunes of war. In the ensuing battle they were captured. When Gonzaga, the Sienese general, recognized Bertoldo as a Knight of Malta, he tore the cross from his prisoner's cloak, for Bertoldo had broken the vows of the order by attacking the duchess in an unjust war. Further, when Astutio came as ambassador from King Roberto to disclaim his sovereign's part in the attack, Gonzaga agreed to accept the usual ransom for all the Sicilian nobles except Bertoldo, for whom he demanded fifty thousand crowns. Astutio bore the news that the king would pay nothing for his half brother and had, in fact, confiscated the unfortunate man's estates. Unable to pay the ransom, Bertoldo faced a lifetime of imprisonment.

In Sicily, Adorno had challenged Fulgentio for his treatment of Camiola, but the cowardly favorite had declined the challenge. On Camiola's birthday, in the midst of the celebration, Adorni entered bleeding. He had been wounded in the fight that he had finally forced upon Fulgentio but he had compelled the latter to sign a paper repudiating the slanders he had been spreading about Camiola. Adorni then confessed his love for Camiola, but she rejected him with the admonition that he must not aspire so high. Yet when, through the agency of the ransomed Sicilian noblemen she learned of Bertoldo's plight, she was ready enough to send Adorni with the fifty thousand crowns to ransom the man she loved. Adorni promised to execute the commission faithfully, although he felt that he would not survive for long and departed for Siena to bring happiness to his rival Bertoldo, in ecstasies at the goodness of Camiola, gladly agreed to sign the contract of betrothal that she had demanded. It was his tragedy, however, to be sent for by the victorious Duchess of Siena, who had heard of his martial prowess. Almost instantly she fell violently in love with him and he after a short struggle against the sin of ingratitude fell equally in love with her and promised to marry her.

While this surprising event was in progress at Siena, an equally unexpected change of fortune was taking place in Sicily. The king and his favorite arrived at Camiola's house, the former with seeming sternness, rebuked her for disobedience in refusing Fulgentio's suit and for urging Adorni to attack him. Camiola defended her conduct and accused Ful-gentio of having slandered her. King Roberto then ordered Fulgentio out of his sight, threatened him with death, and praised the behavior of Camiola. Thus the villain was discomfited.

Camiola, informed by the faithful Adorni of Bertoldo's perfidy, made plans accordingly. At a reunion in the palace at Palermo, the king forgave his half brother and consented to his marriage to the Duchess of Siena. But Camiola entered and after promising Fulgentio to try to secure his peace with the king, asked the monarch for justice on Bertoldo. Producing the contract of betrothal that he had signed, she made such a noble plea for her rights that even the love-smitten duchess acknowledged her superiority and yielded Bertoldo to her while he admitted his falseness and confessed himself branded with disloyalty and ingratitude. Camiola forgave him and announced her approaching marriage. The entrance of a group of friars provided another surprise for the gathering. Camiola announced that she had determined to become the bride of the Church; by entering a religious order she was to become, in another sense, the Maid of Honour. As her last act, she gave Adorni a third of her estate and returned to Bertoldo the cross of the Knights of Malta, bidding him to redeem his honor by fighting against the enemies of the faith. As she departed for the convent, King Roberto stated admiringly that she well deserved her title of Maid of Honour.

MAIN-TRAVELLED ROADS

Type of work Short stories
Author Hamlin Garland (1860-1940)
Time Late nineteenth century
Locale The Middle West
First published 1891

In 1887, Hamlin Garland traveled from Boston to South Dakota through farming country he had not seen in three years, to visit his mother and father, whom he had not seen in six. According to his own account, the trip was a revelation. Although he had been brought up on a farm, he had never realized how wretched the life of the farmer was. The farther west he traveled, the more oppressive became the bleakness of the landscape and the poverty of its people. When he reached his parents' farm and found his mother living in hopeless misery, Garland's depression sank into bitterness, a mood which inspired a series of short stories about farm life in the Middle West, the book titled Main Travelled Roads.

One of these stories, "Up the Coolly," re-creates the mood of Garland's trip under circumstances slightly similar in some respects. Howard McLane, after years spent traveling with his own theatrical troupe, returned to the West for a surprise visit with his mother and brother. He found them living in poverty on a small, unproductive farm, the family property having been sold to pay off a mortgage. Although his mother and his sister-in-law greeted him with warmth, Grant, his brother, soon made it plain that he blamed Howard for the loss of the farm, that Howard, had he shared his apparent wealth, could have saved the farm and spared his mother a great deal of misery. Howard's attempt to win the friendship of his brother resulted only in alienation until Howard finally admitted his selfishness and neglect and offered to buy the farm back. The brothers were reconciled, but the story ends in despair with Grant's refusal of assistance.

Not many of Garland's stories end on so despondent a note, in fact, most of them end hopefully, and some happily. But none of Garland's principal characters is spared a bitter sense of failure, though most of them overcome it. Thus, in "A 'Good Fellow's' Wife," Jim Sanford lost all the savings of the farmers who had invested in his bank. In "A Branch Road," Will Hannon lost the beautiful girl he loved and regained her only when she was prematurely old and wasted. And in "Under the Lion's Paw," Tim Haskins was forced to pay double for a farm because he himself had doubled its value by hard work.

Even in the stories which are lighter in tone, the characters are made to taste of the bitterness of life. Thus, in "The Creamery Man," which is about a young man's carefree courtship, Claude Williams won not Lucindy Kennedy, the lovely daughter of a prominent farmer but Nina Haldeman, the unrefined daughter of an immigrant. And in "Mrs. Ripley's Trip," Grandma Ripley made a journey back East where she had been born, but not without a sense of guilt for leaving her husband, even for so short a time.

In addition to reflecting the bitterness which Garland himself felt, many of the stories set forth a disillusioning contrast between the farm life he remembered and the reality he found when he returned after a long absence. "The Return of a Private," for instance, pictures the return of a Civil War soldier to his farm. Expecting the farm to be as prosperous as he had left it, Private Smith found it "weedy and encumbered, a rascally renter had run away with his machinery, his children needed clothing, the years were coming upon him, he was sick and emaciated." In "God's Ravens," Robert Bloom, who had moved to the country because he felt stifled by city life, went through an apprenticeship of misery before the country people finally accepted him and made him feel at home.

It is possible, however, to overemphasize Garland's disillusionment, practically all the stories in Main-Travelled Roads have a hopeful ending in that the characters' love for the land and their trust in it are ultimately justified. It is clear that Private Smith by hard work will restore his farm to its former prosperity. Robert Bloom discovers that the cause of his discontent is within himself, not in the hearts of his farmer neighbors. Tim Haskins, robbed by one man, is set on his feet by another. It is true that Garland's realistic portrayal of hardship and poverty did much to shatter any romantic illusions about an American pastoral idyl, but its somber tone was not enough to discredit the traditional view of the farmer as a doughty, virtuous frontiersman. Rather,

Garland's accomplishment was to expose the pathos, perhaps tragedy, of people who felt the futility and injustice of farm life, but who were unable to change that life and so accepted it with fortitude and resignation

Main Travelled Roads is more than a social document. No less a figure than William Dean Howells recognized that it was important in the development of a new American literature. In an essay which was reprinted as an introduction to later editions of Main Travelled Roads, he commended Garland for the social significance of his work and then went on to praise his "fine courage to leave a fact with the reader, ungarnished and unvarnished, which is almost the rarest trait in an Anglo Saxon writer, so infantile and feeble is the custom of our art."

Singled out for special praise was the ending of "A Branch Road," in which Will Hannon persuaded Agnes Dingman to leave her husband and the farm to lead a life of comfort and ease. Such an ending Howells deemed immoral but justifiable, since for these characters it was probable and realistic. Howells' judgment was sound. It is for Garland's contribution to the rise of American realism as well as for his social commentary that his works are still read.

MAJOR BARBARA

Type of work Drama

Author Bernard Shaw (1856-1950)

Time Early twentieth century

Locale London

First presented 1905

Principal characters

SIR ANDREW UNDERSHAFT, a munitions tycoon

LADY BRITOMART UNDERSHAFT, his domineering wife

BARBARA, their older daughter, a major in the Salvation Army

SARAH, their younger daughter

STEPHEN, their son, a correct young man

ADOLPHUS CUSINS, a professor of Greek

CHARLES LOMAX, Sarah's suitor

SNOBBY PRICE,

RUMMY MITCHENS,

BILL WALKER and

PETER SHIRLEY, members of the lower classes

In writing Major Barbara, Shaw faced essentially the same problems that had confronted the earliest English dramatists, the authors of the medieval miracle and mystery plays. Like those writers, Shaw considered drama to be only a means, not an end, and like them he used drama as a means of educating the great ignorant public. But the problems confronting Shaw were considerably more formidable than those posed by the dramatization of Biblical stories. Instead of stories which were intrinsically dramatic and which provided ready-made plots, Shaw dramatized themes: philosophical themes, moral themes, social, economic, historic, and even biological themes, most of which were intrinsically non-dramatic and unentertaining. No one but a college sophomore or a genius would have dared inflict on a theater audience, intent only on an evening's entertainment, the doctrines of Nietzsche, Schopenhauer, or, for that matter, Ernest Belfort Cox. This is not to deny that earlier dramatists had successfully woven philosophical themes into their plays. But in Shaw's plays the theme is not merely an integral part of the characters and action, as often as not it is a topic of conversation which the characters, sitting in their parlors or standing on the streets, discuss and explore.

Shaw's problem, then, was clear cut to create characters who were so interesting and lively that the audience would not mind listening to them preach. For Shaw's characters do preach, and nowhere quite so vociferously as in Major Barbara.

Major Barbara is a sermon. The subject is salvation of society and salvation of the human soul, the text, blessed are the poor. As might be expected, Shaw's message is diametrically opposed to the lesson taught by Christian ethics. Shaw believed that the poor were unblessed. Since poverty was obviously the source of sin, no poor man could possibly hope to enter the kingdom of heaven. More important to Shaw, perhaps, was the fact that poverty was also the source of crime. To eliminate poverty, then, was a social as well as a moral imperative.

A play built on such a theme could easily have sunk either into the depths of naturalism or drifted into the zone of platitudinous propaganda. Instead, since Shaw was the author, the play turned out to be outrageously funny. In fact, Major Barbara is one of the funniest plays Shaw wrote and therefore one of the most effective.

As in all Shaw's plays, the focus is on a conflict between the forces of conventionality and the power of a superior being—the Shavian hero. Ironically, since Shaw was a Socialist, the hero, Andrew Undershaft, is a multimillionaire capitalist, a manufacturer of munitions. Pitted against him is his daughter Barbara, a major in the Salvation Army. Undershaft is the apostle of Shaw's secular morality. Realizing that poverty breeds social discontent and thus constitutes a threat to capitalism, he uses his immense power to eliminate poverty, at least among his own workers. Barbara recognizes to be a superior person possessed of true but misguided, moral energy. She has deluded herself into thinking that the converts she wins through her work in the Salvation Army have truly reformed, that the Army truly wins souls to the kingdom of God. Undershaft undertakes to convert her. On the other hand, Barbara deplores her father's profession, believing that he is dedicated to the destruction rather than the salvation of mankind. She undertakes to convert him.

The battle is one-sided, short, and decisive. Undershaft merely has to show Barbara that he, a dealer in death and destruction, can buy the Army's good graces for the price of a donation. He shows that he and others like him—a distiller, for instance—provide the financial backing without which the Army would collapse. Crushed by her father's cynicism and what she considers the Army's hypocrisy, she turns in her uniform.

The play ends on a note of sardonic optimism. Undershaft's destruction of Barbara's faith is only a preliminary step; he must now convert her to his own creed. This conversion he accomplishes by taking Barbara and the rest of his family on a tour of his factory and Pervale St. Andrews, the town in which his workers live. The town turns out to be a workman's paradise. Instead of the misery and squalor which Barbara expects, she finds prosperity and sanitation. Realizing at last that it is impossible to save hungry men's souls, she resolves to devote her energies to saving the souls of the well-fed.

Directly involved in this struggle for Barbara's soul is her suitor, Adolphus Cusins, a professor of Greek, who, to please Barbara, neglects his studies to play the bass drum in the Salvation Army band. Cusins is important, too, in the thematic structure of the play because he is the third member of the triumvirate which is to save society. Undershaft, following the tradition of his predecessors in the munitions business, disinherits his own son Stephen and adopts Adolphus as his protégé and heir. To Undershaft's power and Barbara's moral fervor, Adolphus adds intellect. In this combination, presumably, lay Shaw's hope for the salvation of society.

The minor characters serve both to act out the message of the play and to provide much of the humor. They are divided into two classes: rich and poor. The poor class is represented by the rascals and reprobates who frequent Barbara's Salvation Army shelter. Of these, by far the most typical are Snobby Price and Rummy Mitchens, both of whom feign a desire for spiritual sustenance and testify to their conversion to Christianity in return for free meals. The most pathetic is Peter Shurley, who at forty-five has been thrown out of work because he has a streak of gray in his hair. A disciple of Thomas Paine, he swallows his pride to accept a free meal only when he is starving. By far the meanest and funniest is Bill Walker, who comes to the shelter to pommel his girl friend because she deserted him when she was converted. A bully and ruffian, he provides the funniest scene of the play when, after blackening the eye of one of Barbara's young female assistants, he is shamed into an excruciating sense of guilt by Barbara's reproofs. His role as a foil to Undershaft is apparent when Bill tries to atone for the black eye by giving a donation to the Army.

The idle rich are represented by Undershaft's wife, son, younger daughter, and the latter's suitor Lady Britomart and her son Stephen, reek of conventional morality. A typical domineering mother, Lady Britomart abhors her husband's immorality but does not hesitate to capitalize on it, accepting his money to ensure her children's comfortable place in society. Stephen, though cowed at first by his mother, declares his independence toward the end of the play and is rewarded with a career in journalism by his amused father. Charles Lomax, Sarah's suitor, demonstrates the utter frivolity and vacuity of the rich. Although these are stock characters borrowed from Oscar Wilde's drawing room comedies, they are vigorous and funny.

Shaw's success in creating such thoroughly delightful characters is the key to the success of Major Barbara. Without the relief of the humor which each and every character provides, the moralizing and preaching would be tedious. It is by no means certain, however, that Shaw converted anyone to his brand of secular morality by using such a dramatic technique. The play is so amusing that it is difficult to take the theme seriously. But in the process of entertaining his audiences, Shaw was able at least to acquaint them with serious ideas. Surely he did not expect to accomplish more.

THE MALCONTENT

Type of work Drama

Author John Marston (1576-1634)

Type of plot Romantic comedy

Time of plot Thirteenth century

Locale Genoa, Italy

First presented 1604

Principal characters

GIOVANNI ALTOFRONTO, disguised as the Malcontent, sometime Duke of Genoa

PIETRO JACOMO, Duke of Genoa

MENDOZA, a court minion

FERNEZE, a young courtier

AURELIA, Pietro Jacomo's wife

MARIA, Altofronto's wife

BILIOSO, an old Marshal

MAQUERELLE, an old panderer

CELSO, a friend of Altofronto

Critique

Although Marston called The Malcontent a comedy, it has more the qualities of a tragic comedy. The pandering in connection with cuckoldry and the court toadies are treated as comedy in the Elizabethan sense, but the principal issue of the play, restoration of the rightful, and right, state leadership, is not amusing, nor is it handled as humor in this play. In style, The Malcontent is unsatisfying when compared with other Elizabethan dramas. Marston seems to have tried to impress his audience with his facility of language, and his use of descriptive phrases and figures of speech is extended to the point of monotony. Also, the play comes more to life in scenes implying tragedy than in those purporting comedy. Marston dedicated The Malcontent to Ben Jonson, his close friend and sporadic literary feudist. John Webster collaborated to the extent of developing additions for presentation on the stage by the King's Players.

The Story

Duke Altofronto had been banished from Genoa and a political coup, staged by Mendoza with the help of the Florentines, had brought weak Pietro Jacomo to power through his marriage to Aurelia, the daughter of a powerful Florentine leader. Altofronto, disguised as the Malcontent, prepared to bide his time until the state weaned of Pietro. His devoted duchess, Maria, waited faithfully in prison for his return. Celso acted as Altofronto's secret informant on matters of state.

As the Malcontent, Altofronto was described as a likable person of marked intelligence and straightforward honesty. He would not flatter as others did. On the negative side, however, he was described as more monster than man, more discontented than Lucifer in his Fall, a man living on the vexations of others and at variance with his own soul. This mixture, making him seem most unpredictable, served Altofronto well in plotting against his adversaries. This description of the former duke came from Pietro, strangely attracted to the erratic individual known as the Malcontent. It was Altofronto who told Pietro that he was being cuckolded by Mendoza. This condition, Altofronto declared, was most unnatural in that a cuckold was a creation of woman and not of God. Altofronto used such means to torment Pietro and to inflame him against Mendoza.

Incensed by Altofronto's report of Mendoza's relationship with Aurelia, Pietro confronted the minion with accusations and threats to kill him, but Mendoza placated the duke with disparagement of women and their habits, absolving himself of Pietro's accusations by telling him that Ferneze was the offender against the duke's marital rights. To prove his point he suggested that Pietro break into Aurelia's room that night, then, should Ferneze try to escape, Mendoza would kill him. The situation resolved itself as Mendoza planned. Ferneze was discovered in Aurelia's room and was, as the minion believed, killed in his attempt to flee.

Later, when Mendoza and Aurelia were alone, they planned Pietro's murder. Aurelia promised to use her influence to have Mendoza made Duke of Genoa. Unknown to them, however, Ferneze had not been killed. Wounded, he attracted the attention of Altofronto, who revived and hid the young courtier.

Knowing that Pietro had gone hunting, Mendoza hired the Malcontent to pursue and murder the duke. Taken in by Altofronto's apparent willingness to aid him in his villainy, Mendoza outlined the remaining steps to his ultimate goal. With Pietro removed and his alliance with Aurelia established, he would be ready to make his real bid for power. The banishment of Aurelia would be an easy step because he would publicize her infidelity to the Florentines. Then he intended to marry Maria, Altofronto's imprisoned wife, whose friends would strengthen Mendoza and his faction.

Assured by Mendoza's admission that he did not love Maria, that she too was only a pawn to him, Altofronto took heart in his assurance that Maria was still true to him, as Celso had reported. Altofronto suggested to Mendoza that they hire some wretch or holy man to report that he had seen Pietro, bereft of reason because of his wife's infidelity, throw himself into the sea. Also, he offered to act as Mendoza's emissary in winning Maria's favor.

Instead of murdering Pietro, Altofronto divulged to him the plot against his life and provided him with the disguise of the hermit who was to report his suicide. Pietro, in disguise, gave a vivid description of his own anguished demise as he lamented Aurelia's unfaithfulness. Mendoza immediately banished Aurelia. He then instructed Altofronto to negotiate with Maria.

Duped by the earnestness of the supposed hermit, Mendoza sent him after Altofronto, with orders to poison the Malcontent at supper. When Altofronto returned for a letter that would admit him to Maria's quarters in the citadel, he in turn received Mendoza's instructions to poison the hermit.

Altofronto and Pietro, encountering banished Aurelia, found her in abject grief because of her indiscretions and her love for Pietro. Altofronto eased the hurt of Pietro's inadequacy in his relationship with Aurelia by reminding him that many great men have had unfaithful wives. Among them he named Agamemnon, King Arthur, and Hercules.

Maria's faithfulness to Altofronto was proved beyond doubt when Maquerelle and the disguised Altofronto waited upon her to deliver Mendoza's offer of marriage. In answer to their proposal and the promise of great riches if she would accept Mendoza, she announced that she already had a husband. Banished or in power, present or absent, Altofronto was still her true lord.

Mendoza's only remaining threat to power was Altofronto, who in the disguise of the Malcontent knew too much of the usurper's malice. To be rid of him, Mendoza planned to use the contents of one of the two boxes given him by his intended victim. These boxes, according to the giver, contained fumes that on being breathed would either put the person to sleep for twelve hours or kill him suddenly. Mendoza, not knowing the contents of either box, used the one that merely put Altofronto into a sleep resembling death. Later he appeared at a masked ball given by Mendoza to celebrate the deaths he had planned. In the meantime, spurned by Maria, Mendoza accused her of murdering the hermit—the disguised Pietro—whom Altofronto had reported dead. Condemned to die, the faithful wife welcomed death, a fate better than damnation in being married to the usurper.

At the ball Altofronto chose Maria as his partner. Revealing his identity, he asked her to remain composed so that others would not recognize him. Pietro danced with Aurelia, who, repenting of her past deeds, vowed her undying devotion to him. Then, at the signal of a musical flourish, Mendoza's three supposed victims—Altofronto, Pietro, and Ferneze—revealed themselves, to the consternation of Mendoza and the joy of the assemblage. Immediately acclaimed, Altofronto was restored to his rightful place as Duke of Genoa.

Denying Mendoza's plea to live long enough to do penance for his sins, Altofronto ordered the minion to take his own life. Aurelia and Pietro were given the blessing of the court. Maquerelle was allowed to carry on her pandering in the suburbs. Bilioso, a sycophant who chose to stand with the wrong rather than fall with the right, was summarily dismissed from any further court favor. And Altofronto and Maria were reunited in happiness.

THE MAN AGAINST THE SKY

Type of work Poetry

Author Edwin Arlington Robinson (1869 1935)

First published 1916

One of the most difficult of American poets to pigeonhole is Edwin Arlington Robinson. If critics try to file him away under the label of the prolix and wordy poets, he refutes them with the sparkling simplicity of such character sketches as "Bewick Finzer" and "Richard Cory", if they decide he is coldly intellectual, they need only read Tristram to discover a warm and passionate love story, if they try to stuff him into that compartment occupied by poets who take themselves too seriously, such witty masterpieces as "Miniver Cheevy" and "Mr Flood's Party" will laugh at them forever. Yet in spite of these many talents, Robinson has somewhat grudgingly been given the status of a major American poet, and critics who specialize in "modern" poetry tend to omit him from their discussions or to brush him off with a word or two. Possibly the very fact that he cannot be pigeonholed and does not belong to any school or movement accounts for this strange neglect. And strange neglect it is, for Robinson is one of the most interesting and readable poets of our time.

In The Man Against the Sky, the early volume that first brought him the critical acclaim that now seems to be waning, Robinson is at his best, and nearly all the types of poetry he was to write are skillfully represented here. Only his talent for handling long narratives, as found in his Arthurian trilogy and his novels in verse, such as Cavender's House, is lacking, and perhaps even this aspect of this work is foreshadowed in miniature by "Llewellyn and the Tree," the triangle story of a man, his shrewish wife, and Fate.

The light touch that created Miniver Cheevy and Mr Flood introduces us in this volume to "Old King Cole"

No crown annoyed his honest head,
No fiddlers three were called or needed,
For two disastrous heirs instead
Made music more than ever three did

The story of the old man cursed with two wild and worthless sons is essentially a tragic one, but Robinson lets the old fellow take such a merry and philosophical attitude toward his troubles that the reader is amused rather than saddened. This effect is a variation on a well-known skill of Robinson's: in his character sketches he celebrates people who would ordinarily be judged as failures and charmingly turns defeat into a contented, if not glorious, triumph. Robinson is likely to be remembered best for these short poems which are alive with strange and interesting characters. In The Man Against the Sky we first meet Flammonde, that "Prince of Castaways" who comes to Tilbury Town "from God knows where." Flammonde finally is able to make the townspeople see the good points in a woman of bad reputation, to help them raise money for the education of a gifted boy, and to patch up a quarrel between two citizens of the town. But Flammonde himself remains a mystery, an apparent failure in life. In "The Gift of God" we are introduced to the fond and foolish mother who in her dreams ennobles a son who is just an average young man, but her triumph comes in the very nobility of that dream. "The Poor Relation" is less subtle than many of Robinson's sketches, but it is an effective portrait of an old woman who is "unsought, unthought of, and unheard." And, of course, there is Bewick Finzer, the man of wealth whose brain crumbles when he loses all his money, a sad reminder to the more fortunate, he comes begging for loans.

THE MAN AGAINST THE SKY by Edwin Arlington Robinson. Excerpts reprinted by permission of the publishers The Macmillan Co. Copyright, 1910 by Charles Scribner's Sons. Copyright 1916, 1924, by The Macmillan Co. Renewed. All rights reserved.

Familiar as an old mistake,
And futile as regret

Still another fine short poem is "John Gorham," but this one differs from Robinson's other sketches in its ballad-like form. Two young people, Gorham and Jane Wayland, speak to each other in alternating stanzas, they break off their romance in most surprising fashion.

The pièce de resistance of the volume is the long dramatic monologue, "Ben Jonson Entertains a Man from Stratford." Using the few known facts of Shakespeare's life and the many hints found in the plays and sonnets, the poet gives us as fine a characterization of Shakespeare as can be found anywhere. Robinson's setting is a simple one. Ben Jonson meets an alderman from Stratford and treats him to a few drinks in a London tavern. While drinking, Ben talks about "this mad, careful, proud, indifferent Shakespeare." The poem is centered around the bard's very human wish to retire to the finest house in Stratford and live out his life as a country squire. In developing this theme, Robinson credits Ben with some astute observations on Shakespeare's skill as a playwright, on his troubles with women, on the contrast between his simple ambitions and his tremendous success as a writer, and on his feelings toward "a phantom world he sounded and found wanting." Part of the pleasure in reading this poem comes from recognizing the sources from which Robinson has drawn his material, for in stance, Shakespeare's troubled love life derives from the recorded facts of his strange marriage to Anne Hathaway and from the "dark lady" of the sonnets, for Shakespeare's outlook on life Robinson draws chiefly on the graveyard scene in Hamlet, an interesting source because Robinson has definitely "weighted" his poem so that it becomes a sort of literary triple play—Shakespeare to Jonson to Robinson—and he makes Robinson the key man. Here is a passage in which Jonson, when he meets Shakespeare

"down Lambeth way," quotes the bard as philosophizing in a gloomy mood. This could undoubtedly be Shakespeare speaking, but might it not also be pure Robinson?

'Your fly will serve as well as anybody,
And what's his hour? He flies and flies,
and flies
And in his fly's mind has a brave appearance
And then your spider gets him in her net
And eats him up and hangs him up to dry
That's Nature the kind mother of us all
And then your slattern housemaid swings her broom,
And where's your spider? And that's Nature also It's Nature, and it's Nothing. It's all Nothing."

This type of philosophy has its counterpart in the title piece of Robinson's volume. The poet has been called a "muddy thinker" but a careful reading of "The Man Against the Sky" reveals not muddiness but the honest outlook of a man who, like so many others, is unsure of the meaning of birth, life, and death. Robinson is not the first to suggest that man, in his search for the answer to the riddle, will find that the problem is a personal one, that "mostly alone he goes." Robinson places his Man on a hill against the red glare of the sunset and then speculates on the forces that brought him there and the fate that lies ahead of him.

Whatever dark road he may have taken,
This man who stood on high
And faced alone the sky,
Whatever drove or lured or guided him—
A vision answering a faith unshaken,
An easy trust assumed of easy trials,
A sick negation born of weak denials,
A crazed abhorrence of an old condition,
A blind attendance on a brief ambition—
Whatever stayed him or derided him,
His way was even as ours,

And we, with all our wounds and all our powers,
 Must each await alone at his own height
 Another darkness or another light

Aside from its philosophical import, this poem also illustrates well the style that is so definitely Robinson's without strain. In combining a colloquial rhythm that is smooth and offhand with a scholarly choice of words that does not fear the polysyllable. In "The Man Against the Sky" such words as "atrabilious" and "hierophants" are slipped in as if they were inevitable.

The Man Against the Sky is not a perfect volume by any means. There are flat poems (after all, the level of "Eros Turannos" and "Bewick Finzer" is a difficult one to sustain) and even in some of the best ones there are lines that string together a series of what might be called "bland" words, the kind that get a poem started or keep it moving but contribute almost nothing of connotative value. Robinson's diction is usually so effective that these lapses seem especially egregious. Sometimes, too, Robinson sacrifices the exact word in order to make a rhyme. For example, in the third stanza of "Old King Cole" the poet has chosen "affair" to rhyme with "pair", the choice tends to blur the meaning. These objections are minor ones, however, when set against the overall effectiveness of the volume. It seems certain that Robinson, aided by a universality that lifts him above any school, movement, period, or region (the New England flavor blends in like a tart but unobtrusive spice) will survive his current critical neglect and emerge as one of the finest of American poets.

MAN AND SUPERMAN

Type of work Drama

Author Bernard Shaw (1856-1950)

Time c. 1900

Locale England and Spain

First presented 1905

Principal characters

JACK TANNER, an eloquent anarchist and social philosopher

ANN WHITEFIELD, his ward and pursuer

ROEBUCK RAMSDEN, her co-guardian

OCTAVIUS ROBINSON, her suitor

VIOLET ROBINSON, Octavius' sister

HECTOR MALONE, her husband

HENRY STRAKER, Jack's chauffeur

MENDOZA, a bandit

DON JUAN

DOÑA ANA DE ULLOA, a Spanish noblewoman

DON GONZALO, her father

THE DEVIL

Frequently the subtitles of Shaw's plays are just as informative as the prefaces. They are often just as clever; they are always more to the point. Such is the case with Heartbreak House, which is subtitled A Fantasia in the Russian Manner on English Themes, Fanny's First Play, An Easy Play for a Little Theatre, and "In Good King Charles's Golden Days," A True History that Never Happened.

So, too, with Man and Superman, which is subtitled simply but significantly A Comedy and a Philosophy For Man and Superman, though it was written early in Shaw's career, represents the culmination of Shaw's theory that the drama is but a device—a trick, if you like—for getting the public to listen to one's philosophy: social philosophy, political philosophy, economic philosophy—Shavian philosophy With the possible exception of Back to Methuselah, Man and Superman is Shaw's most philosophical play

In its simplest terms, the philosophical meaning of the play is that in the war between the sexes, woman always emerges conqueror, even if man, her antagonist, be a superman, that in a battle between instinct and intelligence, instinct always wins To develop this theme, Shaw claimed to have written a modern, philosophical interpretation of the Don Juan story, which means that Don Juan is re-incarnated as a Shavian hero in England at the turn of the century The closest resemblance between Shaw's hero and the libertine celebrated in music and literature lies in their names John Tanner, Don Juan Tenorio Any other similarity is purely coincidental, for Shaw transformed literature's most notorious libertine into a man of moral passion, a Nietzschean superman who lives a life of pure reason in defiance of the traditions of organized society As a Shavian hero, Tanner is, of course, impeccably moral, even chaste The philosophical meaning of the play arises from the fact that Tanner, representing the good man, is unsuccessful in defending his chastity Pitted against a scheming female who embodies the sexual, maternal drive, Tanner is forced to surrender his control of sexual instinct He capitulates and marries In effect, he commits moral suicide by succumbing to conventionality

On one level, this theme is worked out in a contrived, almost trivial, but nevertheless hilarious plot In his will, Ann Whitefield's father appointed Jack Tanner and Roebuck Ramsden joint guardians of his daughter Ramsden objects to sharing the guardianship on the grounds that Tanner, as the author of "The Revolutionist's Handbook and Pocket Companion," is an anarchist and profligate, Tanner objects on the grounds that Ramsden is a prig and a hypocrite Both, however, accede to the wishes of the deceased, little realizing that Ann had dictated the terms of the will in an elaborate scheme to make Tanner her husband Upon realizing that Ann has designs on him, Tanner flees to the Continent, is detained by bandits, is ultimately caught by the pursuing Ann They agree to marry

On another, more esoteric level, the philosophical implications of the theme are developed at length Tanner has a dream—a play within the play—which turns out to be no less than a Platonic dialogue "Don Juan in Hell" In this scene, four of the principals are re-embodied as historical or mythical personages and are universalized as moral forces Tanner appears as Don Juan, the man of moral passion, Ann, as Doña Ana de Ulloa, the eternal maternal female Ramsden, as Don Gonzalo, the man of pleasure, and Mendoza (leader of the bandits), as the Devil These four engage in a debate which Don Juan, speaking for Shaw, monopolizes with a series of lengthy monologues Herein the theme of the play is recapitulated in abstract but certain terms The subject is Man The end of man, Don Juan argues, is the cultivation of intellect, for only by exercising it dispassionately can man discover his purpose, and discovering it, fulfill it Therefore, the good man, the man of moral passion, will eschew anything that subverts the life of reason Woman, however, will not be eschewed, and it is woman, with her relentless desire to propagate, and marriage, the instrument by which she domesticates, that undermine man If man surrenders to woman, he is doomed

The conclusion of the play is, then, a gloomy one for Shaw By marrying Ann, Tanner admits that woman, bolstered by the "Life Force," is bound to triumph that man, even the superman, is bound to abandon the pursuit of his own goal to serve woman in her goal of perpetuating the race

Although the ending is gloomy and the dream play verbose, the prevailing tone of the play is comic and light In spite of its philosophy, the drama is playable—including the dream play—princi pally because Shaw succeeded in making his characters gloriously human and therefore funny. Tanner, for instance, is moral, intensely moral, but he is fallible, even a bit ridiculous, as Ann delights in proving when she punctures his eloquent utterances with the charge of political aspiration. Ann herself is as engaging a heroine as any in Shaw's plays. An incorrigible liar, an inveterate hypocrite, she is charming because she is thoroughly female.

The minor characters were just as obviously invented to fit into the thematic framework of the drama, but they too contribute to the fun. Both Ramsden and Mrs. Whitefield represent the authority of the old order which Tanner is trying to overthrow, both, however, have distinctly comic personalities. Believing that a man's duty lies in protecting the weaker sex, Octavius serves primarily as a foil to Tanner but provides many laughs as a lovesick youth. Mendoza, the bandit, Straker, the impudent chauffeur, and Malone, the senile American millionaire—all figure in Shaw's design. All, more over, as humorous persons, relieve the tedium of that design.

Considered as a whole, with the "Epistle Dedicatory," which serves as a preface, and "The Revolutionary's Handbook," which is an appendix of sorts, Man and Superman is one of Shaw's most important plays. It is not Shaw's masterpiece, nor is it his best play. It is too obviously a piece of propaganda for such accolades. It is, however, central to Shaw's philosophy, and philosophy is always central to Shaw's plays.

MAN WITH A BULL-TONGUE PLOW

Type of work Poetry

Author Jesse Stuart (1907)

First published 1934

Jesse Stuart's Man with a Bull Tongue Plow is a book of regional and personal poetry come freely from the heart of its author, a book by a man informed with great natural wisdom and one on intimate terms with life close to the land.

I am a farmer singing at the plow
And as I take my time to plow along
A steep Kentucky hill I sing my song—
A one horse farmer singing at the plow

Thus he describes himself, introduces himself to the reader in the opening lines of this book of 703 sonnets which, taken together, tell not only Stuart's own story, but the story of the hill country of eastern Kentucky, past and present, people among whom Stuart grew up and still lives.

These are poems written without artifice, and Jesse Stuart speaks the literal truth when he writes lines like these

I do not sing the songs you love to hear
My basket songs are woven from the words
Of corn and crickets, trees and men and birds
I sing the strains I know and love to sing
And I can sing my lays like singing
corn,
And flute them like a fluting gray corn
bird
And I can pipe them like a hunter's horn—
All of my life these are the songs I've heard

Here in these simple, unpretentious, yet profoundly moving sonnets, Stuart has caught the land we love, the people we know, the moments of beauty which are man's lot in his journey through life. Here are the warmth of the sun and the wind's voice in the leaves, the cloying musk of the grainfields, the honest sweat

MAN WITH A BULL-TONGUE PLOW by Jesse Stuart. Excerpts reprinted by permission of the author. Published by E. P. Dutton & Co. Inc. Copyright 1934 by E. P. Dutton & Co. Inc. Revised Edition published by E. P. Dutton & Co. Inc. Copyright 1959 by Jesse Stuart.

of the plowman, the vespers of the birds,
the talking of mountain brooks

He writes here with great sincerity in a book of such remarkable achievement for a first work, that critical comparison of Stuart with Burns is perfectly apropos. Yet Stuart speaks in his own tongue, he is that rarity among American writers—an original, in the pages of whose book beats the pulse of the soil under the creative passion of a poet who knows that, of all the possessions of man, his land is the last to pass away. This book celebrates the poet's deep and abiding love of his native earth. It is one rich in bucolic scenes, filled with the beauty of Jesse Stuart's land, and replete with portraits of men and women who have lived and died in that part of America. It is a book about all mankind, wherever men have tilled the soil, and these sonnets are distinguished for that universality which is the province of all great art.

Man with a Bull Tongue Plow is a book of unabashed emotion. The pure music, the great gusto and joy of living which are so evident here are designed for every reader—not alone the one who is devoted to poetry. Open the book anywhere, the lines draw and hold you with their clarity, their simplicity, their instant application to life as you yourself know it, their humility and beauty. Listen to Jesse Stuart sing his love of life.

Ah, we get out to work in early April
We brave our bodies to the wind and sun
We swing the plow around the rugged hill
From break of day until the setting sun
We break the earth to plant in corn and cane
We canvas burley beds upon the hill

Season follows season in these poems. In August 'the whispering of the corn/Is fine to hear on any summer morn,' and sunset brings "red evening clouds." "Riding at ease above the corn and timber" Here is a picture of autumn.

When golden leaves begin to shiver down
Among the barren brush beneath the trees
And scarlet leaves and yellow and light brown
Begin to play in wind and pepper down
To earth—these clean and frosted leaves drip down
Then it is time the corn is in the stack
Potatoes in the hold—hay in the mows
This is the time rust has grown on the plows
The time to haul the pumpkins to the shed
Since frosts have come and pumpkin vines are dead

Winter is the season when "We saw the crows go flying cross the land,/Up in the icy heavens with the leaves,/We saw the crows fly over gray starved land/When winter winds sighed in the last year leaves." In Jesse Stuart's world the lives of men are joined to the great cycle of nature.

Fields will be furrowed time and time again
They will be furrowed by tall men unborn
As they were furrowed by men now forlorn
In dust— And fences will be built again
By men like me and fields be cleaned of brush
By men like me only to grow again

There is a natural roughness in these poems, from a technical perspective but it is this very quality of the primitive which gives them their greatest strength. In the spontaneity, the wonder, the resignation to sadness, the joy in earth's beauty so patent in these poems lies their essential effectiveness. They see life whole. They span man's time, from birth to death. There is no mawkishness, no sentimentality here. They are faithful to a world where happiness and grief are alike the welcome experience of every man who is whole in his mortality, who understands that life is the greatest privilege he may know, and who knows by this understanding that he ought to spend life as profitably as he can 'This is the theme of "Marcus Phelps"

I hate to leave the world for I have found
Such joy in life—So many things to love
The sky, the wind and dead leaves on the ground
And wild geese flying through the clouds above
I've loved the color of the autumn leaves
And color of the frozen corn field stones
And I have loved a winter wind that grieves
And dwindling autumn waters monotone
Earth is too great to lose—earth is too vast!
Life is too great to lose—life is too vast!
I hate to part with life and things I love
I hate to leave the earth and skies above
And life must pass but surely Earth will last
All life must end—the ending must be vast

Whether he writes of nature or of man—and they are not distinguished in Man with a Bull Tongue Plow by any sharp demarcation—Stuart celebrates simple existence, praising all of life and all of death. His book is not only filled with songs about the deeply satisfying beauty of the land, but also with epitaphs setting forth in terse lines the lives of the men and women of the hill country, be they successful lives, or failures, happy lives, or sad—lines like these

I always loved Kentucky's lonesome water,
And when I went away I wanted to return
Just something to Kentucky's lonesome water
Makes me remember and my burnt heart burn—

Though Man with a Bull Tongue Plow is a regional book, it is limitless in its application. It should take ultimate rank as one of the finest, most spontaneous of books about man and his earth. This rugged, painfully honest collection of sonnets, with its clean, powerful lines, with its roughness and its gentleness, with its sincere, wholly natural verse has an everlasting freshness. It is a book through the pages of which ring the song of the high hills and the rune of mountain water, through which the heartbeats of men and women mingle with the pulse of earth. These are poems of life and love and death, by a poet in love with life, a poet filled with the humbling wonder and beauty of earth and sky, and a man filled with respect for his fellow men and understanding of their lives.

Open Man with a Bull Tongue Plow at any page and read poems of singular simplicity and great power—and hear the turning of the soil beneath the blade, hear the wind in the treetops, and keep pace unforgettably with man eternally making his mortal mark upon his little plot of earth.

MANETTE SALOMON

Type of work Novel

Authors Edmond (1822 1896) and Jules (1830 1870) de Goncourt

Type of plot Naturalism

Time of plot Nineteenth century

Locale Paris

First published 1867

Principal characters

NAZ DE CORIOLIS, a young painter

ANATOLE BAZOCHE, his close friend, another painter

MANETTE SALOMON, a model, Coriolis' mistress

Critique

This novel is representative of the mature fiction of the Goncourts, pioneers of the naturalistic movement in France. Here they treat with characteristically minute detail the Parisian artists' world, personifying its many facets by following the careers of several young painters. As in the earlier Charles Demilly, the major theme concerns the effect of love on the creative powers of an artist, in this case the painter Coriolis. But here the writers have disciplined their talents to convey more successfully the sense of actual life: they set one detail beside another with deliberate lack of emphasis and kaleidoscopic swiftness, they expunge all trace of the melodramatic or unrealistic from events. Interest focuses on the psychological delineation of the artistic temperament and on aesthetic theory itself. The vividly pictorial style is admirably suited to the milieu of the plot, for it constantly transmutes into language the painter's vision of the world.

The Story

From the Paris zoo one had a magnificent view of the city. Visitors to the zoo were startled one day by a young man, who seemed to be a guide, pointing out landmarks below in terms which might have been used to describe the zoo itself. The young man, Anatole Bazoche, delighted in such pranks. He was studying art at Langibout's studio and kept everyone in constant uproar. The son of a stolid bourgeoisie widow, he had become an artist over her protests, although he had talent, he was content to dissipate it in bright, superficial paintings. His gift for farce symbolized the age, which, disillusioned and effete, laughed at everything. Art had become restless eclecticism, turning increasingly to a romanticism that was essentially literary.

In the same studio were Chassagnol, a compulsive talker who hoped for a new vision. Garnotelle, a quiet little peasant who tried earnestly to follow rules for good painting, and Naz de Coriolis. Of Italian and Creole descent, Coriolis was feared for his temper and pride, and envied for his money. Caring for nothing but his painting, he remained aloof from all but Anatole.

Coriolis, becoming dissatisfied with this Bohemian world, filled with talk and pranks, decided to travel in the Near East for a time. As he and Anatole sat talking before his departure, a woman brought her child to his door and asked if he needed a model. Taken by the child's extraordinary beauty, he caught her up in his arms. As he swung her down again, she pulled his gold watch and chain to the floor. Laughing, he let her keep it.

Garnotelle, who had left the studio won the Prix de Rome for his careful (if mediocre) academic art. Cut off from his funds by his mother, Anatole, experiencing a series of ups and downs, took on any hack jobs that came his way until his uncle invited him to go to Marseilles and from there to Constantinople. Unfortunately, the uncle became jealous of Anatole's charm and left him in Marseilles. He joined a circus after helping in a cholera epidemic. Then he met Coriolis, now on his way back to Paris. Coriolis, who had inherited great wealth, generously invited Anatole to share a studio with him. There the two began painting. Coriolis had vowed never to marry, he felt that marriage and fatherhood destroy the artist because they attach creativity to a lower order of things. He knew, too, that his lazy, Creole temperament needed even more discipline than most.

Coriolis' first paintings, fruits of his travels, were not favorably received. Volatile, filled with light, they did not conform to the fashionable critical notions of Near Eastern landscapes Naively as tonished, Coriolis discovered that critics and public preferred Garnotelle's sterile work Determined to prove his own worth as more than an exotic colorist, he set himself to painting nudes

During his search for a model he saw a young Jewish girl, Manette Salomon, and through Anatole he obtained her services Manette was absolute perfection, her body had a pliant beauty that seemed the quintessence of the female Coriolis, obsessed by her beauty, wanted to keep her all to himself, but she, a true Parisian Bohemian, wanted only to be free Her frank, ignorant nature delighted him, her serenity gave him peace Jealous, he once followed her, but she went only to the synagogue This experience made him suddenly aware of her Jewishness, a strange, foreign element akin to something he had found in his travels One day, however, he saw a watch chain she had and realized that she had been the child he had admired so long ago Remembering her benefactor, she tenderly vowed never to leave him

Coriolis' painting of Manette, in which he captured her glorious flesh tones, was a huge success, and its purchase by a museum restored his faith in himself Feeling herself famous, Manette began to change the praise of the picture Coriolis had painted of her raised a feeling of pride in her that was almost love Like most artists, Coriolis thought of his mistress as a charming, necessary little animal

Soon afterward he fell ill and Manette nursed him back to strength, never leaving his side To speed his convalescence, Coriolis went with Manette and Anatole to the country near Fontainebleau Manette, completely city bred, was delighted by her strange new world and plunged into it eagerly Coriolis found nature soothing and inspiring, yet he grew bored and missed the comforts of his studio Anatole luxuriated in the freshness of the countryside, falling under its spell, but

livened his stay by tricking, mocking, and entertaining the other guests at the little inn

Manette, accepted by this bourgeois group as Coriolis' wife, found her new status attractive and ignorantly believed this bourgeois world worthy of entering Then a new arrival, sensing her true relationship to Coriolis, snubbed her Hurt and resentful, Manette wanted to leave The three moved to a small house near the landscapist Crescent and his wife, an ample, friendly woman who took Manette to her heart The two young artists learned from the old peasant Crescent But Mme Crescent, learning that Manette was Jewish, cooled toward her, sensing (partly through peasant superstition, partly through a kind of animal instinct) something hidden, profound, and destructive in the girl's nature Shortly thereafter, Coriolis, who could not agree with the moralistic basis of Crescent's art, decided to return to Paris

After their return to Paris, Manette became pregnant and her body took on new languor When Coriolis' son was born, Manette acquired a new outlook on life The carefree Bohemian had become the mother her stubborn pride and greed for success came to the fore

Coriolis had begun to work again, this time on a new kind of painting—an attempt to create art through the truth of life He did not mean to imitate photography but to make of the harmonies available in painting a recreation unfolding the inner realities of contemporary life His two paintings, particularly one of a wedding, were scoffed at Manette, seeing his failure, cooled toward him

Coriolis, doting on his son, watched him play and sketched him As time passed, however, he was unable to work and sank into inactivity and despair He could not understand a world which rewarded Garnotelle, now supremely fashionable with his superficial, heartless paintings

Manette decided that for the sake of their child and her own growing desire for respectability, Coriolis should rid him self of such Bohemian friends as Anatole and Chassagnol, and of the failures which they encouraged, and model himself on Garnotelle. She set about arousing Coriolis' suspicions concerning Anatole and herself. She then persuaded Coriolis to go to the country for his lingering cough, taking the child and some new servants, her relatives. There was no room for Anatole. Coriolis, meanwhile, had grown more and more dependent on Manette counting on her to run his home, tend his wants, and make his decisions. He was too weak to struggle against her.

Left alone, Anatole became a true Bohemian, living from day to day on hand outs and forgetting his art entirely.

On Coriolis' return, Manette set about alienating his friends in earnest. They ceased to visit him, cutting him off from valid artistic communication. Though Manette understood the artist's life and was able to adapt herself to it, she was fundamentally ignorant. Her ambitions were for money and success. To her, art was a business, to Coriolis, a religion. Yet he did not oppose her. Her mother came to live with them and feminine domination began to affect his health, but as his psychosomatic illness increased, so did his dependence on Manette. He painted as she wanted him to and became filled with self loathing. Always eager for more money, she persuaded him to sell some of his "failures." Surprisingly, a connoisseur recognized their true artistic merit and purchased them at a fantastically high price. Again Coriolis was famous.

In despair, he turned on Manette, accused her of destroying a number of his canvases, and ordered her out of the house. She calmly went on as though she had never heard him—she had beaten him. A broken man, he was still strong enough in his belief to refuse a medal he had won for a wedding picture because he felt he was unworthy of the award. Manette scornfully removed herself still further from him. But he could not leave her.

Sometime later, Anatole heard that Garnotelle had married a princess, with Coriolis as the best man. He saw Coriolis from afar, with Manette and several dreadful bourgeois types following him. Though love had long been over between Manette and Coriolis, they were married and her ambitions fulfilled. Coriolis painted almost nothing and became increasingly ill.

Anatole, visiting the zoo again, watched the lions in their cages. He lazed on the grass, feeling himself a part of all nature and completely free.

MARIANNE

Type of work Novel

Author Pierre Carlet de Chamblain de Marivaux (1688-1763)

Type of plot Novel of manners

Time of plot Late seventeenth century

Locale France

First published 1731-1741

Principal characters

MARIANNE, COUNTESS OF ———, a virtuous orphan

M. DE CLIMAL, Marianne's benefactor and Mme. de Valville's brother

M. DE VALVILLE, affianced to Marianne

MME. DE VALVILLE, his mother

MILLE VARTHEON, loved by Valville

MILLE DE TERVIRE, now a nun

Critique

In his own day, the author of Marianne or, The Life of Countess ——— was considerably more famous as a playwright than novelist. During his busy career he wrote some thirty to forty very popular and successful plays and his three best known dramas, Le Jeu de l'amour et du hasard (1730), Les Legs (1736), and Les Fausses confidences (1737) are still kept in the repertoires of French dramatic companies. Many critics have asserted that Marivaux was the founder of modern "drawing room" comedy, and others maintain that he was among the first to introduce recognizable features of the modern psychological novel to French prose. His two most significant novels are Marianne and Le Paysan parvenu (1735), both left incomplete. Both were written in the first person, and each concerned the fortunes of the major character. Like Le Sage, his contemporary, Marivaux created episodic plots and was fully as much interested in moral tales, philosophizing, and analysis as he was in the story itself. In Marianne, centered about everyday situations and ordinary people, Marivaux pictured life in France with careful detail. Moreover, the style that he used is still remarkable for its subtleties, its precise but unusual and mannered diction, and its refinement of phrase, in this respect he ranks high among eighteenth century writers of prose. These qualities make Marianne a leisurely paced but interesting story of an extraordinary woman, enlivened by amiable irony and modest gaiety and charm.

The Story

The writer, shortly after he rented a country house near Rennes, came upon a manuscript in several notebooks containing the story of a lady, presented in her own handwriting. At the request of his friends the author agreed to edit and publish her account.

Marianne, for this was the name the lady in the autobiography gave herself, was a countess, about fifty years of age at the time she was writing. She explained that she was describing her past because her dear friend had entreated her to tell the full story of her life.

While still an infant, Marianne had been orphaned in an attack by brigands on the coach in which she and her parents were traveling. Since she was the only survivor of this brutal encounter on the highroad, her identity was unknown. Passersby rescued the child and put her in the care of the sister of the local priest. Marianne remained the ward of that kind person until she was fifteen years old. At that time she accompanied her foster mother on a visit to Paris.

Misfortune came to her almost immediately. An epidemic broke out, and all those intimately concerned with Marianne's welfare were fatally stricken. Soon another benefactor appeared, M. de Climal, who offered to aid her out of charitable piety. Marianne was by this time a beautiful young woman, and Climal showed his fondness by buying her expensive clothing and arranging for her lodging with a widowed shopkeeper, Mme. Dutour. Marianne objected strongly to the bourgeois atmosphere of her new home, but her circumstances gave her no other choice. For a religious holiday, she dressed in her finery and strolled about the city after church. The young blades ogled her; one, in particular, was especially attracted to her, and she to him, although no words passed between them. Bemused by the encounter, Marianne stepped into the path of a moving carriage and was knocked down.

Her unknown admirer, who was M. de Valville, came immediately to her assistance. At the time neither learned the other's identity, for M. de Climal arrived and jealously insisted on taking his charge home. Beside himself, Climal declared his undying love and offered to set Marianne up in an apartment. Proudly refusing this hypocritical proposal and also his protection, she went to a nearby convent to live. Meanwhile, Valville set about to learn her name and whereabouts. Successful in his search, he arrived at the convent soon after Marianne had acquired a loving benefactress who turned out to be the mother of Valville.

Upon the disclosure of their mutual attraction, Mme de Valville agreed that her son and Marianne could well be in love, but she counseled delay in the affair. In the meantime Climal had succumbed to a fatal illness, as an act of repentance, he bequeathed one third of his estate to Marianne. The remainder was to go to his nephew, Valville.

As soon as Valville's noble and influential relatives found out about Marianne's dubious parentage and her brief stay with a shopkeeper, they took steps to stop the marriage. In an elaborate abduction scheme, they succeeded in luring Marianne away from the convent. Then she was told that she had two choices: to become a nun or marry a young man they had provided. In the hope of gaining time, she agreed to talk with the prospective bridegroom. Her decision was, however, that she would wed no one but Valville and she so informed her captors. At that moment, Mme de Valville and her son caught up with the plot and arrived to defend Marianne. At last the relatives, convinced of Marianne's strength of character, nobility, and worthiness, withdrew their objections to the marriage of Valville and Marianne.

Accordingly, plans for the wedding were made and within a few weeks Marianne was to leave the convent and become a bride. Then a chance call upon friends brought a Mlle Varthon to the attention of Valville. During a brief illness when Marianne was confined, Valville became infatuated with Mlle Varthon, who promptly told Marianne of her love for the young man. Deeply grieved by her son's infidelity, Mme de Valville assured Marianne of her own love and affection, which she continued to shower upon the unfortunate girl until death ended her acts of kindness a short time later. Once more Marianne was alone in the world.

To take Marianne's mind off her misfortunes and to give her a perspective on the curious happenings that befall human beings, a nun who had become very friendly with her suggested that she tell Marianne the story of her own life. Depressed and lonely, Marianne agreed to listen to her account.

The nun, the daughter of M de Tervire and Mlle de Tresle, had learned early in life that her father was dead. Sometime later her mother married a grand seigneur of the court, and the young girl was left to the care of a farmer. Although her mother sent money for her support and promised again and again to bring her daughter to live with her in Paris, the invitation was constantly delayed. When she was seventeen years of age, Mlle de Tervire was sought in marriage by Baron de Sercour. An unscrupulous trick by the baron's heir disgraced the bride to be, however, and the marriage never took place. Mme de Dursan then became the young girl's foster mother. She willed her estate to Mlle de Tervire, but an estranged son turned up as Mme de Dursan was dying and the will was changed. When relatives of Mme de Dursan refused to give the girl her one third of the property, as had been promised, she decided to go to Paris.

On the stagecoach, she met a Mme Darcire. Ultimately Mlle de Tervire discovered that Mme Darcire knew her mother well. From a lawyer, they learned that Mme la Marquise, the girl's mother, had been persuaded to turn her estates over to her son. He in turn took all the property and abandoned his mother to poverty. Furious at this turn of events, for the marquise was very ill, Mlle de Tervire went to her sister in law and demanded that her half brother take proper care of their parent.

(Here the story of Marianne breaks off, for Marivaux never completed his novel. He left Marianne alone and jilted, and the nun still had not ended her life story. In a concluding section, added in 1766 by Marie Jeanne Riccoboni, Marianne finally married Valville after years of tribulation and learned also that she was of noble birth The nun's story was terminated with the recounting of a disas trous love affair and her ultimate decision to take the veil)

MARRIAGE À LA MODE

Type of work Drama

Author John Dryden (1631 1700)

Type of plot Comedy of manners

Time of plot Seventeenth century

Locale Sicily

First presented 1673

Principal characters

RHODOPHIL, captain of the king's guards

DORALICE, his wife

PALAMEDE, a courtier

MELANTHA, his betrothed

POLYDAMAS, King of Sicily

PALMYRA, his daughter

LEONIDAS, the true prince

Critique

Marriage a la Mode is a curious mixture of heroic tragedy and comedy of manners One plot concerns the seventeenth century playful attitude toward married love, another, court intrigue and romance Since the two plots are only superficially connected, one cannot escape the impression that Dryden was more interested in the popular success of the play than in its artistic unity Skillful characterization, especially in the comic plot, has saved the play from oblivion

The Story

Palamede, a courtier who had just returned to Sicily after an absence of five years, overheard Doralice singing a song which justified inconstancy in marriage Smitten by her great beauty, Palamede promptly declared his love Doralice's announcement that she was married did not abate Palamede's ardor, instead, the news prompted him to confess that he himself was to be married in three days The two resolved to meet again Having been informed that Rhodophil, her husband, was approaching, Doralice abruptly departed

Rhodophil welcomed Palamede back to court and sympathized with him over the approaching marriage He complained that he himself had found no joy in marriage after the first six months Palamede advised him to take a mistress, a remedy which Rhodophil said he was already trying to effect He had found a woman whom he desired, but her obsession with court society had prevented her from keeping her assignations The conversation ended with the approach of Argaleon, the king's favorite, who brought a message summoning Rhodophil to the king

Amalthea, sister to Argaleon, discussed with a court lady the reason for the king's visit to so remote a section of Sicily King Polydamas was searching for his son Many years before, when Polydamas usurped the throne, the former king's wife had fled with an infant son To Polydamas' amazement his pregnant wife, Eudoxia, fled with the queen No news had been heard of them until recently, when Polydamas was led to believe that his wife had died but that their child still lived

Polydamas ordered brought before him a fisherman in company with a youth and a maid whom the fisherman claimed were his children but who looked too noble to be a peasant's offspring The fisherman turned out to be Hermogenes, who had fled with Eudoxia and the queen Under threat of torture, Hermogenes asserted that the queen, her son, and Eudoxia had died, but that Polydamas' son still lived and was, in fact Leonidas, the youth who accompanied him Hermogenes insisted, however, that the girl Palmyra was his own daughter The king accepted Leonidas as his son and decreed that Palmyra should live at court so as not to be separated from her foster brother

Later, Palamede presented himself to Melantha, the woman his father had ordered him to marry Much to his regret, he found Melantha to be just such an affected lady as Rhodophil had described as his mistress Indeed, Palamede soon learned that Melantha was Rhodophil's mistress—at least in name—and that Doralice was Rhodophil's wife The confusion was compounded when Rhodophil learned that his mistress was to be Palamede's wife

Meanwhile royal affairs were also entangled Polydamas ordered Leonidas to marry Amalthea When Leonidas refused, Polydamas threatened banishment but was temporarily dissuaded by Amalthea from carrying out his intentions In private, Leonidas swore to Palmyra that he would wed none but her When spies informed the king that Leonidas loved a commoner Polydamas ordered Palmyra to be set adrift in a boat Hermogenes saved her from this fate by producing evidence that she, not Leonidas, was the king's child Although Polydamas offered to confer nobility on Leonidas, the youth chose to live in poverty with Hermogenes

In the meantime Palamede had arranged an assignation with Doralice, and Rhodophil with Melantha, both at the same time, in the same place At the tryst, when each couple discovered the other, all four parties fabricated excuses which each pretended to believe, so that Palamede left with his intended, and Rhodophil with his wife

Amalthea informed Leonidas that her brother, Argaleon, had arranged to marry

Palmyra and to have Leonidas banished Although Amalthea loved Leonidas, she agreed to help him see Palmyra by taking him to the masquerade that evening There Leonidas arranged an assignation with Palmyra at Hermogenes' house, not, however, without being recognized by Argaleon

Both Doralice and Melantha planned to attend a masquerade dressed as boys, but they got only as far as an eating house where they exchanged insults, much to the delight of their lovers, who hugged and kissed them at each unflattering remark The game was ended by a message summoning Rhodophil to the king The two "boys" were left to fend for themselves

At Hermogenes' house Eubulus, a former governor who had helped Eudoxia in her escape, informed Palmyra that Leonidas was in reality Theagenes, the son of the late king Leonidas told Palmyra of a plan to unseat the king her father, and made her a prisoner when she opposed the plan But before the conspiracy could be carried out, Polydamas arrived with his guards and seized the rebels

Palamede received news that his father expected him to marry Melantha at once, therefore he solicited the advice of Philotis, her maid, concerning the best means to woo the lady Philotis supplied him with a list of French words, of which the lady was inordinately fond Won by these words, Melantha accepted Palamede as her suitor and they agreed to marry Following this development Palamede and Rhodophil pledged to respect each other's wife, and Rhodophil and Doralice were reconciled

Affairs in the royal household ended just as happily for most of those concerned Suspecting that Leonidas was the true heir to the throne, Argaleon advised the young man's immediate execution, advice which Polydamas decided to follow in spite of Palmyra's pleas for mercy The sentence would have been carried out had not Amalthea revealed Leonidas' true identity, whereupon Rhodophil and

Palamede fought successfully to free the prince. The new king forgave Polydamas and asked for Palmyra's hand in marriage, a request gratefully granted. Having rejected Leonidas' offer of clemency, Argaleon was sentenced to life imprisonment. Amalthea, still in love with Leonidas, declared her intention to spend her life in prayer and mourning.

MASTRO-DON GESUALDO

Type of work Novel

Author Giovanni Verga (1840-1922)

Type of plot Social chronicle

Time of plot First half of the nineteenth century

Locale San Giovanni, Sicily

First published 1889

Principal characters

GESUALDO MOTTA, an ambitious peasant

DONNA BIANCA TRAO, one of the poor gentry

DON DIEGO TRAO, and

DON FERDINANDO TRAO, her brothers

NUNZIO MOTTA, Gesualdo's father

SANTO MOTTA, Gesualdo's brother

SPERANZA MOTTA, Gesualdo's sister

FORTUNATO BURGIO, her husband

BARONESS RUBIERA

BARON NINI RUBIERA, her son, Bianca Trao's cousin

BARON ZACCO, one of the Trao relatives

DONNA SARINA (or CIRMENA), a poor aunt of the Trao family

DONNA MARIANNA SGANCI, a rich aunt

DIODATA, Gesualdo's servant girl

NANI L'ORBO, a peasant, Gesualdo's servant

CANON PRIEST LUPI

CORRADO LA GURNA, Donna Cirmena's nephew

Critique

Giovanni Verga, author of the short story, "Cavalleria Rusticana," which was used as the libretto for Mascagni's opera, is generally regarded as the finest Italian novelist since Manzoni. Mastro don Gesualdo is the second in an unfinished trilogy, the first being I Malavoglia (1881), translated as The House by the Medlar Tree. The series, titled I Vinti (The Defeated), was to have included a third novel, about the Sicilian aristocracy, titled La Duchessa di Leyra. Mastro don Gesualdo is a naturalistic study of the rise and fall of an ambitious Sicilian peasant. His efforts to elevate himself place Mastro don (workman gentleman) Gesualdo between two worlds—the peasantry and the gentry—and his marriage to one of the Trao family, who are of the gentry, only widens the gap between him and the others on either side.

The Story

Shortly after sunrise the bells of San Giovanni began ringing. There was a fire in the Trao house, and the village awakened to answer the summons. Through the smoke the villagers saw the frantic faces of Don Ferdinando and Don Diego, and a voice called out that there were thieves in the house as well. At the same time Don Diego called for his sister, Bianca, who was somewhere in the MASTRO DON GESUALDO by Giovanni Verga. Translated by D. H. Lawrence. By permission of the publishers. The Viking Press, Inc. Copyright 1923 by Thomas Seltzer. Copyright 1951 by Frieda Lawrence.

burning building Mastro-don Gesualdo appeared, showing great concern about his own house nearby and other Mottas, including Gesualdo's brother Santo and his sister Speranza came running both to witness the spectacle and to protect their own property

Don Diego discovered, to his dismay, that the stranger in the house was not a thief but his sister's lover, the young Baron Nini Rubiera. After the fire had been extinguished, Don Diego went to the baron's mother, the Baroness Rubiera, one of the Trao relatives, and meekly requested that Nini marry Bianca. The baroness refused. Any girl who married her son, she declared, must come prepared with a large dowry. Since Bianca's brothers were poor, though proud of their family heritage, there was no hope of convincing the baroness to change her mind. Consequently, after great persuasion, they agreed to allow Bianca to marry Gesualdo Motta, a peasant who by his cleverness in business and industry had managed to make himself a rich landowner. Gesualdo had for some time been happy with Diodata, a servant girl, as his mistress, but now he hoped to elevate himself socially by marrying one of the gentry.

The gentry were aroused to anger by the news that Gesualdo intended to bid for the communal lands at the auction for the taxes on land which had been in the hands of Baron Zacco, another of the Trao relatives. They commented that wealth, not family, was what counted in Sicily. When Mastro don Gesualdo hesitantly attended a gathering at the Sganci house he was welcomed into the house but put off to one side, even though it was known he was to marry Bianca. Bianca, heartbroken, talked to the young Baron Nini about his mother's plan to marry him to Fifi Margarone, one of the daughters of Don Filippo Margarone, the political leader in the village. Knowing that his mother's mind was made up, the young man finally managed to escape from Bianca.

Mastro don Gesualdo continued to work with his laborers, fulfilling contracts to build walls, roads, and bridges. As he sweated with the men and supervised their work, he thought of his father's complaints about losing his position as the head of the family. The elder Motta, Nunzio, had even taken on contracts, using his son's money, in order to reestablish himself as master of his house, but his ventures had been unsuccessful. Nevertheless, Nunzio continued to criticize his son's enterprises and to make things difficult for him.

Gesualdo, returning home from work, always found faithful Diodata, who greeted him humbly and made him comfortable. When he told her of his plan to marry Bianca Trao, she replied that he was the master; it was apparent how ever, that she would never be happy without him. When she was finally married off to another servant, Nani l'Orbo, the children she bore him had been fathered by Gesualdo. Nani took advantage of his position to force Gesualdo to support him with money and property.

A major blow to Gesualdo's fortunes came when a bridge he was building under contract to the town collapsed. His father complained that the failure was Gesualdo's fault, and the villagers who were jealous of Gesualdo's wealth exulted over his misfortune. Only Diodata, who had not yet married Nani l'Orbo, was sympathetic.

Despite the objections of her brothers, Don Diego and Don Ferdinando, Bianca persisted in going ahead with the plan to marry Gesualdo. The brothers finally agreed, only because it was hopeless to forbid her. Bianca knew that she would never marry Baron Nini Rubiera, and she hoped that by marrying a rich man she could ease the burden on her brothers.

When the wedding was held in the old house of the La Gurna family, which Gesualdo had leased, only Donna Cirmena came to represent the Trao family. When Gesualdo was alone with Bianca

he was afraid to touch her, and they talked to each other apprehensively, as if they could never overcome the distance between them

At the tax auction of the communal lands an effort was made to convince Mastro don Gesualdo that for the sake of harmony between the Motta and the Trao families he should divide the land with Baron Zacco and the Baroness Rubiera When Gesualdo refused, Don Filippo Margarone pretended that there was no guarantee that Gesualdo would be able to pay the bid with his own money For the time being the auction was called off The Trao family at tempted to put pressure on Bianca to dis suade her husband from bidding on the communal lands, but she refused to take part In the meantime the canon priest Lupi tried to ingratiate himself with Gesualdo by criticizing the business tactics of the Trao family and by warning Gesualdo that an effort was being made to stir the laborers to revolt against him Gesualdo began to realize that his money was not bringing him the satisfaction he had hoped for and which he had always associated with wealth

An uprising of the peasants was quelled by the nobility with military aid During the trouble Gesualdo sought shelter with Nani l'Orbo, who took advantage of the moment to demand land from Gesualdo as payment for harboring him and for having married Diodata Until peace was restored Gesualdo was in danger from both the laborers and the police One result of the disturbance was that Baron Zacco allied himself with Gesualdo, for the peasants were angry at anyone who had anything to do with the communal lands

When news came that Don Diego was dying, Bianca hurried to the house where her brothers lived Her arrival caused a great disturbance among the relatives, and matters were further complicated when Bianca fell into a faint because her child was about to be born In the midst of the uproar Don Ferdinando walked about talking of documents which he claimed proved that the Traos were entitled to royal lands

Although Baron Nini Rubiera was engaged to be married to Donna Fifi Margarone, he became infatuated with an actress, Signora Aglae, and sent a note to her, composed by Ciolla, a local trouble maker who had stirred up the peasants to revolt The note was intercepted by Master Titta, the barber, who gave it to Fifi, and as a result of that disclosure the engagement was ended The young baron's mother was furious with him—not so much because of the scandal as because Baron Nini had gone deeply into debt with Gesualdo in order to entertain the actress

Bianca's child was christened Isabella There were rumors that since the child arrived seven months after the marriage and since she looked so much like a Trao, it was possible that Mastro don Gesualdo was not the father

Baron Nini, finally becoming disgusted with Signora Aglae, returned home to a furious scene with his mother The baroness accused him of trying to impoverish them all by his dealings with Gesualdo, and in her frenzy she suffered a stroke and became paralyzed After his mother's stroke Baron Nini found himself hopelessly entangled by his debts to Gesualdo In desperation he married a rich widow, Madame Gruseppina Alosi, but even that was not enough to save him He then tried to get help from Bianca Although she was affected by his presence, she refused to yield to his appeal

At school Isabella suffered from taunts that she was a peasant's daughter, and in defense she finally called herself a Trao Gesualdo allowed the change of name because he loved her more than his own pride

When a cholera epidemic threatened San Giovanni, Gesualdo brought Isabella home from college and he then moved his family to Mangalavite But Don Ferdinando, Nunzio, Speranza, and Burgio chose to stay At the last moment Donna Cirmena joined the Gesualdo Motta group, bringing with her Corrado La Guma, who had been orphaned in a cholera epidemic

At Mangalavite, Isabella fell in love with Corrado, but Gesualdo finally put an end to the romance by sending Isabella to a convent and by putting out an order for the arrest of Corrado Later he signed a marriage contract, giving his daughter to the Duke di Leyra, a high-living lord who promptly exhausted Isabella's dowry and used up whatever other resources he could get from Gesualdo

From then on Mastro don Gesualdo's downfall was rapid His father had died of fever and the Motta relatives, quarreling over the inheritance, demanded that Gesualdo divide his property among them His wife being ill with consumption, the servants left for fear of catching the disease When the laborers revolted again, Gesualdo hardly paid attention to them, for by that time Bianca was dying and his own life was losing its meaning

After Bianca's death Gesualdo was hurried from place to place to hide him from the rebelling mob His lands and houses were raided and sacked At last, wearying of turncoat friends like Baron Zacco, Gesualdo allowed himself to be controlled by his relatives He lay in bed with a cancerous disease while his son in law, the duke, exercised the power of attorney he had wrested from Gesualdo in order to despoil more of his property One by one his lands disappeared into the hands of others When he made a last appeal to his daughter to use some of the remaining money for those to whom he owed much, she looked at him from a distance she was a Trao and he a Motta After his death the servants knowing little of his life, commented enviously that Gesualdo must have been born lucky since he died in fine linen like a prince

MAX HAVELAAR

Type of work Novel

Author Multatuli (Eduard Douwes Dekker 1820 1887)

Type of plot Political satire

Time of plot 1857

Locale Java

First published 1860

Principal characters

MAX HAVELAAR a conscientious Dutch colonial administrator

BATAVUS DRYSTUBBLE a Dutch coffee broker of Amsterdam

MR VERBRUGGE, an administrator subordinate to Max Havelaar

RADHEN ADHIPATTI KARTA NATTA NEGARA the native regent of Lebak, Havelaar's district

SHAWLMAN, a schoolmate of Batavus Drystubble and a writer

MR SLIMERING, Havelaar's superior officer

Critique

Like his hero in Max Havelaar, Eduard Douwes Dekker was an administrator in the Dutch East Indies As the Resident of Bantam, in Java he had seen at first hand the scandalous situation which existed there and he devoted himself in later life to the reform of the Dutch government's treatment of the Javanese and the inhabitants of other colonies in the East Indies Within the novel itself Dekker compared his work to Harriet Beecher Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin, but

MAX HAVELAAR by Multatuli Translated by W Siebenhaar By permission of the publishers Alfred A. Knopf Inc Copyright 1927 by Alfred A. Knopf Inc Renewed All rights reserved

in recent years critics have tended to believe that Dekker really wrote Max Havelaar as a satire on colonial maladministration of all kinds, governmental blundering, and the smugness and hypocrisy of middle class Europeans. Max Havelaar is but one of Dekker's writings devoted to satire against these things, a drama, a series of fictional love letters, and a string of articles and pamphlets follow the same vein.

The Story

Batavus Drystubble, a self proud coffee broker of Amsterdam, was accosted one day on the street by a former schoolmate who had obviously fallen on evil times. The Shawlman, as Drystubble called him, pressed his prosperous former schoolfellow to look over a bundle of manuscripts, in hopes that Drystubble might be willing to help him have some of them published. Drystubble, thinking he might have a book written about the coffee trade, turned over the manuscripts to a clerk in his firm to edit. The clerk agreed to make a book of the materials, after securing a promise from his employer not to censor the results before publication. Out of the bundle of manuscripts came the story of Max Havelaar, a Dutch administrator in Java, in the Dutch East Indies.

Max Havelaar was an idealist who believed in justice for everyone, even the poor Javanese who labored in the fields. When he arrived at Rangkas Betoon to take over the post of Assistant Resident of Lebak, a section of the residency of Bantam, in Java, he found the situation much worse than he had anticipated, for the Dutch administrators, despite their oath to protect the poor and lowly, had acquiesced in the robbery and mistreatment of the native Javanese by the Javanese nobility, through whom the Dutch ruled the island. The Adhipatti of Lebak was a relatively poor man because his region did not produce many of the exports that the Dutch wanted. In order to keep up appearances befitting his rank and to support a large and rapacious family, the Adhipatti extorted goods, materials, and services from the people, who felt helpless because of the treatment they would suffer from the native chief if they complained to the Dutch officials.

Being a man who loved a good fight for justice's sake, Max Havelaar was glad he had been assigned to Lebak. In his opening speech to the Adhipatti and the lesser chiefs he declared that justice must be done, and he began trying to influence the Adhipatti by advancing him tax money in hopes that the chief would be less exacting on his people. Suggestions and help were of little use, however, for the same evil practices continued. The people, learning that Havelaar wished to see justice done, stole to his home under cover of darkness to lodge their complaints and give the assistant resident information. Havelaar rode many miles to redress complaints. He also gave an example to the chiefs by refusing to use more native labor than the law allowed, even to letting the grounds of the residency go largely untended and revert to jungle. He realized what he was fighting against, for he was a man in his middle thirties who had spent seventeen years in the Dutch colonial service.

His faithful adherent in his battle against injustice was his wife Tine, who was devoted to her husband and knew he was in the right. Of less help was Verbrugge, the controller serving under Havelaar. He knew the Javanese were being exploited, but he hated to risk his job and career, with their concomitant security, by fighting against the tide of complacency of Dutch officialdom. Verbrugge realized that Havelaar's superiors were interested only in keeping peace, in submitting reports that bespoke prosperity, and in providing wealth for the homeland—regardless of what happened to the Javanese.

One example was the story of Saidyah, the son of a small Javanese rice farmer. One by one the father's possessions were taken from him by extortion, even the buffalo that had faced a tiger to save the boy's life Finally Sadyah's father ran away to escape punishment for failing to pay his taxes, and Sadyah himself left his home village to seek work in Batavia, vowing to his beloved that he would return in three years time to marry her When he returned as he had promised, however, he found that she and her family had been forced to flee and had joined rebellious Javanese on another island Sadyah finally found his beloved, but only after she had been killed and mutilated by Dutch troops Sadyah himself, overcome with grief, rushed upon the troops and was impaled on their bayonets

As time went on, Havelaar realized he could expect but little help from Mr Slimering, the Resident of Bantam and his immediate superior Yet Havelaar hoped optimistically that some support would be forthcoming from that quarter Havelaar learned that his predecessor had probably been poisoned because he had sought to stop the exploitation of the population by the native chiefs Havelaar learned this from his predecessor's native wife, who still lived at the official residence

Having finally gained what he deemed sufficient information against the Adhipatti, Max Havelaar lodged an official protest with Mr Slimering He requested that the Adhipatti and his subordinate chiefs be taken into custody and removed from Rangkas Betoong, lest their presence intimidate the people and prevent their giving testimony of the abuses Instead of acceding to any part of the request, Mr Slimering came to Havelaar's district, denounced Havelaar's actions, and even gave money to the Adhipatti Havelaar, hoping to find support higher up in the administration, appealed to the Governor General, saying that unless he received some support to eradicate the injustices he had found he would have to resign after seventeen years of faithful service to the colonial administration

(At this point in the mss was inserted

a section supposedly written by Batavus Drystubble, who expressed the views of a complacent Dutch businessman in the homeland Drystubble said that he had been royally entertained by retired colonial officials who assured him that the charges made in Shawlman's manuscripts were groundless Drystubble added, too, that he felt as a religious man that the heathen Javanese were given their just deserts for not being Christians and that the Dutch were profiting at the expense of the Javanese because the former were decent, God fearing, and obedient Christian people who deserved divine favor)

After waiting a month, Max Havelaar learned that he had been relieved of his post in Lebak he was ordered to another part of Java This official action he could not accept, knowing that he would have the same fight all over again, a losing battle, in a new assignment He left Lebak after his successor arrived and went to Batavia to lay his case personally before the Governor General That worthy man, too busy to see him, put off Havelaar with one pretext after another On the eve of the Governor General's departure for Holland, Havelaar wrote an angry letter as a last hope That stinging letter did no good, the Governor General sailed for home, leaving Havelaar poor and forsaken

(At the end of the novel Multatuli stepped in to break off the story and speak in his own voice, dismissing the clerk from Drystubble's office and Shawlman, who as fictional characters had been writing the novel Multatuli, after expressing his loathing of the hypocritical, money grabbing Drystubble, went on to say that he wished to leave an heirloom for Havelaar's children and to bring his appeals to the public The author said that he knew his book was not well written, but all that mattered was that people learn how the Javanese were being mistreated, thirty millions of them, in the name of King William of the Netherlands)

THE MAXIMS

Type of work Epigrams and aphorisms

Author François Duc de La Rochefoucauld (1613 1680)

First published 1665 1678

La Rochefoucauld described his Maxims (Reflections or Moral Maxims) as a "portrait of the human heart." He wrote in the preface to the first edition that these reflections on human conduct would probably offend many persons because the aphorisms were "full of truths" that would be unacceptable to human pride. Ironically, he wrote that the reader should suppose himself to be the sole exception to the truth revealed and should avoid the tendency to have his opinion influenced by amour propre, or self love, which would prejudice his mind against the maxims.

The reference to self love, the basic concern for self by which the value of any action, person, or thing is presumed to be judged, is characteristic of La Rochefoucauld. Critics generally describe this great French writer as a cynic and take as evidence his maxims in which he attributes to self love the central role in human conduct. But a mere cynic is one who hopes for a better world than the one in which he finds himself; he constantly compares what could be and what ought to be with what is—and the disparity makes him bitter. Consequently, everything the cynic says is a statement of the truth as he sees it, and as he sees it, it is worthy only of a sneer. La Rochefoucauld, on the other hand, takes self love to be an undeniable fact of human existence, and he does not hope for any thing better. Consequently, his view of the world is that of a man amused to see the difference between what men conceive themselves to be and what they are; his delight is in a witty revelation of the facts of life. Throughout the Maxims, as in the refreshing self portrait with which the collection begins, La Rochefoucauld reveals an intelligent sense of humor which takes the sneer out of what critics sometimes choose to call his cynicism.

'My normal expression is somewhat bitter and haughty,' he writes in his initial "Portrait"; his expression "makes most people think me supercilious, though I am not the least so really." He goes on to describe himself as "inclined to melancholy" but not from temperament alone; "it is due to many other causes." He calls himself an intellectual who delights in the conversation of cultured persons, in reading, in virtue, and in friendship. His passions are moderate and under control. He is neither ambitious nor afraid of death. He has given up "light amours" and wonders why so many men waste their time paying "pretty compliments." The portrait concludes with the assurance that were he ever to love, he would love with the strong passion that is a sign of noble character; however, he doubts that his knowledge of the value of strong passion will ever "quit my head to find a dwelling in my heart."

The first maxim is important as a summary statement of La Rochefoucauld's central conviction: "So called virtue is often merely a compound of varied activities and interests, which good fortune or our own assiduity enables us to display to advantage, so it is not always courage that makes the hero, nor modesty the chaste woman."

And with the second, the author names the concern that is essential to the human heart: "Amour propre is the arch flatterer."

In many of the maxims La Rochefoucauld expresses his conviction that virtue is the accidental result of an exercise of the passions, acts undertaken passionately to satisfy the demands of a pervasive self concern are interpreted in other ways, as signs of nobility of character. Thus he writes that "Illustrious deeds, of dazzling brilliance, are represented by politicians as the outcome of great aims, whereas they are usually the result of caprice or passion" (7). Similarly, "The clemency of princes is often nothing more than a political artifice designed to secure the goodwill of their subjects" (15). And, "Such clemency, though hailed as a virtue, is the product sometimes of vanity, sometimes of indolence, not infrequently of timidity, and generally of all three combined" (16).

One way of expressing La Rochefoucauld's philosophy is by saying that, to him, virtue is usually passion misunderstood. A man does something because his own irresistible self-love drives him to it, the world observes the power of his act and mistakes it for the grandeur of courageous virtue.

Not all of the maxims develop this theme, however. Many of the author's comments are both wry and true, and in their pithiness deserve the prominent place so many persons give to the unread sign, "Think." Thus, "The desire to appear clever often prevents our being so" (199), "We all have enough strength to bear the misfortunes of others" (19), "Flattery would do us no harm if we did not flatter ourselves" (152), and "There is no fool so troublesome as a fool with brains" (451).

There is a positive strain to some of the maxims, an appeal to the honesty by which men may lessen the damage their self-love does. Whenever a man finds it possible to recognize another's worth and to do so sincerely, whenever a man knows his own limitations and acknowledges them, whenever a man admits that his show of virtue is often an empty show—there is hope for him. The author respects such honesty, and it is apparent that the Maxims are confessional as well as didactic.

La Rochefoucauld found through his own experience certain truths which writers of all ages have expressed in various ways and which gain power through repetition. In several maxims he develops the idea that it is doing a man an injury to be so much concerned about his welfare that he finds himself burdened with the necessity of being grateful. He recognizes that we tend to be free with advice to others, but not eager to accept it for ourselves. We admit certain shortcomings, such as a poor memory, in order to hide others, such as a lack of intelligence.

La Rochefoucauld's psychology is that of the sophisticated courtier. He was too much aware of his own disguises ever to have acquired the knowledge that would have led to a more objective and more scientific psychology. His psychology, like his philosophy, is not that of the man in the street, was at least that of the man at court—clever enough to see behind the masks of those who traveled in high society, but not tolerant enough of possibilities to be willing to admit that what he called "honest" men were more common than he supposed. When his psychology has the strong ring of truth, it is more by accident than discernment, and when it is false, he seems embittered to distortion—hence the charge of "cynicism."

Nevertheless, certain maxims do define something of the human character. "To disclaim admiration is to desire it in double measure" (149), "We easily forget our faults when they are known only to ourselves" (196), "Excessive eagerness to discharge an obligation is a form of ingratitude" (226), and "If we were faultless ourselves, we should take less pleasure in commenting on the faults of others" (31).

Behind the revealing wit of La Rochefoucauld there is the murmur of an injured man. Who can discern the falsity of others better than a man who believes himself betrayed, who finds himself timid, who longs for recognition and gratitude and receives not enough of either? And who, finally, is scornful of grand passion who has not become bored with his own cleverness and isolation and longs to be transformed, even at the expense of becoming a fool? La Rochefoucauld reveals himself when he reveals the desperate amour-propre which moves all men

MEDITATIONS

Type of work Philosophical discourse
Author Marcus Aurelius (121-180)
First transcribed c. 167-180

Although the Greek philosopher Zeno is generally given the credit for creating the school of philosophy called Stoicism, its greatest fame arises from the popularity and widespread influence of the utterances of two later figures: Epictetus, a slave, and Marcus Aurelius, Emperor of Rome. Of the two, Marcus Aurelius, born just four years before the death of Epictetus in 125, has probably achieved the greater fame, and this fame results almost entirely from his Meditations, one of the most famous philosophical books in the world.

For the average reader, however, there is a disturbing characteristic in the work, which is obscure and often seemingly unrelated; there are passages which suggest that the book has come down to us in a disorganized, even careless, form. One widely accepted cause that has been suggested for this difficulty is the possible intention of Marcus that his writings should be read by no one else, that these recorded thoughts were intended only for their author. It is certain that the Meditations was written during the period between Marcus' accession to the imperial rank in 161 and his death in 180; it is equally certain that the various books were indited during rigorous military campaigns and trying political crises. Although these facts explain in part the irregularity of the book, other scholars feel that there is clear evidence of the emperor's design to publish at least parts of the work.

If this is so, and if Marcus did not merely keep a private journal, then the reason for the present form of the Meditations probably lies in errors and misunderstandings by copyists and later editors of the text. In either event, the reader finds in this book two generally different styles side by side: a nearly casual, sometimes aphoristic, way of writing, and a more literary, more carefully planned, technique. Throughout the twelve books that make up the whole there are passages that read like admonitions addressed by the author to himself, in contrast to these are sections that sound as if Marcus were offering philosophical advice to the Romans or to all mankind in general.

Despite these irregularities, and in spite of the absence of an organized system of thought, a careful reading reveals that the emperor presents to the world some of the sagest suggestions for leading the good life and some of the most effective expressions of the tenets of later Stoicism to be found anywhere.

To say, however, that Marcus Aurelius can be given credit for profound original thinking is going too far. Like many great contemplative books, the Meditations was not written in a vacuum. It rephrases and reinterprets much of that which is usually considered the best of ancient Greek and Roman philosophy. The author acknowledges his debt to his teachers and his wise forbears, his quotations from, and references to, the leading thinkers of his and earlier times prove his wide reading and careful study—his injunction to throw aside one's books and to live one's philosophy notwithstanding.

Perhaps the fact that Marcus did live by his philosophy, one that was tested by almost continually difficult circumstances, is one of the chief charms of his book. There is very little in the Meditations that the emperor probably did not find occasion to think of in relation to his own life Much of practical philosophic value can be found here His advice at the opening of Book II, for instance, to begin each day with the thought that one will meet during that day men who are arrogant envious, and deceitful, but to remember that these men are so because of their ignorance of the good and the right, is surely a sound practical application of the Platonic idea that evil is only the absence of knowledge

Many readers have found the Meditations their surest guide to living by Stoic principles Although happiness must surely come by the pursuit of Stoic virtue duty is the greatest good in the Stoic view The word duty appears rarely in the book, but the emperor's conviction that a man must face squarely his responsibilities is implicit in almost every paragraph Often a note of Roman sternness appears, as in the beginning of paragraph 5 of Book II

Every moment think steadily as a Roman and a man to do what thou hast in hand with perfect and simple dignity and feeling of affection and freedom, and justice and to give thyself relief from all other thoughts

To achieve true virtue, the emperor says, one must live in accord with nature, that is, with both kinds of nature, the nature of man and the nature of the universe The book departs from a commonly held view of the philosopher as an isolated dreamer in its insistence that a man must live wisely with his fellow men, he should not be a hermit Since a man partakes of the same divinity, in his soul, with other men, he must live and work with them, certainly such is the divine intention, and this, then, is one's social duty The duty one has to the universe is to perceive the informing intelligence that pervades and guides it Here Marcus is close to pantheism

With this foundation in mind, the reader can easily understand the emperor's notion of evil as something that cannot harm or disturb the great plan of the universe it is simply ignorance and harms only the doer Thus, no man can be harmed by a force outside himself, only he can do himself real injury The advice of the Meditations, along with that of other Stoic writings, is to accept calmly what cannot be avoided and to perform to the best of one's ability the duties of a human being in a world of humans Since we cannot understand the workings of the great force that rules the universe, it is our part simply to do what we can in our own sphere

Though he believes the world to be divinely guided, Marcus has no illusions about life Therefore, he scorns fears of death Life is full of trouble and hardship, and no one should be sorry to leave it In Paragraph 14 of Book II the author says that however long or short a person's life, he loses at death only the present moment because he does not possess the past and the future, further, since the progress of time is simply a revolution, and all things have been and will be the same, a man loses nothing by an early death This passage displays something of the occasional coldness of the emperor's thought, but it is one of many sections devoted to the consolation of men for the hard facts of existence

Regardless of the varied character of the writing and the thinking in these paragraphs, it is clear that a reasonably consistent philosophy inspired them Certainly the statement that a man rarely comes to grief from not knowing what is in another man's soul, that true misery results from not understanding what lies within oneself, is of a piece with the rest of the book

Some readers have found in Marcus Aurelius a basically Christian spirit, and they believe that the Meditations adumbrates in many passages later religious writings Considerable doubt exists as to his feeling about the Christians or to the extent of his responsibility for their persecution during his reign, but there is little question that a great deal of his thinking is closely allied with that of

later spiritual leaders The book is often compared with other philosophic works of consolation, such as Pascal's Pensees and the Confessions of Saint Augustine Beyond doubt, the readership and in fluence of this book by perhaps the greatest pagan ruler who ever lived is as wide as those of any other work of its kind, and far greater than those of most

MEMOIRS

Type of work Autobiography

Author Giovanni Jacopo Casanova de Seingalt (1725-1798)

Time 1725-1773

Locale Europe and the Near East

First published 1826-1838

Principal personages

CASANOVA, the narrator

TERESA, an actress who became the traveling companion of Casanova for a time

C C, a young Venetian woman who loved Casanova

MADAME LA MARQUISE D'URFE, an aged French noblewoman duped by Casanova

THERESE TRENTI, also called Thérèse Imer and Madame Cornelys, an actress, adventuress, and mother of one of Casanova's illegitimate children

M DE BRAGADIN, a Venetian senator and Casanova's benefactor

In his Memoirs (Memoires écrits par lui meme), Casanova, who took for himself the additional name of Seingalt, set forth his amazing life of adventures as he remembered them in his old age. Not everything in his reminiscences tallies with discoverable historical fact, either because the writer's memory was faulty in his old age or because he colored the truth for the sake of a better story. In his autobiography Casanova reveals himself as a man ruled by pleasure, passion, and a delicate sense of revenge. He was superficial, amoral, proud, and sometimes extremely foolish. As he tells the story, he was also a brave man. He faced poverty, ill fortune, imprisonment, and even possible death with fortitude. The only situation before which he quailed was marriage, a state which would have put an end to his unconventional way of life. Although Italian was his mother tongue, he wrote his Memoirs in French. In the work there is perhaps less philosophizing than one might expect from an old man. Casanova seems generally to have thought his life a full and generous one, over which there was little need to ponder or grieve because of past follies or mistakes.

Casanova was the oldest child of Gaetan Joseph Jacques Casanova and his wife Zanetta, the beautiful daughter of a Venetian shoemaker. When a child, he was left with his maternal grandmother while his parents continued their careers on the stage. Rather strangely, Casanova could remember nothing of his life before he was eight years old. His earliest recollection was of a terrible nose bleed from which he suffered and for which his grandmother took him to see an old woman who performed a strange cure, apparently by witchcraft, for his malady.

At his father's death Casanova, one of three children, was taken in hand by the Abbe Grumani, who placed the boy in a strict school. Though he hated his studies, he was precocious by nature and at the age of sixteen he became a Doctor of Law. Returned to Venice, he was befriended by M de Malpiero, a retired senator. While visiting in Pasean, Casanova met a young girl named Lucy, whom he admired and respected. When he revisited the town again a few months later, he learned that the girl had eloped with another. Disappointed and resentful, he decided that he might as well make love to women instead of treating them with devotion and respect.

At seventeen Casanova entered a seminary, from which he was shortly expelled. Later he fell in with a Franciscan friar named Brother Stephano, with whom he had several adventures. On one occasion he was presented to Pope Benedict XIV, who treated him kindly. For a time Casanova stayed in the household of Cardinal Acquaviva, but an adventure with a girl put the police on his trail and he went to Constantinople, where he had several amorous adventures. On the way to Turkey he met Teresa, an actress who had disguised herself as a boy. The young woman left her family and went with Casanova to become his mistress for a time. Soon afterward Casanova assumed the dress of a military officer. In Constantinople a noble Turk, pleased with the young Venetian, offered him a fortune and his daughter's hand in marriage if Casanova would only become a Moslem. On his return to Europe, Casanova stopped at Corfu, where he actually became an officer. Not entirely happy in military service, he left it before long and returned to Venice.

With his fortunes at a low ebb Casanova took up the profession of a fiddler at the Theater of Saint Samuel. One day he had the opportunity to befriend M. de Bragadin, a Venetian senator, when the old man was suddenly taken ill. The senator, a wealthy man, took Casanova into his home and treated him as his son. He and two of his wealthy friends were soon convinced that Casanova had occult powers. Realizing their gullibility, Casanova hoaxed the old men into marrying off for him a young girl with whom he had had a very interesting affair.

Casanova then left Venice and traveled to Milan and Cesena. In the latter place he met a woman named Henriette, who abandoned her lover to accompany Casanova to Parma. She turned out to be a noblewoman who soon had to return to her family. During a period of reform which followed this adventure Casanova became a Freemason and later went to Paris. After various adventures, including one in which he passed himself off as a doctor, he went to Dresden. There a tragedy he had written had some success on the stage. On his return to Venice he met C. C., a beautiful heiress with whom he fell in love. He was overjoyed to find his love reciprocated. Her family did not approve of the match, however, partly because of the girl's youth, and she was placed in a convent. One day when he visited the convent Casanova impressed one of the nuns, a very beautiful and worldly woman. The nun, M. M., arranged through her lover for an affair with Casanova. During many months of 1753 they met outside the convent and had a very happy time, until the woman's lover, M. de Bernis, the French ambassador to Venice, returned to Paris. Soon afterward M. M. and C. C. learned that they loved the same man, much to Casanova's anger and discomfiture; they changed places one night.

As his affair with M. M. was drawing to a close, Casanova was arrested by the state Inquisition, which confined him in the notorious prison known as The Leads because of his supposed heresy and his dabbling in black magic. After some months in the prison, Casanova found a bolt from which he made a combination tool and weapon. He was almost ready to escape when a change in cells brought his plan to light. He started all over again, with accomplices inside the prison, and eventually made a daring escape with a man named Balbi; the two escaped by making a daring passage over the roofs of the prison itself. Casanova succeeded in making his way from Venice to Munich, but his companion was captured and returned to The Leads.

From Germany, Casanova went to Paris, arriving there in January, 1757, shortly after Damiens had attempted to assassinate King Louis XV. While in Paris, Casanova raised several million francs for the crown by means of a lottery and thus came into favor in court circles. He met Madame la Marquise d'Urfé, a wealthy and elderly noble woman fascinated by the occult arts. Becoming the old woman's companion in experiments in magic and alchemy, he was able to fleece her of a great deal of money.

On a trip to Amsterdam, Casanova again met Thérèse Trenti, whom he had known some years before as Thérèse Imer. Now an actress, she was the mother of Casanova's daughter and of a son by another father. Casanova took the boy back to Paris and put him in the care of Madame d'Urfé. In Paris he also helped out Mlle X V C, who had become pregnant and feared her family's wrath. For his pains he fell afoul of the police, although he himself was innocent of any wrongdoing.

After he had cleared himself he traveled to Holland and then to Germany, having many adventures in love on the way and making some money, most of it by gambling. In Cologne he had an amusing affair with the wife of the burgomaster. From there he went to Wurtemberg, where he was cheated and robbed by three army officers who then betrayed their victim to the police and charged him with unlawful gambling. With the help of two pretty women Casanova made his escape and went to Zurich, Switzerland. At Zurich he had several pleasant affairs, including one with a pretty French widow named Dubois, who served as his housekeeper. In the summer of 1760 Casanova went to Geneva to visit Voltaire, whom he found a charming man but too much addicted to republicanism for Casanova's taste.

From his visit to Voltaire, Casanova went to Aix en Savoie, where he had an interesting experience with a nun who much resembled his M M. Having become pregnant, the nun had arranged to leave her convent with a supposed illness that could be treated by the waters at Aix. He helped her through her confinement and then returned her to her order.

Casanova went on to Rome, where he was received by the Pope, who promised to help him obtain a pardon from the Venetian authorities. Nothing came of the promise, but the pontiff did bestow the Cross of the Order of the Golden Spur on Casanova.

Leaving Rome, Casanova visited Bologna, Modena, Parma, Turin, and Chambéry. At Chambéry he arranged for a banquet with the second M M, whom he had sent back to her convent. Finally back in Paris, Casanova found Madame d'Urfé hopeful of being reborn as a male child through certain occult rites. Casanova, seeing the woman was set in her ideas, promised to help her. Much of his time for almost two years was spent in occult pursuits which enabled the adventurer to make himself a small fortune at the noblewoman's expense.

In Milan the adventurer tried to have an affair with a Spanish countess who retaliated by trying to take his life with magic. Casanova had greater success with the Countess Clementina at the chateau of San Angelo, where he was the guest of Count Ambrose. He won the countess' love and then, as usual, proceeded to leave her. He always had adventures and affairs, but his next great exploits took place in England. He went to London, where he found Thérèse Trenti, who now called herself Madame Cornelys, and her children an unhappy domestic combination. To relieve his boredom and gloom he advertised for a woman to rent an apartment in his house. Pauline, a Portuguese noblewoman who had taken refuge in England, answered the advertisement. Casanova and Pauline had an affair which lasted until she was compelled to return to her homeland. After Pauline's departure, Casanova met Miss Charpillon, an adventuress who proved more than a match for him, even driving him to contemplate suicide After this disaster, Casanova often lived a seedy and wretched existence as he drifted about Europe from Russia to Spain At the time of writing his Memoirs, in 1773, he was still waiting to receive from the Venetian authorities the pardon which would allow him to return to the city and republic he loved

THE MEMOIRS OF A CAVALIER

Type of work Novel

Author Daniel Defoe (1660 1731)

Type of plot Adventure romance

Time of plot 1630 1648

Locale England and the Continent

First published 1720

Principal characters

THE CAVALIER, the unidentified second son of a landed family in England

CAPTAIN FIELDING the Cavalier's friend and traveling companion

SIR JOHN HEPBURN the Cavalier's friend in the Swedish army

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS King of Sweden and Protestant champion in the Thirty Years' War

CHARLES I King of England, served by the Cavalier in the English Civil War

Critique

The year 1720 was an eventful one in the career of Daniel Defoe, for in that year he published three works The Memoirs of a Cavalier, Captain Singleton, and his Serious Reflections of Robinson Crusoe Like the other book length narratives by Defoe, The Memoirs of a Cavalier did not originally carry the author's name, a circumstance apparently intended to lend an air of authenticity to his realistic work Over the years attempts have been made to prove that Defoe merely edited the memoirs of some real person, but scholars are now in agreement that this book, along with others by Defoe, was his own creation and that he probably had no specific person in mind as the original for his fictional narrator protagonist One interesting feature of the novel is that its hero is a member of the upper class, while the usual Defoe hero is taken from the middle or lower classes, groups that Defoe knew at first hand, as he did not know the life of the upper class The Cavalier who narrates the story is similar to other Defoe creations in that, uninterested in religion as a young man, he is worldly and materialistic Also noteworthy is the fact that Defoe, a Protestant himself and a Dissenter from Anglicanism, glorifies the Protestant side in the Thirty Years' War but has little to say for the English Protestants who rebelled against the monarchy and the Anglican Church during the 1640's

The Story

The Cavalier was the son of a landed gentleman in the county of Salop, born according to his own report, in 1608 As a child he was taught by good tutors, as a young man he was sent to Oxford University, where he spent three years deciding that he was not interested either in continuing academic life or entering one of the professions—law, the Church, or medicine His father hoped the young man, who was his favorite son, would settle down near his home He even agreed to settle an estate worth two thousand pounds per year upon the young man, but the Cavalier, much as he loved his father and appreciated the offer, decided, with his father's permission, to travel on the Continent

In 1630 the Cavalier crossed the Channel and began his adventures in life. With him went a college friend named Fielding. Because of his martial bearing the friend had been nicknamed the "Captain," and the name stuck to him. After some minor adventures on the road, the Cavalier and his friend arrived in Paris. Their stay in that city was cut short when the Cavalier killed a man in a swordfight and the two friends left the city hurriedly to escape the authorities. They journeyed to Italy and traveled there for some time, returning later to France to observe how Cardinal Richelieu was administering that country for his king. Again the two Englishmen found themselves in trouble from which they were extricated by the Queen Mother, who gave them a pass that enabled them to travel on to see the fighting between the French forces and those of the Duke of Savoy. Unimpressed in Italy by the antiquities of Rome and by the Italian people, who seemed much degenerated from their Roman ancestors, the Cavalier and his friend traveled northward into central Europe, arriving in Vienna in 1631 and then going on into Bavaria. In Germany they had a chance to see the fighting between the Protestant Germans led by the Elector Duke of Saxony, and the Catholic forces headed by Emperor Ferdinand. One of the dreadful experiences the two Englishmen had was to observe the end of the siege of Magdeburg. The fall of that city was marked by terrible looting, rape, and murder, the city itself was almost completely destroyed, and the population reduced to a mere handful from an original population of more than 25,000 souls.

After the fall of Magdeburg to the Catholic forces, the Cavalier and Fielding journeyed on until they encountered the invading army of Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden, who had joined the Protestant Germans against Emperor Ferdinand. The Cavalier was quite impressed with the Swedish army and the person of the Swedish king to whom he was introduced by Colonel Hepburn, a friend of the Cavalier's father who had taken service in the Swedish army. Fielding joined the Swedish forces, as did the Cavalier himself after a time, serving first as a gentleman volunteer and later as a commissioned officer. The Cavalier distinguished himself many times in the Swedish service. His father raised a regiment of cavalry and, with the consent of the English king, sent it to Gustavus Adolphus, who made the Cavalier its colonel. In addition to his service as a commander, the Cavalier also became a special attendant to the king and some times his emissary. Captured by the Imperial forces shortly before the Battle of Lutzen, in which Gustavus Adolphus lost his life, the Cavalier was allowed to continue his travels after he had given his parole.

In 1635, the Cavalier found himself in Holland, where he observed the Dutch army under its famous commander, Prince Maurice, opposing the forces of Spain. Later in the same year the Cavalier returned to England, where he rested for some months until he was called from his inactivity by Charles I, who asked the Cavalier to enter his service in the campaign against the Scots. Serving as a gentleman volunteer rather than as a commissioned officer, he found the campaigns against the Scots little to his liking, inasmuch as there was little real action, only minor skirmishes, and the war was over religious dissent, a cause in which the Cavalier could see little reason.

At the outbreak of the English Civil War the Cavalier had little feeling about war from a moral standpoint. He considered himself a professional soldier who did his duty honorably, not worrying particularly about the causes of war or the countryside that was devastated or the injuries done to its populace. As the war continued, however, he saw that England as a country was losing, whether victory fell to King Charles or to the Parliamentary forces which opposed the monarchy.

When the Civil War broke out in 1642, the Cavalier was still serving Charles I in the Scottish campaigns. He continued to follow the monarch, even though he recognized that the king was ill prepared to battle for his throne. Rather than take a commission, the Cavalier still fought as a gentleman volunteer in the royal troop of guards. Later, when his father was injured, the Cavalier took the command of the royalist force his father had recruited.

Fighting in many of the minor battles of the Civil War, the Cavalier saw most of the action as the armies marched and countermarched, sometimes to do battle, sometimes to escape it. During the great battle at Edgehill, however, the Cavalier realized that he had a greater stake in the war than the interests of a professional soldier. From that time on he wished that an honorable peace could be arranged between King Charles and Parliament.

During his years of campaigning for the monarchy the Cavalier had many adventures, but he was fortunate to escape with no serious injury. Even a dangerous mission as a disguised spy turned out well. One effect of the war which angered the Cavalier was the activity of the Scots against King Charles. The Cavalier thought that the Scots had no call to make war on the monarch, who had acceded to all their demands, even to abolishing the episcopacy in favor of the Scots' native Presbyterianism.

Toward the end of the war the Cavalier's father was taken prisoner by Parliamentary forces. The Cavalier offered to take his father's place, but his father was able to buy his freedom by giving his parole and paying four thousand pounds. A short time later the Cavalier was cut off from the royal army. He and a group of companions managed to escape, making their way by sea to Cornwall, where they joined Lord Hopton's forces. When the king surrendered to the Scots, who later turned him over to the Parliament, Lord Hopton's troops also surrendered. The Cavalier, like other royalists, was given the choice of leaving the country or peaceably going home. The Cavalier returned to his home, content that he had served his king, his country, and his honor as best he could. Having given his parole that he would take no further part in the war, he retired from active life.

MEMOIRS OF A PHYSICIAN

Type of work Novel

Author Alexandre Dumas, father (1802-1870)

Type of plot Historical romance

Time of plot Eighteenth century

Locale Paris and environs

First published 1846-1848

Principal characters

BARON DE TAVERNEY

PHILIPPE his son

ANDRÉE his daughter

GILBERT in love with Andrée

KING LOUIS XV OF FRANCE

M. DE CHOISEUL the king's minister

MADAME JEANNE DU BARRY, the king's favorite

ARMAND DE RICHELIEU, a political opportunist

JOSEPH BALSAMO (COUNT DE FENIX), a sorcerer and revolutionary

LORENZA FELICIANI, his wife

ALTHOTAS, his instructor in magic

M. DE SARTINES, a lieutenant of police

JEAN JACQUES ROUSSEAU, the philosopher

Critique

Memoirs of a Physician is an intricate plot of court intrigue in the closing days of the reign of Louis XV, with dramatis personae as diverse as the scheming Duc de Richelieu, the philosopher Rousseau, and the favorite dominated king. Manipulating all these by means of his magical control of natural forces and the power invested in him as a representative of the secret brotherhood of Freemasonry is the mysterious figure of Joseph Balsamo. The climax is as lurid as any modern thriller. For its full historical value this volume should be read as one of a series of five all concerned with the court life of France at the time of Louis XV and XVI. Called the Marie Antoinette romances, the novels are Memoirs of a Physician (including Joseph Balsamo), The Queen's Necklace, The Taking of the Bastille, The Countess de Charny, in that order, and, lastly, The Chevalier of the Maison Rouge.

The Story

At the court of Louis XV of France the Duc de Richelieu plotted with Madame du Barry, the king's favorite, to replace M. de Choiseul as the king's minister. They consulted a Count de Fenix, who turned out to be the reputed sorcerer Joseph Balsamo, ten years earlier the necromancer had predicted that Madame du Barry would one day be queen of France. Balsamo used his wife Lorenza as an unwilling medium for his sorcery. Through her he was able to give Richelieu and Madame du Barry compromising information contained in a letter sent by the Duchess of Grammont to her brother, de Choiseul, showing that the minister was encouraging the revolt of parliament against the king and attempting to bring about war with England. Fortified with this information, Richelieu forced the king to dismiss his minister.

The philosopher Rousseau, standing in the crowd gathered outside the palace after the king at a "bed of justice" had defied parliament, was urged to attend a secret meeting where he would be initiated into the mystic order of Freemasonry. Rousseau declared he could do more for the world by not joining the order. The chief of the council, who was Balsamo, read a communication from Swedenborg which warned them of a traitor in their midst.

In order to demonstrate to the surgeon Marat, a member of the secret fraternity, that body and soul can be separated and then reunited and that the soul has a greater knowledge than the body, Balsamo hypnotized one of Marat's patients. As the patient's crushed leg was amputated, Balsamo made the patient sing. He also hypnotized Marat's maid, drew from her an admission of the theft of her master's watch, and, still in the condition of sleep, made her repeat the contents of a letter she could not read while awake.

Andrée, daughter of the impoverished Baron de Taverney, had recently been saved from the violence of a mob by Gilbert, a son of the people, but she was ignorant of this circumstance because Balsamo had brought her home in his carriage. After the girl had been settled at the Trianon through the request of the dauphiness, her beauty charmed the king completely, and he commissioned Richelieu to present her with a necklace worth several million livres, but she declined the gift. Richelieu, escorting de Taverney through the gardens after they had supped with the king, was heard by Gilbert, hidden in a dense thicket, advising the baron to send his daughter to a convent. Philippe, Andrée's brother who held a commission in the royal army, paid a farewell visit to his sister, she confided to him her fears and forebodings. After his departure, Andrée threw herself on a bench and wept. Gilbert approached and declared his love for her, but Andrée rebuffed him.

In his mansion, Balsamo was summoned to Lorenza's room, where she begged him to release her so that she could retire to a convent. When he refused, she plunged a dagger into her breast. After commanding Lorenza to sleep, Balsamo ascended to the chamber of the alchemist Althotas who reminded him that in a week the aged man would be one hundred years old, by which time he must have the last three drops of blood of a child or a young female to complete the elixir which would preserve him for another half century. Balsamo, having promised his help, was returning to the sleeping Lorenza when he was interrupted by the arrival of Richelieu, who had come for a special sleeping draught for Andrée. Richelieu had already left instructions that a love potion be given the king which would cause him to fall in love with the first woman he saw on waking.

Gilbert overheard Nicole, Andrée's maid, tell her lover that Richelieu had arranged for them to escape together after first drugging Andrée and leaving her door unlocked, later he saw them ride off. Andrée, plunged into a hypnotic sleep by the drink, descended the stairs of her apartment in a trance and passed the astounded Gilbert. A flash of lightning disclosed the concealed figure of Balsamo, who ordered Andrée to tell what had happened at his house in Paris after Lorenza had tried to kill herself and he had put her to sleep. Andrée, describing Lorenza's flight, told how she had taken with her a box of papers and, on reaching the street, had inquired the address of the lieutenant of police, M. de Sartines. At this news Balsamo leaped to his horse and without releasing Andrée from her trance, dashed off for Paris.

Andrée, left alone, sank to the ground. Gilbert, a witness of this scene at a distance, rushed toward her, lifted her up, and carried her back to her chamber. As he placed her on the couch he heard a step. Hastily he blew out the candle. Realizing that the visitor was the king, Gilbert fled. King Louis, seeing Andrée lying pale and immobile and thinking her dead, also fled in panic.

Balsamo, riding toward Paris, knew that his only hope of preventing Lorenza from revealing his secrets to the police lay in his magic power over her. Abruptly he reined in his horse and with all the force at his command willed Lorenza to fall asleep wherever she was. From Sevres, he sent a hasty note to Madame du Barry in Paris. Lorenza, meanwhile, had arrived at the office of the police, but before she could give him Balsamo's address she fell to the floor, overcome by a strange dizziness. A valet carried her into an adjoining room. M. de Sartines burst open the coffer, however, and a clerk deciphered the secret papers which implicated Balsamo in plans affecting the king and the government.

At that moment Balsamo, under the name of the Count de Fénix, was announced. Seeing that the coffer had been opened, he threatened to blow out M. de Sartines' brains. Madame du Barry, acting quickly on receipt of Balsamo's letter, arrived at that moment, and M. de Sartines surrendered the coffer to her. She in turn handed it to Balsamo with all the papers intact.

On his return to his chambers Balsamo found Lorenza there in convulsions. His determination to kill her ebbed as he gazed on her beauty, and an overpowering love for her swept his being and caused him to feel that if he surrendered his control over her he might still earn some heavenly recompense. For three days the very thought plunged him into a happiness he had never before experienced, while in her trance Lorenza dreamed aloud her own mysterious love. On the third day, after she had asked him to test her ability still to see through space in spite of intervening material obstacles, Balsamo willed her to report what Madame du Barry was doing. Lorenza reported that the king's favorite was on her way to see him.

Balsamo put Lorenza into a still deeper sleep. As he was leaving her he fancied he heard a creak. Looking back, he saw only her sleeping form. In her sleep Lorenza thought she saw part of the ceiling of her room descend, and from this moving trap a Caliban shaped creature creep toward her. Powerless to escape, she felt him place her on the circular trap, which then ascended slowly toward the ceiling.

Madame du Barry, worried because she had been followed, told Balsamo that she had saved him from arrest when M. de Sartines had handed the king the deciphered names from the coffer. In appreciation, Balsamo presented her with a vial containing a draught which would ensure her twenty years of additional youth. After her departure Balsamo returned to Lorenza's couch, only to find her gone. He ascended to his instructor's room and there discovered the body of Lorenza. To his horror he realized that Althotas drained from her the blood needed for his elixir.

Cursing his master, from whose hands the vial with the precious liquid slipped and broke, Balsamo fell unconscious on the lifeless body of his wife. He stirred only when notified by his servant that "the five masters" were waiting to see him. They had come from the secret fraternity to pronounce sentence on him as a traitor. Having watched his movements, they had seen Lorenza leave his home with a coffer which contained secret names in cipher. Later he himself had arrived at the police office, and Lorenza had departed alone, but he had left with Madame du Barry, whom he had summoned there to receive the secret information for which he was paid. The paper which had revealed their secrets had been left with the police, they charged, but Balsamo had brought away the coffer in order to avoid implication. As a result of this betrayal, five of their prominent agents had been arrested. Balsamo did not defend himself. When he asked only for a few minutes to bring proof that would speak for him, they let him go. He returned, bearing the body of Lorenza which he let slip from his arms to fall at their feet. In consternation, his judges fled.

Althotas, enraged at his pupil and fearing death for himself, set fire to his precious manuscripts and perished in the flames. All night the fire roared in the rooms above, while Balsamo, stretched beside Lorenza's body, never moved. The vaulted walls were thick, however, and the fire finally burned itself out.

Andree recovered from her prostration and retired to a convent. Baron de Taverney, repudiated by the king and Richelieu, slunk back to his impoverished estate. Philippe sailed for America, and Gilbert followed. Balsamo vegetated in his mansion, from which he was supposed to have reappeared during the violence of the French Revolution. As for the king, on May 9, 1774, his physician pronounced him suffering from smallpox. His daughter, Madame Louise of France, left her convent cell to attend him, and he was given extreme unction. Madame du Barry was sent to the chateau of the Duchess d'Aiguillon. The next day the king died, and Louis XVI came to a throne about to be engulfed in the flames of rebellion and anarchy.

THE MENAECCHI

Type of work Drama

Author Titus Maccius Plautus (c. 255-184 B.C.)

Type of plot Farce

Time of plot Third century B.C.

Locale Epidamnus, a city of Macedonia

First presented Late third or early second century B.C.

Principal characters

MENAECCHMUS OF EPIDAMNUS

MENAECCHMUS SOSCILES, his twin brother

MESSENIO, Menaechmus Sosciles' servant

WIFE OF MENAECHMUS OF EPIDAMNUM

EROTIUM, a courtesan, Menaechmus of Epidamnum's mistress

PENICULUS, a parasite, hanger on to Menaechmus of Epidamnum

Critique

The Menaechmi is one of the best known of Plautus' plays (Shakespeare leaned heavily on it for The Comedy of Errors (1592-1594)). Although its plot is not remarkably complex, Plautus handles the action with considerable histrionic dexterity, carefully signaling in advance so that the audience may always be in a position to relish the misunderstandings and confusion of the characters. Binding itself to a very narrow unity of time and place, the action takes place before the house of Erotium in little more than the time actually represented. This limitation creates a number of problems in verisimilitude, but the play moves so rapidly that the audience has no opportunity to grow uneasy at the improbable coincidences or the obtuseness of the characters. The Menaechmi has no apparent social or moral theme, but it manifests good showmanship throughout.

The Story

When the two Menaechmi were seven years old, one, later to become Menaechmus of Epidamnum, accompanied his merchant father from their home in Syracuse to Tarentum. There, fascinated by the confused activity, the boy wandered away, became lost, and was finally picked up by another merchant who took him to the merchant's own home in Epidamnum and adopted him. The boy's family was so grief-stricken at his loss that his name was given to the remaining son. This boy, Menaechmus Sosiscles, grew up, and when he came of age and inherited his father's property, he went out to pursue an aimless quest of his brother.

Menaechmus of Epidamnum had by this time inherited his foster father's wealth, married a somewhat shrewish woman, and acquired a mistress. On the day Menaechmus Sosiscles arrived in Epidamnum on his undirected search, Menaechmus of Epidamnum had quarreled with his suspicious wife and had parted from her, secretly bearing one of her robes as a gift to Erotium, his mistress. Delivering the robe, he instructed Erotium to prepare an elaborate meal for their evening's entertainment, then he left to attend to some business at the Forum.

Shortly afterward, Menaechmus Sosiscles happened to arrive before Erotium's house and, much to his dismay, was addressed familiarly, first by one of her servants and then by Erotium herself. Confusion followed, but Menaechmus Sosiscles finally decided that this was merely Erotium's way of trying to seduce him, and so he gave his servant Messenio his wallet for safekeeping and accompanied the courtesan into the house.

When he came back out later, having consumed the food which Menaechmus of Epidamnum had ordered for himself and his parasite, Erotium gave him the robe so that he could have it altered for her. As he walked away, intent on selling the robe for his own gain, he was accosted by Peniculus, Menaechmus of Epidamnum's parasite, indignant at having missed a banquet to which he had been invited only a short time before and convinced that he had been purposely affronted. Menaechmus Sosiscles finally dismissed Peniculus with an insult, and the latter, believing himself grievously treated by his erstwhile benefactor, went to Menaechmus of Epidamnum's wife and revealed to her that her husband was not only keeping another woman but had given his mistress his wife's robe as well. When Peniculus had finished, Menaechmus of Epidamnum came by on his way from the Forum to Erotium's house, and, in concealment, the two overheard him soliloquizing in a way that substantiated Peniculus' whole story. Sat ified with what she heard, the wife stepped forward and accosted her husband. There followed a confused argument in which Menaechmus of Epidamnium alternated between dissembled ignorance regarding the theft of the robe and genuine dismay regarding his assumed presence at the banquet. Erotium had given. At last, seeing that Peniculus had revealed all, he agreed to get the robe and return it. When he went to Erotium and, unaware that Menaechmus Sosicles had already taken the robe, tried to explain his dilemma, she assumed he was trying to defraud her, grew angry, and slammed her door in his face.

Meanwhile, Menaechmus Sosicles still carrying the robe, met the angry wife, who assumed that he was Menaechmus of Epidamnium returning the robe as he had promised. While the whole situation was still in confusion, the wife's father arrived to take her part. Menaechmus Sosicles decided to feign madness to get rid of the two and was so successful in his attempt that they went off in search of a physician and men to restrain him.

But when these people were assembled, they met Menaechmus of Epidamnium instead of his brother. They would have carried him off if Messenio had not happened along and, mistaking Menaechmus of Epidamnium for his brother, beaten off the assailants. When the others had fled, Messenio asked for his freedom in return for saving his "master's" life, his request was granted by the amazed Menaechmus of Epidamnium, and Messenio went off to collect his master's belongings and return them.

On the way, however, he met Menaechmus Sosicles. Gradually the nature of the confusion came to light. The two brothers finally confronted each other and exchanged the information that was a necessary prelude to formal recognition. Menaechmus of Epidamnium decided to sell his property and return to Syracuse with his brother. Messenio was freed again, this time by his own master, and was made auctioneer for the sale of the property. Everything was to be converted into cash, including Menaechmus of Epidamnium's wife.

LE MENTEUR

Type of work Drama

Author Pierre Corneille (1606-1684)

Type of plot Farce

Time of plot Seventeenth century

Locale Paris

First presented 1643

Principal characters

DORANTE, a student newly arrived in Paris

GERONTE, his father

CLITON, his valet and confidant

ALCIPPE, his friend, engaged secretly to Clance

PHILISTE, a friend to both Alcippe and Dorante

CLARICE, a young précieuse, betrothed to Alcippe

LUCRECE, her friend and fellow conspirator

SABINE, the maid and confidante of Lucrece

Critique

Although Corneille began his career at the famous Hôtel de Bourgogne with Mélite in 1629, his reputation as a writer of comedy rests solely on Le Menteur

(The Liar), based on an episode from Truth Suspected, by Juan Ruiz de Alarcón (c. 1581-1639). The actor producer manager of the Royal Players, LE MENTEUR by Pierre Corneille from CHIEF PLAYS OF CORNEILLE. Translated by Lacy Lockert. By permission of the publishers Princeton University Press. Copyright 1952-1957 by Princeton University Press.

Pierre Le Messier, acted the title role with great success, though he was known chiefly as a tragedian. Written in Alexandrines—six iambic feet per line with rhyming couplets—the play has not been satisfactorily translated into English. Another reason for the play's diminished effectiveness in English lies in the clever play on words and the use of double meanings which defy exact translation.

The Story

Dorante, a young gallant who had come to Paris in order to get his social education and not to take a wife as his father Geronte wished, hired Cliton, a valet who had military and amatory connections, as his mentor. The young man wished to be schooled in the ways of the world, though the only advice he ever took from his man was to spend freely.

Quite by planned accident Clarice, tired of waiting for her lethargic lover Alcippe to conclude their secret arrangements to marry, tripped onto the waiting arm of the newly arrived student. Although a rustic, Dorante immediately accommodated himself to the situation and exchanged euphemistic compliments with the young coquette, much to his valet's despair. The brazen liar captivated not only Clarice but her companions especially Lucrece, who was silent throughout, by his false accounts of the wars he had fought in and the deeds he had accomplished in Germany during the last four years.

The arrival of Alcippe put the girls to flight, but not before Alcippe saw Clarice talking to his old friend Dorante—who quite ecstatically informed his companions that he had had amazing amatory adventures during his month's stay in Paris. Last night, for example, he had entertained a beautiful lady and five companions on five boats with four choirs of instruments playing all night and with dancing until dawn after a sumptuous repast of six courses, and so on. Cliton attempted to break into this mad monologue, but with no result, for Dorante's philosophy was to tell the big lie of wars and adventures in order to be believed. His stories were so plausible and his manner so persuasive that the two young ladies fell in love with him, his friend Alcippe burned with jealousy because he thought his fiancée had been on the barge, and his friend Philiste was completely mystified when he tried to reconcile the tales with what he later found to be the unvarnished and unromantic truth. The one flaw in the liar's plans was that in his conversation with Cliton, who had gained information about the young women from a coachman, Dorante confused Clarice with Lucrece.

Into this confused web of mendacity and misplaced affections came the good-natured Geronte, who without his son's knowledge pressed the young man's suit for marriage with the daughter of an old friend. The girl was Clarice, ready and willing to be wooed after all the time she had spent waiting for Alcippe's advances. The old man and the young girl contrived a meeting that evening under her balcony and incognito, though she doubted that she could judge her suitor's character from such a distance and under such unintimate circumstances. A friend then suggested that she receive him at Lucrece's house and as Lucrece.

Alcippe, consumed with jealousy, angrily accused Clarice of infidelity. Although she denied his charges, she refused to seal their engagement with two kisses, her hand, and her faith. Alcippe, thinking himself the injured party, swore revenge.

Meanwhile, the tolerant father retracted his offer of his son's hand in marriage to Clarice because the young scoundrel had invented a touching story to escape the wedding planned for him. The story, a cape and sword melodrama, concerned his marriage to a poor girl whose father found them alone, in his anxiety to disguise their presence his gun went off, his sword was broken, his barnacle smashed, and her reputation threatened. Under the circumstances, what could he do but marry sweet Orphise? Cliton's despair changed to admiration, now that he realized how useful his master's ability at lying could be. Though Cliton tried to acquaint him with his mistake about the shy, virtuous, and quiet Lucrece with whom Dorante had not spoken, the bewitched swain swore he would keep his appointment under her balcony. Alcippe wrote a letter breaking off his friendship with Dorante and demanding satisfaction. In one short day his second in the big city, the provincial student had quarreled, made love, and reported a marriage. To lie effectively, Cliton observed, one must have a good memory.

Confronted by his accuser, Dorante told Alcippe and Philiste that he had known Clarice for several years but was not interested in her. He had, he said, taken a beautiful married woman with him on the barge, a woman whom Alcippe could not possibly know. He cautioned Alcippe not to believe all he heard and not to be led by the green-eyed monster. When Philiste revealed to Alcippe that the young dandy had only yesterday arrived from the college at Portiers—proof that while he might be valorous, his deeds were imaginary—Alcippe asked the innocent scoundrel's pardon.

Clarice, by the time she had exchanged places on the balcony with Lucrece, also knew about the lies Dorante had told. Lucrece thought his actions a sign of love. Confronted, Dorante denied all accusations save one, he declared that he had pretended marriage in order to wed his Lucrece—at this point there was consternation on the balcony—whom he would marry that next day as proof of his sincerity. By group action he was ordered hence, so shocked were the young ladies at his effrontery—or naivete.

Dorante now promised Cliton not to lie any more, or at least to give a signal when he did. He immediately lied by saying that the rumor of his fight with Alcippe was true and that the unfortunate challenger had been left for dead. He lied again when he claimed that the secret of Alcippe's recovery lay in the magic of a Hebrew word. Hebrew, he claimed, was one of his ten languages. He lied also to Sabine, the servant, in order to get back in Lucrece's good graces, and he invented new names so that his father could send his daughter in law his good wishes, the duped father was pleased to learn a grandchild was even now six months along. His lies were met by counter lies told by the clever Sabine, who lied for money and kept herself in constant employment by delivering letters and arranging assignations.

By now neither Dorante, Lucrece, nor Clarice knew whom they loved. Clarice declared herself in favor of Alcippe, whose father finally settled the marriage arrangements. Dorante then observed that she had only been flirtatious and curious, while the real Lucrece—he declared that he had fallen in love with a name and henceforth changed only the face to fit it—was much deeper. The father declaring as he did so that he would never again help his scoundrel of a son, arranged quite docilely for his marriage. Lucrece, who swore she would love the liar when she could believe him, was suddenly converted to belief when she saw that his avowals were true in spirit. Cliton, of course, knew as much all along.

THE METAMORPHOSES

Type of work Collection of narrative poems

Author Ovid (Publius Ovidius Naso, 43 B.C. A.D. 18)

First transcribed Before A.D. 8

Unlike most Greek and Roman authors, Ovid wrote almost entirely to entertain. The tone of the literature of the ancient world, whether written by Greeks or Romans, is ordinarily edifying, but that tradition Ovid discarded. For this reason, and because of the subject matter of Ovid's Ars amatoria (Art of Love), Europeans and Americans have usually been doubtful of Ovid's true literary stature. Anyone who has read Ovid seriously will usually agree, however, that to take his writings as they were intended—to entertain—opens the door to granting his writings a conspicuous place in Roman literature.

The Metamorphoses is generally conceded to be Ovid's finest work. In this collection of poems Ovid managed to draw together artistically most of the stories of Greek and Roman legend. More than two hundred of the myths of the ancient world have been rendered into an organic work, the unifying theme being that of transformation from one kind to another: as Jove changed himself into a swan, Narcissus was transformed into a flower, Tereus was turned into a bird, and Midas was given the ears of an ass. These stories were arranged by Ovid into fifteen books, containing in the original Latin almost twelve thousand lines of sweetly flowing verse written in the dactylic hexameters common in classical poetry. The poems were written when Ovid was a mature man of perhaps fifty, shortly before Augustus Caesar banished him to the little town of Tomi on the shores of the Black Sea, far from the city that Ovid loved. Although Ovid wrote that he destroyed his own copy of the Metamorphoses, apparently because he was dissatisfied with his performance, he also seemed to feel that the work would live after him. In his epilogue to the Metamorphoses he wrote

Now I have done my work. It will endure,
I trust beyond Jove's anger, fire, and sword
Beyond Time's hunger. The day will come, I know,
So let it come, that day which has no power

Save over my body, to end my span of life
Whatever it may be. Still, part of me,
The better part, immortal, will be borne
Above the stars: my name will be remembered
Wherever Roman power rules conquered lands,
I shall be read and through all centuries
If prophecies of bards are ever truthful,
I shall be living, always.

As if it were necessary for a work of literary art to have some edifying or moral purpose, the poems have sometimes been regarded primarily as a useful handbook on Greek and Roman mythology. Certainly the work does contain a wealth of the ancient legends, and many later writers have become famous in part because they were able to build on the materials Ovid put at their disposal. However, the Metamorphoses deserves remembrance as a work of art in its own right.

Modern writers view stories about the gods of the pagan Pantheon in a different light from that in which such tales were regarded in the time of Ovid and Augustus Caesar. Where we can smile, Ovid's light, even facetious, tone must have been regarded by serious Romans as having more than a little touch of blasphemy. Perhaps his irreverent attitudes may even have been a partial cause for his exile: for rulers have always been sensitive people and Augustus was at the time attempting moral reforms. It must be kept in mind, too, that Ovid, after treating good humoredly of the other gods, turned at the end of the Metamorphoses to describe the transformation of Julius Caesar to godhood. How seriously he meant to be taken, from the tone of the poem, is open to question.

Ovid began the collection with a description of how the universe came into being with the metamorphosis of Chaos, the unshaped stuff, into Cosmos, the ordered universe. Having described how the Lord of Creation, "Whatever god it was," established order in the universe, he proceeded to give a picture of the four ages. Like other ancients, Ovid had a different concept of the past from that of modern times. He began his account with the Golden Age, when justice and right existed everywhere, when law and punishment were absent because they were unnecessary. When Saturn was sent to the land of shadowy death, wrote Ovid, and Jove became chief of the gods, then came the Age of Silver, when men first built houses to guard themselves against the seasons and planted fields to provide themselves with a harvest. Next came the Age of Bronze, when warlike instincts and aggression came into being, to be succeeded in its turn by the Iron Age, when modesty, truth, and righteousness were displaced by trickery, violence, and swindling. So bad was this age that Jove struck down the living and nature brought forth a new race of men who were, as Ovid put it, "men of blood." Of this race, all except Deucalion and Pyrrha, a righteous man and woman, were wiped from the face of the earth by Jove, who with Neptune's aid caused a flood to cover the globe. Ovid's stories of the Creation and the Flood, told in a pagan environment, are strikingly similar to the stories of the same phenomena told, in keeping with Judaic tradition, in the Old Testament.

Much of Ovid's poetry in the Metamorphoses deals with love. It is not romanticized, sentimentalized love that Ovid presented, however, for he recognized the physical reality of men and women for one another, and his gods and goddesses exhibit human passions. In love, as Ovid described it, there is often found a strain of cruelty and brutality, the veneer of civilization is thin enough to let his readers sense the savagery of violence, revenge, and cruelty underlying human culture. In this connection one recalls Lycaon boiling and broiling the flesh of a human hostage before the altar of Jove, Tereus raping Philomela and then cutting out her tongue to keep the deed a secret, a satyr being flayed alive by Apollo, the son of Latona, for trying to surpass him at playing the flute, sixteen-year old Athys having his face battered to mere splinters of bone by Perseus, and Pelias' daughters' letting their father's blood at the behest of Medea. In these stories gory details are described in the account of each brutal act, brains, blood, broken bones, and screams of agony and hate fill the lines. Love and hate, both powerful, basic human emotions, are close in Ovid's Metamorphoses.

Mere enumeration does not do Ovid's collection of stories in the Metamorphoses the justice it deserves. Practically every phase of the Graeco-Roman mythology is at least represented in the fifteen divisions of the work. The stories are artfully drawn together with consummate skill. Yet the noteworthy fact in assessing Ovid's mastery of his materials and craft is that he himself was a skeptic who did not believe in these stories as being true in the sense of really having happened. Without the sincerity of belief, he nevertheless wrote in such a way that he induces in the reader that mood which Coleridge, almost two thousand years later, described as the "willing suspension of disbelief."

Ovid placed in his pages believable personalities. His men and women, his gods and goddesses, hate and love as human beings have always done. The twentieth-century reader recognizes in himself the same surges and flows of emotion that he finds in Ovid's poetry. Our world is, in this way, little different from the Roman empire of Ovid and Augustus, despite technological advances.

Another element of Ovid's style that comes through in translation is the large amount of specific detail. At almost any point in the Metamorphoses there is a vivid picture of the people or the action, as when Myrrha, in "Cinyras and Myrrha," flings herself, face down, to cry into her pillow, when Pygmalion lavishes gifts of pet birds, sea shells, lilies, and lumps of precious amber on his beloved statue, or when Dorylas, in "The Battle of the Centaurs," is wounded by Peleus and dies trailing his entrails, treading and tangling them with his centaur's hoofs. We are reminded in such stories that Ovid's Rome had a culture that included not only greatness in art but also the grim and bloody scenes of death by violence within the confines of the arena at the Coliseum

MID-CHANNEL

Type of work Drama

Author Arthur Wing Pinero (1855-1934)

Time c 1900

Locale London

First presented 1909

Principal characters

THEODORE BLUNDELL, a stockbroker

ZOE BLUNDELL, his wife

LEONARD FERRIS, Zoe's friend

ETHEL PIERPOINT, Zoe's protégée

Realistic drama tends to depend upon motivational interrelationships of characters within a specific environment or society for its impact. Henrik Ibsen, by his careful and selective writing and arrangement, made a place for realism in the modern theater. Believability of character was important, but more significant was the door that Nora slammed at the end of Ibsen's A Doll's House (1879). Its impact was heard around the world. Thereafter a new and important use was to be made of the theater, and the social thesis play became a recognized and valuable adjunct to the literature of the stage.

By the end of the nineteenth century many playwrights were following Ibsen's example. Henry Arthur Jones, Arthur Wing Pinero, Bernard Shaw, and others cast their works in the selectively realistic mold of the Norwegian. The success of these writers and the durability of their works depend on their language and characterization, not on their plots, many of which are remarkably similar. Upon reading the plays of Pinero and Jones, in particular, one is struck by their old-fashioned language and by their stereotyped characters. On the other hand, Shaw's brittle wit and absolute addiction to the language itself keeps his plays as fresh and true today as when they were written.

Pinero, writing concurrently with Shaw in an England that was still relatively ignorant of modern drama achieved, in 1893 his first real success with The Second Mrs. Tanqueray which remains his most durable play. He became known as a craftsman of the well-made play, chiefly concerned with social commentary. However, time has heightened a certain pretentiousness in his plays and in his concern with what were then accepted as ultrarealistic characters.

Pinero's plays depend heavily upon plot complications rather than the inevitability of circumstance for their action. What should seem headlong and unavoidable is rather a series of deviously contrived twists of storytelling designed to keep the spectator at all times interested. Pretentiously tragic, his plays now seem merely melodramatic. The transparent and pat endings remove the total impact of a higher, more energizing form of theater; resolutions are mechanical and forced.

The late nineteenth century dramatists were unconsciously setting a trap for their successors, for the melodramatic form which they evolved almost automatically continues to harass playwrights to this day. Escapes from it have been few. Shaw managed because of his wit, deliberate artifice, and a rebellious spirit.

Those who inadvertently copied Ibsen in search of tragedy were almost invariably doomed to conventions of theme and situation

Mid Channel appeared in 1909, after Pinero had written a series of successes that began with The Second Mrs Tanqueray in 1893. As theater, it abounds in plot complications and moral preachments which make for interest but remove a unifying force from the play. The central character, Zoe Blundell, does contribute a certain cohesiveness, but because of the monotony of Pinero's prose, interest in her lags.

Zoe and Theodore Blundell are wealthy and fashionable, but their marriage is in mid channel, there is little love in their relationship, and there are no children. To amuse herself, Zoe has taken on a series of men younger than she, whom she calls her tame robins. They squire her about in the social world and sip endless cups of tea while they amuse and entertain her. One of them, Leonard Ferris, makes the mistake of falling in love with her. She and Theodore finally agree to separate after another of their petty quarrels, and when Zoe goes to Italy to forget, Leonard follows her. Theodore takes a mistress during her absence.

When Zoe returns in bad health, a mutual friend tries to effect a reconciliation, but the old bickering begins again, making an adult relationship impossible.

In the meantime Zoe's young friend, Ethel Pierpoint, has confessed her love for Leonard. Leonard, on the rebound from Zoe, goes to Ethel and they plan marriage. Zoe admits having had an affair with Leonard while they were in Italy, and Theodore swears that he will divorce Zoe and force Leonard to marry her. When Zoe finds that Leonard is committed to Ethel, she ends it all by throwing herself from an upstairs window in her estranged husband's flat.

Zoe has some fascination as a tormented character. Wealthy and spoiled, childless and unhappy, she presents a rather touching picture of a woman approaching middle age who has never fulfilled her place as wife and mother. Yet she seems constantly at fault and unable to control herself as a social being. Interesting relationships exist between Zoe and her tame robins. They are her favorites until they become involved with other women, then, petulantly and jealously, they are dismissed. She exerts considerable control over them, while they, spineless and lacking in ambition, do her bidding.

Zoe and Theodore are characters caught in a circumstance of their own making. They are in mid channel and must go one way or the other, or sink. They are both pictured as intelligent people, aware of their own shortcomings, yet they seem powerless to do anything about their failing marriage. Pride, ambition, thoughtlessness, and coldness all enter into their union, but on a petty, commonplace level. They are people of few redeeming qualities except for charm and money.

Zoe's suicide at the end of the play is an action difficult to explain in the light of all that has gone before. Pinero suggests that she has no choice, having been provided with all the possibilities for happiness but finding herself unable to use them. Actually, it is more Pinero the playwright than Zoe the character who has no choice but to come to this ending. Ibsen might have left it all unresolved, with the events of the future left to the imagination of the viewer, but with careful hints presented along the way to suggest other possibilities. But in the English theater of sensibility, a satisfactory conclusion to all entanglements was demanded. Theatergoers were not yet ready to face reality unless it condoned a fulfillment of moral obligations. The realistic form was a new and foreign thing, provocative and unpleasant, its redeeming feature was the lesson it taught.

As a stylist, Pinero lacked the technique of handling the inevitability of action in his plots. Circumstances invented rarely have as much force and impact as circumstances which inevitably flow from other events. Predictable actions are never as convincing as actions that arise from character itself. Zoe is, ultimately, an unsuccessful character because she reacts within a carefully structured framework, lacking the motivations that make for believability and importance as an individual caught up in an unavoidable turmoil.

MISCELLANIES

Type of work Poetry

Author Abraham Cowley (1618-1667)

First published 1656

Abraham Cowley and his works are difficult to classify. Cowley himself was essentially a pre-Restoration poet, but his verse does not fit well into the classifications normally made of poetry in the period between 1600 and 1660. At various times his work has been compared to that of John Donne and John Milton. The comparison of Cowley's poetry to Donne's has been made because of the conceits to be found in both, to Milton's because of Cowley's use of Biblical subject matter in his Davidis, an unfinished epic poem.

Most representative of Cowley's work is the 1656 edition titled Miscellanyes, a volume published shortly after the poet's return to England from France. Cowley, dispossessed of his fellowship at Cambridge University, had joined friends among the followers of Charles I at Oxford during the early years of the Civil War. When many of the Royalists fled to France, Cowley was among them. In exile he assisted the English queen in her correspondence with the king in England. The Miscellanyes volume, according to Cowley's preface, was an attempt on his part to preserve in print all his poetical works that he considered worth keeping for posterity. His avowed motivation was that he intended to write no more verse, and he wished to publish his own edition, lest after his death an edition containing spurious or inferior writings be foisted upon the public, as had already happened in the cases of Shakespeare, Fletcher, and Jonson.

The Miscellanyes consists of four parts. The first is a collection of poems on a variety of themes, some written when Cowley was quite young; the second includes the poems Cowley had published earlier as The Mistress, a series dealing with love in various aspects; the third part he labeled Pindarique Odes, translations from Pindar and free imitations in English of that poet's work; the fourth and last portion of the volume contains the four books of the Davidis.

In the first section there are odes on wit, on the king's return from Scotland, on Prometheus, on the pleasures of wine over the pangs of love, on friendship, and also imitations, in English, of both Horace and Martial. A light but pleasant poem is "The Chronicle," an example of vers de societe dealing with the experiences of a young man in love with a long series of young women. Of note also is a poem celebrating the publication of the first two books of Sir William Davenant's Gondibert (1651). The best, certainly the sincerest poems of the Miscellanyes group, are those written on the deaths of persons the poet had known and respected in life. The most outstanding of these is "On the Death of Mr. William Hervey." Although the poem may seem to the twentieth-century reader extravagant in its tone, diction, and imagery, it compares favorably with the best elegiac poetry of the time. Other elegiac poems in the collection are those on Sir Henry Wotton, Mr. Jordan, a master at Westminster School, Van Dyck, the painter, and Richard Crashaw, the poet Of little interest, other than historic, are some English paraphrases of Anacreon

Most critics have been less inclined to favor The Mistress, or Several Copies of Love Verses, first published in 1647 and included in the Miscellanies Like much of the love poetry of the earlier part of the seventeenth century, The Mistress is bound too closely by conventions in many respects It supposedly deals with a courtship and the lady's reception of the suit over a period of three years That Cowley actually loved a woman of higher social rank and courted her with this poetry is doubtful, for the suffering lover, the stand offish lady of higher degree, and extravagant protestations of love are typical of the love poetry of the time—usually mere convention Cowley's unusual figures of speech, written apparently under the influence of John Donne, have until recent years been the target of critics With the revived interest and renewed sympathy for the metaphysical poets and their techniques, however, Cowley's exercise of his exceptionally learned and fertile fancy has been viewed less stringently In this section the poem entitled "The Spring" represents Cowley at his best, while "Written in Juice of Lemmon" shows him at his poorer level of performance

For about a century the ode, particularly the Pindaric ode as it was established by Cowley, was a favorite verse form among English poets and poetasters until the eighteenth century when Dr Samuel Johnson, literary arbiter of the era, pronounced against it Undoubtedly the freedom of meter exercised by Cowley in his Pindarique Odes and introduced by him was a decisive factor in the popularity of the form, for as they were written by Cowley the odes appear deceptively easy Current literary opinion is against Cowley's odes, declaring them too flat and imitative

The last portion of the Miscellanies is taken up with the unfinished Davidis, four of the twelve books originally planned on the model of the Aeneid Cowley's strong religious convictions led him to choose the figure of David, traditional ancestor of Jesus, as the hero for an epic poem In these four books he packed much of his learning, often in wide and only loosely connected digressions Critics have argued the fitness of the subject, Cowley himself seems to have changed his mind about its suitability, since he left the work unfinished

As he announced in the preface to the Miscellanies, Cowley wrote almost no poetry after publication of that edition In the twentieth century his poetry attracts little attention beyond that given by students of literature The poems seem to have little to say to modern readers that has not been said better by other poets

MISS LONELYHEARTS

Type of work Novel

Author Nathanael West (Nathan Weinstein, 1903? 1940)

Type of plot Social satire

Time of plot Late 1920's

Locale New York City

First published 1933

Principal characters

MISS LONELYHEARTS, an advice-to-the-lovelorn columnist on the New York Post-Dispatch

BETTY, his girl friend

WILLIE SHRIKE, the paper's feature editor, his boss

MARY SHRIKE, the boss's wife

MISS LONELYHEARTS by Nathanael West By permission of the publishers Farrar Straus & Cudahy Inc Copyright 1933, by Nathanael West.

Critique

If it took seventeen years after his early death for the works of Nathanael West to achieve either critical or popular success, one may say with some assurance that the present acclaim is on fairly solid ground. Of the four novels in his Complete Works (1957), Miss Lonelyhearts is regarded most highly. Bitter in its satire, brief, episodic and unique in its treatment, ironic and hopeless in its outlook, Miss Lonelyhearts is not so much a tale of newspapering as it is West's grotesque picture of the miserable, monstrous, often disgusting life man has made for himself in his despair.

The Story

Miss Lonelyhearts found it hard to write his lovelorn column in the New York Post Dispatch; the letters were not funny, there was no humor as desperate people begged for help. Sick of it all, for example, with seven children in twelve years, was pregnant again and ill, but being a Catholic she could not consider an abortion and her husband would not let her alone. Desperate, a sixteen year old girl, a good dancer with a good shape and pretty clothes, would like boy friends, but cried all day at the big hole in the middle of her face (should she commit suicide?), Harold S., fifteen, wrote that his sister Gracie, thirteen, deaf, dumb, and not very smart, had something dirty done to her by a man, but Harold could not tell their mother. Gracie was going to have a baby because her mother would beat her up. Shrike, the feature editor and Miss Lonelyhearts' tormentor, was no help at all instead of the same old stuff, he said, Miss Lonelyhearts ought to give his readers something new and hopeful.

At Delehanty's speak easy where Miss Lonelyhearts went to escape his problems, his boss still belabored him about brooding and told him to forget the Crucifixion and remember the Renaissance. Meanwhile, he was trying to seduce Miss Far kis a long legged woman with a childish face. He also taunted the columnist by talking of a Western sect which praved for a condemned slayer with an adding machine, numbers being their idea of the universal language.

Miss Lonelyhearts' bedroom walls were bare except for an ivory Christ nailed with large spikes, and the religious figure combined in a dream with a snake whose scales were tiny mirrors in which the dead world took on a semblance of life. First he was a magician who could not move his audience by tricks or prayer, then he was on a drunken college spree with two friends. Their attempt to sacrifice a lamb before barbecuing it, with Miss Lonelyhearts chanting the name of Christ, miscarried when the blade broke on the altar and the lamb slipped out of their bloodied hands. When the others refused to go back to put the lamb out of its misery, Miss Lonelyhearts returned and crushed its head with a stone.

One day, as he tried to put things in order, everything went against him: pencils broke, buttons rolled under the bed, shades refused to stay down, and instead of order on the skyline he found chaos. Miss Lonelyhearts remembered Betty, who could bring order into his world, and he went to her apartment. But he realized that her world was not the world and could never include the readers of his column; his confusion was significant and her order was not. Irritated and fidgety, he could neither talk to her nor caress her, although two months before she had agreed to marry him. When she asked if he were sick, he could only shout at her when she said she loved him, he could only reply that he loved her and her smiling through tears. Sobbing that she felt swell before he came and now felt lousy, she asked him to go away.

At Delehanty's he listened to talk of raping a woman writer, and as he got drunker he heard friends mock Shrike's kidding him, but whiskey made him feel good and dreams of childhood made the world dance. Stepping back from the bar, he collided with a man holding a beer. The man punched him in the mouth. With a lump on his head, a loose tooth and a cut lip, Miss Lonelyhearts walked in the fresh air with Ned Gates. In a comfort station they met an old man with a terrible cough and no overcoat, who carried a cane and wore gloves because he detested red hands. They forced him to go to an Italian wine cellar. There they told him they were Havelock Ellis and Krafft-Ebing and insultingly mocked him with taunts of his homosexuality. When Miss Lonelyhearts twisted his arm—imagining it was the arm of Desperate, Brokenhearted, or Sick of it all—the old man screamed, and someone hit the columnist with a chair.

Instead of going to the office after Shrike phoned him, Miss Lonelyhearts went to the speak easy, he knew Shrike found him too perfect a butt for his jokes to fire him. Needing a woman, he phoned Mary, Shrike's wife, whom he had never seduced, although she hated her husband and used Miss Lonelyhearts to arouse Shrike. At a night club, in a cab, and at her apartment door, Miss Lonelyhearts tried to talk Mary into sleeping with him, but Shrike opened the door, ending that scheme.

The next day Miss Lonelyhearts received a letter from Fay Doyle, unhappily married to a cripple, asking for an appointment. Although he first threw the letter away, he retrieved it, phoned her to meet him in the park, and took her to his apartment. In the intervals of making love, she told of her married life and her child Lucy, whose father was not Doyle.

Physically sick and exhausted in his room for three days, he was comforted by Betty, who tried to get him to quit his Lonelyhearts job. He said he had taken the job as a joke, but after several months the joke had escaped him. Pleas for help made him examine his values and he became the victim of the joke. While Betty suggested he go to the country with her, Shrike broke into the room, taunted him to escape to the South Seas, hedonism, art, suicide, or drugs, and ended by dictating an imaginary letter from the columnist to Christ.

After he had been ill for a week, Betty finally persuaded Miss Lonelyhearts to go with her to her aunt's Connecticut farm. They camped in the kitchen, sat near a pond to watch frogs, deer, and a fawn, and slept on a mattress on the floor. They walked in the woods, swam in the nude, and made love in the grass.

After several days they returned to the city. Miss Lonelyhearts knew that Betty had failed to cure him, he could not forget the letters. He vowed to attempt to be humble. In the office he found a lengthy letter from Broad Shoulders, telling of her troubles with a crazy husband.

About a week later, while Shrike was pulling the same familiar jokes in Delehantry's, the bartender introduced Miss Lonelyhearts to Peter Doyle, a cripple whose wife wanted the columnist to have dinner at their house. After labored conversation, Doyle gave him a letter about his problems: he must pull his leg up and down stairs for $22.50 a week, his wife talked money, money, money, a doctor prescribed a six months' rest. When their hands touched under the table, they were at first embarrassed, but then held hands in silence.

As they left the speak easy, very drunk, to go to Doyle's, the cripple cursed his wife and his foot. Miss Lonelyhearts was happy in his humility. When Mrs. Doyle tried to seduce the columnist, he failed to respond. Meanwhile, her husband called himself a pump and at his wife's request went out to get gun. Failing to find a message to show Mrs. Doyle her husband loved her, and disgusted by her obscene attempts to get him to sleep with her, Miss Lonelyhearts struck her again and again before he ran out of the house.

Following a three days' illness, Miss

Lonelyhearts was awakened by five people, including Shrike and his wife, all drunk, who wanted to take him to a party at the editor's home. Betty was one of the party. Shrike wanted to play a game in which he distributed letters from Miss Lonelyhearts' office file and made taunting comments. When the columnist could stand it no longer, he followed Betty out, dropping unread the letter given him, which Shrike read to the crowd. It was from Doyle, accusing Miss Lonelyhearts of trying to rape the cripple's wife.

Miss Lonelyhearts told Betty he had quit the Lonelyhearts job and was going to look for work in an advertising agency. She told him she was going to have a baby. Although he persuaded her to marry him and have the baby instead of an abortion, by the time he left her he did not feel guilty, he did not feel, in fact, for his feeling, conscience, sense of reality, and self knowledge were like a rock.

The next morning he was in a fever. The Christ on his wall was shining, but everything else in the room seemed dead. When the bell rang and he saw Doyle coming up the stairs, he imagined the cripple had come to have Miss Lonelyhearts perform a miracle and make him whole. Misunderstanding the outspread arms, Doyle put his hand in a newspaper wrapped package as Betty came in the door. In the struggle the gun Doyle carried went off and Miss Lonelyhearts fell, dragging the cripple with him.

MITHRIDATE

Type of work Drama

Author Jean Baptiste Racine (1639-1699)

Type of plot Historical tragedy

Time of plot First century B.C.

Locale Nymphaeae on the Bosphorus

First presented 1673

Principal characters

MITHRIDATE, King of Pontus

MONIME, betrothed to Mithridate and already declared queen

PHARNACE, and

XIPHARES, sons of Mithridate by different wives

ARBATE, Mithridate's confidant and governor of Nymphaeae

PHOEDIME, Monime's confidante

ARCAS, a servant

Critique

Presenting a theme borrowed from history, Mithridate is a tragedy which conforms absolutely to Racine's literary ideal: a simple action with few events. In this work Racine was much more faithful to actual fact than he had been in his earlier plays. He simply added a love story to the historical pageant to turn it into a drama: an old man in love with a young woman and jealous of his two sons. The two main characters are interesting in their complexity. Mithridate offers a contrast between the indomitable will power of the warrior and the blindness and confusion of the unhappy lover. Monime seems to combine harmoniously all the gentleness and strength of Racine's heroines. The style is versatile. Rhetorical and sometimes epic in Mithridate's speech, it also takes on an exquisite softness to express the subtlest shades of sentiments. Mithridate is the only one of Racine's tragedies with a happy ending.

The Story

Mithridate, the Pontine king who had been fighting against the Romans for forty years, had just been defeated and was believed dead Xiphares, the son who was, like his father, an enemy of Rome, deplored sincerely the loss of Mithridate The other son, Pharnace, favorable to the Romans, was all the more pleased because he was in love with Monime, the old king's betrothed now he hoped to win her for himself

Xiphares had told Arbate that he had no claims to the states Pharnace was to inherit and that his brother's feelings toward the Romans were of little interest to him His concern for Monime was an other matter The truth was that Xiphares himself had long been in love with Monime, even before his father saw her Although he had remained silent as long as she was betrothed to his father, he was now determined that Pharnace would be compelled to kill him in order to have her

When Monime begged Xiphares to protect her against Pharnace, whom she did not love, Xiphares finally declared his love to her At first he was afraid that she might receive his avowal with anger Monime, however, was secretly in love with Xiphares They might have opened their hearts to each other at that time if Pharnace had not appeared

Pharnace urged Monime to support his cause in Pontus She thanked him but explained that she could not favor a friend of the Romans who had killed her father When Pharnace hinted that another interest was prompting her, Xiphares confirmed his suspicions by defending Monime's freedom The brothers then realized that they were rivals

At that moment Phœdime, Monime's confidante, arrived to tell them that the report of Mithridate's death was false and that the king was returning Monime and Xiphares, each having sensed at last the other's feelings, were stunned Monime deliberately bade them farewell and left Now Pharnace knew that Monime and Xiphares loved each other, and Xiphares knew that Pharnace loved Monime and was expecting the arrival of the Romans Both, afraid of their father's anger, would be forced to keep each other's secret when they met him

After everyone had gone to meet Mithridate at the harbor, Phœdime was surprised to find Monime still in the palace Monime explained her realization that Xiphares had suffered as much as she did all the time they had been separated after their first meeting in Greece Aware that she had betrayed her love without even speaking, she felt that she could never see Xiphares again because she also feared Mithridate's anger She left hurriedly because she heard the noise of Mithridate's arrival and she did not want to face him

The king was surprised to find his sons in Nymphée instead of in their own states Suspiciously, he asked whether they were in love with Monime and inquired of Arbate why he had allowed them to enter the city The governor told him that Pharnace had declared his love to Monime Arbate said nothing, however, about Xiphares' feelings Mithridate, relieved that his favorite son had remained faithful, was afraid that Monime might have responded to Pharnace's love At that moment Monime appeared and he asked to be left alone with her Mithridate told her that he wished to have their wedding performed as soon as possible Seeing her sad resignation and suspecting that she was in love with Pharnace, he summoned Xiphares and asked his trusted son to try to turn her affections away from his brother

Xiphares also feared that Monime might love Pharnace Aware of his fear, Monime was unable to hide her true feelings At the same time she declared her intention to follow her duty to Mithridate

A short time later Mithridate called for his two sons and explained to them his plan to attack the Romans in Italy Pharnace would leave on a mission to the Parthians, his purpose being to marry the daughter of their king, with whom Mith

ridate wished to make an alliance necessary to his plans. When Pharnace refused, his resistance aroused his father's anger. Pharnace, thinking that his brother had betrayed him, tried to get revenge by disclosing the love of Xiphare for Monime.

At first Mithridate refused to listen to Pharnace. Then, tortured by jealousy, he resorted to a stratagem in order to learn the truth. He announced to Monime his desire to have her marry Xiphare. When she showed surprise, asking if he were trying to test her love, he pretended to believe that she wanted to marry Pharnace instead. He declared that he would go with Xiphare to find death in battle, while she would stay with Pharnace. Monime, misled by the king's apparent sincerity, admitted that she loved Xiphare and was loved by him. After her departure Mithridate prepared to take a terrible revenge on his son.

When Xiphare came to bid Monime farewell, she accused herself of having caused his ruin by her weakness. Hearing the king approaching, he left hurriedly. Monime then reproached Mithridate for his infamous stratagem. Ordered to marry him at once, she gently but firmly refused.

At that point Mithridate was in a quandary over killing Xiphare, the son who was not only his rival in love but also his best ally against the Romans. While he was debating with himself, Arbate appeared with the announcement that Pharnace, aided by the Romans, had risen in revolt. Believing that Xiphare had also betrayed him, the king ordered Arcas, his faithful servant, to kill Monime.

Meanwhile, convinced that Xiphare was dead, Monime had attempted to strangle herself, but Phaedra had prevented her. Still wishing to die, she welcomed the poison Arcas brought her. Before she could drink it, however, Arbate came on the run and took the potion away from her. He brought word that Xiphare had routed the Romans and that Mithridate was dying. The king, believing himself defeated, had chosen to die by his own sword.

Forgetting all jealousy, Mithridate blessed Monime and Xiphare, the faithful son who would succeed to the throne and avenge his father's death.

THE MOCK ASTROLOGER

Type of work Drama

Author Pedro Calderón de la Barca (1600-1681)

Type of plot Farce

Time of plot Seventeenth century

Locale Madrid

First presented c. 1624

Principal characters

MARIA a girl of Madrid

JUAN DE MEDRANO an impoverished young nobleman

DON CARLOS his friend

DON DIEGO, a wealthy nobleman in love with Maria

MORON, his servant

BEATRIZ, Maria's servant

LEONARDO, Maria's father

DOÑA VIOLANTE a woman in love with Juan

Critique

If Lope de Vega wrote plays at an early age, Calderón was no less precocious. When his El mejor amigo, el muerto (Death, the Best Friend) was published in 1657, it was announced as the work of a nine-year-old boy. And in his letter of 1680 to his friend the Duke of Veragua, he stated that El carro del cielo

(Cart of Heaven) was completed when he was thirteen. Very likely he was practicing the art of playwriting before he was graduated from the University of Salamanca in 1619—certainly immediately afterward. At any rate, Hartzbusch dates The Mock Astrologer before 1622 because of its mingling of Tirso de Molina and Lope de Vega, and all critics put it before 1625, when Calderón went into military service. Because of the many pirated copies by publishers and actors, it quickly appeared in several authorized versions before being included, with additional scenes, in Part II of his Collected Plays in 1637, a volume reissued posthumously by Calderón's friend, Juan de Vera Tassis, in 1682. In this satire on grafters and impostors there is no deep philosophy and little beyond a fast-moving farce. The first scene of Act II provides a good sample of the belabored language of Gongorism as Diego pleads his love in baroque style and María replies in language no less flowery and figurative. Only the servant brings the speakers down to earth. There is no moral lesson, unless Morón's insistence that one cannot trust a woman with a secret is so regarded.

The Story

Looking from the balcony of her Madrid home, María watched Juan de Medrano ride by, courting her from a distance as he had been doing for two years, and she was moved to confess to her servant Beatriz that she much preferred him to the more aggressive Don Diego. But Juan was at last tired of seeing María only at a distance. That afternoon he came to call, with the excuse that next day he was leaving for the wars in Flanders. María postponed their farewells until that night, when Beatriz would bring Juan to her mistress' room.

Don Diego, also deciding on direct action, next arrived with a highly rhetorical demand for her affections. Claiming inability to understand his proposal, María turned him down in the same kind of jargon. Angered, Don Diego directed his servant Morón to try to learn from Beatriz how his mistress might be approached. Though the gift of a gold chain did not open her mouth, the gracioso knew she would in time tell him every thing.

Juan had another secret. He wanted his friend Don Carlos to spread the story of his departure for the army, while really providing him with lodgings. The first step was to send his farewells to Doña Violante, an errand gladly performed by Don Carlos because with Juan away he thought he could win the lady for himself.

The next morning, as she was sneaking Juan out of María's house, materialistic Beatriz reflected on how silly aristocratic ladies were. They would not be seen talking to a man on the street for fear of gossip, instead, they entertained him secretly in their rooms. But this time the secret was not kept. Morón wormed out of Beatriz all the details of Juan's visit and ran with them to his master. Don Diego elaborated on the story while passing it on to his friend Antonio, and it grew greater as the latter tried to get the true facts from Don Carlos. Exasperated and resentful, Don Diego decided to confront María and levy on her affections.

When Don Diego mentioned Juan's nocturnal visit to María, the girl was sure that her servant had gossiped indiscreetly. To protect Beatriz, whom he loved, Morón explained that Don Diego was an astrologer who could summon up demons and who knew the past and the future. Don Diego did not deny this claim. In fact, when María's father Leonardo came up to them, he was predicting an impoverished husband for her. The father, having had experiences with magicians, did not believe in them, and he would have unmasked Don Diego if Morón had not cleverly saved his master from disclosure.

Don Diego's friends, passing on the story, convinced Doña Violante of Don

Diego's powers, and she begged him to materialize the absent Juan. To his protest that his power could not cross water, she replied that, according to a letter just delivered by Don Carlos, he was in Zaragoza. At Don Diego's prompting, Doña Violante wrote Juan a letter inviting him to visit her. The note mysteriously delivered by Don Carlos, brought Juan to her house. There he frightened her and he himself became thoroughly confused, since he knew nothing about the pretended astrologer.

Juan was more eager than ever to see Maria. Since Leonardo did not know him, he presented himself as a friend of Leonardo's brother, just arrived from Zaragoza. Maria gave him a ribbon with a costly pin and told him to sell it in order to provide himself with spending money. Then, scheming to bring him back to her, she told her father that the pin had been stolen. Leonardo hurried to consult Don Diego. Since Beatriz had already babbled the new developments to Moron, Don Diego appeared to have miraculous powers, and Leonardo went in search of Juan. Discovered and fearing for Maria's reputation, Juan confessed to the theft. Angered, Leonardo refused Juan's request to marry Maria.

His supposed magic prowess brought Don Diego nothing but trouble. Even his servant was claiming a share in his strange powers and was trying to send another servant on an aerial journey to his home town. Then Don Diego angered Doña Violante by refusing her a spell that would kill Juan and Maria. Meanwhile, he was no further advanced in his own courtship. The conflicting prophesies he had given, hoping that some might come true, caused everyone to turn against him. Then Beatriz explained how he had secured his information. Finally, the mock astrologer renounced all claims to magic powers, but not before he had accomplished one good deed. His action in the jewel robbery reunited Maria and Juan after the whole truth had been revealed.

MONKEY

Type of work Novel

Author Wu Ch'eng en (c. 1505 c. 1580)

Type of plot Fantasy

Time of plot Seventh century

Locale China, India, and various mythical regions

First published Sixteenth century

Principal characters

MONKEY, a monster with miraculous powers

BUDDHA, the founder of Buddhism and Lord of the Western Paradise

KWAN YIN, a Bodhisattva (commonly known as the Goddess of Mercy)

HSUAN TSANG (TRIPITAKA), a Chinese Buddhist priest

T'AI TSUNG, the great Chinese emperor of the Tang Dynasty

PIGSY, and

SANDY, monsters, Tripitaka's disciples

Critique

Known in Chinese as the Hsi Yu Chi (Record of a Journey to the West), Monkey was inspired by the pilgrimage of the Chinese priest Hsuan Tsang to India in the seventh century. Except for the priest and a few other historical personages, the novel is fantastic, with the whole mythical universe as its background. It is interpreted as a satire, with the rebellious monkey against the bureaucratic heavenly government, and as an allegory, a Buddhist Pilgrim's Progress. For centuries, however, the Chinese, adults and children alike, have loved this absurd story of monsters simply because of its imagination, humor, and profound nonsense. Arthur Waley has translated thirty out of the original one hundred chapters, omitting many of the calamities the pilgrim and his disciples encountered. The story before the start of the pilgrimage is preserved almost in its entirety and this alone makes interesting reading. Wu Ch'eng'en was a sixteenth century magistrate as well as a novelist.

MONKEY by Wu Cheng en. Translated by Arthur Waley. By permission of the publishers. The John Day Co., Inc. Copyright 1943 by The John Day Co., Inc.

The Story

In the beginning there was a rock. The rock gave birth to a stone egg and the egg developed into the shape of a monkey. The monkey became alive and played with other monkeys. He was made their king.

One day, troubled by the thought of death, he bade farewell to the monkey tribe and set out on a journey to seek immortality. He became a pupil of the Patriarch Subodhi, from whom he learned seventy-two transformations and the cloud trapeze. When he showed off his newly learned magic of transformation by changing into a pine tree, this public display of magic enraged his master, who disowned him. Monkey went back to his cave. But now he did not have to travel over mountains and rivers. One leap carried him head over heels a hundred and eight thousand leagues.

He killed the demon who had molested his "little ones" during his absence. He got the magic iron staff from the Sea Treasury of the Dragon King. The weapon could reduce, at his will, to the size of an embroidery needle. In spite of all these powers, however, his allotted life span of 342 years had come to an end. In a dream he was taken to the Land of Darkness. Furiously, he crossed out his name in the Registers of Death, together with whatever names of other monkeys he could find.

His disturbance at the Palace of the Dragon King and the Court of Death having been reported to the Jade Emperor, Monkey was summoned to Heaven so that he could be constantly watched. At first he was happy to have an appointment from the emperor, but upon learning how humble his position as groom in the heavenly stables really was, he returned to his monkeys.

As a rebel, he called himself "Great Sage, Equal of Heaven," and he defeated the heavenly hosts sent off to arrest him. The Jade Emperor consented to appoint him to the rank he wished. Then he disturbed the Peach Banquet, to which he was not invited. By the joint effort of the gods he was caught and imprisoned in the crucible of Lao Tzu, where for forty-nine days he was burned with alchemical fire before he escaped. It seemed nothing could stop him until Buddha came to help the heavenly powers. Monkey was placed under a five-peaked mountain, originally the five fingers of Buddha's hand, where he was to serve his penance.

Now Buddha wished that some believer from sinful China would come to the Western Continent to fetch the True Scriptures. Kwan yin volunteered to help the man accomplish his journey.

The man was Hsuan Tsang. His father, a young scholar, had been murdered while on his way to take up his duties as governor of Chiang chou. The murderer, a ferryman, assumed the dead man's name and took his wife and office. The wife would have committed suicide but for her unborn child. Immediately after the boy was born, she tied him to a plank with a letter written in blood tucked to his breast, and pushed the plank into the river. The child was picked up by the abbot of a temple, who learned the tragic story of the boy's birth from the blood letter.

Hsuan Tsang was brought up as a monk. He did not know of his parentage until he was eighteen years old, then he met his mother and made plans to avenge his father. The false governor was executed, on the spot where he had committed his evil deed. Suddenly a body came floating up through the water. It was Hsuan Tsang's father, whom every one had thought dead, but who had been saved by the Dragon King of the River. Thus the family was reunited. Hsuan Tsang chose to remain a monk.

The Emperor T'ai Tsung of T'ang made a visit to the World of Darkness. He had promised to celebrate a great mass for the salvation of the hungry ghosts, and Hsuan Tsang was chosen to preside over the ceremonies. Kwan yin, appearing in the disguise of a ragged priest, interrupted the service by pointing out that there were Three Baskets (or Triptitaka) of Mahayana scriptures for a pilgrim to bring from India. Then she revealed herself in her glory and vanished. Hsuan Tsang volunteered to undertake the quest in spite of the length and perils of the journey. His request granted, he was given a new name, Triptitaka.

He had passed several dangers before he arrived at the mountain where Monkey had been imprisoned for five hundred years, waiting for the man who, according to Kwan yin, would release him and whom he was to follow and protect and obey as his master. When Triptitaka said a prayer, the seal of the prison was lifted into the air and Monkey was freed.

Three other monsters had received similar instructions from Kwan yin to wait for the priest of T'ang at three different places. Because they did not know the man when they saw him, they had to be defeated in battle before they joined the pilgrimage. A young dragon devoured Triptitaka's horse, but, learning his mistake, he allowed himself to be changed into a horse to serve the priest. Pigsy, a banished marshal of the heavenly hosts, now reincarnated in the shape of a pig, had to be driven away from his human wife and father-in-law. The last to join was Sandy, a man-eating monster with red hair and a blue face, also a banished heavenly marshal.

Monkey and Pigsy sometimes created trouble. Pigsy was cowardly, lazy, self-indulgent, clumsily shrewd, and jealous of the much more powerful Monkey. But he seemed to be Triptitaka's favorite. The brilliant Monkey could not be a paragon of obedience and on several occasions he quarreled with his master. But the priest needed only to say a certain spell and the fillet on the monkey's head began to hurt him by becoming tighter. He had been tricked into wearing the cap with the fillet and now he could not take it off. This was the only control Triptitaka, with Kwan yin's help, held over unruly Monkey.

The travelers passed the kingdom of Cock-crow, where a Lion Demon had murdered the king and disguised as the monarch, usurped the throne. The ghost of the dead king asked help from Triptitaka. After the king had been fished up from a well and miraculously revived, the usurper was forced to flee. He turned out to be the gelded lion in the service of the Bodhisattva Manjusri.

The travelers came also to Cart-slow Kingdom, where Taoists were the privileged class and Buddhists were persecuted. Monkey challenged three Taoist magicians, who had won full confidence of the king, to a contest of miracles. The first magician could not recover his head, chopped off in the contest, and he fell dead, leaving the corpse of a headless tiger. The second magician was found to be only a white deer, now dead, since he was not able to close his ripped open belly. The third was fried to death in boiling oil, leaving in the caldron the bones of a ram. Monkey survived every one of the ordeals.

Monkey and Pigsy changed into a boy and a girl as bait for the Great King of Miracles, who demanded annual human sacrifice. Although the monster proved no match for Triptitaka's disciples, he captured the priest and brought him down to the River That Leads to Heaven.

There the monster, caught at last, in Kwan yin's basket, turned out to be a golden fish. A big turtle carried Triptitaka across the river. The turtle had been perfecting himself for more than one thousand years, but he was worried because he could not yet achieve human form. Triptitaka promised to ask Buddha about the turtle's wish.

The travelers, finally arrived in the Blessed Region of Buddha, began to carry the scriptures to China. But Triptitaka had forgotten to ask about the turtle's prospects. The turtle, annoyed, took a dive, leaving the pilgrims, who had been riding on his back to recross the river, and the scriptures in the water. The pilgrims were all saved, but a part of the scriptures was lost. This was the eighty-first calamity."

Carried back to paradise after completing their mission, Triptitaka and Monkey were both made Buddhas and Pigsy was promoted to be Cleanser of the Altar. Sandy, Golden Bodied Arhat, and the white horse, who had also aided Triptitaka, were set among the eight senior Heavenly Dragons. And Buddhism prospered in China.

MONSIEUR D'OLIVE

Type of work Drama

Author George Chapman (c. 1559-1634)

Type of plot Romantic comedy

Time of plot Seventeenth century

Locale An imaginary dukedom near France

First presented 1604

Principal characters

VANDOME, a gentleman

MONSIEUR D'OLIVE, a fop

ST. ANNE, a count

MARCELLINA, a countess

EURIONE, her sister

Critique

The most entertaining part of this drama is the subplot, which is concerned with the action, or inaction, of d'Olive, a fluent, self-assured fop. D'Olive's ill-fated mission to France is a satire on certain English embassies of the seventeenth century that were distinguished by magnificent preparations and long delays. Also ridiculed is King James's wholesale creation of knights. Although these events are of little interest today, Chapman's treatment of them retains its power to amuse, mainly because of the delightful character of d'Olive.

The Story

On returning home after three years of travel, Vandome was greeted with two pieces of bad news. First, he heard that his friend Marcellina, the wife of Count

Vaumont, had gone into voluntary exile, shutting herself in her curtained chamber, she had resolved never again to be seen in the light. This unusual behavior had been her response to the unjust accusations of her husband. Before Vandome left on his travels, Marcellina had carnied on with him a circumspect and perfectly acceptable platonic affair. When he left, she had spoken of him with such passion that Vaumont had been filled with jealousy and had asserted that the relationship went beyond the purely spiritual. Vaumont later realized that he had made an error, but it was too late to dissuade Marcellina from her action.

Vandome's second piece of bad news concerned the equally eccentric behavior of the Count St. Anne. St. Anne's wife, who was Vandome's sister, had died. His devotion to her was so great that he refused to have the corpse buried. Instead he had her body embalmed and placed in a chair in his chamber. With sad music playing in the background, he was weeping out his life at her feet. When Vandome learned of these problems, he determined to find solutions.

Forcing his way past the servants, he entered Marcellina's chamber. He called her course of action stupid and implored her to abandon it, but she was unmoved and refused to answer him. Sharing her isolation was her sister Eurone, who had been a close friend of St. Anne's wife. Eurone claimed that she had gone into seclusion in honor of the dead woman. In reality, however, she had become a recluse because of her love for St. Anne, a love that developed from her observation of the amazing fidelity of the bereaved husband for his dead wife. Eurone now revealed to Vandome her feeling toward St. Anne, and asked his help.

Meanwhile, measures to help St. Anne were being contemplated in another quarter. Duke Philip had decided to ask the King of France to intervene. He planned to petition the king, who was the uncle of St. Anne's wife, to demand the burial of the corpse. Since it was necessary to send an emissary to the king, Monsieur d'Olive was recommended for the post. Two courtiers, Roderigue and Mugeron, had suggested d'Olive, partly for selfish reasons and partly for amusement. D'Olive—an idler, wit, and man about town—had agreed to consult with the duke, mostly for amusement. In his interview with Duke Philip, d'Olive declined to accept advice about the mission. Instead, he gave a learned talk on the advantages and disadvantages of using tobacco. Duke Philip, pleased with his wit, appointed him the ducal envoy.

Vandome, who had a marked physical resemblance to his dead sister, used this fact to establish a bond with St. Anne on his first visit to the widow. While St. Anne readily accepted the friendship of Vandome, he was deaf to suggestions that he seek a new love or that he bury his wife's body. On his second visit, Vandome declared love for Eurone and appealed to St. Anne for his help. The count, out of affection for his brother-in-law, agreed to visit Eurone and try to advance the suitor's cause.

D'Olive proceeded slowly with his preparations for his journey. Having dismissed St. Anne's affliction as stupidity, he turned his attention to the more important business of forming a retinue. He had no difficulty in collecting followers, in fact they soon became a nuisance to him. Many people felt that a trip to France as members of an embassy would revolutionize their lives, that they would return with exquisite manners and new found wisdom. After Mugeron had collected bribes from the applicants, d'Olive assigned them, according to his whim, to the rank of gentleman or yeoman.

When St. Anne visited Eurone she adroitly succeeded in acting and speaking as the dead woman had done in life. Suddenly St. Anne discovered that all his deep emotions had been transferred to Eurone. After leaving her, he spoke aloud to himself of his passion, and was overheard by Vandome. Vandome, after first calling St. Anne a traitor, revealed that he had only feigned love for Eurone, that she was, in reality, in love with St. Anne.

All the attention that d'Olive had received as a result of his ambassadorship began to go to his head. While he was congratulating himself on his great fame Roderigue came and told him that the trip had been canceled because St. Anne had buried his dead wife. Mugeron rebuked d'Olive for having taken such a long time with his preparations. D'Olive, after first refusing to believe the news, decided to sever completely his connection with the court. His followers, he said, could take care of themselves.

Roderigue and Mugeron, who profited from having d'Olive in the court, were now faced with the problem of getting him back. They decided that his most vulnerable side was his interest in women. Accordingly, they forged a love letter to him from Hieronime, a lady of the court whom he liked. The letter told him to come in disguise to her chamber between two and three o'clock.

Vandome, having successfully solved St Anne's problem, now turned his attention to Marcellina. Standing outside her window, he shouted that he brought bad news and that she must come out. When she had reluctantly come from her room, he told her that her husband had become a libertine. With help from Eugène, he fabricated a lurid story of Vaumont's activities. He claimed that Hieronime was the current object of his lasciviousness, and that she, disliking his attentions, was planning to expose him to public shame. When it was suggested that Vaumont might suffer castration or death for his behavior, Marcellina decided that she would break her vows in order to save him.

When Vandome's group arrived outside Hieronime's chamber, d'Olive was there, preparing to enter. Hidden nearby were Mugeron, Roderigue, and Duke Philip. Now that Marcellina's vows were fully broken, Vandome revealed his trickery, but to insure that she did not hurry back to her room he told Duke Philip that she had come out of seclusion to see the duke's wife, who was ill. When Mugeron and Roderigue revealed themselves to d'Olive, he was furious with them. The duke brought peace by stepping forth and assuring d'Olive that his services would be desired in the future.

MOTHER

Type of work Novel

Author Maxim Gorky (Aleksei Maksimovich Peshkov 1868-1936)

Type of plot Naturalism

Time of plot First decade of the twentieth century

Locale Russia

First published 1907

Principal characters

PELAGUEYA VLASOVA, a revolutionary heroine

PAVEL VLASOV, her son

ANDREY,

RYBIN,

NIKOLAY IVANOVICH,

SOFYA

SASHENKA, and

NATASHA, the Vlasovs' revolutionary friends

Critique

Although Maxim Gorky wrote primarily about the proletariat and in a naturalistic vein, he was not fundamentally concerned with politics, and his works exhibit a marked lyric talent that gives his writing a haunting poetic quality. Gorky's basic concern was with strong, vital, memorable characters rather than with dogma or morality. He envisioned a future in which these vigorous people would free themselves from their economic degradation and live as free, independent spirits. He was a visionary rather than a dogmatist. This fact is particularly evident in his novel Mother, in which Pelagueya Vlasova, through the love of her son, becomes converted to the revolutionary cause and gradually comes to love all the people as her children. Gorky was strongly attracted to these self-made people, to men and women with the courage to carry out their plans, and he makes the reader admire them as well. The lyric sweep of Gorky's vision in this novel is compelling

The Story

The factory workers in the small Russian community of Nizhni Novgorod were an impoverished, soulless, brutal lot. Their work in the factory dehumanized them and robbed them of their energy, as a result they lived like beasts.

When Michael Vlasov, a worker, died, his wife Pelagueya felt that her son Pavel would lead the same anguished, brutal life. But gradually she noticed with joy and apprehension that Pavel was turning out differently, that he was given to reading. One day Pavel informed his mother that he was reading subversive literature and that a group of his Socialist friends were coming one evening to visit him. Pelagueya was naturally frightened, but when his friends arrived she noticed that they were much warmer, much more gentle than the people she had lived with all her life. Though they engaged in heated arguments, no one seemed to get angry at the others. Pavel's friends seemed full of hope and vitality, and Pelagueya quickly warmed up to them. She liked Pavel's friend, Andrey, in particular, for he was big hearted and full of laughter. She liked Natasha too, a frail, gentle girl who read aloud during the meetings. Other members of the group were Sashenka, a commanding girl who loved Pavel, and Vyesovshchikov, the village misanthropist. They were an idealistic crowd, hopeful about the future of the workingman, and prepared to put their ideas into action. Gradually Pavel's home became the center of their activities, and Pelagueya agreed to take Andrey in as a roomer out of her motherly love for him.

Eventually Pavel's house became the center of village suspicion as well. Pavel and his comrades had printed and distributed among the workmen leaflets which made plain their miserable conditions. Rumors were spread that the police were coming to search the house. Soon afterward the police dropped in unexpectedly and arrested Andrey and Vyesovshchikov. Several others had been arrested as well.

While the workers were generally hostile to Pavel because of his strangeness, he also inspired a certain confidence in them by virtue of his stern intelligence. Pelagueya was flattered that the sharp peasant, Rybin, an old bear of a man, should go to her son for advice. One day the workers were notified that their pay was going to be cut. The workers were behind Pavel when he made a speech to them and to the manager in protest against the cut, however, because of the speech, Pavel was arrested and sent to jail.

Pelagueya, distressed by her son's arrest, learned that about sixty others had been arrested along with him and that Andrey sent her his regards from prison. Deciding at last to become involved in her son's activities, she took a job as a caterer to the factory laborers and under cover of her work she distributed revolutionary literature. Meanwhile, she continued to see Pavel's Socialist friends.

Soon afterward Andrey was released from prison, and he returned to Pelagueya, who welcomed him with open arms. Rybin, claiming that the peasants were no better off than the workers, went to the country to stir up the peasantry against their oppressive masters.

With Andrey living in her house, Pelagueya felt happier, and under his friendly goading she learned to read and write. She visited Pavel in prison and slyly told him of her activities in distributing leaflets. Pelagueya's world expanded greatly now that she was involved in the Socialist cause, she had something to hope for beyond her selfish interests.

In the spring Pavel was released from prison. The Vlasov household continued to be the hub of the local Socialist activities, and Pavel announced his intention of marching with the banner in the coming May Day parade, even though to do so would mean another jail sentence.

Not long afterward one of Pavel's friends rushed in to report that a spy had been murdered in the street. At first Pelagueya feared that Vyesovshchikov had committed the crime, later Andrey revealed that he had accidentally killed the spy and felt guilty about his deed. After two weeks of inquiring into the matter the police gave up the investigation.

May Day arrived and Pavel and Andrey were up early. The crowds had gathered in the streets and the two men walked through them with Pelagueya close behind. After they had made an abortive attempt to rouse the workers with speeches and songs, soldiers appeared, forced back the crowd, and arrested Pavel, Andrey, and their companions.

Pelagueya felt depressed after their arrest. In answer to her loneliness Nikolay Ivanovich came to her and invited her to live with him in the city. She accepted his invitation and moved to his apartment. Nikolay and his sister Sofya were well-bred Socialists. They treated Pelagueya with affection and respect, and she came to love them as though they were members of her own family.

Pelagueya and Sofya dressed as pilgrims and in that disguise distributed propaganda throughout the city and surrounding countryside. While delivering books to Rybin, Pelagueya saw the hardships of peasant life and the cruelty of the masters. She proved useful in aiding Vyesovshchikov to hide out from the police after he had escaped from prison. She nursed a dying comrade and during a riot at his funeral she helped a wounded boy at some danger to herself. She also visited Pavel in prison.

Learning that many of her comrades had been arrested, she decided to go alone to deliver her pamphlets in the country village. On arriving there she saw that Rybin had been arrested and cruelly beaten. That night she stayed with sympathetic peasants and gave them copies of her leaflets.

Returning to the city, she aided a fugitive peasant and told Nikolay about her trip. Shortly thereafter she helped a comrade to escape from prison. Her efforts for the workers made her realize how family allegiances could interfere with loyalty to the cause. She understood now why Pavel would never get married.

After about six months in jail Pavel and his comrades were finally brought to trial. The judges were cold, impersonal, and aloof. Several of Pavel's friends declined to testify in his defense. As the trial proceeded Pavel made a rousing speech in which he denounced the decadence of the masters and praised the youth and vision of the Socialists. After Andrey had further taunted the judges, Pavel and his companions were finally sentenced to exile in Siberia.

In the meantime the police were hunting down the Socialists. Nikolay was arrested shortly after the trial. Pavel's speech had been printed and Pelagueya had promised to deliver copies to a remote town. On the train she recognized a police spy and knew she had been trapped. When the police tried to arrest her, she shouted to the other occupants of the train about her mission and their servitude. She opened her bag and handed out the leaflets even while the police were beating her.

MY LIFE AND HARD TIMES

Type of work Autobiography
Author James Thurber (1894-)
Time Early twentieth century
Locale Columbus, Ohio
First published 1933

Principal personages

JAMES THURBER
CHARLES, his father
MARY his mother
HERMAN and
ROY his brothers
HIS GRANDFATHER

To say that there are two worlds—the World of Ordinary Men and another known as the World of Thurber, which orbits erratically through our atmosphere and occasionally bumps into the country side or blunders down a city street like a low flying blimp—is a cliché which would never be tolerated by Mr. Thurber himself, for one of the charms of his style is a scrupulous avoidance of anything resembling the trite. One suspects that among his many phobias there must exist the dread of turning a corner in a sentence without first myopically peering around to make sure there is no cliché about to waylay him. His precision of language and careful attention to detail are the qualities which give his writing its interest and charm, his ability to impose a world of fantasy on a world of reality and to achieve an interrelationship of the external and the internal, the factual and the imaginative. Such Thurber touches are what his followers have come to expect in all his work.

In his preface to My Life and Hard Times, Thurber apologizes for writing an autobiography before he had reached the age of forty and for not conforming to Ford Madox Ford's dictum that one's memoirs should paint a picture of one's time. Thurber more or less admits that he has no time, that all he intends to tell is what happened to one writer. Since all that follows could happen to no one but Thurber, he thus admits, but without saying so, the existence of the Thurber world.

This world reaches beyond the boundaries of the real or the commonplace and extends into a region of fable, peopled by such figures as Emma Inch, the cook, and her asthmatic dog Feely, colored Della, who made cretonnes for the soup and whose brother worked in an incinerator where they burn refuse, Barney Haller the hired man, whom thunder followed like a dog, and Walter Mitty, that frustrated, comic Prufrock with his impossible dreams of heroism and glory. Strange things happen in this world because James Thurber sees it that way: an old woman with a parasol is seen to walk through a truck, a cat goes rolling across the street atop a striped barrel, an admiral in full uniform rides a bicycle across the highway in the path of an oncoming car. That these things are never what they seem but fragments of the ordinary world suddenly revealed in a new light or a different perspective is the secret of Thurber's humor. It is a form of humor little concerned with the conventional or the obvious. It arises quite naturally from a recognition of the inner, emotional chaos of a sensitive individualistic man trapped in the affairs of the practical, demanding world, with no weapon of defense but his own resistances and inferiorities.

Hence that air of the fabulous which invests Thurber's drawings as well—the meek, rotund men whose poses are those of resignation and whose faces reveal long thwarted efforts to think and act in a positive manner, the aggressive rather frightening women who never seem disturbed by doubts as to their superiority, the huge, sadly patient dogs. They belong in a world in which life has grown complicated for men and animals, from which one way of escape leads into a Cloud Cuckoo Land where the illogical becomes the logical and the fantastic reveals the dilemma of modern man facing the psychological confusion and insecurity of his place in a world almost devoid of sense and meaning.

Nowhere does James Thurber display to better advantage his genius for uncovering the incongruous in the everyday affairs of men, the daydream escapes from personal confusion or catastrophe, than he does in the nine episodes which center (perhaps the proper word is eccentric) around Thurber's youth in Columbus, Ohio, as told in My Life and Hard Times.

"The Night the Bed Fell" is about the night the bed did not fall on Thurber's father while he slept in the attic where grandfather was supposed to sleep. But grandfather, who refused to believe that the Army of the Potomac was not still trying to take Richmond, had wandered off some days before, eventually he would turn up with profane criticism of the campaign, its military leaders, and the administration in Washington. Actually, James Thurber rolled out of his cot, his mother was convinced that the bed had fallen on father and he must be pulled from the wreckage, a visiting cousin poured a glass of camphor over himself, and father was sure that the house was on fire. Mother, who always called it the night on which the bed fell on father, was looking on the bright side of things when she said she was glad grandfather had not been there.

"The Car We Had to Push" is about all sorts of things, but mostly about grandfather's brother Zenas, who contracted the chestnut tree blight and died of that strange malady in 1866.

"The Day the Dam Broke" is about the day the dam did not break. Expected catastrophes have a way of not happening in the Thurber world, but the effects are very much the same. The citizens of Columbus thought it had broken and they fled in panic, hysterical at the time but hilarious in the retelling.

The police were summoned to the Thurber household on "The Night the Ghost Got In," and grandfather shot one policeman in the shoulder under the hallucinated impression that the men in blue uniforms were deserters from General Meade's army.

"More Alarms at Night" deals with brother Roy's feigned delirium, even at the best of times Roy was likely to sing "Onward, Christian Soldiers" or "Marching Through Georgia" in his sleep. He awakened father in the small hours called him Buck, and announced that his time had come. Father, a mildly nervous man, aroused his family. Everyone assured him that he had had a bad dream. The sketch also deals with another night when James awoke poor father to get help in remembering the name of a New Jersey city, Perth Amboy. Sure that his son had gone mad, father ran from the room.

"A Sequence of Servants" deals with just what the title indicates. There were 162 of these servants, including a colored one, Vashti, who told her lover that he must never tangle with her jealous stepfather, who had married her mother just to be near Vashti. But Thurber (the writer) cannot stay away from the negative, it turns out that Vashti had invented her stepfather to pique the lover.

A memorable Airedale named Muggs is "The Dog That Bit People." When he died, after biting almost everybody in Ohio—including Lieutenant Governor Malloy—mother wanted to bury him in the family plot under "Flights of angels sing thee to thy rest" or some equally inappropriate inscription. The family dissuaded her, however, and Muggs was interred along a lonely road beneath an epitaph of Thurber's choice: "Cave canem." Mother was always quite pleased with the classic dignity of that simple Latin phrase.

"University Days" presents Bolenciewicz, star tackle on the Ohio State football team, whom an economics professor tried to make eligible for the Illinois game by asking him to name one means of transportation, after hints, prods, and auditory and visual demonstrations by the professor and the whole class. Bolenciewicz mentioned a train and the day was saved. There is also an agricultural student named Haskins, who wanted to be a journalist and whose beat for campus news covered the cow barns, the horse pavilion, the sheep house, and the animal husbandry department in general

The final sketch "Draft Board Nights," finds Thurber being incessantly called before the board which always turned him down because of poor eyesight, and then, through some repetitive mistake, kept calling him back. He eventually drifted into service, not in the army, but as an unauthorized and undetected examiner of draftees—a pulmonary man, to be exact. What put a merciful end to it all was the Armistice.

For critics to debate the place of Thurber in contemporary literature is useless. His humor, which creates its effects according to the laws of its own logic and yet always with a savoring of common sense, is superbly his own, as his would-be imitators have discovered. His manner is nimbly without being racy, it has poignance without sentimentality. His touch with words is delicate yet precise. Best of all, he illustrates his own books with his inimitable drawings which, like his prose pieces, distort the familiar into the fantastic without—again, this is Thurber's secret—losing touch with reality.

THE MYSTERIOUS ISLAND

Type of work Novel

Author Jules Verne (1828-1905)

Type of plot Adventure romance

Time of plot 1865-1869

Locale An island in the South Pacific

First published 1870

Principal characters

CAPTAIN CYRUS HARDING, an engineer

NEBUCHADNEZZAR, his Negro servant

GIDEON SPILETT, a reporter

JACK PENCROFT, a sailor

HERBERT BROWN, an orphan

AYRTON, a mutineer

CAPTAIN NEMO, captain of the Nautilus

Critique

The Mysterious Island is in a sense a sequel to Jules Verne's famous Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea, for in this work Verne describes the death of Captain Nemo, but it is primarily a story of survival and a celebration of the adaptability and ingenuity of intelligent, hard-working, God-fearing man. Verne shows the great satisfaction that can be derived from personal accomplishment. The wealth of detail and description and the valid explanations of mysterious happenings create a sense of realism.

The Story

On March 24, 1865, a balloon carrying five persons who were escaping from Richmond, capital of the Confederacy

during the War Between the States, fell into the sea. Caught in a storm, the balloon had flown some seven thousand miles in five days. The five passengers were Captain Cyrus Harding, an engineer in General Grant's army, his Negro servant, Nebuchadnezzar, Gideon Spillett, a reporter, Jack Pencroft, a sailor, and Herbert Brown, the fifteen-year-old orphan son of one of Pencroft's former sea captains.

The balloon fell near an uncharted island, and Harding, together with his dog Top, was washed overboard. Its load lightened, the balloon then deposited the other travelers on the shore of the island. The next morning Nebuchadnezzar, who was known as Neb, went to look for his master while the others explored the island

The next day Herbert, Pencroft, and Spilett took stock of their resources, which consisted of the clothes they wore, a notebook, and a watch. They suddenly heard Top barking. The dog led them to Captain Harding who, having been unconscious, was at a loss to explain how he had arrived at a place more than a mile away from the shore.

When Harding was stronger, the group decided to consider themselves colonists rather than castaways, and they called their new home Lincoln Island. Harding found on the island samples of iron, pyrite, clay, lime, coal, and other useful minerals. The colonists made bricks which they used to construct an oven for the making of pottery. From Top's collar they were able to make two knives, which enabled them to cut bows and arrows. Eventually they were able to make iron and steel tools.

Under the brilliant direction of Harding, who seemed to know a great deal about everything, the colonists worked constantly to improve their lot. After discovering a cave within a cliff wall they planned to make this their permanent residence, they called it Granite House. They made a rope ladder up the side of the cliff to the door of the cavern, which they equipped with walls of brick, furniture, and candles made from seal fat.

One day Pencroft found washed up on the beach a large chest containing many useful items, including books, clothes, instruments, and weapons. On another occasion the colonists returned to Granite House to find that their home had been invaded by orangutans, who suddenly became terrified at something and began to flee. The colonists killed all but one that they domesticated and called Jup.

The colony prospered. They domesticated various animals, used a stream to power an elevator to Granite House and made glass windows. They built a boat designed by Harding and named it the Bonadventure. As they were sailing it they found a bottle with a message, saying that there was a castaway on nearby Tabor Island. Pencroft, Spilett, and Herbert sailed to Tabor Island, where Herbert was attacked by a strange wild man. Pencroft and Spilett succeeded in capturing the creature and they took him back to Lincoln Island, where he began to become civilized again. One day he confessed with shame that his name was Ayrton, that he had attempted mutiny on one ship, had tried to seize another, and had finally been put ashore on Tabor Island by one Captain Grant of the Duncan. Ayrton, who repented his past life, was accepted by the colonists as one of them. He lived at a corral which the colonists had built some distance from Granite House.

One day the colonists sighted a pirate ship. A battle between the pirates and the colonists developed, and just when things were going badly for the colonists, the pirate ship seemed to explode. Later the colonists found the remains of a strange torpedo that had destroyed the ship.

A short time later the colonists discovered that the telegraph system which Harding had built to the corral had broken down. When they went to the corral to investigate, they were attacked by some of the pirates who had not perished with their ship, and Herbert was seriously wounded. Ayrton, moreover, was gone. While the colonists were trying desperately to keep Herbert alive, the pirates set fire to the mill and sheds close by Granite House and destroyed the plantation. By the time the colonists were able to make their way back to Granite House, Herbert had weakened seriously. The one thing needed for his recovery, sulphate of quinine, was lacking on the island, but on the crucial night, which might have been Herbert's last, the colonists found a box of quinine beside Herbert's bed, and the medicine enabled him to recover.

Finally the colonists set out to find their mysterious benefactor and to exterminate the pirates When the expedition arrived at the corral they found Ayrton, who had been tortured by the pirates but who was still alive Top then discovered the corpses of all the remaining pirates who had been killed in a mysterious way

The colonists made plans to build a ship large enough to carry them back to civilization When they discovered smoke rising from the crater of the volcano, they redoubled their efforts to complete the boat

One day the colonists received a call on the telegraph telling them to go to the corral immediately There they found a note which told them to follow the wire that had been attached to the telegraph line They followed the wire into a hidden cove, where they found the fantastic submarine Nautilus and its captain, their benefactor Captain Nemo He told them how he had been a rich nobleman in India, how he had been defeated in his fight for the independence of his country, and how he and his followers, disgusted with the ways of man, had built a gigantic undersea craft His followers having died, Nemo, old and alone had taken the Nautilus to Lincoln Island, where he had lived for the past six years, giving aid to the colonists because he believed them to be good people

After presenting Harding with a box of jewels and pearls and making a last request that he be buried in his ship, he died The colonists sealed the Nautilus with Captain Nemo's body inside and then opened the flood valves to sink the ship

Following some advice Captain Nemo had given him, Harding investigated the caverns beneath the island and saw that, as soon as the sea water penetrated to the shaft of the volcano, the entire island would explode

The colonists worked with all haste to complete work on the boat By March of their fourth year on the island the hull had been built but on the night before the launching the entire island was shattered with a tremendous roar All that was left of Lincoln Island was a small rock formation The colonists had all been able to reach safety there, but their ship had vanished The colonists stayed on the rock formation for nine days

On March 24 they sighted a ship It was the Duncan, which had come to rescue Ayrton after his exile of twelve years on Tabor Island The colonists went to America, and with the treasure Captain Nemo had given them they bought land in Iowa They colonized it and prospered in their new home

NATHAN THE WISE

Type of work Drama

Author Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (1729-1781)

Type of plot Philosophic humanism

Time of plot Twelfth century

Locale Jerusalem

First published 1779

Principal characters

NATHAN a Jewish merchant

RECHA his adopted daughter

SULTAN SAT ADIN son of the ruler of all the Saracens

SITTAH his sister

CONRAD VON STAUFFEN a Templar who was spared by the Sultan

DAJA, a Christian woman and Recha's companion

Critique

Nathan the Wise is a fitting climax to a great career, a deeply humane verse

drama expressing Lessing's philosophy of enlightenment and tolerance The pro tagonist, a rich Jewish merchant, is based on and a tribute to the playwright's good friend, the humanitarian Moses Mendelssohn, grandfather of the composer. The high point of this interesting play occurs when Nathan relates the famous folk parable, found in both the Decameron and the Gesta Romanorum, of the three rings which represent the three major religious faiths. The true faith (ring) is that one which best serves mankind, Lessing suggests, thereby writing an eloquent plea for religious tolerance and freedom.

The Story

Nathan, a wealthy Jewish merchant, had just returned to Jerusalem from Babylon when Daja, the deeply prejudiced Christian companion to the Jew's adopted daughter, a girl orphaned during the Third Crusade, told him of the dramatic rescue of his beloved Recha from their burning house. Nathan, in spite of the fact that he had suffered severely at the hands of Christians and Saracens alike, wished to reward the young man who had so courageously saved the girl's life. His benefactor proved to be a young Templar who recently had been pardoned by the sultan.

Each day, at Recha's urging, Daja had attempted to thank and reward the brave young man as he made a daily visit to Christ's tomb, but each time he rudely repulsed her. Recha, as the result of shock over her narrow escape as much as from gratitude to her benefactor, suffered hallucinations in which she believed that the young Templar was her guardian angel. Nathan thought it miraculous that Sultan Saladin should spare a Christian knight's life or that the Templar would desire to be so spared. The truth was that the Saracen's leniency had been based on the young man's resemblance to his own dead brother Assad.

Daja, told by Nathan to seek out the young man and invite him to their home, found him in a bad mood after rejecting a friar's request from King Philip that he spy on and murder Saladin, a treacherous deed he vehemently refused to consider. The knight again told Daja that he had performed his rescue of Recha through whim and therefore would accept no reward. Nathan then met with and begged the youth, a penniless stranger in a strange land, to accept aid and friendship. Boorish though the young knight was, he offered to let Nathan buy him a mantle to replace his own burned in the fire. At this suggestion the Jew shed a tear and dissolved the intolerant Templar's disdain and suspicion. On this note they shook hands, friends. Nathan learned that the young man was Conrad von Stauffen, a name somehow associated in the Jew's mind with the name Filneck, but before he could inquire further the Jew received a message demanding his presence at the sultan's palace.

The young knight, in the meantime, called on Recha. Something immediately drew them together, some mutual feeling not unlike romantic love. He hastened off, however, to avert any disaster which might befall Nathan at the hand of Saladin, who had summoned the Jew to obtain from him money to replenish the treasury so that the war against the crusaders might continue. To put the Jew somewhat at a disadvantage, Saladin asked enlightenment from this man called the Wise (which Nathan denied he was) on the paradox of the several "true" religions.

Nathan then told the story of the father who possessed a ring traditionally passed on to the favorite son who would then be lord of the house. Since he loved his three sons equally well (as the Father in heaven loves us all, said Nathan), the father made exact copies of the ring and gave one to each son. None knew which was the true ring, and after the father's death a controversy arose. But the problem of the "true" ring could be resolved no more than the argument over the "true" faith—Jewish, Christian, or Mohammedan. A judge suggested that each son act as if his were the true ring and live and rule as well as he could. Finally, generations hence, it would be decided in a higher, greater court, with religions as with the ring, which was the true one.

When Nathan returned from the palace, young Conrad von Stauffen asked for Recha's hand in marriage. Astounded, Nathan said that he could not consent without due reflection. Daja, on an amorous mission, told the Templar that Recha had been born Christian but had been reared as a Jewess, a crime punishable by death. The Templar assumed that she had been stolen from her proper parents. Dismayed by Daja's story, the knight guardedly asked counsel of the Patriarch of Jerusalem, who said that in such a case the Jew must die at the stake for holding back salvation from an innocent child. Perplexed and unhappy, the young man went to confer with the sultan.

Saladin, amazed at such accusations, refused to believe ill of Nathan and asked the Christian to exercise prudence and charity. As the young Templar left to save Nathan from the patriarch's wrath, the sultan and his sister remarked the resemblance the young man bore to their long lost brother, believed dead.

In the meantime a friar sent to spy on Nathan revealed that eighteen years ago he, the friar, then a squire, delivered Recha to the Jew for his master, Lord Wolf von Filneck, who was later killed in battle, the child's mother, a von Stauffen, was already dead. Nathan confided that his own wife and seven sons had been killed by Christians only shortly before he adopted Recha as his own, an act which saved his sanity and restored his faith in God.

Saladin, who favored the marriage of the two young people, then learned from Nathan that Wolf von Filneck's breviary, turned over to Nathan by the friar, contained a strange story. Crusader Filneck's rightful name was Assad. The sultan's brother, having married a Christian and accepted her faith, had left his son to his deceased wife's brother, Conrad von Stauffen, after whom he was named. The boy's sister he left indirectly to Nathan. The Jewish child and the Christian child both were Mohammedans, their uncle was a sultan, and their godfather was a wise man and a Jew.

NEW ATLANTIS

Type of work Essay

Author Sir Francis Bacon (1561-1626)

Type of plot Utopian voyage

Time of plot Sixteenth century

Locale New Atlantis, an island in the Pacific Ocean

First published 1627

Principal characters

THE NARRATOR, an English traveler

THE GOVERNOR OF THE HOUSE OF STRANGERS

THE FATHER OF SALOMON'S HOUSE

Critique

For centuries writers have delighted in presenting their conceptions of the ideal state, and the English Renaissance produced two outstanding works of this type. Thomas More's Utopia, describing a communistic community, and Sir Francis Bacon's New Atlantis. As one would expect, since the author is regarded as one of the originators of the scientific method, the well being of Bacon's model state depended upon the application of scientific experiments carried on by its wisest citizens. Bacon succeeded in giving New Atlantis a semblance of truth by writing it as an account of his personal experiences. Although the work lacks some of the force of Utopia because it is not aimed at the England of Bacon's time, it is nevertheless fascinating for its speculations on society and science

The Story

Traveling from Peru to the Orient, the Narrator and his companions seemed hopelessly lost in the South Sea when they came upon an island and sailed into the harbor of one of its large cities. Its inhabitants stood on the shores with clubs, as if warning them not to land. A small boat came toward them, carrying a governmental official who presented them with a scroll inscribed in Hebrew, Latin, Greek, and Spanish, promising any assistance they might need, but forbidding them to land. Noticing with amazement and joy that the document bore the sign of the cross, the travelers asked permission to bring their sick companions to land. The voyagers offered merchandise in return for aid.

A few hours later another citizen, evidently of high rank, invited the whole company to land, if they would swear as Christians that they were not pirates and had killed no one in the past three months. They were given rooms in the city at the House of Strangers, where special cells and medicines were provided for the sick crew members.

The Governor of the House of Strangers, impressed by their gentlemanly behavior, invited them to remain in the city for six weeks and offered to answer their questions about his country. He was delighted when they inquired about his homeland's conversion to Christianity. He told them that one night, about twenty years after Christ's ascension, a large cross on a pillar of light appeared on the sea. The people of the city of Renfusa rowed out toward it, only to find that they could not move closer than about sixty yards away. A wise man prayed for an explanation of the sign and was able to sail on. The cross disappeared, but he found a chest containing the Old and New Testaments, even the books not written at that time, and a letter from Saint Bartholomew explaining that he had been ordered in a vision to send the ark to sea. The Testaments were themselves miraculous, they could be understood by everyone, no matter what his language, and through them the kingdom was converted.

On succeeding days the Governor told how his people knew the languages and literature of Europe, yet remained unknown to its inhabitants. About three thousand years before, he said, navigation was widespread, and his country traded with Phoenicia, China, and the mighty kingdom of Atlantis, later named America. But within one hundred years Atlantis was destroyed by flood and only a few mountain dwelling savages survived. The bulk of New Atlantis' commerce ceased, and its wise king, Salomon, perceiving that his land was self-sufficient, forbade communication with foreigners. He set strict regulations on the entrance of strangers and allowed only a chosen few to visit other nations.

To improve the welfare of his country he established Salomon's House, a society of scientists named for the Hebrew king, to study all "the works and creatures of God," and he ordered that every twelve years six fellows of the House should go to gather information from other countries and bring back "books, instruments, and patterns of every kind." The Governor added that he was not permitted to tell how these men concealed their identity during their travels.

The Narrator was invited to a great family feast, given in honor of every man who had thirty living descendants. The tersetan, the father, sat in state under a canopy of ivy decorated with silver and silk. As his family stood around him, a herald presented a scroll announcing honors from the king and a cluster of gold grapes, one for each descendant. The latter was given to the worthiest son, henceforth called the Son of the Vine.

A second outstanding occasion for the Narrator was a visit from a father of Salomon's House, who described his society, founded for "the knowledge of causes and secret motions of things and the enlarging of the bounds of human empire to the effecting of all things possible"

Among the elaborate experiments the society used to extend knowledge were processes of refrigeration, the production of artificial metals, the study of soils, grafting, and crossbreeding of plants and animals

The fathers of Salomon's House studied the weather from tall observation towers, heat, in a variety of furnaces, light and color in 'perspective houses' in which they also developed powerful telescopes and fine microscopes. They conveyed sound in trunks and pipes over long distances, and they had "some degrees of flying in the air," as well as "boats for going under water." In Salomon's house each member was assigned a function: traveling, collecting experiments from books, making them, compiling results, finding practical applications for results, formulating laws and axioms from experimental data.

The father of Salomon's House completed his discourse, blessed the Narrator, and gave him permission to write down these revelations about his order.

NIGHT FLIGHT

Type of work Novel

Author Antoine de Saint Exupéry (1900-1944)

Type of plot Psychological realism

Time of plot Early 1930s

Locale South America

First published 1931

Principal characters

RIVIÈRE, director of the air mail service

ROBINEAU, the inspector

FABIEN, the lost pilot

MME FABIEN

PELLERIN, a pilot

ROBLET, a former pilot

THE WIRELESS OPERATOR

Critique

A novel concerning the early days on the mail routes of South America, Night Flight deals with the dangers and difficulties of flying at night. The hero, Rivière, is a man determined to make night flying regular, despite the dangers of weather, disrupted communication, and inadequate machinery. The novel becomes a conflict between the sense of purpose and achievement in carrying out night flights and the warm, domestic comfort that nights spent with wives represent. The conflict finds a strong and dramatic focus within the character of Rivière, an unbending man determined to keep the mail route going but sensitive enough to venerate his pilots as men. The novel, written in a dense, evocative, poetic style, is in Saint Exupéry's hands an excellent medium for combining the poetic and philosophic reflections with praise for a life of action and purpose. For this writer, flyers, the pilots of the early, difficult days of the mail routes represented genuine heroes, men of achievement in terms of both thought and action.

The Story

Fabien, along with his wireless operator, was flying at sunset, bringing the mail from Patagonia to Buenos Aires.

NIGHT FLIGHT by Antoine de Saint Exupéry. Translated by Stuart Gilbert. By permission of the publishers Harcourt, Brace & Co., Inc. Copyright 1932 by The Century Co. Copyright 1942, by Reynal & Hitchcock. All rights reserved.

Two other mail planes, one from Chile and one from Paraguay, were also headed for Buenos Aires, where another plane was to take off, about two in the morning, with a cargo of South American mail intended for Europe. Fabien's wireless operator, hearing reports of storms ahead, urged Fabien to land in San Juan for the night, but Fabien, looking at the clear sky and the first stars, refused and headed for Buenos Aires.

At Buenos Aires, Rivière, the head of the mail service, was pacing the airport. Worried about the safety of his three planes, he was pleased when the plane from Chile landed safely early in the evening. Pellerin, the pilot of the plane from Chile, told of flying through a great storm in the Andes. Although Pellerin had not experienced great difficulty, he was still shaken by his experience. Both men seemed certain, at this point, that the storm would not cross the Andes. Robineau, the inspector at Buenos Aires, somewhat resentful of Rivière's severity and unwillingness to relax discipline, revealed more pity for Pellerin's experience than Rivière had shown. Robineau went out to dinner with Pellerin, a meal over which they could chat about women and domestic concerns, away from the tension of the airfield.

When Robineau returned to the field, Rivière criticized him for making a friend of Pellerin. Rivière went on to point out that supervisors, who had to order men to what might be their deaths, could not become friendly with the men under them, the supervisors had to maintain discipline, impersonality, because the success of the project, the conquest of space at night, depended on firm and immediate control. Rivière, although mastering the pain in his own side only with great difficulty, maintained severe discipline on the airfield all the time. He deprived pilots of bonuses if planes were not on time, no matter what the reason, he disciplined old Roblet severely for any minor infraction, even though Roblet had been the first man in Argentina to assemble a plane. He fired an electrician for some faulty wiring in a plane.

The wife of the pilot who was to fly from Buenos Aires to Europe received a phone call. She awakened her husband and he prepared for the flight. She was aware, as he was dressing, that he was already part of another world, that he had already lost interest in home, domesticity, herself. He then reported to Rivière who reprimanded him for turning back on a previous flight. Rivière was severe, although he silently admired the man's skill.

Meanwhile, the plane from Patagonia, piloted by Fabien, entered a violent storm. As the storm became more serious, Fabien tried to find a place to land, for he could see nothing but all the airfields nearby were completely closed in by the storm. Rivière became more and more concerned. Unable to contact Fabien by radio, he alerted police and emergency services throughout the country. Fabien's wife of only six weeks, accustomed to having him arrive for dinner by a certain hour, telephoned the airfield. Rivière, feeling strong emotion, tried to reassure her that all would be well, but knew he could not honestly say so.

When Fabien, in deep distress and thinking he might try a crash landing, threw out his only landing flare, he found that he had been blown off course by the storm and was now over the ocean. He turned sharply west. After a time he noticed a clearing above and climbed to it. The storm was still solid beneath him, however, and he could find no airfield open for a landing. He had gas for only thirty minutes. Buenos Aires informed him that the storm covered the whole interior of the country and that no airfield within thirty minutes' flying time was open. Rivière, realizing that Fabien could not fly to safety, could only hope for a lucky crash landing through the storm.

Mme Fabien, distraught, arrived at the airfield. Rivière, knowing that he could not comfort her, was too wise to try, but he sympathized with her distress as he tried to explain the enormous effort men must make in order to conquer the skies. He did not speak melodramatically to her, rather, he was matter of fact in what he said, and they understood each other.

At last they received a blurred message from Fabien reporting that he was coming down and entering the rain clouds. They did not know whether the fuel had already run out or whether he was at tempting to guide the plane through the storm to some safe spot.

The plane from Paraguay, in the meantime, had arrived safely, just skirting the edge of the storm. Robineau watched Rivière closely enough to realize that Rivière was enormously concerned, that his sense of discipline was not callousness but a dedicated sense of the purpose in his mission. Robineau came into Rivière's office with some papers and, for a moment, there was a sense of understanding, of communion, between the two men.

As time passed, everyone realized that Fabien was lost. Although some sign of him might still turn up the next day, there was nothing to do now and little hope that he and his wireless operator could be found alive. The pilot of the plane from Paraguay passed the pilot of the plane going to Europe. They exchanged a few words about Fabien, but there was no sentimentality, for the pilots' world realized the necessity for carrying on with a minimum of expressed emotion. Rivière felt that this loss might be used as evidence for the governments to curtail night flying operations. At the same time he believed strongly that these operations must continue, that man must, in spite of disaster, carry on. He ordered the next plane to take off on schedule.

THE NORTHERN LASS

Type of work Drama

Author Richard Brome (? 1652 or 1653)

Type of plot Comedy of manners

Time of plot Early seventeenth century

Locale London

First presented 1632

Principal characters

SIR PHILIP LUCKLESS, an indiscreet gentleman

MASTER TRIDEWELL, Sir Philip's kinsman

MISTRESS FITCHOW, Sir Philip's fiancée

MASTER WIDGINE, her brother

ANVILE, Widgine's boastful tutor

SIR PAUL SQUELCH, a justice and friend of Mistress Fitchow

CONSTANCE, the northern lass, Squelch's niece

MISTRESS TRAYNWELL, her governess

CONSTANCE HOLDUP, a cunning prostitute

Critique

Richard Brome, first the servant and later the friend of Ben Jonson, wrote fifteen plays, alternating between romantic comedy and comedy of manners. The Northern Lass, catalogued in the latter group, often borders on pure farce because of its ridiculous situations and practical jokes. The plot twists and winds until it appears impossibly complicated, but Brome manipulates its several threads with great skill. The play does not concern itself very actively with social comment, though its romantic situations involve some indirect gibes at marriage customs and standards among the English upper middle class.

The Story

Sir Philip Luckless, engaged to marry the rich widow, Mistress Fitchow, refused to listen to the protests of his companion, Master Tridewell. Tridewell insisted that the lady was too old and too domineering for the match to be successful, but his warning made no impression upon his friend and kinsman. Doubts did begin to enter the mind of Sir Philip, however, when he was presently brought face to face with Master Widgine, the foolish brother of his bride to be, and with Widgine's equally foolish tutor, the braggart Anvile.

The encounter between this pair and Sir Philip was soon interrupted by the abrupt arrival of a stranger, Mistress Traynwell, who upset Sir Philip by the charge that, in marrying Mistress Fitchow, he was ignoring a prior marriage contract with a young girl under Mistress Traynwell's care. To strengthen this accusation, the gentlewoman handed him a note signed with the single name, Constance. Sir Philip, confused, immediately thought of a prostitute named Constance Holdup, with whom he had had some previous acquaintance, he hastily assumed that Mistress Traynwell was the prostitute's unscrupulous agent and unceremoniously dismissed her, calling her a bawd.

Meanwhile, Tridewell boldly decided to intervene in the affairs of Sir Philip by paying a visit to Mistress Fitchow. Hoping to find some way to block the impending marriage, he began to criticize the character and habits of Sir Philip, but Mistress Fitchow proved too clever to be taken in by his line of attack. Instead, she assumed an attitude of such sweet reasonableness and such devoted constancy to her lover that Tridewell, completely deceived, found himself falling in love with the woman whom he had previously scorned.

Sir Philip, still nervous from his interview with Mistress Traynwell, decided to forestall what he considered blackmail by hastening his marriage. Consequently, he took a coach to the house of his fiancée and sent in word of his desire to wed immediately. Somewhat surprised, but not unwilling, Mistress Fitchow made preparations to leave the house and join her lover in the coach. While completing her toilette she took the necessary time to inform her brother Widgine of her desire to marry him to a northern lass named Constance, the niece of Sir Paul Squelch, a well known justice. Widgine, though he had never even heard of Constance before, became enthusiastic when he learned that the girl would receive a large dowry from her childless uncle.

The attractive subject of this conversation, the northern lass, was meanwhile being questioned by her governess, Mistress Traynwell. To the latter's chagrin, she discovered that the young girl had mistaken flowery compliments from Sir Philip for an actual marriage proposal. As they talked, they were disturbed by an odd train of events which they eventually perceived to be a hoax planned by Pate, Sir Philip's servant. Pate, having observed his master's treatment of Mistress Traynwell and concluding that she was of the same ilk as Constance Holdup and therefore to be held in light regard, had prompted the boorish Anvile to call upon Mistress Traynwell and make improper advances to her. Constance and her governess, resenting the affront, tricked him into entering a closet, where they held him prisoner while awaiting the arrival of Tridewell. The latter, who thoroughly detested Anvile, beat him until he confessed not only the hoax but also Sir Philip's hasty marriage. This news dismayed, for different reasons, both Tridewell and Constance, but Tridewell asked the women to trust him in his efforts to salvage the situation, especially since Sir Philip's marriage would not be irrevocable until it had been consummated.

When Sir Philip and his bride returned to her house, they were greeted by Sir Paul Squelch and others. Squelch, in a peevish mood because his niece was not present, reaffirmed his intention of marrying her to Master Nonsense, a Cornish gentleman, instead of to Widgine. Disguised as masquers, Constance, Tridewell, Mistress Traynwell, and Anvile presently entered and entertained the company, after they had finished, Anvile lingered behind the others for the purpose of revealing their true identities. Learning that Constance had been present gave Sir Philip a shock he quickly realized that it had been she, rather than Constance Holdup who had fallen in love with him. Mistress Fitchow, so recently transformed into Lady Luckless, grew angry at Sir Philip's obvious interest in Constance and flounced off in a huff.

A note from Constance increased Sir Philip's feeling that his hasty marriage might have been a terrible mistake. A gleam of hope appeared, however, when he received the news, through Widgine, that Mistress Fitchow had barred her door against the bridegroom. Reacting swiftly to this information, Sir Philip and Tridewell began to confer, with the object of bringing about a divorce.

Even though Constance found Master Nonsense inarticulate and empty-headed, Squelch insisted that she yield to his suit, at Mistress Traynwell's importunity, however, it was decided that Constance could have more time to become amenable to this courtship. Squelch demonstrated his obstinacy in still other ways. Enamored of Mistress Traynwell, he had secretly intended to make her his wife. When, however, she had the misfortune to anger him inadvertently, his pique was so great that he decided to throw his fortune away on merrymaking and self-indulgence. Because of this fit of spleen, Squelch fell victim all the more easily to a practical joke which was planned and executed with elaborate care by Tridewell and Sir Philip. It involved the justice's deception by the prostitute, Constance Holdup, who was coached in her words and actions by the two jesters.

While his reckless mood still prevailed, Squelch was persuaded that Constance

Holdup, of whom he had been cleverly made aware, was a simple country girl who would accept his amorous advances. Installing her, soon afterward, in an inconspicuous apartment, he instructed her to assume the identity of his niece so that his visits to her would attract no comment. But Widgine, in his determination to win the real northern lass, succeeded in locating this hideaway of Constance Holdup. Since he had never seen Squelch's niece, the real object of his search, except as a masquer, he was now convinced that his pursuit had successfully ended. The prostitute, spying unexpected dividends from this turn of the game, responded to his advances and agreed to elope with him.

Meanwhile, her irritation with Sir Philip led Mistress Fitchow to declare that she would allow him to divorce her only after Constance—whom she suspected to be the real object of his affection—was safely married to someone else. This person, she hoped, would be her own brother. She was greatly pleased, therefore, when Tridewell brought her a report that Widgine and Constance had succeeded in eloping. Not so pleased, naturally, was Squelch, who had heard the same report but who, as yet, did not realize just which Constance had flown with Widgine. Squelch took the occasion to upbraid Mistress Fitchow for being her brother's accomplice, they occupied themselves in trading violent insults while Tridewell sought vainly to restrain them.

Squelch, disguised as a Spaniard, went to keep a previously made assignation with Constance Holdup. He still did not know that Widgine had spirited her away, least of all did he suspect that Mistress Traynwell, disguised, was waiting in her place as part of the plot to cozen him still further. By prearrangement, a constable broke in on them, arrested the supposed Spaniard and his companion, and took them to Squelch's own house for arraignment. There the rest of their acquaintances awaited them, masked as merry-makers.

After sufficiently enjoying Squelch's confusion, Mistress Traynwell disclosed her identity and persuaded him that she was, after all, the right mate for him. The others also unmasked and began to set straight their tangled relationships. First, Widgine purchased his freedom from Constance Holdup for a hundred pounds.

Then both Sir Philip and Mistress Fitchow were surprised to learn that their marriage ceremony had been performed by a prankish impostor, rather than a licensed minister, consequently, both Sir Philip and Tidewell were free to wed the ladies of their choice.

NOTES ON THE STATE OF VIRGINIA

Type of work Essays on American culture
Author Thomas Jefferson (1743-1826)
First published 1784-1785

Thomas Jefferson's universality is best evinced in his Notes on the State of Virginia, which he began writing in 1780 in answer to inquiries from the French government about conditions in Virginia. Then Governor of Virginia, Jefferson's far-reaching interests ranged over all of what he called America's empire of liberty. The Notes are not restricted, therefore, to the boundaries of Virginia as they existed before 1781, including, in addition to the present commonwealth, the territory now covered by the states of West Virginia, Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and part of Pennsylvania. The writing of the Notes was made easier because Jefferson for some twenty years had collected colonial maps, legislative journals, newspapers, and explorers' accounts. He had made and continued to make investigation of Virginia's institutions, economy, flora, fauna, fossils, meteorological conditions, and Indian culture. No dry, statistical account, although containing plenty of facts, the Notes deal with culture in its widest sense. They include so many of Jefferson's comments about social phenomena that they comprise in capsule his political and social philosophy, his intellectual, scientific and ethnic beliefs.

The book, with 260 pages of text and appendices, is arranged arbitrarily by the queries of François Marbois, secretary of the French legation in Philadelphia. Jefferson's essays in reply vary in length from one page each on Sea Ports and Manne Force to the forty-five pages accorded Virginia's Productions, Mineral, Vegetable and Animal. Essays between ten and twenty pages consider her Aborigines, Constitution, Laws, and Jefferson's Draught of a Fundamental Constitution.

Besides writing celebrated descriptions of Harper's Ferry and Natural Bridge, Jefferson speculated on the physical characteristics of beasts and mankind as well as on the natural resources of his state. He convincingly refuted the contention of the French naturalist Buffon that there were fewer species of mammals in America than in Europe and that the American ones had degenerated as a result of the inferior climate. With spirit, he contradicted Buffon's disparagement of the American Indian, hailing the noble red man as superior to the white in fortitude as equal in physical conformation, and as potentially equal in sexual prowess and mental talent. The Indian's limitations were, insisted Jefferson, only those which resulted from inadequate diet and a cultural lag which he compared with that of the Gauls before the Roman conquests north of the Alps. In response to the Abbé Raynal's lament that America had produced no good poet, mathematician, or scientist, Jefferson asserted with pride his claims for Franklin in physics, for Rittenhouse in astronomy, for Catesby in ornithology, and for the Indian Logan in eloquence. As for other cultural achievements, Jefferson pleaded for time in which American liberty might achieve what he considered its certain promise

Although Jefferson did not write a separate essay on the subject of education, he outlined fully his views in the Notes. In doing so he concealed with typical modesty the personal role he had played in the reform of the College of William and Mary and in proposing a system of primary and grammar school education. Preoccupation with religion at the college was transferred during the Revolution to emphasis on science, at the same time Latin and Greek gave ground to modern languages, but interest in mathematics and moral philosophy was continued. Jefferson's schemes for pre-college education were not so extreme as is sometimes thought. He did urge free education of all children in the Three R's and in mathematics, but only the best student of a school district six miles square would study at the state's expense in an intermediate or grammar school, whose six year curriculum afforded instruction in Greek, Latin, geography, and mathematics. By the end of the second year of grammar school, the unfit were to have been rigorously pruned. At the end of the sixth year the upper fifty percent would have been selected by examinations and given scholarships for college. At any stage in this educational pyramid, a prosperous parent could continue his child's education at private expense if the child did not meet the high standards set for state scholars.

Similarly, Jefferson praised the disestablishment of the colonial Church, but he failed to mention his own part in that accomplishment. Reliant on reason, sure that a neighbor's belief in plural gods or in none could hurt no other, he was happy at the increasing sectarian diversity of the Old Dominion, but he urged suspicion of zealots, whom he believed always responsible for persecutions in the name of uniformity. Jefferson's eloquence in the cause of freedom of conscience was later on turned against him, and his enemies twisted his statements in the Notes to condemn him as an anti Christ

The ideal of a simple, frugal, agrarian republic is nowhere better stated than in Jefferson's essays on Manufactures. His conviction that "those who labour in the earth are the chosen people of God" was accompanied by the corollary that "the great mobs of great cities" corrupted both humans and governments. To preserve Virginia's arcady, therefore, he discouraged construction of "satanic" mills and factories, saying "let our work shops remain in Europe." As a scientific farmer, he gleefully asserted that on the eve of the Revolution Virginia had so diversified her economy that wheat almost equaled tobacco as her staple, and he was by no means loath to see her primacy in tobacco pass to more southerly states.

On grounds of republicanism, incentive, and efficiency Jefferson admonished his fellow citizens that slavery was injurious to both master and slave, and he hoped for a voluntary increase in Negro emancipation and deportation to Africa, whither he would also have consigned Negro criminals at the expense of the state. More than six pages were devoted to consideration of Negroes in his essay on Manufactures, in the course of which Jefferson concluded that they were inferior to the white race when judged on their accomplishments, unlike the white slaves of Greek or Roman times, who had surpassed their masters in that respect. He lamented the lack of study of Negroes as "subjects of natural history," and he advanced the "suspicion only" that the Negro was indeed "inferior to the whites in the endowments both of body and of mind." Friendly to the plight of the Negro, anxious for his emancipation, this future president of that American Colonization Society which founded Liberia was adamant on one point. "When freed, he is to be removed beyond the reach of mixture."

Jefferson's policies as President of the United States were also foreshadowed in the Notes. Desiring to "cultivate the peace and friendship of every nation," he wished "to throw open the door of commerce to all" With conviction in peaceful progress, he advocated minimum military or naval forces on two grounds American financial resources could not maintain a force to stand against that of a European power without bankrupting the country, and the expenditure of such funds would be more beneficially applied to the improving of the arts and handicrafts of America

In his essay on Virginia's Constitution, Jefferson provided a brief historical account of the Old Dominion, for which he also compiled a bibliography of charters and legislative acts Stressing the continuum of Virginian history, he praised such historians as Captain John Smith and Robert Beverley Doubtless he considered that he was more factual than a propagandist in insistence on his theme of royal and parliamentary subversion of legislative assemblies and those rights of freeborn Englishmen guaranteed by the ancient charters which he cited He laid heavy emphasis on the injustice of James I's revocation of the Virginia Company charter, of the diminution of the colony's extent by proprietary grants made by the king out of her domain, and of Parliament's illegal assumption of control over colonial foreign trade during the 1650's Indeed, contended Jefferson, the colonists had every right to believe that their capitulation to the Cromwellian military forces in 1651 had secured reaffirmation of ancient boundaries, upon which Maryland impinged, and of freedom in foreign trade In view of contemporary dispute over Bacon's Rebellion in 1676, it is interesting to observe that Jefferson makes no reference to that event in this formal historical essay As might be supposed, Jefferson, in bringing the history of the Old Dominion down to his own time, placed the heaviest blame for the wrongs she suffered on George III and his parliaments Revolution in 1776 is presented as inevitable, as honorable resistance in stead of unconditional submission to tyranny

Jefferson has been in our history an ideologue claimed by almost all political parties Unlike much of his profuse personal and official correspondence, his Notes on the State of Virginia was a formal, considered work, more important to knowledge of the man, his ideas, and his America than momentary effusions from his pen, such as private letters

Jefferson's only other book published during his lifetime was his parliamentary Manual The Notes were first published in English at Paris in 1785 During his lifetime he made corrections, emendations and addenda to that text with an eye to authorizing the new, corrected, and enlarged edition which was finally published at Richmond in 1853 and which will remain standard until the editors of the Princeton edition of The Papers of Thomas Jefferson publish their version of the Notes as one of the last of its fifty odd volumes

With good reason twentieth century scholars have looked with renewed interest on the Notes on the State of Virginia as one of the first masterpieces of American literature and possibly the most important scientific and political book written by an American before 1785

ODE TO APHRODITE

Type of work Poem

Author Sappho (fl. c. 600 B.C.)

First transcribed Sixth century B.C.

The Ode to Aphrodite, a representative introduction to the poetry of Sappho, may be summarized thus The poetess, Sappho, invokes the attention of Aphrodite, goddess of love, and invites her to leave the house of Zeus, mount her chariot, and let her doves bear her to the earth The poetess imagines their meeting the goddess will inquire who it is that troubles Sappho by fleeing from her, by refusing to reciprocate the ardors of love. That person—Sappho imagines the promise of the goddess—will soon suffer as Sappho now suffers. The vision, briefly and movingly expressed, concludes, and in the last lines Sappho takes up the prayer with which the poem begins. It is a prayer to an absent being—a goddess who may or may not be gracious.

This ode, a brilliant specimen of the six hundred lines of Sappho's poetry that remain, is characteristic of a body of work very distant from us and yet modern. Sappho's poetry once consisted of nine books of some twelve thousand lines, but all except a few fragments are supposed to have been destroyed by Church leaders in Constantinople and Rome. Some of her work, fortunately survived because it was quoted by grammarians who used her passionate verse to illustrate a syntactical point. Other fragments, written on papyrus, were discovered in 1897 at Oxyrhynchus in Egypt. Ancient coffins had been lined and stuffed with Sappho's living verse.

Out of such materials scholars have labored to reconstitute the reputation and the effect of a woman whom the Greeks called "the poetess" just as they called Homer "the poet." Plato, in the Phaedrus, declared that she was worthy to rank with the nine muses. Out of references in the poems and also from confusing, transmitted tradition, some sort of biography of the writer may be put together, and is not uninteresting to us because the voice of passion is always the voice of a living person. Born shortly before the beginning of the sixth century B.C. on the island of Lesbos in the Aegean, Sappho grew up in a civilization that was rich and relaxed, epicurean before the time of Epicurus. The luxury of the life which her class enjoyed stirred the merchants of the island to revolt; they supported a "tyrant" named Pittacus. Sappho was twice exiled from her native town, the second time as far away as Sicily. During her exile she married, bore a daughter, was widowed, and returned to Lesbos. Here, for a time at least, she put masculine affection behind her, even though her fellow exile, Alcaeus, had expressed a warm interest in her. Instead, Sappho set up a sort of academy, here she was the mistress and guiding spirit of young women whose self-cultivation and loves she supervised. The charms of the young women were celebrated in Sappho's verse and their departure to other places or to the marriage altar caused Sappho to lament. Of this section of her mature life the Ode to Aphrodite, the Ode to Anactoria, the Farewell to Anactoria, and other poems seem to speak.

There is also a record of Sappho's objection to the marriage her brother made with an Egyptian courtesan. Ancient tradition also tells how Sappho, no longer preoccupied with her group of lovely girls, leaped from a cliff because Phaon the sailor would not respond to her affection. Yet another fragment touchingly shows us Sappho pointing to her wrinkles when someone speaks to her of love.

Whatever her tastes, Sappho was certainly "love's creature"; she tells us she served a goddess who could make the limbs sweat and tremble as well as stir with joy. When Sappho speaks of a girl as the sweet apple remaining alone on a high twig, perceived by the gatherer but unreachd, or when she tells us of a girl who cannot mind her spinning because her fingers ache with love's desire, Sappho is initiating a tradition of sensual frankness in Western poetry. Moreover, when Sappho's laments mark the departure of Atthis or some other friend from the charmed and charming circle of girls who used to wander through the gardens of Lesbos, we can hear in Sappho's lines the authentic voice of passion and desperation.

At such moments, Sappho's odes and fragments do not testify to mere convention. They record an experience of life that is as fresh and troubled today as it was six centuries before Christ. "Never shall I see Atthis again If this is so, should I not die?" Human devotion, distressed attachment—a whole significant part of the possible human adventure is explored in Sappho's poems

OLD FORTUNATUS

Type of work Drama

Author Thomas Dekker (c 1572 1632?)

Type of plot Allegoncal comedy

Time of plot Tenth century

Locale Cyprus, Babylon, England

First presented 1599

Principal characters

FORTUNATUS, a foolish man endowed by Fortune

ANDELOCIA, his worldly younger son

AMPEDO, his virtuous older son

AGRIPYNE, daughter of the King of England

FORTUNE

VIRTUE

VICE

Critique

A story of a father and son who could not escape the attraction of money, Old Fortunatus contains excellent passages of poetry, of wit, and of humor. Structural weaknesses, however, keep it from being a great play. The plot was impaired by revisions that were made for a special performance before Queen Elizabeth, and even greater damage resulted from Dekker's own uncertainty of purpose. An uneasy marriage of morality and farce, the play is too moralistic to be wholly amusing, too farcical to be seriously moral.

The Story

Fortunatus had never assiduously pursued virtue. He had been compelled, however, by his poverty to lead a life of patience and temperance. One day, after wandering for three days in a forest and sustaining himself by eating nuts, he unexpectedly encountered the Goddess Fortune. This meeting was to transform his life. The goddess, who enjoyed both the praises and the curses of men as tokens of her power, chose to smile on the old man. Of her six gifts—wisdom, strength, health, beauty, long life, and riches—she offered him one. Believing that all other blessings would naturally flow from it, Fortunatus chose wealth. To effect his wish, she gave to him a magic purse that would always contain ten pieces of gold, no matter how frequently he drew from it. This gift, she told him, would last until he and his sons died. After reproaching him for his foolish choice, she sent him on his way home.

At home, Fortunatus found his sons, Ampedo and Andelocia, in a despondent mood. Andelocia, the worldly son, had been lamenting his lack of food and money, while his more virtuous brother, Ampedo, had been greatly worried about their father's plight. Fortunatus, returning in rich attire, told them they need sorrow no longer, for he was presenting them with four bags of gold and would give them more when it was gone. Then he announced his intention to travel and associate with the mighty men of the world.

Meanwhile, Fortune was joined in the forest by Virtue and Vice, goddesses who had come to Cyprus to plant trees of good and evil. Virtue's tree had withered leaves and little fruit, while Vice's flourished. Although Virtue had experienced defeats and was forced to endure the taunts of Vice, she had resolved once again to seek fertile ground for her tree Fortune, who advanced both the virtuous and the vicious, cared not whose tree flourished, but agreed to judge the contest and declare the sovereignty of the winner

Fortunatus, once scorned, now found himself honored in every court Among other rulers, he visited the Soldan of Babylon, who had heard of the purse and wished it for himself The crafty Fortunatus said that he had given away three of the purses and would make an other for him In gratitude, the soldan proposed to show the old man the wondrous sights of Babylon He started with his most highly valued possession, a hat which earned its wearer wherever he wished to be Tricking the soldan into letting him try on the hat, Fortunatus wished himself in Cyprus and disappeared

Convinced of the supreme value of money, he returned home at the height of his triumph His self congratulations were interrupted, however, by a second encounter with Fortune, who, this time decreed his death His dying wish that his sons might have wisdom instead of wealth was denied Bequeathing them the purse and the wishing hat, he asked that the two gifts be kept together and shared equally No sooner had he died than Anelocia insisted that they be exchanged each year

Anelocia, in possession of the purse, followed the example of his father by going to court His first destination was England, where he planned to test the effect of gold on the beautiful Agnipyne, daughter of King Athelstane When Athelstane observed the lavish spending of Anelocia, he advised his daughter to try to discover the source of this wealth With ease she drew the secret from the foolish young man, then drugged him and took the purse

Awaking and discovering the theft, Anelocia, discouraged, determined to return home, steal from his brother the wishing hat, seek out the dwelling place of Misery, and there make his home He carried out his resolution to possess the magic hat but, instead of seeking Misery, he returned to England, abducted Agnipyne, and carried her away into the wilderness But again she was able to outsmart him, this time accidentally gaining possession of the hat and wishing herself in England

The hapless Anelocia, after having eaten an apple, discovered that he had grown horns The Goddess Vice stood before him and mocked him, for it was her apple that had caused his deformity Virtue also stood before him, grieving and offering him apples that would remove the horn He accepted Virtue's apples and pledged himself to be her minion

But his resolve was short lived, for his love of money was much more compelling than his promise to Virtue He returned to England determined to recover the purse and hat Disguised as Irish costermongers, he and his servant peddled the apples of Vice which he had brought with him By falsely representing the effect of eating the apples, he sold them to Agnipyne and two courtiers, Longaville and Montrose While thus employed, he was discovered by his brother Ampedo, who had come to England to find the purse and hat and to burn those sources of grief and shame

Longaville, Montrose, and Agnipyne grew horns, and Agnipyne found herself promptly deserted by all but one of her many suitors After they discovered that the horns grew back after being cut, they sought the help of a French physician, who was, in reality, Anelocia in another disguise By using a medicine taken from the apples of Virtue, he removed Longaville's horns As he turned to treat Agnipyne, he spied the magic hat Warning everyone to look the other way so that his cure would work, he grabbed the hat, took Agnipyne by the hand, and wished himself with his brother

After he had recovered the purse, An delocia removed the horns from Agripyne and released her. But he was not destined to enjoy his possessions long. Ampedo, according to his pledge, burned the hat. Soon afterward Longaville and Montrose found Andelocia and took the magic purse. Seeking revenge for the indignities they had suffered, they placed the brothers in the stocks, where Ampedo died of grief and Andelocia was strangled.

Longaville and Montrose then turned to quarreling between themselves over the purse, but were interrupted by the arrival of members of the court and the three goddesses. The purse was reclaimed by Fortune, and the two courtiers were condemned by Vice to spend their lives wandering with tormented consciences.

Again a quarrel broke out between Virtue and Vice. This time Fortune turned to the audience for judgment. For her judge, Virtue singled out Queen Elizabeth. And at the sight of this paragon of virtue, Vice fled, Fortune bowed to a superior force, and Virtue admitted that she, by comparison, was a mere counterfeit.

ON LIBERTY

Type of work Philosophical essay
Author John Stuart Mill (1806-1873)
First published 1859

John Stuart Mill, the English Utilitarian, here concerns himself with the problem of defining the limits of the power of the state in interfering with the liberty of persons. The result is one of the most important statements in the history of Western democracy. The essay is distinguished by its clarity and the orderly arrangement of its persuasive argument. Throughout the book can be discerned Mill's interest in the happiness and rights of men everywhere and his serious concern lest that happiness be threatened by governmental power unwisely used.

Mill states concisely that

The object of this Essay is to assert one very simple principle, as entitled to govern absolutely the dealings of society with the individual in the way of compulsion and control, whether the means used be physical force in the form of legal penalties or the moral coercion of public opinion. That principle is, that the sole end for which mankind are warranted, individually or collectively, in interfering with the liberty of action of any of their number, is self-protection. That the only purpose for which power can be rightfully exercised over any member of a civilized community, against his will, is to prevent harm to others.

Another statement of the author's intention is found in the last chapter, "Applications," in which Mill states that two maxims together form "the entire doctrine" of the essay. The first maxim is "that the individual is not accountable to society for his actions, in so far as these concern the interests of no person but himself," and the second is "that for such actions as are prejudicial to the interests of others, the individual is accountable, and may be subjected either to social or to legal punishment, if society is of the opinion that the one or the other is requisite for its protection."

It would be an error of interpretation of Mill's intention to suppose that he is explicitly objecting to all efforts of government to improve the condition of its citizens. What Mill objects to is the restriction of human liberty for the sake of human welfare; he has nothing against welfare itself. On the contrary, as a Utilitarian, he believes that a right act is one which aims at the greatest happiness of the greatest number of persons, and it is precisely because the restriction of human liberty is so destructive to human happiness

ness that he makes a plea for a judicious use of restrictive power, justifying it only when it is used to prevent harm, or unhappiness of whatever sort, to others than the person being restricted

Restricting a man's liberty for his own good, for his happiness, is not morally justifiable Mill permits, even encourages, "remonstrating" and "reasoning" with a person who is determined to act against his own best interests but he does not approve of using force to keep him from it

After reviewing some of the acts which a person may rightfully be compelled to do—such as to give evidence in court to bear a fair share of the common defense, and to defend the helpless—Mill asserts that society has no right to interfere when a man's acts concern, for the most part, only himself This statement means that a man must be free in his conscience, thought, and feeling, and that he must have freedom of opinion and sentiment on all subjects This latter freedom involves freedom of the press In addition, each man should be free to do what he likes and to enjoy what he prefers—provided what he does is not harmful to others Finally, each man should be free to unite with others for any purpose—again, provided no one is harmed by this action

Certainly this theme is pertinent, for at any time there is either the present or the possible danger of government interference in human affairs Mill admits that his principal thesis has the "air of a truism," but he goes on to remind the reader that states have often felt justified in using their power to limit the liberty of citizens in areas which Mill regards as sacrosanct In the context of Mill's philosophic work, On Liberty remains one of his most important essays, sharing honors with his Utilitarianism

In perhaps the most carefully articulated part of his argument, in Chapter II, "On the Liberty of Thought and Discussion," Mill considers what the consequences of suppressing the expression of opinion would be if the suppressed opinion were true, and then, having countered a series of objections to his arguments against suppression, he continues by considering what the consequences of suppressing opinion would be if the opinion were false

Suppressing true opinion is clearly wrong, particularly if the opinion is suppressed on the ground that it is false Silencing the expression of opinion on the ground that the opinion is false is a sign of an assumption of infallibility A moment's thought shows that the assumption may be mistaken, and that suppressing opinion may very well make discovery of error impossible

In response to the objection that it is permissible to suppress opinion, even true opinion, because the truth always triumphs, Mill answers that the idea that truth always wins out is a "pleasant falsehood" proved false by experience To the objection that at least we no longer put men to death for expressing their opinions, Mill counters with the argument that other kinds of persecution continue to be practiced, destroying truth and moral courage

If the opinion suppressed be false, Mill continues the prevailing and true opinion lacking opposition, becomes a dead dogma When ideas are not continually met by opposing ideas they tend to be come either meaningless or groundless, or both Beliefs which at one time had force and reasons behind them may come to be nothing but empty words

The argument in favor of freedom of opinion and the press closes with the claim that most opinions are neither wholly true nor wholly false, but mixtures of the two, and that only in free discussion can the difference be made out

In order to reinforce his central contention—that it is always wrong to hinder the freedom of an individual when what he does is not harmful to others—Mill devotes a chapter to an argument designed to show that development of individuality is essential to man's happiness. Since there is nothing better than happiness, it follows that individuality should be fostered and guaranteed. Mill supports Baron Wilhelm von Humboldt's injunction that every human being aim at "individuality of power and development," for which there are two prerequisites: "freedom and the variety of situations."

There is a refreshing pertinence to Mill's discussion of the value of individuality. We are reminded of Emerson's defense of nonconformism when we read that "Originality is the one thing which unoriginal minds cannot feel the use of," and "He who lets the world, or his own portion of it, choose his plan of life for him, has no need of any other faculty than the ape-like one of imitation." Mill argues that only if uncustomary acts are allowed to show their merits can anyone decide which mode of action should be come customary, and, in any case, the differences among men demand that differences of conduct be allowed so that each man can become what is best for him.

In his discussion of the harm that results from a state's interference with the rights of an individual to act in ways that concern only himself, Mill reviews some of the consequences of religious intolerance, prohibition, and other attempts to restrict liberty for the common good. In each case, he argues, the result is not only failure to achieve the goal of the prohibitive act, but some damage to the character of the state and its citizens.

As if he were writing for our times, Mill closes by saying that "a State which dwarfs its men, in order that they may be more docile instruments in its hands even for beneficial purposes—will find that with small men no great thing can be accomplished."

ON THE ORIGIN OF SPECIES

Type of work: Biological study
Author: Charles Darwin (1809-1882)
First published: 1859

Charles Darwin's On the Origin of Species—originally titled On the Origin of Species by Means of Natural Selection, or the Preservation of Favoured Races in the Struggle for Life—belongs to that category of books which almost every educated person knows by title and subject but which the average person has never read. This is a circumstance to be regretted, for probably no other book written in modern times has had so powerful an influence on contemporary thought, either indirectly or directly. For Darwin's report on his biological investigations came to have far-reaching importance beyond the field of biology; the evidence he presented and the implications and principles it involved came eventually to influence psychology, sociology, law, theology, educational theory, philosophy, literature, and other branches of man's intellectual endeavor.

The ideas contained in this work were not entirely new in Western culture, as Darwin himself realized. It was he, however, who put theory in definitive form, and his writings caught the public's attention, so that in the public mind his book, together with his name, came to be a symbol for an empirical, positivistic approach to problems and their study.

Scholarly opinion is somewhat divided as to Darwin's contribution to biological science. He built on the researches of his predecessors, as all scientists do, but to his studies he brought immense labors of his own. More than twenty years prior to the publication of On the Origin of Species he had contemplated the theory that species were not immutable. As a naturalist he had spent five years in scientific study during the voyage of H.M.S. Beagle. During that time he had unusual chances to observe flora and fauna around the globe, those observations led him to believe that species did change, for what he observed caused him to see the probability of common descent for all living organisms. As early as 1837 he had begun a systematic study to determine whether such hypotheses were correct, and by 1842 he had a rough draft of his theory of evolution. Wishing to conduct as exhaustive investigations as he could before publication of his theory, he postponed public statement. In 1858 a manuscript setting forth the same ideas came to him from A. R. Wallace. The two men, working independently, had come to similar conclusions. Darwin then felt obliged to publish a statement of his own work in July 1858, at a meeting of the Linnaean Society. On the Origin of Species was published a little over a year later. His later books—Variation of Animals and Plants under Domestication (1868), The Descent of Man (1871) and other writings—elaborated particular aspects of the general theory promulgated in the first book.

The possibility of evolution of species goes back in the history of thought to classical times, even Aristotle hinted at it in his writings. Darwin opened his book with an account of previous thinking on the theory of evolution in which he outlined earlier statements, beginning with Buffon, in modern times, and noting such men as Lamarck, Geoffroy Saint-Hilaire, W. Herbert, von Buch, Haldeman, the anonymous author of Vestiges of Creation, and others. In his introduction he also exercised care in warning the reader what to expect. He wrote

This Abstract which I now publish, must necessarily be imperfect. I cannot here give references and authorities for my several statements, and I must trust to the reader reposing some confidence in my accuracy. No doubt errors will have crept in, though I hope I have always been cautious in trusting to good authorities alone. I can here give only the general conclusions at which I have arrived, with a few facts in illustration, but which, I hope, in most cases will suffice. No one can feel more sensible than I do of the necessity of hereafter publishing in detail all the facts with references on which any conclusions have been grounded, and I hope in a future work to do this. For I am well aware that scarcely a single point is discussed in this volume on which facts cannot be adduced, often apparently leading to conclusions directly opposite to those at which I have arrived. A fair result can be obtained only by fully stating and balancing the facts and arguments on both sides of each question, and this is here impossible.

Again, in his final chapter titled "Recapitulation and Conclusion," Darwin told his readers that the book is "one long argument" in favor of the theory of mutability and evolution of species in both the plant and animal worlds. He pointed out that all the evidence had not been gathered and that even the likelihood of someday having all the evidence is so slight as to be wholly inconceivable. Darwin pointed out that there have been too many gradations, especially among broken and failing groups of organisms, including those which have in past eras become extinct.

The vast amount of information Darwin laid before readers of On the Origin of Species can be appreciated only by actually reading the work itself in its entirety. A partial list of the chapter headings does give an indication, however, of the kinds of evidence Darwin accumulated and presented for the reader. There are chapters on both variation in nature and under domestication, there are chapters on the struggle for existence, on natural selection, on the principles of variation, on instinct, on hybridism, and on the geographical distribution of flora and fauna. There are also chapters on various objections to the general theory of evolution, on the mutual affinities of organic beings, and on the imperfections of the geological record of the succession of organisms. These chapters, more or less interdependent, cast light on all varied aspects of the theory of progressive evolution of species. For this reason the chapters do not lend themselves to separate study. Darwin's organization of his material is as complex as it is excellent.

Darwin's theory of progressive evolution has been misunderstood at times. Despite the fact that he did his best to avoid misunderstanding, there were misinterpretations. Although Darwin pointedly expressed his view that natural selection had been the principal means by which variation occurred, some critics objected that his theory rested on saying that natural selection was the only means by which variation occurred. The grossness of such misinterpretations, now that the theory can be approached in most quarters without emotion, should be obvious to any careful reader.

In spite of its length and the weight of its content, On the Origin of Species is a remarkably easy book to read. The credit must go to the care with which Darwin organized his materials and the lucid style in which he wrote. His writing is scientific writing at its best. Each sentence is carefully worded so that prolixity is seldom encountered. The ideas flow naturally from sentence to sentence and paragraph to paragraph. To characterize this style, one can say of it figuratively that it is lean and muscular. Living in an age when superlatives and prolixity abound, the twentieth century reader may find himself pleasantly surprised in reading Darwin's prose.

ORFEO

Type of work Poetic drama with music

Author Politian (Angelo Ambrogini, 1454-1494)

Type of plot Mythological tragedy

Time of plot Remote antiquity

Locale Sicily

First presented 1480

Principal characters

ORPHEUS

EURYDICE

ARISTAEUS,

MOPSUS, and

THYRSIS, shepherds

PLUTO

PROSERPINA

Critique

To a city dweller, life in the country, when he is not compelled to live there, has always held a poetic charm. As far back as the third century B.C., Philetas, on the island of Cos, collected a group of young poets to hymn the joys of rustic existence. One was Theocritus (305?-c. 250 B.C.), of Sicily, whose bucolic poems have survived. They inspired the Eclogues of Vergil (70-19 B.C.). Prose writers, too, were attracted by this theme. No writer, however, was moved to put these idealized shepherds on the stage until a young Tuscan, Angelo Ambrogini, born in Montepulciano in 1454, was asked by Cardinal Francesco Gonzago, of Mantua, to help in a gala entertainment for Duke Galeazzo Sforza. Drawing on his classical training in Florence, in two days this eighteen year old wrote Orfeo, a play in verse with music. The play is short, for the amateur playwright failed to wring all the drama from his material. The characters in the first act drop out of sight and the final act has nothing to do with the original problem. The death of the new protagonist comes, not from some flaw in his character, but because he angered a crowd of drunken women. However, one must remember that Orfeo was both the world's first pastoral drama and the first Italian nonreligious play. Also, since music was provided for some of the speeches, it was a forerunner of Italian opera.

The Story

While looking for a lost calf, old Mopsus came upon Aristaeus and his servant Thyrsis. They had not seen the animal, but Aristaeus sent the young man in search of it. Meanwhile, he told Mopsus that he had seen a nymph more beautiful than Diana in the woods. Although she had been accompanied by a youthful sweetheart, Aristaeus declared that either he must win her love or he would die. Mopsus tried to warn him of the desolation and unhappiness caused by love, but without success, the return of Thyrsis with word that the girl was still in the woods sent Aristaeus hurrying to find her. Both shepherds were convinced that he was mad.

After finding the nymph, Aristaeus tried to make love to her, but she fled. A moment later another nymph appeared with news that the lovely Eurydice had just died of a serpent bite by the river side. She called on her sister dryads to join in a dirge "to set the air ringing with the sound of wailing." As they sang, they saw Orpheus, her sweetheart, approaching with his lyre. The dryad took it upon herself to break to him the sad news of Eurydice's death.

When Orpheus' song about the exploits of Hercules was interrupted by the nymph bearing "crushing tidings," the desolate poet called on sky and sea to hear him lament his bitter fate. At last he vowed to go to the gates of Tartarus in an attempt to win back his dead love—perhaps the magic of his lyre would move even Death to pity. The satyr Menechmus, who had been listening, had his doubts.

In Tartarus, Orpheus' lyre of gold and his beautiful voice "moved the gates immovable." In fact, Pluto acknowledged that everything stood still at his melody. Proserpina was so charmed by it that she seconded Orpheus' request that Eurydice should be returned to him. Pluto agreed on condition that the poet return to earth without looking behind. But in spite of his promise to the king of the underworld, his doubts betrayed him. Orpheus looked back and saw Eurydice drawn again toward Tartarus. When he tried to follow her, Tisiphone refused to let him pass.

While he was lamenting his woes and expressing his determination never again to desire a woman's love, Orpheus was overheard by a chorus of Maenads. One of the Bacchantes, angered that a man should scorn love, exhorted the others to take revenge, and the fierce creatures tore him to pieces in their rage, so that every twig close by was soaked with his blood.

ORLANDO INNAMORATO

Type of work Poem

Author Matteo Maria Boiardo (c. 1440-1494)

Type of plot Chivalric romance

Time of plot Eighth century

Locale France, India, Africa

First transcribed 1486-1495

Principal characters

CHARLEMAGNE, King of France

ORLANDO, his nephew, a paladin of France

ANGELICA, Princess of Cathay

UBERTO, in reality Argalia, her brother

RINALDO, a paladin of France

MALAGIGI, a magician, Rinaldo's brother
 BRADAMANT, a maiden knight, Rinaldo's sister
 ROGERO, a noble young Saracen
 FERRAU, a Spanish knight
 ASTOLPHO, an English knight
 AGRAMANT, King of Africa

Critique

The second of three Italian chivalric romances based on the legendary history of Charlemagne and his paladins, Boiardo's poem unites the Matter of France with the Arthurian by introducing a love story which tells of Orlando's passion for the bewitching Angelica. The poem, consisting of sixty-nine cantos in ottava rima and left incomplete when Boiardo died in 1494, was stylistically revised in the popular edition of Francesco Berni (c. 1497-1535). Boiardo's own manuscript was not recovered until the nineteenth century. This work served as the model for Orlando Furioso (1516-1532) by Ludovico Ariosto (1474-1533). The predecessor of Boiardo's work was Il Morgante Maggiore (c. 1482), by Luigi Pulci (1432-1484), a romance more farcical and less heroic than Orlando Innamorato, concerned as it is with the Christianizing of a famous magician of folklore and filled with tales of ridiculous encounters with giants and sorcerers. In the characters of Bradamant and Rogero, both Boiardo and Ariosto tell of the adventures and love of the supposed ancestors of the great medieval house of Este. Also, both writers blend a world of chivalry and a realm of fantasy. In Don Quixote, Cervantes' hero was made quite as mad reflecting on these chivalric adventures as ever were the mock heroes of the older romances.

The Story

King Charlemagne summoned all his paladins and vassal barons to a court plenary in Paris, an occasion to be celebrated with magnificent tournaments and great feasts in which all friends and foes, Christians and Saracens alike, were invited to take part. To the banquet on the opening night of this fête came an unknown knight, a beautiful damsel, and four giants serving as bodyguards. The knight, who called himself Uberto, offered his lovely sister Angelica as the prize to any man who could defeat him in the jousts to be held the next day. He, in turn, would claim as his prisoner any knight whom he unhorsed. Seeing the beautiful damsel, Orlando, the greatest paladin of Charlemagne's court, was immediately stricken by love, and it was only respect for the monarch that kept Ferrau, a Spanish knight, from snatching her up and carrying her away in his arms. Even great Charlemagne was affected by her charms. The only person unmoved was Malagigi, a magician, who sensed in the visitors some purpose quite different from that which they claimed.

After the damsel and her brother had retired, Malagigi summoned a fiend who informed him that Uberto was in reality Argalia, the son of Galaphron, King of Cathay, sent with his sister to demoralize the Christian knights. With Angelica as his lure, protected by a magic ring that would ward off all enchantment or make him invisible if placed in the mouth, Argalia planned to overcome the Christian knights and dispatch them as prisoners to distant Cathay. Armed with this knowledge, Malagigi mounted a magic steed and flew through the air to the star of Merlin, where Argalia and Angelica were asleep. There he cast a spell over the watchers which caused them to fall into a deep slumber. As the magician approached Angelica with the intention of killing that damsel who was as false as she was fair, he himself became enslaved by her beauty and clasped her in his arms. Angelica awoke with a shriek. Argalia, aroused by her scream, ran to her assistance and together they overcame

Malagigi Angelica then summoned fiends and ordered them to carry the magician to Cathay There King Gala phron confined him in a dungeon beneath the sea

In the meantime dissension had broken out among the knights of Charlemagne's court, for all wished to try their skill against the strange knight in order to win such an enchanting prize At length lots were cast to determine the order of combat The first fell to Astolpho, the second to Ferrau, and the third to the giant Grandonio Next in order came Berlinghier, Otho, and Charlemagne himself Orlando, much to his indignation, was the thirty seventh on the list

At the running of the first course Astolpho was jolted from his saddle Ferrau, who followed, was also unhorsed but, contrary to the rules of the joust, he leaped to his feet and continued the fight on foot After he had slain the giants who attempted to restrain him, he bore himself so fiercely that Argalia, even though he was protected by enchanted armor, finally called a brief truce When the combat was renewed, Angelica suddenly disappeared, followed by Argalia Ferrau pursued them into Arden forest but found no trace of the knight or the damsel Rinaldo and Orlando also set off in pursuit of the fleeing maiden Meanwhile, Astolpho had taken up the magic spear which Argalia had left behind, with this weapon he performed great feats of valor until, carried away by the excitement of the combat, he felled friends and foes alike Finally, by Charlemagne's command, he was overborne and subdued

Rinaldo, Ferrau, and Orlando, meanwhile, were wandering through the forest in search of Angelica Rinaldo had a rather ironic success in his quest Having drunk from a fountain which Merlin had created years before to relieve the love pangs of Tristram and Isolde, the knight no longer loved Angelica, but hated her A short time later he fell asleep beside a nearby stream Angelica, coming upon the stream, drank from its magic waters and immediately became enamored of the sleeping knight When she pulled a handful of flowers and threw them over him, Rinaldo awoke and, in spite of her piteous pleas and avowals of love, fled from her in loathing

Ferrau, riding through the forest, came upon Argalia asleep beneath a tree The two engaged in fierce combat Ferrau, finding a chunk in his enemy's magic armor, struck him to the heart Dying, Argalia asked that his body and armor be thrown into the stream Ferrau agreed, keeping only the helmet of his adversary As he rode on through the wood, he came upon Angelica and Orlando, who, having chanced upon the sleeping maiden, had thrown himself down by her side Supposing that Orlando was her protector, Ferrau awoke the sleeping man with taunts and insults Orlando, starting up, revealed himself, but Ferrau, although surprised, stood his ground A duel followed, in the midst of which Angelica again fled The combat of champions ended only when a strange maiden, Floridespina, appeared with news that Gradasso, King of Sencane, was ravaging the Spanish dominions Ferrau, torn between love and duty, departed for Spain with Floridespina

Gradasso, a mighty monarch who coveted whatever he did not possess, had invaded Europe in order to obtain possession of Durindana, the famed sword of Orlando, and Bayardo, the horse of Rinaldo Charlemagne, assembling all the knights summoned to the tournament, dispatched a mighty army, under Rinaldo, to aid King Marsilius against the pagans During a battle fought near Barcelona, Gradasso and Rinaldo engaged in single combat Neither prevailing, they agreed to fight again on the following day under these conditions if Rinaldo were the victor, Gradasso would release all the prisoners he had taken, if the victory went to Gradasso, Rinaldo would surrender Bayardo to the king

Angelica, meanwhile, had returned to

Cathay Deciding to use Malagigi as the mediator in her pursuit of the disdainful Rinaldo, she released the magician and promised to give him his complete liberty if he would bring Rinaldo to her Deceived by his own brother, Rinaldo was decoyed away from his encounter with Gradasso His troops, left leaderless, returned home Gradasso then invaded France and took Charlemagne and his knights prisoners Offered his liberty and the restoration of his lands if Durindana and Bayardo were surrendered to the conqueror, Charlemagne agreed When he sent to Paris for the horse, which had been returned from Spain, Astolpho, refusing to give up the animal, challenged Gradasso to a duel Using the enchanted lance, Astolpho overthrew the king Gradasso, true to his promise, released his prisoners and returned to Sencane

Orlando, continuing his wanderings, learned that Agrican, the king of Tartary, had sought the hand of Angelica in marriage Angered by the girl's refusal, Agrican besieged Albracca, the capital of Cathay, he had sworn to raze the city if need be in order to possess the princess News of the war having spread far and wide, Orlando, Astolpho, and Rinaldo journeyed by different routes to the kingdom of Cathay There Orlando and Astolpho ranged themselves on the side of the defenders, while Rinaldo, still filled with loathing for Angelica, joined the forces of King Agrican Orlando, riding to the defense of King Galaphron, met Agrican in single combat and slew the Tartar king Later Orlando and Rinaldo engaged in furious combat When night fell, each withdrew in expectation of resuming their struggle on the following day, but that night lovesick Angelica, scheming to save Rinaldo from his kinsman's fury, sent Orlando on a quest to destroy the garden of Falenna in the kingdom of Orgagna

In the meantime Agramant, the young King of Africa, was preparing to lay siege to Paris in revenge for the killing of his father One of his advisers prophesied

failure in his efforts, however, unless he could obtain the help of Rogero a gallant young knight held prisoner by the magician Atlantes on the mountain of Carena

After Orlando had set out on his quest, Rinaldo with several of his companions left the camp before Albracca and started in pursuit, Rinaldo still eager to continue their quarrel On the way Rinaldo encountered a ruffian with whom he fought until both plunged into a lake and disappeared beneath the waves While these events were taking place, the messenger of Agramant returned with word that he had been unable to find Rogero Irked by the delay, Rodomont, a vassal king, decided to embark with his forces on the invasion of France Agramant was told that the garden of Atlantes was invisible and that the young knight could be freed only by possession of Angelica's magic ring A dwarf, Brunello offered to obtain the prize for his master

Orlando, having accomplished his quest, arrived at the lake where Rinaldo had been carried under the waves Seeing his kinsman's arms stacked by the shore, Orlando determined to avenge his former companion in arms He and the guardian of the place fought a mighty battle in which Orlando was victorious From the enchanted garden beneath the lake he freed all the prisoners held there by Morgana, the sorceress All the knights except Orlando then returned to France to aid in the defense of Christendom Orlando, now reconciled with Rinaldo, turned back toward Albracca On the way he encountered Brunello, who had in the meantime stolen Angelica's magic ring

With the ring to dispel the mists of enchantment, Agramant came at last to the castle where Atlantes held Rogero in duress At Brunello's suggestion the king issued an invitation to a tournament Joining in the tourney, Rogero was wounded but revenged himself on his assailant His wounds miraculously healed, he returned to the tourney, whereupon Agramant recognized him and made him his knight Meanwhile, Rinaldo and Rodomont mont had engaged in single combat in a great battle between Christians and pagans. When they were separated during the fighting, Rinaldo, in pursuit of his enemy, rode once more into the forest of Arden.

On his arrival in Albracca after his perilous quest, Angelica prevailed upon Orlando to help her in her escape from the beleaguered city and to escort her into France. Orlando, not suspecting that her real purpose was the pursuit of Rinaldo, immediately agreed. After many adventures they embarked for France and at length arrived, hot and tired, in the forest of Arden. There Angelica drank from the waters of hate at the same time Rinaldo drank from the waters of love. When they met a short time later the circumstances of their love were reversed. Angelica now fled from Rinaldo in disgust, while he pursued her with passionate avowals. Again Orlando and Rinaldo fought. In the midst of their struggle Angelica fled. When she took refuge in Charlemagne's camp, the king, hearing her story, gave her into the keeping of Namus, Duke of Bavaria.

Agramant, joined by Gradasso, began the siege of Paris. In the ensuing battle Bradamant, a maiden warrior and the sister of Rinaldo, became enamored of Rogero and went over to the side of the Saracens. When she removed her helmet and allowed her hair to fall down, Rogero was struck by love for the valiant maiden. At that moment they were attacked from ambush and Bradamant, unhelmeted, was wounded slightly in the head. Rogero avenged her hurt by routing their enemies, only to be separated during the pursuit from the woman who would one day become his wife and the mother of the illustrious line of Este, the noble family whom Boiardo, the poet, served

THE ORPHAN

Type of work Drama

Author Thomas Otway (1652-1685)

Type of plot Domestic tragedy

Time of plot Seventeenth century

Locale Bohemia

First presented 1680

Principal characters

ACASTO, a nobleman living in the country

CASTALIO and

POLYDOR, his twin sons

SERINA, his daughter

CHAMONT, a young soldier

MONTMILA, an orphan, Chamont's sister and Acasto's ward

Critique

Though not so highly regarded as his Venice Preserved (1682), Otway's The Orphan held the stage until the early nineteenth century and still receives a few kind words from critics. The language abounds in Shakespearian echoes, particularly of Romeo and Juliet, and the character of Chamont, the hot-headed brother, is very reminiscent of Laertes. The plot, supposedly founded upon an actual incident, turns upon a highly improbable situation, but such improbabilities were common in the drama of the period. The tone of the play also points forward to the sentimental drama of the next century. Otway, now an almost forgotten writer, was highly admired in his own day, and Goldsmith considered him next only to Shakespeare in tragedy.

The Story

Somewhere in the Bohemian country side there lived a nobleman, Acasto, who had served the emperor well before his retirement from military service and the life of the court. In his household were his twin sons, Castalio and Polydore, and his daughter Serina, as well as a young noblewoman, Monimia, who had been left as his ward upon the death of her parents. It was Acasto's purpose to keep his sons at home, for he had seen enough of the intrigues and disappointments of court life. The two sons, however, restless and unoccupied, had both fallen in love with Monimia.

Previously they had been close friends and sharers of each other's secrets, but now their love for the same woman came between them. Castalio, whose weakness was an excessive scrupulousness, made the great mistake of minimizing his passion for Monimia when talking with his brother; he claimed that he had no desire for marriage and that he would not object to watching Polydore press his own suit. This conversation was repeated to Monimia by a page. Since she genuinely loved Castalio, she misunderstood his attitude and really believed that his love had cooled. Thus it was that Castalio, in his desire to be fair with Polydore, allowed him and Monimia to be alone together under circumstances which allowed the less scrupulous Polydore to make dishonorable proposals to her.

A short time later Chamont, Monimia's brother, returned from the wars in which he had been engaged for many years. In his first interview with his sister, he told her of a strange and ill-omened dream he had had: a vision of Monimia surrendering herself to two lovers. Further, on his journey to Acasto's estates, he had been warned by an old crone to hasten in order to protect his sister's honor. Although Monimia convinced him that she really loved Castalio and that his intentions were thoroughly honorable, her brother nevertheless warned her against Castalio and all men and made her promise to treat her lover coldly, so as to try him. But when she and Castalio met, they smoothed out their misunderstandings, and the course of true love seemed again to be running smoothly.

Almost immediately the household was thrown into confusion by the sudden illness of Acasto, who had been entertaining his friends at a feast. Thinking that he was about to die, the old nobleman assembled his family and told of his plans to divide his estate among them and to dower Monimia. He also gave Chamont permission to marry Serina. After the old man and his family had left the room, Chamont found out from the family chaplain that that priest had just married Monimia and Castalio but that the marriage was still a secret because of their fear of Acasto's disapproval. Chamont, disliking the secrecy of the marriage, felt that it was ill-omened, but that his sister's honor was now safe.

Castalio, in the meantime, was urgently begging his bride to allow him to spend the night with her; she demurred, on the grounds that her room was next to that of Acasto and every sound would be heard. It was finally agreed, however, that Castalio was to come, was to make his presence known by three light knocks upon the door, and that not a word was to be spoken during the night. So the newly married pair parted, not knowing that Polydore, lurking in the background, had overheard their plan. That dishonorable man, who was of course ignorant of the marriage, instantly decided to take his brother's place, and this unworthy plan he carried out. When Castalio arrived at his wife's bedroom, he was denied admittance because the maid thought him to be Polydore.

The next morning, when Castalio, who had been in a frenzy of despair all night, met Monimia, he threw her from him. The bride, thinking that she had spent the night with her husband, could not understand this treatment and complained to her brother. Chamont, always the impetuous soldier, demanded justice of Acasto and told him of the marriage, of which the nobleman did not approve. Next, the wretched Monimia met Polydore and the tragic horror was made complete when he, in his vanity, told her that it was he, not Castalio, who had spent the night with her. When she told him that he had slept with his brother's wife, he was as horror struck as she, and they both agreed to spend the rest of their lives in expiation of their sin.

For Castalio, still ignorant of the truth, there was to be no peace. His father told him of Chamont's demand for justice, the young soldier, also ignorant of the truth, wished to fight. He and Castalio were parted only by Acasto. Then news was brought by the servants that Monimia was running distractedly through the house calling for Castalio. When husband and wife met, she told him that she must leave him forever, but did not reveal the terrible deception practiced by Polydore the previous night. A short time later the frantic Castalio met his brother, and Polydore, by insults, forced a fight upon his twin, then, dropping his own sword, ran upon Castalio's blade. Dying, and having expiated his sin, Polydore told Castalio of the events of the night before. His only reproach, and a just one, was that, had Castalio trusted him and told him of the marriage, the tragedy would have been averted.

The tragedy was heightened when Monimia revealed that she had taken poison. She died, the innocent victim of circumstances. But this was not the end of the tragedy, for Castalio killed himself with a dagger and Polydore died of his wound. Only stricken Acasto, Chamont, and Serina survived the ruin of the family whose great tragedy was caused by excessive scrupulousness.

THE OTHER ONE

Type of work Novel

Author Sidonie Gabrielle Claudine Colette (1873-1954)

Type of plot Psychological realism

Time of plot 1920's

Locale Franche Comté and Paris

First published 1929

Principal characters

FAROU, a playwright

FANNY, his wife

JANE, their secretary companion and Farou's mistress

JEAN FAROU, Farou's son by a former mistress

Critique

The Other One is one of Colette's last major novels. Her sensibility having widened by this stage to an awareness of human motivation beyond the love relationship, her incisive and ironic analysis of the loving wife who prefers keeping the former mistress of her beloved and polygamous husband to facing loneliness without her, is one of the most poignant examples of the major theme in Colette's writing: the portrayal of a woman's ruling passion. Colette's characters always take things in their stride—even to the edge of heartbreak. This novel is an excellent example of her comprehension of the forces which mold individual lives and control their relationships to other people.

The Story

Fanny's and Jane's ways of waiting for a letter from Farou, who was in Paris, made explicit the contrast between them. The beautiful, heavy Fanny, whose dark Mediterranean beauty had long ago won Farou's devotion, slept on the sofa, while

THE OTHER ONE by Colette. Translated by Roger Senhouse. By permission of the publishers Farrar Straus & Cudahy, Inc. Copyright, 1960 by Martin Secker & Warburg Ltd.

Jane, a thin, nervous, ash blond girl of nearly thirty, stood weeping quietly on the veranda. Fanny's stepson Jean awoke her when the letter arrived. Farou wrote enthusiastically about a young lady who was obviously his new mistress. Fanny was amazed at Jane's violent reaction to this news and wondered why, in spite of her companion's affection and indispensability, she still did not regard Jane as a close friend.

Their lives quickened with Farou's return. Jane was happy and busy taking dictation as Farou worked on his play. To Fanny, Farou's roaring voice and the murmur of the bees sounded in the heat like the office of the Mass. Farou's immense presence completely absorbed them. When Fanny was alone with him, it was clear that she both depended upon and supported him. He was her one love, and in this knowledge she was very proud.

Jean and Farou, however, were uneasy together. Jean had developed an unhappy passion for Jane and watched her and Farou very closely. When Jane went for a walk he would climb into the lime tree to see where she would go.

Farou's establishment dated from the time before his plays became established successes. In that lean period Jean had contracted typhus, Farou's last play had failed, and his secretary had left. At that psychological moment Jane arrived. She nursed Jean, she worked for Farou, and with Fanny she soon established an easy relationship of affection and respect. When she could have left, Jane begged to stay, and the Farous were glad to keep her on as a secretary for Farou and a companion for Fanny.

Soon afterward they left for their first summer in the Franche Comté. They were now spending their second summer in the country. During the hot days Fanny, whose intelligence consisted of emotional awareness more than of intellectuality, found herself unable to consider Jean and his father objectively. The household revolved around Farou and they all rejoiced when he sold a play. Their practical dependence on Jane continued. This awareness increased Jean's restlessness, and at last he won Farou's unwilling permission to leave France for South America after the summer.

Once, from the balcony, Jean and Fanny heard Jane and Farou talking in the garden. Jean leaped to the wall to watch them. Fanny joined him. Both were suddenly aware of the intimacy of Jane's relationship with Farou. But as soon as Farou returned to the balcony Fanny felt only an unaltered devotion toward him. She subsequently felt vulnerable, and indignant that she should herself be involved in an affair of Farou's. This realization, however, did not significantly alter her affection for Jane.

Fanny slept little that night. At dawn she heard Jane also moving about. Fanny realized that she was disturbed by the fact that Jane suffered with her over Farou, and that no longer did she alone, as it were, possess his unfaithfulness. The sight of Farou sleeping intensified her emotions of hurt and tenderness, and emphasized her need for self control.

One morning Fanny found Jean lying on the path leading from the village where she had been to shop. He had fainted from the heat and from his agony over Jane and Farou's relationship. He was scornful of the telegram Fanny was bringing, a message which summoned Farou to Paris, and he mocked its theatricality. Farou, meeting them, called Jane to arrange their return to Paris. Fanny became convinced that her moral duty was to feel wounded, but instead she was afraid of possible disruption in their lives. Jean was angered by her obvious lack of pride and emotion.

Surprisingly, Fanny was regretful when they left the house the next day. Farou teased Jane, who immediately told him to help Fanny. Suddenly, Fanny remembered how often Jane had done that. In the train Jane tried to settle Fanny to reading or sleeping, but Fanny declared that she was managing very well. Then

she was surprised to find what she had said was true

In Paris, Fanny entertained the friends that gathered around toward the end of rehearsals for Farou's new play. Farou was harsh and demanding with Jane. Fanny scolded him and defended Jane—terrified that their relationship would somehow be exposed. The women dined together after Farou had left for the theater. When Jean found them amicably reading, he taunted Jane for her endless companionship with Fanny, a relationship he despised because he thought it hypocritical.

Farou's nervousness and Fanny's jealousy and feeling of responsibility increased as the confusions of the rehearsals continued. For the first time, as she returned from her dressmaker, Fanny saw Farou kiss Jane. She realized then that she would have to face the fear of desertion within her own home, which previously had been inviolate. Hoping that they had not seen her, Fanny pretended to be ill. Jane and Farou were most solicitous, but Jean, because of his own obsession with Jane, was anxious only to learn what exactly had upset Fanny. When Farou returned home exhausted from the rehearsal, Fanny pretended to be asleep instead of soothing him, her loss in that situation was at least as great as his.

By the time of the dress rehearsal Fanny was utterly exhausted, and Jane and Jean were tense. Farou fast approached the boredom that he always suffered when a new play was finally out of his hands. At the rehearsal critics pronounced the play strong, direct, and dynamic. Fanny wondered whether Farou's reputation, if he had been small and wiry instead of being massive and having the head of a pagan god, would have been for subtlety and insight instead of force and power.

On the way home Fanny feared that the relaxation after weeks of strain might precipitate a crisis in the taxi. She dreaded this happening before she could have time to prepare herself for it, or while she was not protected by the familiarities of her home.

The next day Fanny reluctantly told Jane that she knew that Farou was her lover. She was disheartened by Jane, who saw the matter as a joint problem. They kept reasonably calm while Jane vacillated between appeals of friendship mixed with bitter explanations that she no longer was Farou's mistress and reproaches because she had helped to create the situation by disregarding Farou's infidelities in the past. Farou interrupted them and, discovering the situation, wondered why Fanny had spoken up at all. He reminded her that it was she who had always commanded his greatest passion and devotion. Ironically, this fact gave him confidence that Fanny would be able to reorder their lives satisfactorily.

During the rest of that evening Fanny and Jane were together. As Jane prepared to leave, Fanny realized that she could not bear to be so alone; she would be abandoned to Farou's moods, absences, and frequent inarticulateness. Gently, and with few words, it was arranged that Jane should stay and that in this solution would lie a measure of security for them all.

PARADISE REGAINED

Type of work Poem

Author John Milton (1608-1674)

Time First century

Locale The Holy Land

First published 1671

Principal characters

JESUS OF NAZARETH

SATAN

Paradise Regained is a masterpiece which is little read and little liked by the mass of general readers in the twentieth century. Of course, students of Milton in various colleges and universities are required to pay it a small tribute of study, and among scholars of the period it has a substantial number of admirers. It is, however, overshadowed by its colossal predecessor, Paradise Lost, and it lacks the appeal of the earlier and more graceful, less austere Comus.

The poem is concerned with triumphant resistance to temptation. Much of our popular literature today is concerned with surrender to temptation. When Satan, in his conference with the powers of darkness, dismisses with contempt the idea of sexual temptation, he wipes out with a single stroke a horde of readers. The temptations which Jesus is required to face are lack of faith, hunger, desire for glory, desire to overthrow the enemies of his people by violence, and pride in being declared the beloved Son of God. These temptations are not remote from the life of modern man, though they have less attention on the screen, in books, or on the air than the more romantic and flamboyant temptations of sex.

Like the Biblical story of Samson, the Biblical story of the Temptation in the Wilderness furnished Milton with a story outline, but only a Milton would have found Samson Agonistes and Paradise Regained in his sources. Paradise Regained is composed of four books averaging about five hundred lines of blank verse each; the poem, therefore, contains over two thousand lines. The Gospel story in Luke, Milton's principal source, is contained in seventeen verses spread over two chapters.

The poem begins with an invocation to the Holy Spirit. The first incident is the baptism of Jesus by John the Baptist. This rite is attended by Satan, the Adversary, cloaked in invisibility. Thunderstruck by the pronouncement from Heaven that Jesus is the beloved Son of God, Satan hastily assembles a council of his Peers. They choose "their great Dictator" to attempt the overthrow of this new and terrible enemy God, watching Satan set out on his evil mission, foretells to Gabriel the failure of that mission. (The poet here abandons the popular literary device of suspense.) The angels sing a triumphant hymn.

Led by the Spirit, Jesus enters the desert and pursues holy meditations. In retrospect he examines his life up to this point, considers his destiny, but does not wish for revelation of his future until God chooses to give it. For forty days he wanders unharmed through the perils of the desert, then for the first time he feels hunger. Just at this moment he meets an aged man in rural clothing. This old man explains that he was present at the baptism, then expresses amazement at the lost and perilous situation of the wanderer. Jesus replies, "Who brought me hither will bring me hence, no other Guide I seek." The old man then suggests that if Jesus is really the Son of God, he should command the stones to become bread. In his refusal Jesus asks, "Why dost thou then suggest to me distrust, knowing who I am, as I know who thou art?" At this discovery, Satan abandons his disguise and enters a dispute at tempting self-justification. Overcome in the argument, he vanishes as night falls.

The other newly baptized people and Mary the Mother of Jesus are distressed at his absence, but do not allow themselves to despair.

Satan calls a fresh council of war. He dismisses Belial's suggestion, "Set women in his eye and in his walk," and receives a vote of confidence for his own plan of using honor, glory, and popular praise combined with relief from the suffering of physical hunger.

Jesus dreams of the ravens who fed Elijah by Cherith's Brook and the angel who fed him in the desert. Awakening, he looks for a cottage, a sheepcote, or a herd, but finds nothing. Suddenly Satan appears again in a new form, but does not attempt to conceal his identity. He discloses a table loaded with delicious food and invites Jesus to eat. Jesus refuses the food, not because the food itself is unlawful, but because it is the offering of Satan. Disgruntled, Satan causes the food to vanish and returns to the attack, offering wealth with which to buy power. When this is declined as an unworthy aim of life, Satan proposes the career of a glorious conqueror. Jesus retorts with references to Job and Socrates, as justly famous as the proudest conquerors, and he declares that desire for glory, which belongs to God, not man, is sacrilege. Satan then attempts to relate conquest to the freeing of the Jews from their Roman oppressors. Jesus replies that if his destiny is to free his people from bondage it will come about when God chooses. He then asks another of his penetrating questions: why does Satan hasten to overthrow him self by trying to found Christ's everlasting kingdom? This question tortures Satan internally, but he takes refuge in hypocritical assurances that he has lost hope of his own triumph. Then, remarking that Jesus has seen little of the world, he takes him to the top of a mountain and shows him the terrestrial kingdoms, in particular the empires of Rome and Parthia, one of which he advises him to choose and to destroy the other with it. But Jesus refuses earthly empire. Then Satan tries a particularly Miltonic temptation: he offers the empire of the mind — philosophy, learning, poetry, particularly those of Greece and Rome. Against these Jesus places the sacred literature of the Hebrews. Satan, baffled again, returns Jesus to the desert and pretends to depart. When Jesus sleeps again, Satan disturbs him with ugly dreams and raises a fearful storm. With morning and the return of calm weather, Satan appears for a last, desperate effort, no longer so much in hope of victory as in desire for revenge.

He seizes Jesus, flies with him to Jerusalem, places him on the highest pinnacle of the Temple, and cries out:

There stand if thou wilt stand to stand upright
Will ask thee skill
Now show thy Progeny if not to stand
Cast thyself down safely if Son of God
For it is written He will give command Concerning thee to his Angels in their hands
They shall uplift thee, lest at any time
Thou chance to dash thy foot against a stone
To whom thus Jesus also it is writ ten,
Tempt not the Lord thy God, he said and stood
But Satan smitten with amazement fell

Surely this climax is exciting enough to produce a thrill of triumph. After Satan's second fall a host of angels fly to the Temple, take Jesus to a fertile valley and spread before him a table of celestial food. After they sing another hymn of triumph, Jesus returns home to his mother's house.

This "brief epic," a type according to Milton best illustrated by The Book of Job, is a marvelous synthesis of the poet's wide reading in Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Italian, and English literatures. It is also a distillation of his earlier works, notably Comus, Lycidas, and Paradise Lost. Since the dating of the composition of Samson Agonistes is uncertain, we do not know whether that great tragedy or Paradise Regained was the last composition of the blind poet. Perhaps most readers would prefer Samson Agonistes as the more appropriate final work. But either creation is worthy of the titan who kept his strength to the end.

PARALLEL LIVES

Type of work: Biography
Author: Plutarch (c. 45 c. 125)
First transcribed: 105-115

Principal personages

JULIUS CAESAR, Roman general and statesman
ALEXANDER THE GREAT, King of Macedon
MARC ANTONY, Roman statesman
DEMETRIUS, Macedonian king
MARCUS BRUTUS, Roman statesman
DION, statesman of Syracuse
DEMOSTHENES, Greek orator and statesman
CICERO, Roman orator and statesman
ALCIBIADES, Athenian general
CORIOLANUS, Roman leader
SOLON, Athenian lawgiver
POPPLICOLA, Roman lawgiver
THESEUS, legendary Athenian hero
ROMULUS, legendary founder of Rome

The collection which is today known simply as Plutarch's Lives is derived from the Parallel Lives, a work in which Plutarch presented a large number of biographies (of which forty six survive), alternating the lives of eminent Greeks with comparable lives of eminent Romans. A number of shorter essays compared the lives accorded biographical treatment. The collection as it survives includes some biographies written independently of the Parallel Lives, as, for example, the biographies of Otho, Galba, Artaxerxes and Aratus.

Plutarch considered the lives of famous men important for their moral implications, and his treatment shows his concern to apply the ethics of Aristotle to the judgment of those whose lives he reports. His treatment is more personal than political, like the biographer Suetonius, whose Lives of the Caesars lacks the moral emphasis of Plutarch's work. Plutarch was interested in great figures as human beings liable to the errors and inevitable temptations which confront all human beings. Also, like Suetonius, Plutarch delighted in anecdote and used various tales concerning the Greeks and Romans partly for their intrinsic interest and partly to suit his moral intention. Although there are inaccuracies in the Lives, the charm and liveliness of Plutarch's style give the biographies a convincing appeal which more than compensates for errors in fact. In any case, all his tory is the result of an attempt to make an intelligible statement about a past which must be reconstructed from the perspective of its writer, and if one is constrained to say that in the Lives we see the famous Greeks and Romans only as they appeared to Plutarch, then we must say of any history or biography that it is the past only as it appears to its author. The conclusion might be that since biographies are sensible only relative to their authors, the character and the ability of the author are of paramount importance, and if the Lives are judged in this manner, then again Plutarch survives, for his work expresses the active concerns of a sensitive, conscientious, and educated Greek writer.

An accidental but none the less fortunate consequence of the appearance of the Lives was that through Sir Thomas North's translation Shakespeare found the dramatic inspiration and factual basis for his Julius Caesar, Antony and Cleopatra, Coriolanus, and Timon of Athens.

The comparisons which Plutarch made between his Greeks and Romans have sometimes been dismissed as of minor historical importance. The error behind such judgment is that of regarding the comparisons as biographical and historical. Plutarch's comparisons are not attempts to recover the past, but to judge men as he reported them, and if in the biographies we come closer to the subject matter of the Lives, in the comparisons we come closer to Plutarch himself. In the com parisons the moralist is at work, and what ever the truth of the biographies, we come close to the truth about the moral climate of Plutarch's day. Another way of putting it is that in his biographical essays Plutarch defined men of the past but in the comparisons he defined himself and the men of his age.

Thus, in comparing Romulus, the legendary founder of Rome, with Theseus, the Athenian hero of Greek mythology, Plutarch first of all considers which of the two was the more valiant and the more aggressive for a worthy cause. The decision is given to Theseus, who voluntarily sought out the oppressors of Greece—Sciron, Sinnis, Procrustes, and Corynetes—and who offered himself as part of the tribute to Crete.

But then Plutarch finds both heroes wanting. "Both Theseus and Romulus were by nature meant for governors," he writes, "yet neither lived up to the true character of a king, but fell off, and ran, the one into popularity, the other into tyranny, falling both into the same fault out of different passions." Plutarch then went on to criticize both men for unreasonable anger, Theseus against his son, Romulus against his brother. Finally, he severely took Theseus to task for parricide and for the rapes he committed.

Even from this brief comparison we learn a great deal about Plutarch. Although he had an inclination to favor the Greeks, he gave the Romans their due, achieving a near balance of virtues and vices. He honored courageous action provided it was motivated by a love of country and of man, and he approved the ancient morality which called for respect toward parents and faithfulness to friends and brothers.

Plutarch was aware of the difficulty and the dangers of the biographical tasks he undertook, and he gives the impression that the presence of the comparisons was intended both to unify and to justify the book as a whole. At the outset of his biographical survey of the adventures of Theseus he compares those biographies of men closer to his own time with biographies such as that of Theseus, in which he was forced to deal with fictions and fables. He wrote, "Let us hope that Fable may, in what shall follow, so submit to the purifying processes of Reason as to take the character of exact history", but he recognized the possibility that the purifying process might not occur, and so begged the indulgence of the reader. He then compared Theseus and Romulus briefly, showing parallels of position and fortune in their lives, in order to justify his having decided to place their biographies side by side and to undertake a comparison of their moral characters.

Other comparisons which survive are those of Numa Pompilius, Romulus' successor as King of Rome and originator of Roman religious law, with Lycurgus, the Spartan lawgiver, of Poplicola, or Publius Valerius, the Roman ruler who converted a despotic command to a popular one, thus winning the name "Poplicola" or "lover of the people," with Solon, the Athenian lawgiver, of Fabius, the Roman leader who was five times consul and then dictator, who harassed Hannibal with his delaying tactics, with Pericles, the Athenian soldier and statesman who brought Athens to the height of its power, of Alcibiades, the Athenian general, with Coriolanus, the Roman leader of Timoleon, the Corinthian, the opponent of Dionysius and other Sicilian tyrants, with Aemilius Paulus, the Roman who warred against the Macedonians, of Pelopidas, the Theban general who recovered Thebes from the Spartans, with Marcellus, the Roman consul who captured Syracuse, of Aristides, the Athenian general who fought at Marathon, Salamis, and Plataea, with Marcus Cato, the Roman statesman who disapproved of Carthage and destroyed the city in the third Punic war, of Philopomen, the Greek commander of the Achaeans who defeated the Spartan tyrants Machanidas and Nabis, with Flaminius, the Roman general and consul who freed Greece from Philip V of Macedon, of Lysander, the Spartan who defeated the Athenians and planned the government of Athens, with Sylla, the Roman general who defeated Mithridates VI, sacked Athens, and became tyrant of Rome, of Lucullus, who continued Sulla's (Sylla's) campaign against Mithridates and pursued him into Armenia, with Cimon, the Greek who defeated the Persians on both land and sea at Pamphylia, of Crassus, one of the First Triumvirate with Pompey and Caesar, with Nicias, the Athenian who was captured by the Syracuse forces which repelled the Athenians, of Sertorius, a Roman general who fought in rebellion against Pompey in Spain, with Eumenes, the Greek general and statesman who was opposed by Antigones, of Pompey, the Roman general who became Caesar's enemy after the formation of the First Triumvirate, with Agesilaus, the Spartan king who fought the Persians and the Thebans without preventing the downfall of Sparta of Tiberius and Caius Gracchus, the Roman statesmen and brothers who fought and died for social reform in the effort to assist the poor landowners, with Agis and Cleomenes, the Spartan reformer kings of Demosthenes, the Greek orator and statesman, with Cicero, the Roman orator and statesman, of Demetrius, the Macedonian who became king after nu merous campaigns and after murdering Cassander's sons, with Antony, Caesar's defender and the lover of Cleopatra, and of Dion of Syracuse, who attempted to introduce Dionysius and his son to Plato, with Brutus, the slayer of Caesar

The most important of the remaining biographies are those of Alexander the Great and Julius Caesar. Acknowledging the difficulty of his task, Plutarch declared his intention to write "the most celebrated parts," and he added that "It must be borne in mind that my design is not to write histories, but lives. And the most glorious exploits do not always furnish us with the clearest discoveries of virtue or vice in men, sometimes a matter of less moment, an expression or a jest, informs us better of their characters and inclinations."

Plutarch wrote at the beginning of his biography of Timoleon that he had come to take a personal interest in his biographies, and he explained that "the virtues of these great men" had come to serve him "as a sort of looking glass, in which I may see how to adjust and adorn my own life." Over the centuries readers have responded with respect to Plutarch's moral seriousness, thus testifying to his power both as biographer and commentator.

THE PARLIAMENT OF FOWLS

Type of work Poem

Author Geoffrey Chaucer (c 1343-1400)

Time Fourteenth century

Locale The dream world

First transcribed c 1380

Principal characters

CHAUCER the dreamer

SCIPIO AFRICANUS, his guide

DAME NATURE

THE FORMEL EAGLE

THREE TERCEL EAGLES, the highest ranking birds

The Parliament of Fowls is one of the most delightful of Chaucer's early poems, written in the manner of the French romances, but at the same time gently satirizing the courtly love tradition that produced them.

The poem opens with comments on the hardships of love, which, the poet assures his reader, he knows only through his books, and books, he says, are the source of all men's new discoveries Just now he is reading Cicero's 'Somnium Scipionis' in Macrobius' commentary, one of the most popular books of the Middle Ages Chaucer tells the reader how, in his book, Scipio Africanus appears to the younger Scipio in a dream and shows him all the universe, pointing out how small the earth is in comparison with the whole He advises the younger man to live virtuously and with knowledge that he is immortal, so that he may come swiftly to heaven after death

Darkness forces the poet to put his book aside, and, falling asleep, he dreams that the same Scipio Africanus comes to him and leads him to the gate of a beautiful garden Over one half of the gate is a message promising happiness to whoever enters, above the other half, a warning of pain and sorrow within As the dreamer deliberates, his guide pushes him through, explaining that neither motto applies to him since he is not a lover, but adding that he may discover there something to write about

The two men find themselves in a garden filled with every kind of tree and bird Deer, squirrels, and other small beasts are playing there Music and fragrant breezes permeate the atmosphere Around the garden are the familiar personifications found in The Romance of the Rose and imitations of it Cupid, tempering his arrows, Pleasure, Beauty, Youth, Jollity, Flattery, and many others Nearby stands a temple of brass upon pillars of jasper Women are dancing around it, and doves sit on the roof Before the doors sit Dame Peace and Dame Patience "on a hill of sand"

When he enters the temple, the dreamer sees the goddess Jealousy, the cause of the great sighing he hears around him, Venus and the youth Richness, Bacchus, god of wine, and Ceres, who relieves hunger Along the walls are painted the stories of many unhappy lovers

Returning to the garden, the dreamer notices Dame Nature, so fair that she surpasses all others as much as the sun light does the stars Around her are all the birds, ready to choose their mates, for it is St Valentine's Day She decrees that the tercel eagle, the bird of highest rank, shall have first choice

He asks for the lovely formel eagle who sits on Dame Nature's own hand but immediately two other high ranking fowls interrupt, they, too, love her A lengthy debate follows one has loved her longest, another says that he has loved fully as deeply, if not so long This kind of discussion was popular in court circles in Chaucer's day, but others had their own ideas about such conversations The other birds, thought by scholars to represent different levels of English society, the clergy, peasants, and the bourgeoisie, soon weary of the debate, since they want to pick their own mates They decide that each group shall elect a spokesman to give its opinion of the "cursed pleading"

The birds of prey, no doubt the nobility, pick the tercelet falcon, who suggests that the formel wed the worthiest knight the bird of gentlest blood The goose speaking for the water fowls, says simply, "If she won't love him, let him love an other" The gentle turtle dove dissents, the seed fowls hold that a lover should serve his lady until he dies, whether or not she loves him in return

The duck offers a saucy retort "There are more stars, God wot, than a pair" The tercel chides him for having no idea of love then the cuckoo gives the verdict of the worm fowls, probably the peasants — give us our mates in peace and let the eagles argue as long as they wish, let them be single all their lives if they can reach no decision One of the noble birds insults the cuckoo, calling him a murderer because of his usual diet, and Dame Nature has to intervene to keep peace

Since none of the birds' opinions has provided a solution, she orders the formel eagle to choose the one she loves best

Although she advises the formel to wed the royal tercel, since he seems noblest, she says that the bird herself must make a choice. The formel pleads that she is still too young to marry, she would wait a year to decide. Dame Nature agrees, and at last all the birds are permitted to choose their own mates. Before they depart they sing a charming roundel.

The noise the birds make as they fly away awakens the poet, who immediately picks up other books, hoping that some day he will read something that will give him a dream to make him fare better.

It is impossible to do justice to The Parliament of Fowls with a summary alone. Much of its charm lies in the poetry itself, moving swiftly along despite its stanzaic form. The catalogue of trees, with a few words about each one, the description of the garden and the birds, the courtly debate of the eagles, the humorous comments of the duck and the goose — all are delightful. One of the most attractive passages is the birds' final song.

Now welcome, somer, with thy sonne
softe,

That hast this wintres wedres overshake,
And driven away the longe nyghtes
blake!

Saynt Valentyn that art ful hy on lofte,
Thus syngen smale foules for thy sake
Now welcome, somer, with thy sonne
softe,
That hast this wintres wedres overshake

Wel han they cause for to gladen ofte,
Sith ech of hem recovered hath hys make,
Ful blissful mowe they synge when they wake,
Now welcome, somer, with thy sonne
softe
That hast this wintres wedres overshake,
And driven away the longe nyghtes
blake

Much of the excellence of the poem lies in the characterization, even when Chaucer's characters are birds, he can picture a cross section of society. He knew and understood many different kinds of people, and here he presents them and their ideas humorously, impartially, and with his never-failing good sense.

THE PASSION FLOWER

Type of work Drama

Author Jacinto Benavente y Martinez (1866-1954)

Type of plot Tragedy

Time of plot Early twentieth century

Locale Castile, Spain

First presented 1913

Principal characters

ESTEBAN, a well to do Spanish peasant

RAIMUNDA, his second wife

ACACIA, her daughter

RUBIO, a family servant

JULIANA, another servant

NORBERT, Acacia's former fiancé

FAUSTINO, engaged to Acacia

Critique

The first two acts of The Passion Flower are violent melodrama. Then comes the philosophical third act with its action confined to the hearts of two women who love the same man, one consciously, one unconsciously. When the translated version of this work was first performed in the United States critics wrote rave notices contrasting its full blooded story with the anemic American theater of the time Also, the play was partly responsible for the award to Benavente in 1925 of the Nobel Prize for literature "for the happy way he pursued the honored traditions of the Spanish drama" Actually, Benavente was one of the least Spanish of recent Spanish dramatists, having been especially influenced by Ibsen, Shakespeare, and Moliere as well as by Levedan and other French playwrights of his time The Passion Flower is in many ways more universal than Spanish One Spanish critic has called it "a tragic drama on classical lines, written without any real national bearing or spirit"

THE PASSION FLOWER by Jacinto Benavente, from PLAYS FIRST SERIES. Translated by John Garrett Underhill. By permission of the publishers Charles Scribner's Sons. Copyright 1917 by John Garrett Underhill. Copyright renewed 1945, by John Garrett Underhill.

The Story

There was much excitement in the home of Esteban a wealthy peasant living in an outlying section of a small town in Castile, Spain The engagement of his stepdaughter Acacia to Faustino, son of Tio Eusebio, a friend of Esteban, had just been announced, and friends of Raimunda, her mother, were calling to talk over the event Acacia, after turning down several suitors, had finally consented to Faustino's suit The women were wondering whether she still thought about Norbert, who some time before had broken off his engagement to her without explanation

Fidelia, one of the callers, said that she had seen Norbert going away angrily with his gun after the engagement was announced that afternoon Another Engracia, shrewdly suspected that the girl had accepted Faustino to get away from Esteban, against whom she had borne a grudge for marrying Raimunda so soon after the death of her first husband But Raimunda assured her friends that she had seen no signs of ill feeling except in Acacia's unwillingness to call him father Certainly Esteban had been most generous to both of them

Night was coming on Faustino and his father, who lived in the next village, would have no moonlight for their journey and hungry husbands would soon be demanding suppers, so the party ended Esteban offered to accompany his friends to the edge of the village

Raimunda, still not certain how her daughter felt about the coming marriage, began questioning her, but she was reassured by her daughter's replies Only the servant, Juliana, struck a sour note as she began to tidy the house after the party She wished that Acacia's real father had lived to see this day

Milagros, a friend who had stayed to see Acacia's hope chest after the departure of the others also asked the girl how she felt toward Norbert When she suggested that Acacia was still in love with him, Acacia's answer was to tear his last letter into bits and throw it out the window into the darkness

At that moment a gunshot was heard outside Raimunda sent Juliana to investigate The servant returned with villagers carrying the body of Faustino None had seen the shot fired, but the women were sure Norbert was the assassin

At the court trial unbiased witnesses gave Norbert an unbreakable alibi, but weeks later the village was still arguing about the affair Esteban moped about the house and talked so much about the killing that Acacia was almost frantic At last Raimunda sent Juliana after Norbert She was sure she could learn the truth from him

In the meantime Rubio, the servant, was becoming increasingly drunk and impudent, and he tried to keep Eusebio from calling on Esteban to discuss the murder Eusebio's boys, disgusted with what they regarded as a miscarriage of justice, were threatening to shoot Norbert Their father hinted that even if the young man was innocent, rogues can be hired to assassinate or family servants can act through loyalty Raimunda told him she prayed every day that God would reveal and punish the murderer

After Eusebio's departure, Juliana sneaked Norbert into the house. He assured Raimunda that he was completely innocent of the crime. Bernabé, another servant, arrived with accounts of Rubio's drunken boasting that he was now master in Esteban's house. The servant also repeated a song, heard in the tavern calling Acacia the Passion Flower because she inspired an unholy love in men. Norbert confessed that he had broken off his engagement to her because he had been threatened and because he was a coward.

When Acacia appeared, Raimunda, to test her suspicions, accused her of being in love with her stepfather. The girl replied that her father was in the cemetery and that she hated the man who had taken his place. The arrival of Esteban brought further denunciation from Raimunda. Let him get Rubio's help to murder Acacia and her, if he wished, but she would kill him if he approached her daughter Norbert, trying to leave the house in spite of Bernabé's warning, was shot by Eusebio's boys.

The peace of the household had been shattered. Norbert was recovering, but an atmosphere of hatred hung over all that was said or done. Raimunda and Juliana talked over the time when Esteban came courting and wondered whether he had loved Acacia then. Juliana warned that great hatred like Acacia's might contain the germ of great love.

Rubio, insolent in his demands, proved that Esteban had never actually told him to murder Faustino. The master had only audibly hoped that no one would take Acacia from his house. There was still love between Esteban and Raimunda, however, and to preserve it they decided that it would be wise to send Acacia briefly to a convent and then try to find a husband for her. Acacia, who had been listening outside the door, burst in with the announcement that she would not leave the house. Esteban acquiesced, since he was the cause of all the trouble, he should be the one to go. At that Acacia broke down. Esteban must not go, she loved him.

Raimunda's screams denouncing him brought the neighbors to the scene. The trapped Esteban shot Raimunda, who died happy because Acacia had turned to her at the end as she lay dying, and not to Esteban. Raimunda, by her death, had saved her daughter. Esteban could never have her now.

PATERSON

Type of work Poem

Author William Carlos Williams (1883)

First published 1946 1951

Anyone who picks up a copy of William Carlos Williams' Paterson and gives it a hasty reading may arrive at the end of the poem with a feeling not unlike that of the traditional country bumpkin on his first trip to the big city: there are so many different things to look at, in so many different shapes and sizes, and all the people seem to be rushing about so haphazardly that the poor rustic winds up his day in bemused but happy confusion.

Such a reaction to Paterson is part of Dr. Williams' purpose, for this poem interweaves the story of a city with the story of a man so that the two become interchangeable, and the jumbled kaleidoscope of city life turns and glitters like the conflicting ideas, dreams, loves, and hates that assail the mind of modern man. So much for a hasty reading of Paterson.

Looked at more closely, the poem begins to take on shape, like a city coming out from under a rolling fog or a man walking out of the shadows of trees in a park. Dr. Williams unifies his poem by letting the river that flows through the city serve as a symbol of life, both the city's and the man's. That life is like a river flowing somewhere safe to sea is certainly an image as old as poetry itself, but Dr. Williams' style and presentation are so fresh, so individual, that he seems to have invented the idea. The poem is divided into four books which correspond to four parts of the river: first, the river above the Falls; second, the Falls itself; third, the river below the Falls; and fourth, the entrance of the river into the sea.

PATERSON by William Carlos Williams. Excerpts reprinted by permission of the publishers, New Directions. Copyright 1946 1948 1949 1951 1958 by William Carlos Williams.

Dr. Williams opens the first book called "The Delineaments of the Giants," with these lines:

Paterson lies in the valley under the Passaic Falls
its spent waters forming the outline of his back. He lies on his right side, head near the thunder
of the water filling his dreams!

Having quickly presented the blended image of city and man, the poet lets us know that there are also symbols for women, a flower, a cliff, the Falls. He then introduces one of the main concerns of Paterson: the search for a language by which human beings may "redeem" the tragedies of life. To counterbalance this somewhat abstract and nebulous idea, Dr. Williams intersperses his poem with many concrete passages, some in prose, which serve as an entrancing documentation of the background of the city and the man. In Book I, for instance, his torical notes and newspaper clippings tell us of the finding of pearls in mussels taken from Notch Brook, near the city, of General Washington's encounter with "a monster in human form", of the accidental drowning of a Mrs. Cumming at the Falls, of the death there of a stunt man named Sam Patch, and of a great catch of eels made by the local people when a lake was drained. Paterson the man is represented by letters written to him, one from a misunderstood lady poet. Dr. Williams rounds off Book I with a quotation from Symonds' Studies of the Greek Poets. Such diversity of material seems to call for a prestidigitator to make it all seem a part of the whole. Dr. Williams does it easily, for he is a master juggler who never quite lets his reader see all of the act, making him fill in some of the parts from his own imagination.

"Sunday in the Park," the title of Book II, concerns itself chiefly with love, including the many kinds of love making found in a city park, and with poetry, for Paterson is as much a tribute to language as it is to a city or a man. Fittingly, this section ends with another long passage from a letter written by the lady poet who is struggling to fit together her work, her life, and her friendship with the "dear doctor" to whom she writes. Book III, "The Library," continues to probe the inarticulateness of tragedy and death, searching for some way that language may assuage, even prevent those things we accept so complacently as a part of existence. In these beautiful lines Dr. Williams has this to say about poetry:

The province of the poem is the world
When the sun rises it rises in the poem
and when it sets darkness comes down
and the poem is dark

Book III also describes a great fire that sweeps the city, destroying the library. The poet continues to insert prose passages and one of these tells the story of Merselis Van Giesen, whose wife was tormented by a witch that appeared to her nightly in the form of a black cat. In telling the story, Dr. Williams throws in a few comments that display his sense of humor, a talent so lacking in many modern poets. When the witch is revealed to be a Mrs. B, "who lived in the gorge in the hill beyond," he comments, "Happy souls! whose devils lived so near " Interspersing the tale with other witty remarks, the poet winds it up by having the husband shoot the cat with a silver bullet made from his cuff links The shot is a difficult one because the cat is visible only to his wife, who must locate the target for him and direct his aim He kills the cat and, in the tradition of witch stories, Mrs B suffers for some time with a sore on her leg

Book IV, "The Run to the Sea," which opens with an idyl involving Corydon, Phyllis, and Paterson, also introduces that bugaboo of our times, the Bomb The poem concludes when Paterson the man reaches the sea, but he, along with a dog found swimming there, is able to escape from this symbol of death and to head inland

This poem, which Dr Williams published in sections between 1946 and 1951, has been compared with Whitman's Leaves of Grass, MacLeish's Conquistador, and Hart Crane's The Bridge It is certainly as good as anything written by Crane, but it lacks the eloquent brilliance of Conquistador, and to compare Williams with Whitman is stretching the superlatives until they become tenuous

Whitman writes like a great wind that sweeps you off your feet, buffeting you with words until you are exhausted, Williams wafts a far gentler breeze And while Paterson is a poem filled with variety and surprises, it cannot match the symphonic effect created by Whitman in Leaves of Grass There are times in this poem when Dr Williams turns his kaleidoscope so quickly that you feel like quoting from his own work

Geeze, Doc, I guess it's all right
but what the hell does it mean?

On the other hand, passages of great lyrical beauty occur frequently in Paterson and a careful reading of the poem creates the feeling that you have visited a typical American city and been taken on a tour of it by a man who tells its history as you walk along More important, you become acquainted with the man himself he is clever, witty, sensitive, wise, and deeply concerned with the people of his city and with their problems Thus does Paterson achieve its purpose, you make friends with a man and a city, both blended into one of the most fascinating poems of our time

THE PATH TO ROME

Type of work Travel sketches
Author Hilaire Belloc (1870-1953)
First published 1902

Hilaire Belloc—poet, novelist, essayist, biographer, historian, polemicist and propagandist—was a writer so prolific and versatile that it is almost impossible to designate any one of his works as best or even representative, but The Path to Rome is in many ways as typical as any in revealing his intellectual attitudes, the nature of his faith, his outlook on the world, and the qualities of his style

The book is an account of a walking tour that Belloc made one summer from Toul, in eastern France, across the Alps in Switzerland, and down through northern Italy to Rome Throughout the book Belloc provides a great many digressions

accounts of the people and the scenery, essays on society and character, stories told to divert the reader much in the manner that Laurence Sterne used stories in his accounts of his travels, observations on language, culture, universities, and poetry But Belloc's principal digression from the theme of his walking tour is his constant reference to and discussion of the Roman Catholic faith Although The Path to Rome is not a symbolic journey into Catholicism, it is an attempt to get at the essential meaning of experience by observing the area as closely as possible, just as, for Belloc, Catholicism was the religion which expresses the essential truths of experience Catholicism is an important theme in The Path to Rome, the religion gives the digressions a sense of direction, just as Rome itself provides the geographical direction of the tour

Throughout, Belloc provides maps and sketches that he himself drew The maps, all complete with directional arrows toward Rome, show the villages he passed through and the mountains he crossed in Switzerland The mountains are drawn with faces, passes and routes clearly shown The sketches of buildings and churches that interested him along the way are also drawn with a great deal of careful detail Twice, on his walking tour, Belloc persuaded himself to take short train journeys In both instances, once just before he reached Milan and once not far from Siena, Belloc was almost out of funds Had he continued walking, he would not have had enough money to buy the minimum amount of food to sustain him on his walking tour Thus he saved time and took the train to the city where his money was waiting for him

The Path to Rome is written in the first person But Belloc frequently interrupts his monologue by means of a character called 'Lector' who derisively jibes at the author for any pretentious statement or complains when the narrative is broken off to pursue one of Belloc's pet theories The author answers Lector and often puts him down

Lector is a convenient device for Belloc, a means of focusing the reader's attention on the particular point or digression the author is eager to make For example, Lector's interruptions allow Belloc to go on about human pride and pride in the intellect, one of the sins that he finds most harmful among human beings Lector is also a means of self-satire, for he sometimes complains after the author has indulged in a passage of purple descriptive prose, reminding the author of his original dedication to simple and careful writing Lector, in other words, gives Belloc's account a wider perspective, allows the reader to see that the author, while strongly immersed in his own observations and point of view is also wise enough to detect the possible relevant objections to and inconsistencies in his work

Belloc, beginning his book with an assault on conventional proverbs and wise sayings, announces his intention to see and understand life fully and sympathetically he refuses to be bound by the petty little guides for experience like 'A penny saved is a penny earned' In rejecting such sayings, Belloc plans to devote himself to largeness, width of both understanding and expression He has a kind of Rabelaisian appreciation of all sides of human activity, and during the course of his journey he has many opportunities to demonstrate this largeness He is simple kind, though shrewd when he needs to be, in all his dealings with the peasants and innkeepers he meets along the way Frequently tattered and dirty from his walking, he is sometimes misjudged by the people he encounters But he often shows, and is shown, kindness and friendship as well as a genuine ability to understand the forces that mold these people

At one point, in Italy, he is arrested as a tramp, but he is generally able to find both inexpensive food and revealing conversation at places where he stays His Rabelaisian quality is also evident in his appreciation of good food and good wine He carries a quart of the wine of the area with him all the time, and he stops for at least one good meal each day In addition, he demonstrates a real respect for the people who live close to the earth, whose constant and necessary preoccupations are with food and drink and the essentials of physical life

Belloc's faith, however, dominates the book even more strongly than does his desire to understand people He always makes a point of noticing whether the people he encounters are Roman Catholics, and, although he does not judge them on this basis, he feels strongly the error of those who do not belong to his Church. He attends mass almost every morning on the entire journey. He praises the Germans he meets for their constant interest in things spiritual, and he frequently points to his own love of the richness of ritual. At one point, in a long digression on the values of attending mass, he asserts that the mass allows one to forget passions and cares, that ritual relieves the individual from the necessity of making judgments and controlling his own life, that man receives enormous satisfaction from acting as thousands before him have acted and formally releasing himself into the hands of a higher power.

Belloc, in frequent digressions of this sort, is able admirably to point out the value and necessity of his faith. He also praises religion from another point of view: he uses it as the antidote to the nagging, penny pinching, narrow commercialism he so much deplores. At times he connects this commercialism with the rise of the middle classes historically, although, at other times, he praises the middle classes for their continuous and conventional devotion to religion as well as for their bravery in facing the hard and difficult circumstances of their lives.

Belloc's greatest enemy, however, is not commerce but the pride man often has in his intellect and powers of analysis. In his most bitter digressions, he attacks the pedants and the academics who, saturated with intellectual pride, find man the measure of all things. Such people, Belloc feels, are skeptical about religion, ultimately wicked, and unaware of all the various delights and depths of experience.

Throughout The Path to Rome, Belloc uses a rich, discursive, allusive style. Despite his promises to be brief and to the point, he rarely is, and part of the pleasure of the book is contained in the rich and highly discursive use of language. His style fits his long ramble, his frequent pauses to sketch, to observe, to ruminate. And his enjoyment of his own language parallels his enjoyment of people and places. His style is, perhaps, less effective when he is describing the magnificence of the scenery or the grand view from an Alpine peak. In such passages, his writing is likely to be florid, to deliver rhapsodies in conventional terms. Belloc, as writer and as observer, is best when dealing with people, when describing, from his firmly held but wide point of view, the ideas and reactions of the people he meets.

Belloc did not hold to all the firm resolutions with which he began his journey. He twice took a train, he did not (because of a snowstorm that drove him back) cross the Alps at the point that would lead him most directly to Rome. But consistency or allegiance to man-made resolutions was not the most important thing for Belloc. He did have a good time, and he did complete his physical, humane, and spiritual journey to Rome. He wandered, observed, and lectured along the way, fully appreciating the human and spiritual life he encountered on a journey that was both physically and spiritually rewarding.

THE PATRICIAN

Type of work Novel

Author John Galsworthy (1867-1933)

Type of plot Social criticism

Time of plot Early twentieth century

Locale England

First published 1911

THE PATRICIAN by John Galsworthy. By permission of the publishers Charles Scribner's Sons. Copyright 1911 by Charles Scribner's Sons. Copyright renewed 1939 by Ada Galsworthy.

Principal characters

EUSTACE CARADOC Lord Miltoun
MRS AUDREY LEES NOEL, a woman separated from her husband
LORD VALLEYS, head of the Caradoc family
LADY VALLEYS his wife
BARBARA CARADOC, their daughter
LADY CASTERLEY, Lady Valleys' mother
MR COURTIER, a political liberal

Critique

In this novel Galsworthy concerns himself with the traditions of English aristocracy and the possibility of a break with tradition when the individual attempts to assert himself. Although the author appears to be sympathetic to such a break, he never allows it actually to happen. He seems, rather, to be saying that we should continue in the patterns that are already set for us. It is something of a disappointment to the reader when he finishes the novel and realizes that all the lofty cries for liberty and freedom have not been heeded, and that much unhappiness results from them.

The Story

After spending a pleasant weekend at Monkland Court, the county seat of the Caradoc family, Lord Valleys, the head of the house, returned to London for a Cabinet meeting called because of war threats facing the country at the moment. These scares had an added interest in the household because the eldest son, Eustace Caradoc, was making his first bid for a seat in Parliament. Family tradition demanded that he take such a step and also that he be a member of the Conservative Party and work to maintain the authority vested in society, or the English aristocracy.

Lord and Lady Valleys were concerned about young Eustace's career because his speeches too vividly reflected his very high ideals and also because he was seeing an attractive young woman, Mrs. Audrey Noel, who was rumored to be a divorcee. Because of her concern in these matters Lady Valleys had written to her mother, Lady Casterley, who would do everything in her power to keep her grandson from making a mistake dangerous to his career.

While Lord Valleys was motoring to London, Eustace was engaged in conversation with Mr. Courtier, the real power behind his opposition. The conversation, or informal debate, took place in Mrs. Noel's drawing room. Mr. Courtier took his usual stand in favor of freedom and liberty for the masses, while Eustace argued that authority should be left in the hands of the aristocracy whose education and training traditionally equipped them for running the country in the best way. That both of these gentlemen should be visiting Mrs. Noel was not surprising. Courtier had known her since she was a child, and Eustace was rapidly falling in love with her.

A few nights later Eustace was again visiting Mrs. Noel when word was brought to them that the villagers were "devilling" a man on the green. When they rushed to his aid they found that Mr. Courtier had been roughly treated, although his only injury was a badly sprained knee. Eustace, following the dictates of courtesy at once took him to the Caradoc home, where he was to stay until he recovered. But damage had also been done to Eustace, for by allowing himself to be seen visiting a woman of a somewhat dubious reputation, his own reputation, and consequently his attempts to gain a seat in Parliament, also came under suspicion. His actions were duly reported by the local newspaper. The fact that Mr. Courtier ran in its next issue a statement to the effect that Mrs. Noel was the lawful wife of the Reverend Stephen Noel clarified but did not help the situation.

Eustace because of a quick trip to London, did not learn of these developments until the day that Courtier's statement appeared and then only when he went to propose to Audrey Noel. He was so much in love with her that he had neglected to find out her real story and he had assumed, like everyone else, that she was divorced. She had not discouraged his attentions because she thought he already knew the truth. Matters became even worse when Mrs Noel's husband would not give her a divorce because of his religious beliefs, and Eustace, because of his own ideals, had to acquiesce.

Soon afterward Eustace was duly elected to Parliament. Although they had resolved to see no more of each other, Mrs Noel followed him to London. Eustace worked night and day trying to keep from thinking of her until the strain of work and love proved too much for him, and he became ill. His younger sister Barbara, who had gone to see him in his rooms just before the fever took hold, decided to follow an impulse. Having heard from Mr Courtier that Mrs Noel was in London, she took her to Eustace so that she could nurse him back to health.

Barbara was sympathetic to the couple, partly because of her own youth and partly because of a strong temptation in her own life to break away from the traditions of family and society. Having come to know Mr Courtier during his stay at Monkland Court, she could not help being attracted to him because of his handsome appearance and his belief in personal freedom for everyone. Barbara, beginning to feel the restraints of her position in society and dreading the prospects of marrying the man that every one expected her to marry, was able to take Mrs Noel to her brother with no qualms whatsoever.

Barbara did not tell her family about this step until after her brother had passed the crisis and was almost well. They then saw to it that he was moved to their family home in London. Soon after Eustace had recovered, an active love affair between him and Mrs Noel began.

Being a man of the highest ideals, Eustace, when he had entered into an affair with Mrs Noel, felt that he was no longer fit for his seat in Parliament. He reasoned that if he thought of himself as helping to establish the authority of the land, he could not very well flaunt that authority, and so he resolved to resign his seat. His family, however, could not understand that kind of idealism and felt that he should keep his seat in spite of the affair, or else give up the woman. Also, Mrs Noel had no desire for him to give up his career; she knew that he could never be happy outside of Parliament.

At last, after Lady Casterley had gone to see Mrs Noel in London, the young woman agreed never to see her lover again. Eustace, although depressed, went on with his career, and Barbara, who also had come close to a break with tradition, married a man of her own class within the year. Mrs Noel and Mr Courtier, both foreign and detrimental to the tradition of the conservative, aristocratic class, quietly went away.

THE PEACE

Type of work Drama

Author Aristophanes (c 448 c 385 B C)

Type of plot Satiric comedy

Time of plot The Peloponnesian War

Locale Athens

First presented 421 B C

Principal characters

TRYGAEUS, a citizen of Athens

Critique

After a decade of fighting, both Sparta and Athens were ready to make some kind of peace between themselves, and the peace of Nicias was nearly complete. In this play Aristophanes joyfully looks forward to such a condition, although it was not to be achieved as quickly as he expected. Indeed, he anticipates herein some of the difficulties to be overcome within the various Greek states and, as usual, he shows that the farmers of the country will be most instrumental in bringing about the peace. However, an atmosphere of gaiety and hopefulness does pervade the play. Since Aristophanes is usually ribald when he is happy, this is one of his first plays in which we see the bawdy side of his nature.

The Story

Being tired of the wars and hungry, Trygaeus, like most Athenian citizens, called upon the gods not to desert them. Unlike the others, however, Trygaeus searched for a way to gain entrance to the heavens so that he might make a personal plea to Zeus and thus save himself his family, and his country. He had tried climbing ladders but had succeeded only in falling and breaking his head. Now he decided to ride to heaven on the back of a dung beetle, in the manner of Bellerophon on Pegasus.

This attempt to make his way to heaven succeeded, but when Trygaeus arrived at the house of Zeus he found that the gods had moved to that point farthest away from Greece so that they need see no more of the fighting among those peoples and hear no more prayers from them. Having afforded the Greeks an opportunity for peace, which they had ignored, the gods had now abandoned them and given the god of War, aided by his slave Tumult, full power to do with them as he pleased.

Trygaeus soon found out that War had already begun to carry out his plans. He had cast Peace into a deep pit and was now preparing to pound up all the cities of Greece in a mortar. Trygaeus watched him as he threw in leeks representing the Laconians, garlic for the Megarians, cheese for the Sicilians, and honey for the Athenians. Fortunately this deed of destruction was momentarily postponed because War could not find a pestle. After several unsuccessful attempts on the part of Tumult to find one for him, War himself had to leave the mortar and go make one.

His departure gave Trygaeus the chance he needed to save Peace, and immediately he called on all the states of Greece to come to his aid. All came, but with noise enough to bring Zeus himself back from his retreat. Hermes, who had been left in the house of Zeus, was aroused and angered by the noise, and could only be cajoled into allowing them to go on with their work after many promises of future glorification.

Even at such a crucial moment the people refused to work together. The Boeotians only pretended to work, Lacharus was in the way of everyone, the Argives laughed at the others but profited from their mistakes, the Megarians tried hard but had not enough strength to do very much. The Laconians and the Athenians worked earnestly and seriously, but it was primarily through the efforts of the farmers that Peace was finally freed. With her in the pit were Opora and Theoria. Everyone was now apparently happy, and to ensure the peace Opora was given to Trygaeus as a wife and Theoria was sent to the Senate. All then descended to earth, where preparations for the wedding were begun.

Before going on with the wedding, Trygaeus decided to make a sacrifice to

Peace During his preparations he was interrupted by Hierocles, a prophet from Areus Trygaeus and his servant both tried to ignore the prophet because they felt he had been attracted only by the smell of cooking meat, but he was not to be put off so easily When Hierocles learned to whom the sacrifice was being made, he began to berate them and gave them many oracles to show that this was not a lasting peace and that such could not be achieved However, when they were ready to eat the meat, he was prepared to agree with anything they said in order that he might satisfy his own hunger But Trygaeus, wishing to have nothing to do with the soothsayer, beat Hierocles and drove him away

With peace newly restored to the country, the people of Athens seemed to enjoy the feasting and mirth before the wedding

A sickle maker approached Trygaeus

and praised him for bringing back peace and prosperity, but he was followed by an armorer and various other personages representing those trades which had profited by the war These people were unable to join in the festivities, theirs was not so happy a lot Trygaeus, however, had no sympathy for them and offered only scorn When they asked what they could do with their wares in order to regain at least the cost of manufacturing them, he mocked them He offered to buy their crests and use them to dust the tables, and he offered to buy their breast plates for use as privies He told them to sell their helmets to the Egyptians who could use them for measuring laxatives, and he told them to sell their spears as vine props

When Opora appeared, the whole party went off to the wedding singing the Hymen Hymenaeus

PEDRO SÁNCHEZ

Type of work Novel

Author José María de Pereda (1833 1906)

Type of plot Picaresque romance

Time of plot 1852 1879

Locale Santander and Madrid

First published 1883

Principal characters

PEDRO SANCHEZ a provincial from the Cantabrian Mountains

AUGUSTO VALENZUELA, a politician from Madrid

CLARA, his daughter

SERAFIN BALDUQUE, a former state employee

CARMEN his daughter

MATA (MATICA), a student in Madrid

REDONDO editor of El Clarín of Madrid

BARRIENTOS Governor Pedro Sánchez' secretary

Critique

In treatment of subject matter and in composition, Pedro Sanchez is one of Pereda's most finished works It is a modern picaresque novel, an autobiography satirizing all the phases of the protagonist's life as office seeker, journalist, political agitator, revolutionist, social lion, and governor Pedro's opinions of life and politics in Madrid doubtless reflect those of the author, who had followed a somewhat similar career in the capital before he yielded to homesickness and returned disillusioned to his native region There is nothing heroic about Pedro He is an ordinary mortal with a weak moral sense, yet he arouses sympathy and pity when viewed in contrast to the snobbery and villainy of the people about him

The Story

Pedro Sánchez, a young provincial proud of his descent from Sancho Abarco, a tenth century king of Navarre, had seen little of Spain when he left his father and three sisters to go to Madrid. Augusto Valenzuela, a visiting politician, had promised to look after his future in the capital. It was October, 1852 when Pedro took the coach from Santander. Among the passengers were a down-at-heels bureaucrat Serafin Balduque, and his attractive daughter Carmen. From a student in the coach, Pedro learned of a cheap boarding house where he hoped to stay until he could contact Valenzuela.

The politician proved hard to find. After settling in his lodgings, Pedro called at Valenzuela's house, where Pilita, his wife, and his daughter Clara gave the young man a cool reception. The politician, finally tracked down after a dozen visits to his office, vaguely promised to keep Pedro in mind if anything should turn up. However, the boy wrote his father an optimistic letter in which he lied about his reception by the Valenzuela family.

Pedro's acquaintances at the boarding house were more helpful. Matica showed him around Madrid and, when Pedro's money gave out and he was about to return home, found him a job on the anti-government newspaper, El Clarín, at twenty five duros a month. From the staff Pedro learned of the crookedness of Valenzuela. Occasionally Pedro saw Balduque. Mostly he spent his free time in efforts to become a writer.

In the autumn, when one of the El Clarín contributors entered government service, Pedro was advanced to writing reviews under his own name, which was announced as the pseudonym of a famous literary man Redondo, the editor, hinted that plays and novels by friends in the party were to get preferential treatment while literary works by members of the opposition were to be severely criticized. One of Pedro's first tasks was to criticize Clemencia, by Pardo Bazán.

Pedro's success went to his head. He abandoned his old friends, even Matica. He saw Clara and in spite of her disdain he found himself falling in love with her. Valenzuela, however, did nothing to help the young man get ahead in Madrid. Since all El Clarín employees were revolution minded, Pedro caught the fever and wrote a fable attacking the government. Featured on the front page, it brought him much attention. Valenzuela sent for Pedro and offered him a meager job, which he refused on a government publication. Warned by Balduque that his refusal would put the police on his trail, Pedro took refuge with Balduque and Carmen.

After the overthrow of the government in the revolution of July 17, 1854, there was no longer any reason for Pedro to stay in hiding. On his way from the Balduque house to the office of El Clarín he saw a mob burning government buildings. When they began shouting against Valenzuela, he diverted the rioters to the palace of Cristina, the queen mother, and rushed to save Clara. He was unwilling to admit, however, that he acted out of love for her.

Street fighting broke out, with Pedro in command of a barricade. He was joined by Balduque, who was eager to get revenge for the wrongs committed against him. When Balduque was killed, Pedro and Matica were forced to break the news to Carmen. She refused their offers of help.

Finally Espartero imposed peace on the troubled country. Valenzuela fled, and his family accepted an invitation to the country estate of the Duchess of Pico. Pedro was rewarded with a provincial governorship. Going to tell Clara goodbye, he found himself proposing to her. A fall marriage was arranged.

Through Pedro's efforts the government granted a pension to Carmen, but when he went to tell her the news and to announce his approaching marriage, her lack of approval puzzled him. Matica, too, was unenthusiastic. Redondo was downright angry. The marriage was performed after Pedro had visited his father for the first time in three years.

Clara, her mother, her brother, and Barrientos, a secretary whom Pedro disliked from the first, accompanied him to the seat of his government. There everything went wrong. Clara's family was extravagant and snobbish. Pedro's secretary sneered at him and so did the citizens. Finally, from a friendly editor, Pedro got an explanation: his secretary was collecting bribes and his wife was exploiting her husband's political position. Returning home unexpectedly, Pedro surprised Barrientos in his wife's bedroom. When Pedro and Barrientos met in the street, they fought with sabers and Pedro was wounded.

At last a change of government cost

Pedro his governorship. Ashamed to return to Madrid, he got Matica's promise to look after Carmen and gave up his political life.

The passing years brought many changes in Pedro's affairs. Valenzuela soon died, as did his wife. Barrientos was killed in a duel. Clara had several protectors and eventually died, leaving Pedro free to return to Madrid and marry Carmen. But evil luck still plagued him. His new wife and their small son died during an epidemic. When he tried to squander his money, Pedro became rich. Homesick for the mountains, he sold his business and returned to Santander, but there he found no happiness. His father was dead, the countryside and the people seemed strange. Unhappy, Pedro wrote his autobiography, ending it in true picaresque style, with the hope that the example of his disillusionment would serve as a warning to his readers.

PEÑAS ARRIBA

Type of work Novel

Author José María de Pereda (1833-1906)

Type of plot Regional romance

Time of plot Late nineteenth century

Locale Santander, Spain

First published 1895

Principal characters

MARCELO, a young man from Madrid

CELSO RUIZ DE BEJOS, his eighty-year-old uncle

CHISCO, Celso's faithful servant

DOCTOR NELUCO

PEDRO NOLASCO, a mountaineer

MARI PEPA, his daughter

MARGARITA (LITA), his granddaughter

Critique

Some have compared Pereda to Tolstoy in ability to probe the human soul, to reproduce human feelings, and to set down moral scruples and self-sacrifice and heroism. Among Pereda's novels, Peñas arriba (Ascent to the Heights) is equaled in craftsmanship only by his Sotileza (1884). The first deals with the mountainous region of northern Spain, the other with the seacoast at the foot of the mountains. Both reveal the author's artistry in describing nature and its moods. Published eleven years after the story of the Santander fisherfolk, Peñas arriba marks the height of Pereda's technical development. It is also outstanding for the author's statement of his social philosophy and ethical convictions, the doctrine of the simple life

The Story

Marcelo, an epicure of Madrid, received eight or ten letters from his eighty-year old uncle Celso, who lived in the mountains of Santander. Celso was alone in the world and his thirty-two year old nephew Marcelo was his nearest relative, he wanted the young man to come and live with him. More out of pity for the old man than anything else, one October day Marcelo took the train for the heart of the Pyrenees. He was met by Chisco, a servant who explained in dialect that old Celso was the mayorazgo and a kind of beneficent patriarch of the mountain region.

Celso lodged Marcelo in a room used by the Bishops of Santander and Leon. On the first evening Marcelo met the not very bright village priest, Sabas Peñas, who had three different personalities: one for the Church, another for the mountains, and the third for the kitchen of the Celso manor house. Pedro Nolasco, a huge mountaineer, was another of the group. They talked about the simple pleasures of the region, none of which appealed to Marcelo, who, having sowed his wild oats in various parts of Europe, preferred the theaters and cafes of big cities. He foresaw monotony. The Tablanca house provided bread baked twice a week and one kind of meat, with occasional fresh milk. He could return to Madrid, however, only if he deserted his relative and his own obligation to carry on the family estate, or if the old man died.

Marcelo's first taste of rural wholesomeness was an exhausting climb to the loftiest peak in company with two hardy old citizens. More agreeable was the cordiality of the community, evident after he met Dr. Neluco and other villagers who idolized old Celso and worried about his wasting cough and worsening condition.

In the evening tertulias at the Big House, and during his excursions through the town, Marcelo expressed and listened to the philosophy of general helpfulness in a community of kindred spirits. Facing his new situation, he realized how unprofitable his soulless life had been to the needy world. As time passed, the moral and physical grandeur of his surroundings began to influence his thinking. He began to be part of them.

When Pito Salces took him on a bear hunt he saw the daring of the mountaineers. Chisco discussed his rivalry with Pepazos for Tanasia, the daughter of Topero. Also, Facia came to him for advice. In spite of objections by Celso and others, she had married a good-for-nothing who robbed a church, knifed a priest, and then disappeared, abandoning her and their daughter Tona. That was what the town knew. But to Marcelo she confessed that, hidden in the mountains, he was blackmailing her.

During one period when Celso could be left alone, Dr. Neluco rode with Marcelo to the town of Promisiones to meet others of the Ruz family who had lost their family home through drink. One stormy day Celso showed his nephew the gold he had accumulated. It was all for Marcelo, his heir. Marcelo tried in vain to persuade him to have one of the other branches of the family put in charge of restoring the decaying ancestral home.

Winter came. Marcelo had seen snow on flat places in Madrid, Paris, and St. Petersburg, but in Celso's domain there was no flat place outside the house. The drifts piled on the peaks and in the valleys. When one of the servants disappeared, the villagers risked death to find him. The doctor came through dangerous drifts and even the old priest made the trip up the snowbound mountain as Celso lay dying.

At the funeral, attended by villagers from leagues around, one visitor told of finding several dead people in the snow, and Marcelo realized that Facia's problem had been solved. But he found no solution for his own difficulties. At last he decided to confide in Dr Neluco. The old man advised him to marry Lita, the granddaughter of Nolasco. Marcelo had not considered that possibility, but he approved. After a brief trip to Madrid for material to renovate the manor house, he invited the three generations of the Nolasco family to view the results. His proposal to Lita was interrupted, but he went to her house the next day and made formal request for her hand. He was accepted.

Years later Marcelo was able to say that he had lived so happily in the old house that he dreaded leaving it even for short trips.

PENSÉES

Type of work Philosophical reflections on religious matters

Author Blaise Pascal (1623-1662)

First published 1670

Blaise Pascal, scientist and mathematician, became an active member of the society of Port Royal after his conversion as the result of a mystical experience in 1654. He was actively involved in the bitter debate between the Jansenists, with whom he allied himself, and the Jesuits, and the series of polemical letters titled Provinciales (1656-1657), is the result of that great quarrel. Wanting to write a defense of Catholic Christianity which would appeal to men of reason and sensibility, Pascal, about 1660, began to prepare his defense of the Catholic faith.

Like many other great thinkers whose concern was more with the subject of their compositions than with the external order and completeness of the presentation, he failed to complete a continuous and unified apology. When he died at thirty-nine he left little more than his notes for the projected work, a series of philosophical fragments reflecting his religious meditations. These form the Pensées as we know it. Despite its fragmentary character, the book is a classic of French literature, charming and effective in its style, powerful and sincere in its philosophic and religious protestations.

Philosophers distinguish themselves either by the insight of their claims or by the power of their justification. Paradoxically, Pascal distinguishes himself in his defense by the power of his claims. This quality is partly a matter of style and partly a matter of conviction. It was Pascal, in the Pensées, who wrote, "The heart has its reasons, which reason does not know," by which he meant not that emotion is superior to reason, but that in being compelled by a moving experience one submits to a superior kind of reason. Pascal also wrote that "All our reasoning reduces itself to yielding to feeling," but he admitted that it is sometimes difficult to distinguish between feeling and fancy; nevertheless, he believed that the way to truth is by the heart, the feeling, and that the intuitive way of knowledge is the most important, not only because it is of the most important matters but also because it is essential to all reasoning, providing the first principles of thought. Much of the value of the Pensées results from the clarity with which Pascal presented his intuitive thoughts.

A considerable portion of the Pensées is taken up with a discussion of philosophical method, particularly in relation to religious reflection. The book begins with an analysis of the difference between mathematical and intuitive thinking and continues the discussion, in later sections, by considering the value of skepticism, of contradictions, of feeling, memory, and imagination. A number of passages remind the reader of the fact that a proposition which seems true from one perspective may seem false from another, but Pascal insists that "essential" truth is "altogether pure and altogether true" The power of skepticism and the use of contradictions in reasoning both depend upon a conception of human thinking which ignores the importance of perspective in determining a man's belief Thus from the skeptic's point of view nothing is known because we can be sure of nothing but the skeptic forgets that "It is good to be tired and wearied by the vain search after the true good that we may stretch out our arms to the Redeemer" Contradiction, according to Pascal, "is a bad sign of truth" since there are some things certain which have been contradicted and some false ideas which have not Yet contradiction has its use "All these contradictions, which seem most to keep me from the knowledge of religion, have led me most quickly to the true one"

Pascal had the gift of responding critically in a way that added value to both his own discourse and that of his opponent Criticizing Montaigne's skepticism, he came to recognize the truth—a partial truth, to be sure—of much that Montaigne wrote His acknowledgment of this is grudging, he writes that "It is not in Montaigne, but in myself, that I find all that I see in him," and also "What good there is in Montaigne can only have been acquired with difficulty" Yet, as T S Eliot has pointed out in an introduction to the Pensees, Pascal uses many of Montaigne's ideas, phrases, and terms, paralleling several parts of Montaigne's "Apology for Raymond Sebond"

Perhaps the most controversial part of the Pensees is Pascal's section on miracles He quotes Saint Augustine as saying that he would not have been a Christian but for the miracles, and he argues that there are three marks of religion: perpetuity, a good life, and miracles He writes, "If the cooling of love leaves the Church almost without believers, miracles will rouse them," and "Miracles are more important than you think They have served for the foundation, and will serve for the continuation of the Church till Anti-christ, till the end" Although there are other passages which assert the importance of faith which is in no way dependent upon miracles, as, for example, "That we must love one God only is a thing so evident, that it does not require miracles to prove it," Pascal does seem unambiguously to assert that miracles are a way to faith This idea is opposed by those who insist that belief in miracles presupposes a belief in God and the Gospels Pascal had been profoundly affected by a miracle at Port Royal, but his defense of the importance of miracles goes beyond that immediate reference with appeals to reason and authority as well as to feeling

Pascal's "Proofs of Jesus Christ" is interesting not because it pretends to offer demonstrations which would appeal to unbelievers, but because it uses persuasive references which throw a new light on the question of Jesus' status He argues that because of unbelievers at the time of Christ we now have witnesses to Him If Jesus had made His nature so evident that none could mistake it, the proof of His nature and existence would not have been as convincing as it is when reported by unbelievers Pascal emphasizes the function of the Jews as unbelievers when he writes "The Jews, in slaying Him in order not to receive Him as the Messiah, have given Him the final proof of being the Messiah And in continuing not to recognize Him, they made themselves irreproachable witnesses"

Pascal's famous wager is presented in the Pensees He makes an appeal to "natural lights"—ordinary human intelligence and good sense God either exists or He does not How shall you decide? This is a game with infinitely serious consequences You must wager, but how shall you wager? Reason is of no use here Suppose you decide to wager that God is "If you gain, you gain all, if you lose, you lose nothing" Pascal concludes that there is everything to be said in favor of committing oneself to a belief in God and strong reasons against denying God

To the objection that a man cannot come to believe simply by recognizing that he will be extremely fortunate if he is right and no worse off if he is wrong, Pascal replies by saying that if an unbeliever will act as if he believes, and if he wants to believe, belief will come to him. This wager later inspired William James's The Will to Believe, in which the American pragmatist argued that Pascal's method is essentially pragmatic. James's objection to Pascal's wager is that the wager alone presents no momentous issue, unless one can relate the particular issue being considered to a man's concerns, the appeal of the wager is empty. If such proof would work for Pascal's God, it would work for any god whatsoever. However, James's use of the wager to justify pastional decisions is much like Pascal's.

In a section titled "The Fundamentals of the Christian Religion," Pascal wrote that the Christian religion teaches two truths: that there is a God whom men can know and that by virtue of their corruption men are unworthy of Him. Pascal rejected cold conceptions of God which reduced Him to the author of mathematical truths or of the order of the elements. For Pascal the God of salvation had to be conceived as He is known through Jesus Christ. The Christian God can be known, according to Pascal, but since men are corrupt they do not always know God. Nature assists God to hide Himself from corrupt men, although it also contains perfections to show that Nature is the image of God.

In considering "The Philosophers," Pascal emphasizes thought as distinguishing men from brutes and making the greatness of man possible. "Man is neither angel nor brute," he writes, "and the unfortunate thing is that he who would act the angel acts the brute."

Thus in Pascal we find a man who is on the one hand eager to defend the Christian faith, on the other determined to indicate the shortcomings of men. He is remorselessly critical in his attacks on skeptics, atheists and other critics of the Church, not simply because they err, but because they do so in disorder and without respect for the possibilities of man or the values of religion. In regard to skepticism he wrote that his thoughts were intentionally without order in order to be true to the disorderly character of his subject.

But it is not Pascal the bitter critic who prevails in the Pensees. It is, rather, the impassioned and inspired defender of the faith. Even those who do not share his convictions admire his style and the ingenuity of his thought, and much that is true of all mankind has never been better said than in the Pensees.

THE PEOPLE, YES

Type of work Poetry

Author Carl Sandburg (1878)

First published 1936

In these days when people everywhere shiver under the cloudy skies of the cold war, with its threat of bombs and radiation sickness, it is a pleasure to step suddenly into the bustling sunshine of Carl Sandburg's The People, Yes. Although Sandburg wrote this book during the depression of the 1930's, his strong voice is as cheerful and reassuring today as it was in the time of bread lines and soup kitchens. But Sandburg does not raise his voice to shout down the pessimists, he hymns America out of no sense of duty; his book arises from a genuine love of the plain people who will somehow survive their blunders, somehow find the answers to "Where to? What next?"

In the opening section of this volume

THE PEOPLE YES by Carl Sandburg Excerpts reprinted by permission of the publishers Harcourt Brace & Co. Inc. Copyright, 1936 by Harcourt Brace & Co. Inc.

Sandburg lets these questions be asked by the children of workers who come to build the Tower of Babel and at the end, when the poet looks forward to the "Family of Man" and the time when "brother may yet line up with brother," the questions are still unanswered. In between, the poet makes his tribute to people in general and the American people in particular: here are the legends, the sayings, the slang, the tall tales, the dreams of twentieth century America.

Two of the best (and most quoted) sections of the book are the one on Lincoln and the one on tall tales beginning "They have yarns." Sandburg is world famous as an authority on Lincoln: there are his great biography and many poems, speeches, and articles, but nowhere is he more successful than in this short poem which presents the many talents of a great man by asking a series of questions, such as "Lincoln? was he a poet?" and "Lincoln? was he a historian?" and then gives the answers from quoted speeches, letters, and conversations of the man himself. The tall tales poem is an encyclopedia of laughs ranging all the way from the familiar "man who drove a swarm of bees across the Rocky Mountains and the Desert 'and didn't lose a bee'" to the not so familiar story of a shipwrecked sailor who has caught hold of a stateroom door and floated in near the coast, when his would-be rescuers tell him he is off New Jersey, he takes a fresh hold on the door and calls back "half wearily, 'I guess I'll float a little farther'."

Much of The People, Yes is in this same light hearted tone, for Sandburg loves the American language and the twists we give to our sayings. For irony, he quotes from a memorial stone

"We, near whose bones you stand,
were Iroquois
The wide land which is now yours,
was ours
Friendly hands have given us back enough for a tomb"

For homespun wisdom, he offers this advice: "Sell the buffalo hide after you have killed the buffalo." And for unsophistication, he throws in "The coat and the pants do the work but the vest gets the gravy." There are scores of other wisecracks and jokes, some new and some that wink at you like old friends from your childhood.

Sandburg has also filled his book with American people—the real, the legendary and the anonymous. Among the real ones are John Brown, "who was buried deep and didn't stay so", Mr. Eastman, "the kodak king," who at the age of seventy seven shot himself to avoid the childishness of senility, and the Wright brothers, who "wanted to fly for the sake of flying." The legends include Mike Fink, John Henry, and, of course, Paul Bunyan, to whom Sandburg devotes a whole section, explaining how the people created this Master Lumberjack, his Seven Axmen, and Benny, his Little Blue Ox. Of the anonymous, there are hundreds, and Sandburg pays tribute to them all, from whoever first said "Wedlock is a padlock" to whoever first remarked, "No peace on earth with the women, no life anywhere without them."

If one fears that Sandburg will consistently handle the American people with the twin kid gloves of gentleness and affection, he can quickly put his mind at rest. When he feels like it, Sandburg puts on the six ounce mitts of a prizefighter (as he has often done since his Chicago Poems was first published in 1916) and flails away at what he hates: the liars who do not care what they do to their customers so long as they make a sale, the torturers and the wielders of the rubber hose, the cynics who shrug off the unemployed, the crooked lawyers, the judges who can be bought and the men who boast that they can buy them, and, most of all, the misleaders who spit out the word "peepul" as if it were scum hocked from their throats.

Of the many books that Sandburg has written, both prose and poetry, The Peo ple, Yes comes closest to being his coda, his summing up of what he has tried to say in a lifetime. As if to indicate as much, he includes echoes from earlier poems: there is the hyacinths biscuits combination that appeared first in one of his most famous definitions of poetry, he mentions the Unknown Soldier, "the boy nobody knows the name of", and he includes the refrain from his "Four Preludes on Playthings of the Wind": "We are the greatest city, the greatest people. Nothing like us ever was." And certainly the themes in this book are the same as those that run through all of Sandburg's poetry: his love of America and its democracy, the mystery of man and where he is going, the hope that people everywhere will someday blunder through the fogs of injustice, hypocrisy, and skulduggery into a bright world of peace. Sandburg has put it all in The People, Yes, has expressed it perfectly in the fluent style that only he can master. No American poet has a better ear for the right combination of words and certainly none has ever matched his ability at writing dialogue, at putting on paper the way Americans really talk.

As in all books, there are caution signs for the reader to observe. No one should try to read The People, Yes at one sitting. It is not a narrative poem with suspense enough to carry one along breathless to the end. Some of the sections are repetitious and in places the Whitmanesque cataloging drones on monotonously. Perhaps these are flaws that Sandburg might have corrected by devoting more individual sections to the telling of a single story, as in the poems on Lincoln and Paul Bunyan. Sometimes one gets the feeling that over the years the poet has kept a gigantic notebook which he crammed with all the jokes and picturesque sayings he ever heard; then he sat down with notebook beside him and patiently strung them on the strings that are his central themes. Such a feeling can be ameliorated if the reader will treat this volume as a sort of reference book without the dryness the word "reference" usually connotes. Here is writing to be dipped into, savored for a time, and put aside, to be taken up again when a sense of humor is drooping, when faith in American democracy is lump and cold.

The people will live on
The learning and blundering people will live on

They will be tricked and sold and again sold
And go back to the nourishing earth
for rootholds

In the darkness with a great bundle of grief
the people march
In the night, and overhead a shovel of stars for keeps, the people march
'Where to? What next?'

PERSIAN LETTERS

Type of work Satirical essays in letter form
Author Charles de Montesquieu (1689-1755)
Time 1711-1721
Locale Paris, Smyrna, Venice, Ispahan
First published 1721

Principal characters

USBEK, a Persian in Paris
RICA, a young friend of Usbek
IBBEN, a Persian in Smyrna
RHEDI, a Persian in Venice
ZEPHIS, ZACHI,
ZELIS, and

ROXANA some of Usbek's wives in his seraglio in Ispahan

SOLIM one of Usbek's servants in Ispahan

THE CHIEF BLACK EUNUCH guardian of Usbek's seraglio

In these 161 letters written by various fictional correspondents Montesquieu gives a sharp picture of many facets of Parisian society and the customs of the early eighteenth century. The correspondence also reveals much of the thinking of the time on comparative religions.

Although the writing is in a formal mode in keeping with the status of the correspondents, Montesquieu's tone and style never become stiff or artificial. The satire is by turns muted in the mellowness of friendly correspondence and proclaimed in the harshness of intentional criticism. Unlike many similar collections of letters, however, Persian Letters is entertaining pleasant reading. The concise, clear sentences have a conversational tone. In spite of Montesquieu's title, the aim of the writing is not a sociological picture of life in a Persian harem. It is a subtle, accurate satire of French society, pointing up the decadent attitudes and loose morals, from 1712, in the last years of the reign of Louis XIV and the regime of Philip Duc de Orleans, during the minority of Louis XV. In Persian Letters there are numerous resemblances to Dufresney's Amusements, The Spectator, and the Decameron, writings known to have been among Montesquieu's favorite books.

Persian Letters, printed in Amsterdam and published anonymously in 1721, was an immediate success. As a friend of Montesquieu had predicted, copies of the work "sold like loaves."

Because of a thin thread of story, Persian Letters may be said to contain a sustained narrative. Usbek, from his youth a courtier, was given to sincerity in his resolution to remain uncorrupted by worldly concerns. Finally the ministers came to question his intentions because he was not given to flattery. Persecuted, he resolved to go to Europe and eventually to visit Paris. Rica, a young friend, went as his companion. Other Persians with whom these two exchanged letters were Ibben, in Smyrna, and Rheda, in Venice.

Letters to Usbek from his wives, the eunuchs, and other servants reported unrest in the harem. These letters told of the jealousies and the temperamental behavior of the wives, the inadequacies of underlings with responsibility but without authority, and the efforts of those persons to maintain their status through Usbek's support.

The revolt continued. Violence grew. The wives wrote, variously proclaiming their devotion to, or their hatred of Usbek. The chief eunuch was killed while attempting to maintain order in the harem. Roxana, the most recent of Usbek's wives, had been the instigator of that unrest and violence. Hers is the last letter in the book. In it, she tells of having betrayed Usbek. Personifying liberated womanhood (a transition apparent in eighteenth century France), Roxana wrote

Yes I have deceived you, I have led away your eunuchs and I have known how to turn your frightful seraglio into a place of pleasure and delight. How could you think that I was such a weakling as to imagine there was nothing for me in the world but to worship your caprices that while you indulged all your desires you should have the right to thwart me in all mine? I have remodelled your laws upon those of nature and my mind has always maintained its independence.

Rica, good humored and sardonic, represents the lighter side of Montesquieu's nature. Rica jibed at groups and individuals, at religion and government, at customs and beliefs. Nothing escaped his cynical eye. It was his observation that the King of France was much wealthier than the King of Spain, even though the latter owned mines of gold and silver, the French king's wealth came from a more inexhaustible source, the vanity of his subjects. The gullibility of the French people, Rica wrote, was so great that should the king be short of money, he had only to suggest that a piece of paper was the coin of the realm, and the people were at once convinced of its value.

In Rica's estimation, the Christian religion consisted of an immense number of tedious duties. Among the tradespeople in Paris, he noted that a "good natured creature will offer you for a little money the secret of making gold", another "promises you the love of the spirits of the air, if you will see no women for a small trifle of thirty years", "an infinite number of professors of languages, of arts, and of sciences, teach what they do not know, and their talent is not by any means despicable, for much less wit is required to exhibit one's knowledge, than to teach what one knows nothing of."

Rica disdained the pseudo intellectual and everyone's apparent desire to write a book on any topic of conversation fashionable in the salons. "I am exasperated," he wrote, "with a book which I have just laid down—a book so big that it seems to contain all science but it has only split my head without putting anything into it."

Although Usbek was as brilliant and on occasion as satirical as the younger Rica, he was graver and given more to meditation and reflection. Throughout his many discussions of religion in the letters, Usbek showed respect for all faiths. The social and the theological are as one,

according to Usbek, because God established religions for man's happiness, and he can most surely please God by obeying the laws of society and by loving his fellow man. That all religions had their foundations in God was expressed in Usbek's prayer "Lord, I do not understand these discussions that are carried on without end regarding Thee. I would serve Thee according to Thy will, but each man whom I consult would have me serve Thee according to his." Usbek did not believe that it was necessary to hate and persecute those of other faiths in order to serve God, nor was it necessary to try to convert them.

Although the Persian is Montesquieu's mouthpiece for philosophical viewpoint and discussion, Usbek is quite capable of cryptic analysis. In one letter he asserted that "a poet [is] the grotesqueness of humankind. These sort of people declare that they are born what they are, and, I may add, what they will be all their lives, namely almost always, the most ridiculous of men." On another occasion, having been cornered at a party by a dandy who boasted of his successful conquests with ladies, Usbek told him that "If you were in Persia, you would not enjoy all these advantages, you would be held fitter to guard our women than to please them."

In Persian Letters communication is direct and immediate, character is self-portrayed, and ideas reveal the working of a shrewd incisive mind that is always reflective of the author, yet in keeping with the personalities of the principals who are allowed to speak for him.

THE PHILIPPICS

Type of work Orations

Author Demosthenes (384-322 B.C.)

First transcribed Fourth century B.C.

Occasionally in history, perhaps more often than we realize, genius and a crisis in human affairs unite to produce a great man whose name then rings down through the ages long after the particular events which produced him have faded into the dimness of antiquity. Such a man was Demosthenes. Almost every educated person has heard of him and knows that he was a famous Greek orator.

But the events and the crisis in ancient Greece which helped make him famous are unknown, except to students of ancient history

As an Athenian lawyer and orator, Demosthenes might have won but little fame had it not been for Philip of Macedon, whose ambition was to conquer and rule as much of the world as he could, and to a great extent he succeeded in his aim. When the danger to Athens became great, Demosthenes did all he could to arouse his fellow Athenians to the defense of their city state. The crisis was one that has recurred in various forms throughout history. On the one hand was Philip of Macedon, a tyrant who sought control of many lands and peoples; on the other, Demosthenes, a believer in democracy and local sovereignty who did all that one person could to arouse his contemporaries to fight against Philip and, later, his son, Alexander the Great. In this conflict between democracy and tyranny there is no doubt of Demosthenes' sincerity: it rings out from his orations almost as clearly today as it must have more than twenty-three centuries ago.

By common consent of his contemporaries and later generations, Demosthenes was the greatest of the Greek orators, in a culture that produced a great many able men in rhetoric and oratory. Scholars of all periods have praised his speeches, and the number of manuscripts found in Egypt containing fragments of his speeches has been second only to papyri containing fragments of the Homeric epics. In modern times we can see but dimly the greatness of the speeches from the standpoint of formal rhetoric as the Greeks knew and used it. What Cicero praised in the orations is now to be found only by the serious student of Greek language and culture.

On the other hand, modern readers can find something in the speeches that his admirers in the ancient world seem to have overlooked or ignored. We can see that Demosthenes was an able and sincere statesman laboring for democratic ideals at a time when his fellow citizens in Athens were inclined to do little to oppose the forces of tyranny led and symbolized by Philip of Macedon. Demosthenes knew human nature as he knew his art, and he brought the two together to speak out forcefully what he believed in. He spoke out, not for the sake of his rhetoric, but for the sake of Athens, he spoke not to a select group, to no aristocracy, but to all Athenians. He wished to persuade them to rise to the defense of their city and the way of life and government that it represented. In the orations there is, at least as they are translated, little flamboyance. Demosthenes spoke plainly and sincerely, his art was like all great art, hiding beneath the cloak of apparent simplicity great care in production. Demosthenes' tone is serious, even to the point of sobriety.

As in the case of so many ancient authors, the authenticity of work supposedly done by Demosthenes is open to question. More than sixty orations, as well as some letters and poems have been attributed to him, but scholars nowadays accept only about forty of the speeches as authentic. Many of the orations accepted as his are nonpolitical, having been composed for delivery in cases at law. These orations furnish a great deal of material about Greek culture, as Cicero's orations furnish information about Roman culture at a later time. Demosthenes' true fame rests on the speeches called the Philippics. These were not the only orations on political subjects that he made, nor were they the only speeches he gave which had to do with the threat of Philip to Athens. Quite a number of other orations, like the Olynthiacs, deal with Philip's depredations in the Greek peninsula and other portions of the eastern Mediterranean world.

The first Philippic was delivered in 351 B.C. At that time Philip, stopped at Thermopylae, had sent his armies into Thrace, dispatched a fleet to attack the islands of Lemnos and Imbrus, and interfered with the commerce of Athens by attacking shipping Demosthenes spoke that the Athenians might be made aware of the danger and take steps to defend themselves The orator obviously felt that Athens in 351 B C had more to fear from the Macedonian king than its traditional enemy, Thebes, or from a combination of other unfriendly city states It was not as an alarmist that Demosthenes spoke, he spoke, rather, to awaken his fellow Athenians to an awareness of the need for watchfulness and preparedness In this first Philippic he encouraged his city to meet the danger, pointing out its advantages and strengths In practical fashion, he suggested ways in which the city could economically take steps to meet the danger, which at that time was not as great as it would become in passing years It was not enough, as Demosthenes knew, merely to hope that Philip had died, as rumor had it Demosthenes realized that failure to provide for defense through inaction sets up circumstances which are an invitation to strong armed tyranny Later history has shown that leaders have often failed to realize this truism of politics Demosthenes realized, as leaders sometimes have failed to do, that free people do not have a choice between action and inaction To oppose Philip, to warn him that Athens was prepared to defend itself, the orator suggested a military force of moderate size, with good officers to lead it He recommended that at least twenty five percent of the personnel be Athenians, the rest mercenaries Knowing that to equip, pay, and keep in the field a large force was beyond the economic power of the city, he urged a small, but efficient military force The answer to the problem, he said, lay in making the best use of what could be afforded, not in hitting blindly only at places where Philip had already struck

Nothing was done by the Athenians In 344 B C, seven years later, he again spoke pointedly in the second Philippic By that time Philip, allied with the Messenians, had become a more powerful threat to Athens Demosthenes himself had headed an embassy to Messene and Argos to warn those cities against the oppressor, to no avail Philip, in turn, had sent an emissary to Athens to complain about Demosthenes' charges and to vindicate his conduct Demosthenes spoke to explain carefully what Philip was doing and what the pro Macedonian group in Athens was doing to endanger the city He ended by pointing out that Philip's conduct now made the Athenians' problem one of defending their city and homes, not merely of looking after claims and interests abroad Philip's benevolence was shown to be double edged

In the third of the Philippics, delivered in 341 B C, Demosthenes cried out that Athenians had to learn that a state of war existed, even though Philip talked of peace Philip aimed at the Chersonese, which controlled the route of grain ships between Athens and the Euxine Demosthenes urged that the Chersonese be protected as a means of protecting Athens He was right in his predictions Philip attacked the Propontine cities in the following year The Athenians, to their credit and Demosthenes', played their part in resisting the tyrant The fourth and last of the Philippics was also delivered in 341 B C, just before Philip laid siege to the Propontine cities In this oration, as he had in the third Philippic, Demosthenes urged resistance, even advocating an alliance with Persia Although the fourth Philippic is generally accepted as authentic, some scholars have viewed it with suspicion, claiming for several reasons that it is spurious and not really a product of Demosthenes' own hand

PHILOCTETES

Type of work Drama

Author Sophocles (c. 496-406 or 405 B.C.)

Type of plot Classical tragedy

Time of plot The Trojan War

Locale The island of Lemnos

First presented 409 B.C.

Principal characters

PHILOCTETES, an abandoned Greek warrior

NEOPTOLEMUS, Achilles' son

ODYSSEUS, King of Ithaca

A SAILOR, disguised as a trader

HERAKLES, a Greek immortal

CHORUS OF SAILORS, under the command of Neoptolemus

Critique

Philoctetes is Sophocles' penultimate play. It is interesting that it is in theme markedly similar to his last play, Oedipus at Colonus. In both plays the protagonist has become hateful to his society and has been rejected by it, and in both plays the hero again becomes necessary to the society which had cast him out, is restored by the gods, and resumes his powers. In this play the attitude of Odysseus to the sufferings of the hero, like that of Creon in the Oedipus plays, is completely inhuman. Philoctetes varies from all of Sophocles' other plays, however, in having a happy ending. This circumstance is achieved only after Philoctetes has been lovingly accepted as a fellow man by Neoptolemus. The myth of the Wound and the Bow, although it has not received the overwhelming attention that has been accorded the Oedipus myth, has interested modern writers and critics. The crux of the myth is the fact that the unacceptable man and his remarkable and essential powers are inseparable. Only when this fact is understood by others can he take his place and play his part in society.

The Story

Odysseus had abandoned Philoctetes on the barren island of Lemnos after the warrior had been bitten on the foot by a snake while preparing to make a sacrifice at the shrine of Chrysa. The wound never healed, and the smell that came from it and the groans of suffering Philoctetes were the reasons Odysseus gave for making him an outcast. But Philoctetes, with his invincible bow, once the property of Herakles, had become indispensable to the Greeks in their war against Troy. Landing for the second time on Lemnos, Odysseus described the cave in which Philoctetes lived. Neoptolemus identified it by the stained bandages drying in the sun, the leaf-stuffed mattress, and the crude wooden cup he found.

Instructed by Odysseus, Neoptolemus was to lure Philoctetes on board with his bow by declaring that he too hated Odysseus because the king had deprived him of the weapons of his father Achilles. Neoptolemus was disgusted by this deception, but wily Odysseus pleaded necessity and promised him honor and glory after this one day. When Neoptolemus had agreed to obey, Odysseus left him.

The chorus of sailors reported that they heard the painful approach of Philoctetes. He asked who they were and whether they too were Greeks. Imploring their pity, he told them not to fear him, although he had become a savage through solitude and great suffering. Neoptolemus answered Philoctetes, who asked who he was and why he had come. The young warrior said that he was the son of Achilles and that he did not know Philoctetes, who replied that he must indeed be vile if no word of him had reached the

Greeks His wound had grown worse and because he was alone on the island he had to use all his energy to keep alive He shot birds with his great bow, and in order that he might drink in winter he was forced to build a fire to melt the ice He cursed the Atreidae and Odysseus, who had abandoned him, and wished that they might suffer his agony Neoptolemus, answering as he had been instructed, said that he too had cursed Odysseus, who had deprived him of his rights and robbed him of his father's arms He asserted that he intended to sail for home

Philoctetes, declaring that their grief was equal, wondered also why Ajax had allowed these injustices He was told that Ajax was also dead Philoctetes was certain that Odysseus was alive, and this fact Neoptolemus confirmed After hearing of the death of other friends, Philoctetes agreed with Neoptolemus that war inevitably killed the good men but only occasionally and by chance killed the bad Neoptolemus stressed his determination never to return to Troy He then said goodbye to Philoctetes, who implored them not to abandon him and to suffer for one day the inconvenience of having him on board the ship on which Neoptolemus was sailing When he begged on his knees not to be left alone again, the chorus expressed their willingness to take him with them After Neoptolemus agreed, Philoctetes praised the day that had brought them together and declared himself bound in friendship to the young warrior for all time

As Odysseus had planned, a sailor disguised as a trader came to help Neoptolemus in tricking Philoctetes He said, hoping to persuade Philoctetes to go quickly on board, that Odysseus was pursuing him in order to compel him to rejoin the Greek army, for Helenus, Priam's son, had prophesied that Philoctetes was the one man who would defeat Troy Philoctetes swore that he would never go with his most hated enemy, and the disguised trader returned to his ship

Neoptolemus asked permission to hold the mighty bow while Philoctetes prepared to leave the island Suddenly the wound in Philoctetes' foot began to pain him beyond endurance He handed the bow to Neoptolemus and writhed on the ground until the abscess burst and the blood flowed The sailors advised Neoptolemus to leave with the bow while the exhausted man slept Neoptolemus refused, for the bow was useless without Philoctetes

When Philoctetes awoke, Neoptolemus revealed to him that he had come to take the warrior to fight against Troy Philoctetes refused to go When Neoptolemus insisted on keeping the bow, Philoctetes enraged and despairing, cursed such treachery and declared that he would starve without his weapon Neoptolemus loyalties were divided between duty and compassion, but before he had decided on the course to pursue, Odysseus arrived and demanded that Philoctetes should accompany them When he remained adamant, Odysseus and Neoptolemus left, taking with them the bow

The chorus of sailors assured Philoctetes that it would be best to fight with the Greeks, but out of pride he was determined not to fight with men who had made him an outcast He begged for a sword to kill himself Then Neoptolemus, followed by Odysseus, returned, he had decided to redress the wrong he had done Philoctetes and to return the bow Odysseus, unable to change the young warrior's decision, went to tell the other Greeks of this act of treachery Meanwhile, Neoptolemus again tried to persuade Philoctetes to join them When Philoctetes again refused, Neoptolemus, in spite of the return of Odysseus, gave back the bow He was then forced to keep Philoctetes from killing Odysseus

When Odysseus had again left them, Neoptolemus revealed the whole of Helenus' prophecy, which foretold that the wound would be cured when Philoctetes returned and that, together with Neoptolemus, he would conquer Troy Philoctetes, declaring Odysseus had been faith less once and would be so again, implored Neoptolemus to take him home, as he had first promised. But Neoptolemus was afraid that the Greeks would in retaliation attack his country. Philoctetes swore that he would defend the country with his bow.

Before they could leave, Herakles, from whom Philoctetes had inherited the bow, appeared on the rocks above the cave. He informed Philoctetes that Zeus had spoken. Philoctetes should return to the Greek army, where he would be healed. Also, with Neoptolemus, he would kill Paris and take Troy. Philoctetes, heeding the voice of the immortal, willingly left Lemnos to fulfill his destiny.

PHILOSOPHIAE NATURALIS PRINCIPIA MATHEMATICA

Type of work Scientific and philosophical treatise

Author Sir Isaac Newton (1642-1727)

First published 1687

One of the most seminal and influential books in the English language has been Newton's Philosophiae Naturalis Principia Mathematica (The Mathematical Principles of Natural Philosophy). Published in 1687, the book immediately led to intellectual controversy among the scientists and philosophers of the day. Men as distinguished as Leibniz, Dr. Robert Hooke, and John Flamsteed, the British Astronomer Royal, felt it necessary to argue with many of the propositions and conclusions Newton advanced. In spite of these arguments, the Principia remained the principal document in the field of physics for two hundred years and a highly revered work of philosophy throughout the eighteenth century. Newton became one of the most honored figures in Western culture, one of the first formulators of scientific method and the man whose work formed the basis for scientific study and application of principles. Physics, as a field of theory and knowledge, did not exist before Newton's work.

Newton published a preface to the Principia in which he announced that he was interested in the laws of mathematics as a means of discovering nature, or getting at philosophical truth. He felt that mathematics was not a pure, abstract system, but rather a human and rational means for discovering the principles of the universe, for making a kind of universal order out of man's disparate experience. In fact, he felt this function of mathematics so strongly that, in the body of the Principia, every experiment or demonstration is concluded with a "Scholium." The "Scholium" is a short essay giving the philosophical implications or the speculative use of the mathematical or physical principle just demonstrated.

After the preface, Newton supplied a series of definitions for such terms as motion, force, and quantity, terms necessary for even an elementary understanding of his work. These definitions are still standard among students of physics. After the definitions, Newton stated his famous three axioms or laws of motion. These axioms, like the tendency of a body at rest to remain at rest or the fact that every action has an equal and opposite reaction, are still relevant in any account of the physical forces operating with respect to the earth. Newton stated these laws as axioms on which his whole account of the universe rested. It was not that he could prove them universally; rather, these axioms became the cornerstone of his system, the principles which explained the various facts and data that men found in physical phenomena around them. The axioms, like the definitions, were necessary beginnings, points which must be accepted in order that all the physical data could make rational sense. The axioms had six corollaries, propositions which could be established from the axioms and be used in turn to establish other propositions

In the first book of the Principia, Newton deals with the motion of bodies. In order to simplify and explain his theories, in the first book he confines his observations and proofs to bodies moving in a vacuum. He begins with the more purely mathematical establishing ratios (demonstrating the logic of the number system), determining the vectors of forces, tracing and proving how bodies move in various arcs, parabolas, and ellipses. For all these geometric demonstrations he gives mathematical proof by inventing and proving his equations and by making frequent reference to his many diagrammatic figures. He also develops and proves equations dealing with the ascent and descent of bodies, again confining his work to bodies in a vacuum. He also devises mathematical explanation for the oscillations of a pendulum. Finally, at the end of the first book, Newton deals with the attractions of bodies for one another, setting up equations to demonstrate this necessary and universal principle of attraction and repulsion.

In the second book he deals with the motion of bodies in resisting mediums. Because of the natures of the resisting mediums, such as water or air, the proofs become more intricate and complicated. Newton usually attempts to simplify his demonstrations by assuming that the medium is constant. These experiments allow Newton to calculate and, more important, to explain the resistance of substances like water or air to the motion of bodies. He gives further demonstrations of motion, analyzing some of the problems dealt with in his first book. He brings up, for example, the oscillations of the pendulum and charts the equations for the motion of a pendulum through air. His consideration of the resistance to bodies allows Newton to present and demonstrate the solution to other problems in the physical universe. In this section, dealing with means of determining the density and compression of fluids, he develops equations to explain the behavior of fluids. The density they offer as resistance and the force they exert when compressed. This work on fluids permitted Newton to establish his equations to determine the velocity of waves.

Newton called his third book the "System of the World," his specific intention in this book being to develop the philosophical principles which he believed followed directly from his mathematical proofs and his experimentation. He begins the book by stating his rules for accurate reasoning, based on his belief that there are no superfluous causes in nature. Each cause that man can talk of sensibly has direct effects which man is able to observe and subdue to order with his mathematical and rational equipment. In other words, Newton thought that the simplicity of the design of the universe is a basic rule, causes are never extraneous, only the basis for observable and frequently calculable phenomena. Another significant rule is Newton's belief that all conclusions are based on induction. Man reasons from the observable facts and always needs to refer his conclusions or theories to the observable facts around him. In this complete devotion to scientific method, to the necessity of constant reference of the theory to all of the data, Newton fully realized, however, that theories might well have to be altered to provide explanations for new or accumulated data. Changes in post-Newtonian physics would not have surprised Newton, for he always acknowledged that scientific theories could be no more than the best conclusions available from the data at hand at the moment the conclusion was made.

The third book sets forth Newton's mathematical demonstrations of the periodic times and movements of the planets. Again, he derives many new equations to demonstrate, with a good deal of accuracy, the movements of the planets and to correlate this knowledge with the system of time on earth. He also proves that gravity applies to all bodies and calculates the ratio of gravity. Much of the third section is devoted to lunar motion, establishing equations and calculating in terms of time, the various changing relationships between the moon and the earth. These matters lead Newton into consideration of the effect of the sun and the moon on the waters of the earth, and he devises means of measuring the tides. He also computes the times and ranges of recurrent comets.

In a long final "Scholium" designed to tie the extensive parts of the Principia together, Newton develops the basis for his belief in God. He asserts that such a perfect, and perfectly simple, system must have, as its ultimate or final cause, a perfect, and perfectly simple, Being. This Being must embody all the intelligence, the rationality, the perfection, of the system itself. Newton views God as this ultimate principle, not as a personal God. Firm in his devotion to his principle, he answered, in later editions of the Principia, charges of atheism brought against his system. This principle, the final cause, is the perpetrator of the whole Newtonian universe, the perfectly rational origin of all the laws, mathematics, and reason that man can use in order to develop and describe the meaningful pattern in his universe. And God, the perfect Being, having set this vast plan in constant motion, is constantly at hand to make sure the universe does not run down, or to repair any defects in the system.

This concept of God became, during the eighteenth century, one of the principal concepts held by intellectuals. The religion of Deism, of viewing God as the perpetrator and final cause of a complete, perfect, mechanistic universe, was derived from Newton's thorough and systematic explanation.

As science and as philosophy, the Principia is one of man's great achievements. The book vastly increased the store of human knowledge and derived a sound and rational basis for making conclusions about the physical universe. In addition, Newton, in his Principia, both illustrated and defined the method by which man could continue to test his observations, developed a whole new and important area for the human intellect, and established a metaphysical system which governed a great deal of human thinking and scientific investigation for over a century.

PHILOSOPHY OF ART

Type of work Aesthetic philosophy
Author Hippolyte Taine (1828-1893)
First published 1865

Hippolyte Taine, author of The History of English Literature (1863-1869) and of The Origins of Contemporary France (1875-1894), combined a historical interest in his subjects with a philosophical one. He was able to do this because he regarded both history and philosophy as sciences, he believed that a study of the nature of art and of art production could proceed, in the manner of any scientific study, by attention to the observable facts and by the framing of inductive generalizations. Consequently, his Philosophy of Art is to some extent a description of some predominant art periods and to some extent an attempt to generalize philosophically from the data of his historical inquiries. Other Taine volumes present studies of the art of Greece, the Netherlands, and Italy.

Taine's working assumption is that no work of art is isolated and that the only way to understand a particular work of art or the nature of art in general is by attending to the conditions out of which works of art come.

This theory holds that the character of a work of art is determined by the artist but that the artist himself is what he is in virtue of a number of cultural influences which are inescapable Taine believed that works of art present, in perceptible form, the essential character of the time and place in which the artist works In his words, "The work of art is determined by an aggregate which is the general state of the mind and surrounding manners" To illustrate his point, Taine refers to the art of Greece, reflecting in its nude statues the Grecian preoccupation with war and athletics and with the development of the healthy human animal, the art of the Middle Ages, reflecting the moral crisis resulting from feudal oppression, the art of the seventeenth century, reflecting the values of courtly life, and the art of industrial democracy, expressing the restless aspirations of man in an age of science

The work of art itself is conditioned by the wholes of which it is a part and product In the first place, according to Taine, the work of art exhibits the artist's style, that prevailing mode of aesthetic treatment which runs through all the works of an artist, giving them a family resemblance to one another Secondly, the work of art reflects the prevailing manner of the school of artists to which the individual artist belongs It expresses, in the third place, the world of the times, the social milieu of taste, conviction, and manners within which the artist must work and by which he must be affected Taine believed, then, that "in order to comprehend a work of art, an artist or a group of artists, we must clearly comprehend the general social and intellectual condition of the times to which they belong"

In addition to the influence of taste and style, one must consider "moral temperature," the spiritual milieu, whether mystic or pagan or something foreign to both, which infects the artist and, consequently, his work The philosophy of art, as Taine understood it, is the attempt to study the art of various countries and ages in order to discover the conditions under which the art of a particular place and time was created, and,

finally, the conditions in general for any art whatsoever A report of those general conditions would be a philosophy of art

In examining actual works of art, the first step in scientific aesthetics, Taine found that imitation was an important feature of most works of art, particularly of works of poetry, sculpture, and painting Taine wondered whether exact imitation was the end of art, for he was interested in arriving by inductive means at a theory of the nature of art He concluded that it is not since exact imitation does not produce the finest works of art Photography, for example, is useful as a means of making accurate reproductions of scenes, but no one supposes that it can be ranked with such fine arts as painting and sculpture Another reason for concluding that works of art are not essentially concerned with exact imitation is that many works of art are intentionally inexact

There is a kind of imitation, however, which is essential to art, according to Taine, and that is the imitation of what he calls "the relationships and mutual dependence of parts" Just as a painter, even when reproducing a human figure, does not represent every feature of the body, its exact size, color, and weight, but rather what might be called the logic of the body, so artists in general, in creating works of art, do not aim at deception through exact representation but, rather, at presenting the essential character of an object Since the essential character of an object is simply the predominant feature of the object as affected by the place and time of its existence, we may say that the artist's objective, according to Taine's analysis, is to put into perceptible form that principal feature of the object In painting a lion, for example, the important thing is to represent him as carnivorous, in painting the Low Countries the artist must imitate its alluvial character

Taine was aware of the fact that the artist is often doing something quite different from making the dominant feature of nature the predominant feature of the work of art, but he believed that all art can be explained as the imitation of essential quality. What the artist presents may be not the essential character of some physical scene or object, it may be the prevailing temper of his times. This view is made clear in Part II of the book, in which Taine considers artistic production. Part I, on the nature of art, concludes with the summary statement that "The end of a work of art is to manifest some essential or salient character, consequently some important idea, clearer and more completely than is attainable from real objects. Art accomplishes this end by employing a group of connected parts, the relationships of which it systematically modifies."

The law of art production—that a work of art is determined by the general state of mind and surrounding circumstances—Taine defends in two ways. He refers to experience in order to argue that the law of production applies to all works of art, and then he analyzes the effects of "a general state of mind and surrounding circumstances" in order to claim that the law reveals a necessary connection.

As an example, Taine considers the effect of melancholy as a state of mind, together with the circumstances which made melancholy characteristic of an age. He argues that in a melancholy age the artist is inevitably melancholy. As a result, the artist portrays all objects as being predominantly melancholy; he "paints things in much darker colors."

During a renaissance, when there is "a general condition of cheerfulness," the works of art will express a joyful condition. Whatever the combination of moods in an age, the art of that age will reflect the combination. It could not be otherwise, Taine argues, because the artist cannot isolate himself from his age.

As historical examples, the Greek period, the feudal age, the seventeenth century, and the nineteenth century are referred to

A "general situation" resulting from a condition of wealth or poverty, or of servitude or liberty, or from a prevailing religious faith or from some other feature of the society, has an effect on the individual artist, affecting his aptitudes and his emotions. Thus, "In Greece we see physical perfection and a balance of faculties which no manual or cerebral excess of life deranges, in the Middle Ages, the intemperance of over excited imaginations and the delicacy of feminine sensibility, in the seventeenth century, the polish and good breeding of society and the dignity of aristocratic salons and in modern times, the grandeur of unchained ambitions and the morbidity of unsatisfied yearnings."

The four terms of a causal series by reference to which the production of art can be explained are: 1. The general situation, 2. The tendencies and special faculties provoked by that situation, 3. A man, representing and embodying the tendencies and faculties, and 4. The material—such as sounds, forms, colors, or language—by the use of which the man gives the character sensuous form.

Taine argues that the artist imitates the prevailing quality of his age because he cannot escape being a part of his age, because nothing else would be accepted, and because the artist works for acceptance and applause.

Taine's Philosophy of Art is a clear and sensible defense of the idea that art reflects the spirit of the times. In opposition to his position there are those theories which emphasize the role of the extraordinary man, the eccentric who by his genius transcends the perspectives and sentiments of his age. The attempt to reconcile these two basic philosophical perspectives only hides the truth that resides in each. The moral seems to be to read Taine for an appreciation of the influence of the social milieu, and someone else, say Nietzsche, for an aesthetics in which the artist is shown as an individual rebel who falsifies nature.

PHINEAS FINN

Type of work Novel
Author Anthony Trollope (1815-1882)
Type of plot Political romance
Time of plot Mid nineteenth century
Locale The British Isles
First published 1869

Principal characters

PHINEAS FINN, a personable young Irishman
LORD BRENTFORD, an important Whig
LORD CHILTERN, his profligate son
LADY LAURA STANDISH, Brentford's beautiful daughter
MR KENNEDY, a very rich Member of Parliament
VIOLET EFFINGHAM, a charming girl of large fortune
MADAME MARIE MAX GOESLER, a pretty and wealthy young widow
MARY FLOOD JONES, a pretty Irish girl

Critique

Phineas Finn, the Irish Member is an objective account of the successful but brief parliamentary career of a guilelessly opportunistic young man who lacks the fortune which could give him independence from his party. The novel is rewarding for its dispassionate account of the passing of the important English Reform Bill, but the author's approach both to that and to his hero is so completely objective that it is difficult for the reader to feel much enthusiasm for either. As usual, Trollope's characterizations are excellent, but the loose and episodic plot structure prevents Phineas Finn from equalling the best of the Barsetshire series.

The Story

Young Phineas Finn, just admitted to the bar, was tempted to postpone his career as a barrister by an offer to run for election as a member of Parliament from the Irish borough of Loughshane. Phineas' father, a hard working Irish doctor, reluctantly agreed to give Phineas enough money to enable him to live, for a Member of Parliament received no salary and could only hope that his party, when in power, would reward him with a lucrative office.

Phineas was elected. Among those to whom he said goodbye before leaving for London was pretty Mary Flood Jones, a girl devoted to Phineas, but no richer than he.

Phineas' well-wishers in London included Lady Laura Standish, daughter of Lord Brentford, an influential Whig. Phineas, falling in love with Laura, saw a rival in the aloof and unprepossessing but rich Mr Kennedy, also a Whig and a member of Parliament. Laura tried to encourage a friendship between Phineas and her brother Lord Chiltern, a violent young man who had quarreled with their father. Lord Brentford would be reconciled with his son if Chiltern were to marry rich, lovely, and witty Violet Effingham, a friend from childhood. Chiltern, loving her deeply, had proposed repeatedly, but Violet was level-headed and, though fond of Chiltern, she did not intend to ruin herself deliberately.

At Laura's recommendation, Phineas accepted an invitation to visit Loughlinter, the Kennedy estate in Scotland. There Phineas made friends with several Whig leaders and became the special disciple of Mr Monk, a cabinet minister with independent views. Phineas proposed to Laura, who told him she was engaged to marry Kennedy. Against her father's wishes, she explained, she had exhausted her personal fortune by paying her brother's debts and was consequently obliged to marry someone with money.

Last minute fright prevented Phineas from carrying out his elaborate plans for his first speech in Parliament. Laura, now several months married, began to find life with her strict, demanding husband oppressive. Chiltern, having unsuccessfully proposed to Violet once more, invited Phineas to hunt with him. Cared for by Phineas after a hunting injury, Chiltern became his intimate friend. The young nobleman confided that, although he could no longer hope for success with Violet, he would fight any other aspirant for her hand.

In the voting on the Reform Bill, the question of the ballot divided Parliament, and the government was dissolved. The capriciousness of Lord Tulla, who had insured Phineas' original success, prevented his running again for Loughshane. Lord Brentford, however, who had the English borough of Loughton "in his pocket," offered it to Phineas, who was easily elected.

Phineas, who had rescued Kennedy from two attackers late one night, was again visiting at Loughlinter. Gradually he had transferred his affections from Laura to Violet, but his plan to confide in Laura was prevented by her confession to him that life with her husband had grown intolerable. Phineas, despairing of an opportunity to see Violet, found his excuse in a letter from Chiltern which contained a conciliatory message for his father. Phineas took the letter to Lord Brentford, at whose house Violet was staying. Lord Brentford agreed to forgive his son if Chiltern resumed his courtship of Violet. Phineas sent this message to Chiltern and, to avoid duplicity, added that he himself hoped to win Violet's hand. He later found the opportunity to propose to Violet. Rejected, he felt that her negative answer was not really conclusive.

Because Phineas refused to give up his courtship of Violet, Chiltern challenged him to a duel. Though they fought secretly in Belgium, the news leaked out, partly because of Phineas' injury, he had been wounded before he could fire. At last Phineas confided in Laura, who was angered by his news—as much because of her own affection for him as because of her brother's claims on Violet.

Phineas met the beautiful and charming widow, Madame Goesler, who became interested in him. Phineas, who had been left a legacy of three thousand pounds, soon received an even more substantial income on being appointed to an office which paid one thousand pounds annually. Feeling she had wronged Phineas, Laura took it upon herself to urge his suit with Violet. But Violet, knowing that Phineas had first courted Laura, disliked being in second place. She refused when Phineas proposed to her again.

When the English Reform Bill was passed, redistributing parliamentary representation to conform to actual population, the borough of Loughton, among others, was voted out of existence. Phineas, having shown himself an able and loyal Whig, was promoted to a higher office paying two thousand pounds a year. Having no borough to run for, he despaired of keeping the office after the next election. But Loughshane was made available again by the caprice of Lord Tulla, and Phineas was assured success.

Chiltern proposed to Violet once more and was accepted, and he and his father were at last reconciled. Phineas, miserable over Violet's engagement, confided in Madame Goesler. He also told Laura of his heartbreak, but she chided him, saying he would soon forget Violet just as he had forgotten her.

Lord Brentford finally learned of the duel between his son and Phineas, whom he accused of treachery. Phineas discovered the real cause of Lord Brentford's anger. Chiltern and Violet, quarreling over Chiltern's unwillingness to work, had broken their engagement.

Madame Goesler had made a conquest of the elderly and all respected Duke of Omnium. Though tempted to accept, she finally refused his proposal of marriage.

Not the least of her motives was her own attachment to Phineas

Because he accused her of taking Phineas as a lover, Laura decided to leave her husband Phineas again asked Violet to marry him She answered that, although she and Chiltern had quarreled, she could not love anyone else

Phineas caused a great sensation at home by bringing Mr Monk to Ireland with him Caught up with Mr Monk in political fervor, Phineas pledged himself to support Irish tenant rights in Parliament Mr Monk had warned him against such promises, saying that Phineas, voting in opposition to his party, would be forced to resign his office Then, without means of support, he would have to give up his promising career Phineas confided this danger and his unsuccessful love of Violet to Mary Flood Jones, who now won him to herself completely They became engaged

After Laura had taken up residence

with her father, Kennedy sought legal aid to get her to return to him To escape persecution, Laura decided to live abroad She confessed to Phineas that she had always loved him and worked for him, even though heartbroken when he had revealed his love for Violet Laura urged him to assure his career by marrying Madame Goesler for her money Phineas did not mention his engagement to Mary When Madame Goesler offered her hand and money to Phineas, he could only refuse His first feeling was one of bitter disappointment

Chiltern and Violet were reconciled The Irish Reform Bill was passed, abolishing Phineas' borough of Loughshane Phineas' career in Parliament was over The intervention of governmental friends, however, gave Phineas a permanent appointment, that of a poor-law inspector in Ireland It paid a yearly salary of a thousand pounds, enabling Phineas and Mary to plan an immediate wedding

PHINEAS REDUX

Type of work Novel

Author Anthony Trollope (1815-1882)

Type of plot Political romance

Time of plot Mid nineteenth century

Locale England

First published 1874

Principal characters

PHINEAS FINN, an Irish politician a widower

MADAME MARIE MAX GOESLER, a wealthy and pretty widow

LADY LAURA KENNEDY, in love with Phineas

MR KENNEDY, her estranged husband

LORD CHILTERN, Laura's brother

VIOLET CHILTERN, his wife

MR BONTEEN, a conniving politician

Critique

Phineas Redux is the second of Trollope's parliamentary novels It is a sequel to Phineas Finn, which was an entertaining account of events which never seemed really momentous Phineas Redux is even more entertaining, the characterization is equally good, and the well-constructed plot encompasses accusations of adultery and a trial for murder These events fully exploit Trollope's genius for detailing the exasperatingly logical thought processes which lie behind false rumors and misinformation

The Story

The conservatives had been in control of the government for over a year In planning their return to power, the liberals wanted to get every good man they could muster

Phineas Finn, now thirty, who had retired from politics two years before to marry his childhood sweetheart and to settle down in a modest but permanent position in Ireland, was invited back to resume his political career. His wife had died in the interval and he had saved enough to let him live two or three years without being given an office. Because the urging of his friends seemed to imply that he would not have to wait long for an office, he agreed to give up his security for the more exciting life of a member of Parliament. He was to run for the borough of Tankerville, held until then by a corrupt conservative named Browborough.

While awaiting the election, Phineas visited Chiltern and Violet, now happily married. Chiltern had at last found the occupation perfectly suited to his temperament and enthusiasm for hunting—Master of the Brake Hounds. Also visiting the Chilterns were Adelaide Palliser and Mr. Maule, a gloomy and idle but rather pleasing young man, devoted to and loved by Adelaide.

In the Tankerville election Phineas campaigned for separation of church and state. Although Browborough won by seven votes, the seat was to be contested on evidence that Browborough had bought votes. The conservative leader, in a desperate effort to keep his party in power, also declared for separation of church and state.

Phineas, on his way to visit Lady Laura Kennedy and her father in Dresden, was summoned by her husband to his estate. Kennedy's mind had become deranged, his one purpose in life was to get his wife back. He forbade Phineas to visit her, and accused him of adultery. Although he knew himself to be guiltless, Phineas could not reason with Kennedy. Later, in Dresden, Laura confided that her love for Phineas had been the real reason behind the failure of her marriage, however,

Phineas had long felt nothing but friendship for Laura.

On his next visit to the Chilterns Phineas saw Madame Goesler. The first meeting was awkward because of their earlier relationship, but soon they were old friends again. She told Phineas that she had been acting as an unofficial companion and nurse to the old Duke of Omnium, now on his deathbed. Lady Glencora, the duke's niece, had become her intimate friend.

Adelaide's thoroughbred qualities attracted the uncouth squire and fox hunter Spooner, who, unaware of the subtleties of social behavior, felt himself more eligible than Maule, whose income was very small. Spooner's proposal of marriage was refused with horror, and Maule's was accepted. Maule and Adelaide felt that they could marry if his father would let them live in Maule Abbey, now abandoned. But Mr. Maule, Sr., opposed to his son's marriage to a fortuneless girl and, angry at the implied reminder that the property would be his son's after his death, refused the request.

Quintus Slide, representative of all that is bad in journalism, brought to Phineas a letter written to his newspaper by Kennedy. The letter was a madman's accusation, implying that Phineas and Laura were guilty of adultery. Slide, who intended to print the letter, enjoyed the feeling of power its possession gave him, believing that he was interested only in upholding the institution of marriage, he offered to give Phineas a day to persuade Laura to return to Kennedy. Actually, Phineas went to Kennedy's hotel to urge him to retract the letter. Kennedy shot at Phineas and missed. In spite of efforts to keep the affair hushed up, the news leaked out later. When Phineas obtained an injunction against Slide, forbidding him to print the letter, the journalist, enraged, wrote an editorial in which, though he could not quote, he referred to the letter. Because he made the story seem even worse than it was, the whole affair was damaging to Phineas' career.

In the meantime Mr Bonteen, long disliked by and jealous of Phineas, had achieved advancement through party loyalty. After the death of the old Duke of Omnium the new duke had given up his former office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, a post which Bonteen was now expected to fill as soon as the liberals returned to power. Since Bonteen was using his influence against Phineas, who despaired of getting an office, Madame Goesler and her friend Lady Glencora, now Duchess of Omnium, resolved on a counter intrigue. But the duchess, while able to prevent Bonteen's being made chancellor, was unable to secure an office for Phineas.

Normally the liberal party was for separation of church and state, but now they officially opposed it, knowing that the conservatives took the unnatural side only to keep control of the government. Phineas, although with some misgivings at first, went along with his party. The conservatives were defeated.

Bonteen and his wife had been befriending a woman victimized by a fortune hunting Bohemian Jew turned preacher and named, variously, Emilus or Mealyus. Mealyus hoped to get half his wife's fortune as a settlement, but Bonteen was working to prove a rumor that Mealyus was a bigamist. One night, after Phineas had been publicly insulted by Bonteen in their club, Bonteen was murdered. Phineas and Mealyus were both arrested, but the latter was released when he proved he could not have left his rooming house that night.

Circumstances looked dark for Phineas. Laura, Madame Goesler, the Duchess of Omnium, Phineas' landlady, and the Chilterns were the only ones convinced of his innocence.

When Kennedy died, leaving everything to Laura, she dreamed that she might be happy with Phineas at last, even though she sensed at the same time that her hope was impossible.

Madame Goesler, on the trail of evidence to help Phineas by destroying Mealyus' alibi, went to Prague, she suspected Mealyus of having another rooming house key made there during a recent trip. Then Mealyus' first wife was discovered and he was arrested for bigamy. At Phineas' trial the circumstantial evidence against him broke down when Madame Goesler wired from Prague that she had found proof of Mealyus' duplicate key. Laura, realizing that Madame Goesler had saved Phineas, hated her as a rival.

The late Duke of Omnium had willed a handsome fortune to Madame Goesler. Not needing the money, and afraid of suspicion that she had been the duke's mistress, she had refused to accept it. The duchess took up the cause of Maule and Adelaide, who were too poor to marry, it being out of the question to expect Maule to work. Adelaide had been a niece of the old duke, and the duchess persuaded Madame Goesler to let Adelaide have the fortune she herself would not accept. Adelaide and Maule were able to marry, and Mr Maule, Sr., was so pleased with her fortune that he turned Maule Abbey over to them after all. Spooner, who had clung to his hope of marrying Adelaide, was so miserable that he gave up fox hunting for a time. Quintus Slide, who had consistently denounced Phineas and Laura in his newspaper, was sued for libel by Chiltern. Chiltern won the suit and Slide was forced to leave the paper.

Phineas was the hero of the day—overwhelmingly reelected in Tankerville, sought by the ladies, acclaimed everywhere—but the knowledge that he had been suspected by friends as well as by strangers made him miserable and bitter. Gradually, as his spirits improved, he was able to meet people and to resume his seat in the House. Also, he was offered the same office he had filled so well in his earlier parliamentary career. Although he was almost at the end of his funds and needed the position, the knowledge that the offer was made simply because he had not committed murder prompted him to refuse.

While visiting Laura at her request, he felt it only honorable to tell her that he planned to propose to Madame Goesler. At first Laura was violent in her denunciation of Madame Goesler, but she was at last calmed. Hers was the unhappiness of knowing that she had brought all her misery on herself by marrying one man while loving another. Now deeply in love with Madame Goesler, Phineas proposed marriage and was joyfully accepted. No longer a poor man, Phineas would be able to continue his career in Parliament without being the slave of his party.

THE PHOENICIAN WOMEN

Type of work Drama

Author Euripides (c. 485 c. 406 B.C.)

Type of plot Classical tragedy

Time of plot Time of the War of the Seven against Thebes

Locale Thebes

First presented c. 410 B.C.

Principal characters

JOCASTA, Oedipus' wife

ANTIGONE, Oedipus' daughter

POLYNICES, Oedipus' exiled son

ETEOCLES, brother of Polynices and King of Thebes

CREON, Jocasta's brother

MENOECEUS, Creon's son

TIRESIAS, the blind prophet

OEDIPUS, deposed King of Thebes

CHORUS OF PHOENICIAN MAIDENS

Critique

The Phoenician Women (Phoenissae) probably incorporates more lines of dramatic development and is more packed with incident than any other Greek play, possibly because the text has been supplemented by one or more later hands. It may be said that Aeschylus' The Seven against Thebes and the entire Oedipus cycle of Sophocles are embodied in it, although Euripides does not underscore the religious or moral significance of the action. In presenting the entire history of the line of Cadmus, Euripides has made a play that is polyproposon, in which none of the characters (no less than eleven, not counting the chorus) can be said to be the tragic hero or the focus of attention. Nevertheless, the play is extremely well constructed, with each action leading directly to the next, and uniformly serious throughout, with no deviations into satire or comedy.

The Story

Before the royal palace of Thebes, Jocasta, the mother of King Eteocles, prayed to the sun god for aid in reconciling her two sons and avoiding fratricidal war over the kingdom of Thebes. In her supplication she recalled that her family had already suffered unbearable horrors when her husband Oedipus plucked out his eyes upon discovering that in marrying her he had married his own mother and had conceived two sons and two daughters by her. At first the sons had confined their father in the palace in order to hide the family shame and had decided to rule the kingdom between them in alternate years. However, Eteocles had refused to yield the throne to Polynices, who, after marrying the daughter of Adrastus, King of Argos, had raised a host from seven city states and was already at the gates of Thebes to win his rightful place by force of arms.

Antigone, viewing the besieging armies from the palace tower, recognized the justice of Polynices' claim but prayed that Thebes would never fall. In desperate fear, Jocasta cut off her hair and dressed in mourning. Then, in the hope that the war could be averted, she arranged a meeting under a truce between her two sons. Eteocles was willing to receive Polynices back in Thebes, but not as an equal to share the throne. Polynices, on the other hand, unable to endure exile and equally unable to accept such ignoble terms, remained bent on war.

Eteocles then sent for his uncle Creon to work out battle strategy. The two, agreeing that the situation was grave, finally decided not to attempt any counterattack with their vastly outnumbered troops but to post men at the seven gates in defensive action. Creon also sent his son Menoeceus to summon the prophet Tiresias for further advice. The blind prophet, after warning Creon that the means for saving Thebes would be one he would be unwilling to accept, announced that Menoeceus must be sacrificed. Horror-stricken Creon refused and urged his son to flee at once. Menoeceus pretended to agree, but shortly after his departure a messenger hurried to Creon with the news that his son had plunged a sword into his own throat at the very moment that the Argive hosts launched their first fruitless assault against the gates of the city.

Jocasta, upon hearing that her two sons had decided to determine the fate of Thebes by a single combat apart from their armies, rushed off with Antigone to the battlefield to stop them if she could. As she departed, Creon entered carrying the corpse of his dead son and seeking Jocasta's aid in the funeral preparations. But a second messenger brought him word that Jocasta had gone outside the walls of Thebes and had found her two sons dying, each the other's victim. Eteocles, unable to speak, bade his mother farewell with his eyes, and Polynices with his dying breath begged his mother to bury him in Theban soil. Then the grief-stricken Jocasta seized a sword and thrust it through her throat. Upon that stroke the Theban warriors fell upon the surprised Argives and drove them from the field. Menoeceus' sacrifice had not been in vain.

Antigone, returning with servants bearing the bodies of her mother and her two brothers, was met by blind King Oedipus, who had emerged from his confinement in the palace and who began to express his grief in groans and lamentations. Creon, resolutely taking over the rule bequeathed to him by Eteocles, commanded him to cease and to prepare for exile. Determined to restore order in the tragic city, Creon was compelled to put aside personal feelings in submitting to the prophecies of Tiresias. Antigone, the new king insisted, must prepare to marry his son Haemon, furthermore, while the body of Eteocles was to be given burial fit for a king, Polynices' corpse must be left to rot, a prey to birds, as a warning to all who might contemplate taking up arms against the city. Oedipus, refusing to beg from Creon, prepared to leave at once, but Antigone flouted his commands. Rather than marry Haemon, she was determined to accompany her father into exile and to bury the body of Polynices with proper religious rites. As father and daughter set out from Thebes, Oedipus lamented the sad history of his life but courageously submitted to the fate that the gods had decreed for him.

THE PHYSICAL BASIS OF LIFE

Type of work Essay in scientific philosophy

Author Thomas Henry Huxley (1825-1895)

First published Written in 1868, published in Method and Results, 1896

"The Physical Basis of Life," together with the other essays that compose Huxley's Method and Results, reveals a nineteenth-century man of science attempting to go beyond the limits prescribed by authoritarian scientists and churchmen and making an effort to bring the clarity of philosophy to the interpretation and expression of the results of empirical observation. This particular essay is among Huxley's most famous. Its subject matter is protoplasm and its claim is that all life has as its physical basis protoplasmic substance.

Such a claim, which to twentieth century man seems so trivial as not to be worth making, was revolutionary in an age which demanded that all studies of man find him unique, possessed of a life-giving principle by reference to which he could be distinguished from all those animals that were merely animals. Huxley realized that his contention would be novel, even shocking, to many of his contemporaries. It was bad enough to suggest that life is not independent of matter but has a physical basis; it was even worse to insist that there is but one physical basis of life for all living things. To reduce man to the material and to equate him with the beast—that was intolerable even to those who respected science.

In his essay Huxley was careful to state that even though all life has protoplasm as its physical basis, it by no means follows that materialism—the philosophical theory that everything is nothing but matter—is true, in fact, he argued that materialism involved “grave philosophical error.”

Huxley's objections to a strict materialism are made in the spirit of Hume's philosophy. Referring to Hume as “the most acute thinker of the eighteenth century,” Huxley argues that we mean by the terms “matter” and “spirit” either something that can be explained by reference to matters of our scientific experience, or else names for unknown, even imaginary, causes. He joins Hume in objecting to the idea that it makes sense to talk about a necessity that is anything more than the observed order of events. “Fact I know, and Law I know,” wrote Huxley, “but what is this Necessity, save an empty shadow of my own mind's throwing?” Since both materialism and spiritualism (or idealism) depend on unfathomable senses of the terms “matter,” “spirit,” and “necessity,” Huxley concluded that such unscientific philosophies were unsatisfactory.

In opposition to metaphysical philosophies, Huxley proposed what he called the “New Philosophy,” the attempt to limit philosophical thought and inquiry to matters that could be verified experimentally or explained by reference to matters of experience. In doing this he anticipated the most significant direction of twentieth century philosophy, the logical empiricist movement as amended by pragmatism and linguistic analysis.

Huxley made a plea for limiting the consideration of problems to those matters about which something can be known. Agreeing with Hume in the rejection of theology and metaphysics, he argued that progress in scientific philosophy is possible on the basis of two assumptions: “the first, that the order of Nature is ascertainable by our faculties to an extent which is practically unlimited, the second, that our volition counts for something as a condition of the course of events.” In a footnote Huxley explained that it would be more accurate to say that not volition but “the physical state of which volition is the expression” may condition the course of events.

He then went on to point out the practical advantages, from the scientific point of view, that resulted from using the language of materialism. The materialistic terminology allowed the scientist to relate thought and life to experienceable phenomena and permitted a kind of expression which facilitated the human control of events. The language of those who held that all is spirit and idea—the spiritualists—was barren and confusing, according to Huxley.

Nevertheless, despite the practical advantages of the terminology of materialism, it would be a mistake, Huxley wrote, to slide into metaphysical materialism.

The reader who asks what Huxley was, if he was neither a materialist nor an idealist, makes the mistake of supposing that Huxley's rejection of two opposing metaphysical positions is somehow a sign of his having adopted a third. The truth is that Huxley had no sympathy for metaphysics. He wanted to use an empirically meaningful language to talk about events that came within the scope of scientific inquiry, hence he had no metaphysics.

In arguing that protoplasm is the physical basis of life, Huxley was making a much more radical claim than the theory that without protoplasm there is no life. He argued that the matter of life is composed of ordinary matter, life is not an indestructible and unchangeable substance. Furthermore, the vital properties of protoplasm are the result of molecular changes. He concluded that his thoughts, and the thoughts of the audience, were the expression of molecular changes in protoplasm.

In his analysis Huxley found a unity in three respects among all living organisms: "a unity of power or faculty, a unity of form, and a unity of substantial composition." The faculty which all living matter has in common is contractility, as to form, protoplasm is usually a nucleated mass, and it is composed of carbon, hydrogen, oxygen, and nitrogen. The line between plants and animals is not at all precise—there are borderline cases—but both forms of living matter are alike in the respects mentioned.

The essays collected under the title Method and Results, also to be found in Huxley's Collected Essays (1898), are intended to outline "the indispensable conditions of scientific assent" as defined by Descartes in his Discourse on Method, and to show the results of applying the method to various problems. In an essay written in 1870 concerning Descartes' method, Huxley praised Descartes as the thinker from whose works the philosophy and science of the modern world stem. Huxley agreed with Descartes in valuing doubt as the first critical operation in science and philosophy, as the beginning of what Goethe called "the active scepticism whose whole aim is to conquer itself." Although he found fault with Descartes' acceptance of "I think, therefore, I am" as an indubitable truth, he credited the Frenchman with having made a reconciliation of physics and metaphysics possible. According to Huxley, Descartes' analysis suggests what physics must admit that "all the phenomena of Nature are, in their ultimate analysis, known to us only as facts of consciousness." But metaphysics must admit, Huxley adds, that the facts of consciousness make sense, practically speaking, only as interpreted by physics. The ideas in this essay are very similar to those which William James was later (1906-1907) to present as the basis of pragmatism in his lectures at Columbia University.

Devotion to skepticism and to the benefits of natural science was shown and defended by Huxley in his essay "On the Advisableness of Improving Natural Knowledge" (1866). The essay is a defense of the advantage of finding out about the world by studying the world itself, a sensible procedure from the twentieth century point of view. But the tentative, practical, empirical character of natural science was believed by many critics of Huxley to be antipathetic to religion. Huxley himself argued that science need not conflict with religion, although it could not tolerate meaningless metaphysics and theology. Huxley concluded that science must refuse to acknowledge authority, for the scientist "scepticism is the highest of duties, blind faith the one unpardonable sin." Justification for the scientist is not by faith, but by verification.

These ideas led Huxley to argue bitterly against churchmen who proclaimed that belief in God or in the particular dogmas of a church was the duty of every man. The duty of a man, according to Huxley, is to face the facts, to test his ideas by reference to the course of natural events, and to know the limits of his inquiry. It cannot be his duty, then, to believe what he has no reason to believe.

Almost a century after Huxley wrote "The Physical Basis of Life," it seems clear that the value of the essay results from the clear and temperate defense of scientific method which it contains. Resisting the impulse to deify science, Huxley indicated its method and results, and he rested secure in the conviction that the progress of science would justify his faith. There is every reason to suppose that from Huxley's point of view, that of a man concerned with the practical search for knowledge, he was right in his belief

PILGRIMAGE

Type of work Novel

Author Dorothy M. Richardson (1873-1957)

Time 1893-1911

Locale England, Germany, Switzerland

First published Pointed Roofs 1915, Backwater 1916, Honeycomb 1917, The Tunnel 1919, Interim, 1919, Deadlock 1921, Revolving Lights, 1923, The Trap 1925, Oberland, 1927, Dawn's Left Hand, 1931, Clear Horizon, 1935, Dimple Hill, 1938

Principal characters

MIRIAM HENDERSON

HARRIET

SARAH and

EVE, her sisters

GERALD, Harriet's husband

FRAULEIN PFAFF, a German schoolmistress

DR. ORLY, head of a dental clinic

DR. HANCOCK, a dentist

"HYPO" WILSON, a writer and socialist

ALMA, his wife

ELEANOR DEAR, a nurse

MRS. BAILEY, a boarding house keeper

DR. DENSLEY, Miriam's friend

MICHAEL SHATOV, a young socialist

AMABEL, Miriam's young friend, later Mrs. Shatov

Of the writers who added to the dimensions and technical resources of fiction in the first half of this century, Dorothy Richardson is the least read and the most inaccessible. The single novels of her twelve-part sequence, Pilgrimage, are now out of print and five, except for some imported sheets of the four-volume collected edition, have never been published in this country. Critical material on her writing is negligible—an early monograph by John Cowper Powys, brief discussions in histories of the English novel, two or three scattered articles, a handful of reviews. For all critical purposes her career ended in 1938, so that when she died in 1957 she had outlived both her work and her minor reputation. Yet in all that has been written about her there is general agreement that she contributed significantly to the stream of consciousness technique of the modern novel. Critical neglect of her books is all the more remarkable in view of the adulation accorded fellow pioneers like James Joyce and Virginia Woolf. Certainly Dorothy Richardson has never received the attention which her position as an innovator warrants.

It was John Middleton Murry who first called attention to the historical and critical importance of her first novel. In "The Break up of the Novel," printed in The Yale Review in 1923, he called attention to the fact that between 1913 and 1916 three books calling themselves novels but trying in a new way to present character and the texture of experience had quietly appeared. In France Marcel Proust had published Du Côté de chez Swann in 1913. Two years later came Dorothy Richardson's Pointed Roofs, followed by Joyce's A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man in 1916 (Virginia Woolf, who would now be bracketed with these three, did not begin her own assault on the conventions of the naturalistic tradition until 1919.) In these novels the writers, working independently, were shown in the process of creating new techniques for recording the development of consciousness without the mediation of story or plot. This was the narrative method to which May Sinclair, reviewing Dorothy Richardson's novels in 1918, applied the term "stream of consciousness," after a phrase from William James.

In a sense Miss Richardson's method is an elaborate but logical extension of Henry James's theory of the "point of view"—with one important difference. Although James tried by every means at his command to identify himself with one or another of his characters, he nevertheless remained unobtrusively on the scene to direct that character's view of things and to control the flow of time. But in Miss Richardson's novel the scene as a dramatic unit has disappeared and time has become only a pattern of impressions and sensations arranged not in chronological sequence but by a process of immediate perception or association. The result is a record of experience lived wholly from within, a sensitively conceived, extended internal monologue presenting what is in many ways the most complete and revealing portrait of a woman in all literature.

The novel may be called a portrait because in the world of Miss Richardson's fiction character is the beginning and end of all experience. Pilgrimage presents no view of the individual in relation to family or society, or to some great concept like good or evil. There is only the view of personality in relation to itself in the life of the heart or the life of the mind. This is not the world of feminine perception we find in the ironic propriety of Jane Austen, the emotional intensity of the Brontës, the moral earnestness of George Eliot, or the quicksilver play of fancy and fact in the novels of Virginia Woolf. It is something more somber and primitive dredged from the depths of being and thrown upon the page without selection, order, or comment.

Dorothy Richardson makes no break with tradition, however, in the substance of her novel Pilgrimage "tells" the rather conventional story, partly by inference through references to things past, partly by direct impressionism, of Miriam Henderson through an eighteen year period during which she progresses from the awkwardness and confusion of adolescence to the calm of maturity. In Pointed Roofs she appears as one of four sisters—Harriet, Miriam, Eve, and Sarah—in a middle class family of some means living in a pleasant suburban home. When the novel opens the family is facing a crisis. Mr. Henderson, who has lived on an inherited income, has, in a way never made clear, lost most of his money, and his daughters are about to be thrown on their own resources. Harriet becomes engaged to Gerald. Miriam and Eve plan to teach. Sarah will stay at home with her parents. At seventeen Miriam secures a post in Fraulein Pfaff's private school in Germany, her intention is to familiarize herself with the language and later to return to teach German in England. Her stay in Germany lasts only a year. Unknowningly she has attracted the interest of Pastor Lahmann, a friend of Fraulein Pfaff's, and the headmistress, jealous, dismisses her.

Returning to England, Miriam becomes a teacher at Wordsworth House, a school conducted by the Misses Perne in London. There she meets Grace and Florrie Bloom, who are to become her lifelong friends. She meets Ted, but because she spends so much time with Max at a dance she loses him. Later Max dies in New York. Although the Misses Perne are pleased with her instruction, she becomes dissatisfied and leaves Wordsworth House at the end of the year to become a governess in the Corrie household in the country. Harriet finally marries Gerald. Miriam is forced to give up her position in order to go to Brighton with her mother, who is dying of cancer.

After her mother's death Miriam feels that she is at last free to find a different life for herself. Harriet and Sarah are married, and Eve has become a governess in the home of a wealthy family in Wales. Miriam becomes the assistant in a dental clinic conducted by Dr. Orly, his son, and Dr. Hancock. Through them she meets new people and forms new friendships. She also renews her association with Alma, a former school friend now married to "Hypo" Wilson, who is gaining some fame as a writer. Miriam goes to visit them at their house in the country. She also finds herself looking after Eleanor Dear, a neurotic nurse suffering from tuberculosis. Through Eve she meets Dr. Densley, who is to become another lifelong friend. During this time she lives in a boarding house owned by Mrs. Bailey in Tansley Street.

At Mrs. Bailey's she meets Michael Shatov, a young Russian Jew, and through him she becomes interested in literature and in socialism. When Shatov proposes to her she accepts, even though she cannot bring herself to marry him because of his race. Meanwhile, Mr. Henderson has died, Harriet and Gerald have apparently lost their money, and Eve has moved back and forth between London and Wales. She finally opens a shop in the suburbs where Harriet and her husband have a rooming house. Through Shatov and "Hypo" Wilson, Miriam has become interested in a socialist organization called the Lycurgans. She breaks her engagement to Shatov because, as we learn later, he has become Eleanor Dear's lover. Miriam herself has fallen in love with Wilson.

After Dr. Orly's retirement Miriam becomes Dr. Hancock's assistant when he opens an office of his own. To supplement her income she begins to write literary reviews. She also leaves Mrs. Bailey's for a time and shares a flat with Selma Holland, a social worker. The two women quarrel and she returns to the boarding house. At Dr. Densley's suggestion she goes to Switzerland for a vacation. On her return to London she hears that Eleanor Dear is dead. Dr. Densley wants her to marry him but she refuses. Instead, she becomes "Hypo" Wilson's mistress. When the affair fails to bring her the peace and happiness she desires, she becomes more disturbed than ever, and on Shatov's recommendation she goes to stay for six months in the country with a family named Rescorla, at Drimble Hill. There she finds the freedom from self she has dreamed of. Shatov falls in love with Amabel, a young girl in whom Miriam has taken an interest. The two are married. Back in London Miriam meets "Hypo" Wilson again at a Lycurgan meeting. This time she sends him on his way.

This bald outline can give no idea of the quality of the novel or of Dorothy Richardson's method. Through the twelve volumes everything remains in flux: a constantly shifting kaleidoscopic pattern of emotion, observation, situation, and reflection. The time of the action, like the story, must be inferred from the clues. Miss Richardson scatters casually through the work. In Pointed Roofs she makes references to music, particularly to that of Wagner. There are references to Oscar Wilde's trial in Honeycomb. Joseph Conrad's Typhoon is mentioned in Revolving Lights, Arnold Bennett's Clayhanger in Dawn's Left Hand. Auto mobiles appear in Clear Horizon. From these instances it may be gathered that the time covered falls approximately between 1893 and 1911. In somewhat the same way certain of Miss Richardson's characters supply the authenticity of a roman a clef "Hypo" Wilson, for example, is obviously a portrait of H G Wells, as one of his biographers has testified, just as the Lycurgans are plainly modeled on the Fabian Society. On an intensely personal level, the experiences of Miriam Henderson reflect the personalities and the spirit of English social and intellectual life between the Victorian Age and World War I.

These links with the realities of time, place, and personality do not serve Miss Richardson's purpose as they would a less experimental writer, her novel remains a roughhewn segment of experience extracted from the flux of time passing. In spite of the writer's originality and those qualities within the work which make for greatness in fiction, Pilgrimage suffers in the end from an excess of its virtues. To follow one woman's interior life through twelve volumes puts a strain on even the most patient and appreciative reader. One has a vision of Miss Richardson resolutely hacking her way through the waste and clutter of material things in the naturalistic tradition of the novel in order to reveal the essence of character, but she leaves only a rough trail behind her. Beside the myth-making quality and the resourcefulness of language that we find in Joyce or the poetry of perception and mood in the novels of Virginia Woolf, her effects appear curiously static. Nevertheless, the reader gets from Pilgrimage the impression of something vast, at times impenetrable, and, at last, meaningful. A resolute experiment, if not always a successful one, in the creation of a new kind of fiction, the work seems likely to stand as a milestone in the development of the novel in our time.

THE PILGRIMAGE OF CHARLEMAGNE

Type of work Poem

Author Unknown

Type of plot Heroic legend

Time of plot c 800

Locale Paris, Jerusalem, Constantinople

First transcribed c 1100

Principal characters

CHARLEMAGNE, the Frankish king Emperor of the West

HUGO, Emperor of Greece and of Constantinople

ROLAND,

OLIVER,

WILLIAM OF ORANGE,

NAIMES,

OGIER OF DENMARK,

GERIN,

BERENGER,

TURPIN THE ARCHBISHOP,

ERNAUT,

AYMER,

BERNARD OF BRUSBAN, and

BERTRAM, Charlemagne's twelve peers

Critique

The Pilgrimage of Charlemagne, a legend from the Middle Ages, is an old French poem titled Pelerinage de Charle

magne, probably the product of some minstrel or group of storytellers who passed the legend, in poetic form, from one to the other and embellished it. The poem presents Charlemagne as the champion of Christianity, undertaking a pilgrimage to Jerusalem in order to return with holy relics for the churches of France. The fact is that Charlemagne never went on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, but the legend is not confined to facts. It reaches its most amusing highpoint with the recital of the "gabs," the fantastic boasts, of the twelve peers of Charlemagne: it seems not at all surprising that God sees to it that enough of the "gabs" come true to satisfy Hugo of Constantinople, Charlemagne's angry host on the return journey from Jerusalem.

THE PILGRIMAGE OF CHARLEMAGNE from THE MERRY PILGRIMAGE Translated by Merriam Sherwood. By permission of the publishers The Macmillan Co. Copyright 1927 by The Macmillan Co. Renewed. All rights reserved.

The Story

At the Abbey of Saint Denis, Charlemagne boasted to his queen that he looked handsome and powerful wearing his crown and carrying his great sword at his side. The queen chided him for boasting and declared that she knew of a king who was even more handsome when wearing his crown. Charlemagne angrily answered that he would have the French lords compare him to such a king, and if it turned out that Charlemagne was handsomer the queen would lose her head. She tearfully begged his pardon, insisting that she had not meant to insult him, and she attempted to pacify him by saying that the other king was not as brave as Charlemagne. But Charlemagne threatened to cut off the queen's head at once if she did not tell him who the king was whom she believed handsomer than he. The queen at last confessed that she had been talking about King Hugo of Constantinople, Emperor of Greece and much of Persia.

Charlemagne returned to Paris and announced to the peers that he would undertake a pilgrimage to Jerusalem to worship the Cross and the Holy Sepulchre. He also intended to visit King Hugo. For the journey the emperor's attendants were dressed in pilgrims' robes, and the pack animals were loaded with gold and silver.

During the pilgrimage Charlemagne boasted to Bertram that there were eighty thousand pilgrims in the forefront alone, he declared that whoever led such a force must be a great leader.

In Jerusalem, Charlemagne visited the great cathedral, and he and his twelve peers sat in the chairs of Christ and the twelve apostles. When the Patriarch of Jerusalem heard that a great man was sitting in Christ's seat, and that twelve men filled the other places, he went to Charlemagne to learn who the visitor might be. The Patriarch named the emperor Charles Magnus and granted the king's request for holy relics. He gave Charlemagne a handkerchief that had covered the head of Jesus, one of the nails with which He had been crucified, the crown of thorns, a knife, a chalice, and a bowl. When the relics were given to Charlemagne, a cripple nearby was immediately cured.

Charlemagne spent four months in Jerusalem then he departed for Constantinople after having promised the Patriarch to destroy the Saracens.

Charlemagne and his company were awed by the grandeur of Constantinople. They saw beautiful gardens in which twenty thousand knights played chess and backgammon, and thirteen thousand maidens worked on embroidery with golden threads.

Charlemagne discovered King Hugo driving a golden plow and riding on an ornamented cushion. The king welcomed him and invited him and his followers to be his guests. The palace was magnificent with paintings and hangings and decorations in silver, gold, and rich jewels. The palace turned with the wind so that Charlemagne and his men could not keep their feet. When the wind ceased and the Frenchmen were able to stand, dinner was served. Olivier, one of Charlemagne's peers, was charmed by King Hugo's daughter. The feast was luxurious.

The king led Charlemagne and his twelve peers to a splendid bedchamber.

where they would spend their nights While the Frenchmen drank their wine and told boasting stories, according to the old custom, they were spied upon by one of King Hugo's men, who hid under a staircase

Charlemagne began the boasting with the remark that were King Hugo to select his strongest knight and dress him in two hauberks and two helmets, Charlemagne would cut through the armor with King Hugo's sword, burying the sword so far in the ground that it would be necessary to dig down a spear's length to draw it out

Roland boasted that he would take one of Hugo's ivory horns and blow it so loudly that all the doors in the city would be blown down, and King Hugo would have his cloak torn from him

Turpin the Archbishop said that he would leap over two running horses and land on the back of a third while juggling four apples

William of Orange claimed that he would take a mighty ball which thirty men could not move and throw it through the palace, knocking down a hundred and sixty cubits of wall

Ogier, the Duke of Denmark, made his gab by declaring that he would crush the pillar on which the castle turned in the wind

Naimes boasted that he would wear a heavy hauberk and leap over the palace, while Berenger said that he would jump from the palace onto the swords of King Hugo's knights while the blades were sticking up from the earth

Bernard of Brusban said that he would divert the river and flood the city, sending King Hugo in flight to the highest tower in Constantinople

Emaut claimed that he would leap into a vat of molten lead and sit there until it hardened, when he would shake himself free

Aymer declared that he would take his invisible cap and eat King Hugo's food and drink his wine, capping it all by knocking the king so that he would fall onto the table

Bertram boasted that he would take two shields and use them as wings, and that while in flight he would make a cry that would frighten all the animals and birds of the forest

Gern said that he would throw a spear from a league's distance and so shake the palace as to cause a farthing to fall from the top of the tower without disturbing another farthing on which the first com rested

The spy reported to King Hugo that Charlemagne and his men were boasting that they could overcome the king in various ways, and that they were making fun of him King Hugo was angry, and in the morning he called his knights together Confronting Charlemagne as the emperor was leaving the mass, he declared that unless the gabs were shown to be true he would have Charlemagne and his peers beheaded

Charlemagne prayed before the relics, and an angel appeared, assuring him that the gabs would be carried out The angel warned him, however, never to make gabs about any man again

William of Orange, challenged to throw the mighty ball as he had boasted he could, picked it up and threw it through the palace Bernard of Brusban then diverted the river and sent King Hugo in flight to the highest tower God made the waters withdraw, and King Hugo became one of Charlemagne's vassals

When the two kings passed before the French knights, all declared that Charlemagne was the handsomer He returned to France in such good humor that he forgave his queen and did not behead her

LES PLAIDEURS

Type of work Drama

Author Jean Baptiste Racine (1639 1699)

Type of plot Satiric comedy

Time of plot Seventeenth century

Locale Normandy, France

First presented 1668

Principal characters

DANDIN, a judge

LEANDRE, his son

CHICANNEAU, a bourgeois

ISABELLE, Chicanneau's daughter

LA COMTESSE, a litigant

PETIT JEAN, a porter

L'INTIME, a secretary

LE SOUFFLEUR, the prompter

Critique

Racine first planned Les Plaideurs as a French adaptation of Aristophanes' The Wasps, to be presented by an Italian company in Paris. As it turned out, he received some collaboration from a group of friends who dined together regularly, a circumstance which may explain the spontaneity of the comedy. The action, unimportant in itself, becomes the occasion for a series of amusing scenes which ridicule doctors and lawyers. Like Aristophanes, Racine took the greatest liberties with the logic of his plot. The play occupies an interesting place in Racine's work, for it shows a master of tragedy equally at ease in a drama of completely different effect.

The Story

Early one morning Petit Jean stood in front of Dandin's house while he complained about the sad state of affairs created by his master's madness. Judge Dandin suddenly wanted to sit in judgment on his own family and to go to bed with his robes on. He had even ordered his rooster killed, saying that a defendant had bribed the bird to wake him up too late.

It was necessary for Leandre to have his father watched day and night, and this was the reason why Petit Jean could not sleep and was complaining. Leandre also insisted that Judge Dandin should not be allowed to go into court, but Dandin was constantly attempting to escape the watchfulness of his family in order to do so. When L'Intime and Petit Jean caught him trying to climb out the window, the noise awakened Leandre, who tried to persuade his father to go back into the house. Finally Petit Jean took Dandin into the house by force.

Leandre confessed to L'Intime his wish to have a note delivered to Isabelle, daughter of their neighbor, Chicanneau, and L'Intime promised to help him. At that moment Chicanneau arrived and insisted on seeing Dandin about one of his trials, the bourgeois was constantly engaged in lawsuits. Petit Jean firmly refused to let him enter. During the argument La Comtesse arrived, she also was always suing someone. Chicanneau tried to advise her about one of her lawsuits. When she misunderstood him and they began to quarrel, both asked Petit Jean to act as a witness. He tried his best to pacify them.

In order to deliver the note to Isabelle, L'Intime disguised himself as a process server and insisted that Leandre dress as a police commissioner. The idea was to give Isabelle the letter while serving La Comtesse' writ on Chicanneau. Finding Isabelle alone, they succeeded in giving her the letter just as Chicanneau arrived home Isabelle, pretending that it was a legal paper, tore up the note and declared that she detested lawsuits In order to convince Chicanneau, L'Intime produced the actual document from La Comtesse Chicanneau, doubting that L'Intime was a process server, administered a sound thrashing

When Leandre arrived in his disguise, L'Intime complained bitterly about the bad treatment he had received and the defiance of the law exhibited by both Chicanneau and Isabelle Leandre, seizing upon this situation as an opportunity to "question" Isabelle, tricked her into admitting her feelings toward him Chicanneau, bewildered, failed to understand what was happening and signed what he thought was a police report, but which was actually a marriage contract between Leandre and Isabelle

Dandin, meanwhile, was running from one window of his house to another Insisting on giving audience to Chicanneau and La Comtesse, he succeeded in pulling Chicanneau inside the house through a cellar window When he next tried to escape, Leandre suggested that he preside at the trial of Citron, a dog that had eaten a chicken

Declaring that he had never seen them before Chicanneau complained to Leandre about the process server and the police commissioner Leandre suggested that Chicanneau and Isabelle demand justice from Dandin

Meanwhile, Leandre staged the trial of Citron with Petit Jean and L'Intime acting as lawyers Petit Jean, as the prosecutor, had difficulty in playing his role in spite of help from Le Souffleur, the prompter, at every other word L'Intime acting as the defense lawyer, was so eloquent that Dandin fell asleep On awakening, he decided to condemn the dog to the gallows L'Intime then produced a basket of puppies and swearing that they would become orphans if the dog were executed, pleaded their cause Dandin, greatly perplexed, discussed this situation with everyone

Chicanneau and Isabelle arrived When Leandre produced the marriage contract, Chicanneau threatened to go to court over the agreement Leandre assured him, however, that he had no interest in Isabelle's dowry Mollified, Chicanneau finally agreed to the marriage Then, as a welcoming present to Isabelle, Dandin decided to acquit Citron

PLATERO AND I

Type of work Prose poems
Author Juan Ramón Jiménez (1881-1958)
First published 1914-1917

About his life Juan Ramon Jimenez said very little He was born in the small Spanish village of Moguer, in Andalusia, and educated at a Jesuit school A few poems published in a Madrid magazine brought him an invitation to visit the capital where the poet Rubén Darío and others befriended him But violent critical attacks on a volume of his poetry and the death of his father so upset him that he spent some time in a French sanitarium From then on, in spite of enthusiastic reception of later volumes of verse, he lived almost a recluse either in Spain or as a political refugee, after the Spanish Civil War, in Cuba and Puerto Rico By the time he was thirty five, he had published twenty volumes of what he called borradores (rough drafts), the rest of his life was spent polishing them, beginning with his Selected Poems in 1917

In prose, his best known work is Platero and I, a series of brief, uncon-

PLATERO AND I by Juan Ramon Jimenez Translated by Eloise Roach Excerpts reprinted by permission of the publishers University of Texas Press Copyright 1957 by Juan Ramón Jiménez

nected sketches, 138 in all, about life in Moguer, the whole given unity by the presence of a silver gray donkey, Platero. There are both narrative and descriptive sections in poetic prose. The subtitle is "Andalusian Elegy," making the donkey a symbol of the simplicity and purity of the soul. Like Sancho Panza's donkey in Don Quixote, Platero seems headed for immortality in a volume "capable of giving back to people their childhood soul."

Platero was a hairy donkey, so soft that he might have been made of cotton, without bones. Only his eyes were hard like two scarabs of black crystal. He fed on oranges, grapes, and figs when he was not nibbling the grass of the meadow. To the country people he looks like steel as the narrator, telling his story in the first person, rides him through the town of Moguer on Sundays. Coming back at dusk, he tells the customs collector that all they have brought with them are white butterflies. Then he rides on through the miserable streets down by the river where poor children are playing games of make believe.

Unconnected episodes are presented. Once Platero and the author saw an eclipse of the sun. In the eerie light, the town seemed to shrink and even the donkey appeared diminished.

At the age of four, Platero should have entered kindergarten, but there were no chairs big enough for him. The wisest plan, in the opinion of his master, was to take Platero to the fields where he could learn about flowers and stars. There no one would ever put a dunce cap on him or call him an ass.

Riding his donkey, the author, with his long brown beard and small black hat, must have looked strange, for ragged children ran after him, shouting "Crazy man!" Later the children were the ones who seemed crazy on the day before Easter, as they celebrated their feast by shooting at Judas, to the terror of the little donkey.

The lengthening days, as the year went on, brought the ripening of the first figs, and Jimenez and Platero went to Roca to pick them. Everybody raced to see who could get there first and arrived panting and excited. The author picked a few of the ripe ones and put them on a tree trunk for Platero. Somehow a fig fight started; the pickers threw the bluish fruit at everybody, including the donkey. On another occasion, Jimenez, with a book of prints that he had received the day before from Vienna, told the children that he would give it as a prize to the first one who reached the violets at the end of the meadow. Seeing them running, Platero took off after them and easily outdistanced them. Panting their protests, the children gathered around the author. He told them that Platero had won and demanded a prize. Because the book would be of no use to him, Jimenez took some parsley and made a crown with which to adorn the victor.

In a serious moment Jimenez tried to comfort his donkey by promising that he would not be thrown into a pit when he died or abandoned beside the road, he would be buried beside the tall pine in the orchard. More immediate problems occupied the donkey, however. As he entered the pasture, he began limping. Immediately his master jumped off. Platero showed his right forefoot, in which Jimenez found a long orange tree thorn stuck into it like a little emerald dagger. After the wound had been washed in a brook they continued on toward the sea, the master now walking ahead and Platero, still limping, gently nudging him in the back.

The swallows arrived early, chirping as if to tell everybody about their two sea crossings and the flowers they had seen in Africa. Because of the unseasonal cold, the birds nearly froze to death.

Sometimes in their conversations, Jimenez would reminisce over his childhood days, the people who lived across the street from him, the striped doorway of the confectioner's house, and the little idiot boy who sat, ugly and unable to speak, in the doorway of his house to watch the people pass The boy had died, and must now be in heaven watching the promenade of heavenly souls

Another memory was the story of Anilla, who used to dress in a sheet, put flour on her face, and walk about carrying a lantern to scare children One September night, during a severe storm, lightning struck and a eucalyptus tree fell on the tool shed When the moon came out, the dog began barking so loudly that everybody went out to see what was wrong There was Anilla, still dressed in a sheet and with her lantern burning, but now she really was a ghost

The author also communed with his earthbound donkey about the joys of height He described climbing to the flat roof and the sights to be seen the gardens, the houses, the people working in them, and even the far off river with its boat Looking into the distance gave him the same feeling that he felt when, as a child, he went to the locked gate in the city walls and saw the winding road with its promise of romance

Many of the inhabitants of Moguer pass through these pages the French doctor whose parrot comforted patients with "It's nothing! Nothing!", the gypsies who would sometimes visit the town and scandalize its inhabitants Don José, the priest who rode a female donkey, Darbon, the veterinarian Children, in particular, play an important part in the life of Platero and his master There is much talk over plans to celebrate the Day of the Magi, when the children would put their shoes on the balconies in hopes of presents from the Wise Men and all the older people would have a parade, Platero would be adorned with a Colombian flag and his master, wearing a cotton beard, would impersonate one of the Three Kings

There are tragedies as well One day Platero, while drinking at the fountain, got a leech on his tongue With the help of Raposo, a farmer, Jimenez pried open the donkey's mouth and removed the leech with sticks At another time horse flies left him covered with blood

Sometimes Platero could be helpful, as when he gave a ride to a little sick girl, or when he and his master helped a little girl and her donkey with their cart which was stuck in the mud She rewarded them with two oranges, one of which Platero ate the other little donkey got the second orange

Finally came the morning when the author found Platero "lying on his bed of straw, his eyes soft and sad ' Darbon, the veterinarian, could do nothing for him Something he ate, perhaps a poison root " By noon Platero was dead Later, when his master went with some children to his grave and asked whether the donkey was carrying angel children through the heavenly meadows, a white butterfly appeared

At the end, in "To Platero, in the heaven of Moguer," Jimenez dedicated the book to the donkey, and concluded "You, Platero, are alone in the past But you also live in a period of no time, for you possess as I do, a new sun with the dawn of each day, red as the heart of the everlasting God "

POEM OF THE CID

Type of work Poem

Author Unknown

Type of plot Heroic epic

Time of plot c 1075

Locale Fief of Bivar, to the north of Burgos Spain

First transcribed Twelfth century

Principal characters

RUY DÍAZ, sometimes called My Cid, Lord of Bivar

ALFONSO, King of León, by whom the Cid was exiled

DOÑA XIMENA the Cid's wife
 MARTÍN ANTOLÍNEZ, one of the Cid's chief lieutenants
 DOÑA ELVIRA, and
 DOÑA SOL the Cid's daughters
 MINAYA ALVAR FÁÑEZ the Cid's chief lieutenant and companion
 FELIX MUÑOZ the Cid's nephew and rescuer of his daughters
 GARCÍA ORDOÑEZ Lord of Grañón and the Cid's enemy DIEGO and
 FERNANDO GONZALEZ, the princes of Carrion, suitors and husbands to the Cid's daughters two villains
 GONZALO ANSUREZ, Count of Carrón, father of Diego and Fernando González

Critique

In this national epic of eleventh century Spain, the poet writes in irregular verse, there are 3735 lines of uneven length in three Cantos which relate in succession the major events in the Cid's life. The poem, rich in Homeric flavor, with frequently repeated descriptions of the principal characters, is more or less historically correct. Such a man did live (he died in 1099), however, his character and exploits have been embroidered, amplified, and distorted to earn him the unquestioned position of the most heroic figure in Spanish history and legend. Of all the epics of the Cid, the Poem of the Cid, dating from the twelfth century, is unique in its qualities of realism, verity, and poetic excellence. The Cid is drawn as a typical Spanish warrior, proud, ruthless, realistic, and calculating. At the same time he shrewdly deals out praise to his vassals and is generous to a fault. In victory, he is quick to do honor—even to overdo it—to his loyal lieutenants. Although exiled by King Alfonso VI he continued to hold the position of the king, if not the man himself, in high regard.

The Story

By royal edict, the Cid was banished from Christian Spain by King Alfonso VI of Castile. The royal edict allowed him nine days in which to leave the kingdom but forbade him from taking with him any of his wealth and goods. Anyone in the kingdom who would offer aid to the Cid would forfeit his estate.

Nevertheless, the Cid enlisted the aid of Martín Antolínez in swindling two money lenders, Raquel and Vidas, in exchange for two large sealed coffers, supposedly loaded with the Cid's riches but containing only sand. The Cid and a small force of vassals then rode away and made a secret camp. On the morning of his actual departure from the country with a fair sized group of loyal vassals massed for all was said at the abbey where Doña Ximena, the Cid's wife, and his two infant daughters, Doña Elvira and Doña Sol, had been ordered to remain.

Becoming a soldier of fortune, the knight led his host in conquest of one Moorish territory after another, each time with a generous sharing of spoils and booty among his knights and vassals, even the lowliest. Thus he built up a larger and stronger force with every foray, and after each victory mass was said in thanksgiving.

The Cid fought his way to the eastern side of the peninsula, where he fought his most crucial battle and won his greatest victory when he took as his prisoner Count Ramón of Barcelona. After Count Ramón had been humbled and forced to give up all his property, he was granted his liberty.

Although Minaya Alvar Fáñez returned to King Alfonso with gifts and a glowing report of the Cid's successes, the king did not revoke his decree of banishment. Minaya's estates were restored, however, and he was granted freedom to come and go without fear of attack.

The Cid continued his campaigns against the Moonish territories in order to increase his favor with King Alfonso. After he had conquered the provinces of Valencia and Seville, his men grew tired of fighting and many wished to return to Castile. The Cid, although still generous and understanding, proved himself master by threatening all deserters with death.

Again the Cid sent Minaya to King Alfonso with a gift of one hundred horses and a request that Doña Ximena and her daughters be permitted to join him in Valencia. Visibly softened by the Cid's obvious power, King Alfonso granted this request. In addition, he returned their former estates to the Cid's men.

Shortly after a triumphant reunion with his family in Valencia, the Cid overcame the King of Morocco. As a gesture of victory he sent the Moroccan's tent to King Alfonso. This dramatic gift earned the Cid's pardon and the request that he give his daughters in marriage to Diego and Fernando, the princes of Carrion.

At the victory feast, many marveled at the great length and abundance of the Cid's beard, for he had sworn at the time of his banishment that his beard would never again be cut and that it would grow very long. A mystical significance of power and success was now attached to the fullness of his beard.

The Cid had reservations about giving his daughters to the princes of Carrion. They were, he thought, too young for marriage. Also, he distrusted the two men. However, with a great show of humbleness and subservience, he returned Doña Elvira and Doña Sol to the king with word that Alfonso would honor the Cid by disposing of his daughters' future as the monarch saw fit.

After the weddings, the elaborate wedding feast, to which all the Cid's vassals as well as those of the territory of Carrion had been invited, lasted for more than two weeks. The Cid expressed some satisfaction in having his family united with noblemen as rich as Prince Diego and his brother Fernando. Two years of happiness followed.

One day one of the Cid's pet lions escaped. Far from showing valor in the emergency, Diego hid from the lion under the bench on which the Cid was asleep, while Fernando fled into the garden and hid behind a wine press. After the Cid's vassals had easily subdued the lion, the favored princes became the butt of much crude humor and scorn, but the Cid, choosing to ignore the evident cowardice of his daughters' husbands, made excuses for their pallor.

Once again the Cid was forced to war with the Moroccans, this time against mighty King Bucar. After a great battle, Bucar was killed and his vassals were subdued. The Cid was jubilant. As the spoils were divided, he rejoiced that at last his sons-in-law had become seasoned warriors. His vassals were half amused, half disgusted, because it was common knowledge among them that neither Diego nor Fernando had shown the slightest bravery in the conflict, and at one time the Cid's standard bearer had been forced to risk his life in order to cover for Fernando's shocking cowardice.

Diego and Fernando were richly rewarded for their supposed valor, but their greed was not satisfied. Resentful and injured by the insults and scorn heaped on them by the Cid's vassals, they began a scheme for revenge by telling the Cid that, proud of their wives and their wealth, they would like to make a journey to Carrion in order to show off their wives and to sing the Cid's praises. In secret, they planned not to return. The noble and generous Cid, always ready to think the best of anyone, granted their request without question.

The Cid added further to the princes' treasure and sent them off with a suitable company of his own vassals as an escort of honor. Then, belatedly concerned for the safety of his daughters, he also sent with them his nephew, Félix Muñoz, after charging the young noble-

man with the care of Doña Elvira and Doña Sol

When they were safely away from Valencia, the princes sent the company on ahead and took their wives into the woods. There, with viciousness, they stripped the women of their rich garments and their jewels, whipped them, and left them, bleeding and wounded, to die. His suspicion aroused by the desire of the princes to separate their wives from the rest of the party, Felix Muñoz followed the princes' tracks and found the women. He nursed them back to consciousness and returned them to the Cid.

The princes' scheme of revenge rebounded to their further disgrace. Word of their wicked and dishonest acts spread quickly, and King Alfonso, in his great displeasure with the Carrions, swore to try them in Toledo. The Cid swore that he, to avenge the treatment his daughters had received, would marry them to the richest in the land.

At the trial, the princes were first ordered to return the Cid's valued swords, which he had given them as tokens of his high regard. Then they were ordered to return his gold. Having squandered it all, they were forced to give him equal value in horses and property.

In the meantime ambassadors from Aragon and Navarre had arrived to ask for the Cid's daughters as queens for their kings. The Cid was jubilant, but still he demanded that the princes of Carrion pay in full measure for their brutality: trial by combat with two of the Cid's chosen knights. King Alfonso charged the princes that if they injured their opponents in the least, they would forfeit their lives. Proved cravens in the fight, the princes were stripped of all honor and wealth.

The Cid rejoiced that, once banished, he could now count two kings of Spain among his kinsmen. He died, Lord of Valencia, on the Day of Pentecost.

POEMS, CHIEFLY IN THE SCOTTISH DIALECT

Type of work Poetry

Author Robert Burns (1759-1796)

First published 1786

Since the first publication of Burns's verse in the famous Kilmarnock edition entitled Poems, Chiefly in the Scottish Dialect, the poet's fame has increased and spread. Other editions of his work, containing later poems, only enhanced his reputation. Unlike many writers who achieve early fame only to see it fade, Burns is still widely read and appreciated.

At least part of the reason for this continuing appreciation is the fact that Burns was essentially a transitional figure between the eighteenth-century neoclassicists and the Romantics who were soon to follow. Possessing some of the qualities of each school, he exhibits few of the excesses of either. He occasionally used the couplet that had been made a skillful tool by Pope and his followers, but his spirit was closer to the Romantics in his attitude toward life and his art.

Although he occasionally displayed a mild conservatism, as in the early "The Cotter's Saturday Night," he was fundamentally a rebel — and rebellion was a basic trait of the Romantics. It would have been hard for Burns to be a true neoclassicist because his background, which figures constantly in his poems, simply did not suit him for this role. He had a hard early life and a close acquaintanceship with the common people and the common circumstances of life. He was certainly not the uneducated, "natural" genius that he is sometimes pictured — having had good instruction from his father and a tutor and having done considerable reading on his own — but he lacked the classical education that earlier poets thought necessary for the writing of true poetry

Like the neo classicists, however, he was skillful in taking the ideas and forms of earlier poets, in Burns's case particularly, the Scottish poets Ramsay and Fergusson as well as the anonymous balladists and writers of folk songs, and treating them in his own individual way. Thus his verse has a wide variety of stanza forms and styles

Despite the variety of his techniques, his basic outlook in his poems is remarkably consistent. This outlook also may have a great deal to do with his popularity. Perhaps more than any other poet since Chaucer, Burns possessed the personal insight and the instinct for human feelings that can make a poem speak to all men's hearts. Burns always saw the human aspect of things. His nature poetry, for instance, marks a departure from the precise appreciation of the eighteenth century poets, Burns's lines about nature treat it primarily as a setting in which people live

The warmth of his verse arises from this attitude combined with the experience he had of being in close personal contact with the people about whom he wrote. His writing never deals with subjects that he did not know intimately. Burns loved several women and claimed that they each served as great poetic inspiration. The reader may well believe this statement when he encounters the simple and clearly sincere little poems "Highland Mary," "Mary Morrison," and the well known song "Sweet Afton." It was this quality of sincerity that another great Scot, Thomas Carlyle, found to be Burns's greatest poetic value

Burns was not an original thinker, but he had a few strong convictions about religion, human freedom, and morality. His condemnation of Calvinism and the hypocrisy it bred is accomplished with humor and yet with sharpness in two of his best poems, "The Holy Fair" and the posthumously published "Holy Willie's Prayer." In these and several other poems

Burns pokes occasionally none too gentle fun at the professional religionists of his time without ever seeming didactic. Here his intensely personal viewpoint saved him from preaching in the style of earlier eighteenth century versifiers. It is to be expected that the few poems that contain examples of his rare attempts to be lofty are unsuccessful

Having grown up in a humble environment, Burns was especially sensitive to social relations and the value of human freedom and the equality of men. On this subject, too, he is never didactic, but few readers have remained unmoved by the lines of probably his most famous poem in defense of the lower classes, "A Man's a Man for A' That"

Is there, for honest poverty
That hings his head an a' that?
The coward slave, we pass him by—
We dare be poor for a' that!
For a' that and a' that
Our toil's obscure and a' that
The rank is but the guinea's stamp
The man's the gowd for a' that

Then let us pray that come it may,
As come it will for a' that,
That sense and worth, o'er a' the earth,
Shall bear the gree, an' a' that
For a' that, an a' that,
It's coming yet for a' that
That man to man the world o'er,
Shall brothers be for a' that

It was this powerful feeling for democracy that led Burns, in his later years, to a tactless advocacy of the principles of the French Revolution, a crusade that did his career as a minor government official no good

It is questionable whether Burns's heated protest against Calvinism and the strict morality it proclaimed was simply a rationalization of his own loose behavior. However many the romances he had, and however many the illegitimate children he fathered, there can be little doubt of Burns's sincere devotion, at least at the time, to the woman of his choice. In a larger sense, too, the poet's warm sympathy for his fellow man is evidence of a sort of ethical pattern in his life and work that is quite laudable

The poetic techniques in Burns's poems are unquestionably a chief reason for his popularity. Few poets have so well suited the style to the subject, and his use of earlier stanza forms and several kinds of poetic diction has a sureness and an authority that are certain to charm even the learned student of poetry.

There are three types of diction in his poetry: Scottish dialect, pure English and a combination of the two. In "Tam O' Shanter," a later work that is perhaps his masterpiece, Burns used dialect to tell an old legend of the supernatural with great effect. The modern reader who takes the trouble to master the dialectal terminology will be highly rewarded. In this, as in most of Burns's poems, the pace and rhythm of the lines are admirably well suited to the subject.

His use of the purely English idiom, as in "The Vision," was seldom so successful. Usually Burns wrote in pure English when he had some lofty purpose in mind, and with the exception of "The Cotter's Saturday Night" this combination was nearly fatal to the poetic quality of these poems.

For the general reader, probably the most enjoyable and rewarding reading consists of the poems and songs that Burns did in English, with occasional Scottish touches here and there in the lines. Most happy is this joining of language and dialect in such a poem as the famous little love lyric, "A Red, Red Rose." These three kinds of poetic diction can be found side by side in one of Burns's best poems, the highly patriotic "The Jolly Beggars," which gives as fine a picture of Scottish low life as can be found anywhere.

Naturally, Burns was most at home when he wrote in his native dialect, and, since one of the most striking characteristics of his verse is the effortless flow of conversational rhythms, it is not surprising that his better poems are those that came as natural effusions in his most familiar diction.

The total achievement of Burns is obviously great, but it should not be misunderstood. Burns lacked the precision and clarity of his predecessors in the eighteenth century, and he never was able to reach the exalted heights of poetic expression attained by Shelley and Keats not long after him. For vigor and the little touches that breathe life into lines of poetry, however, he was unexcelled by earlier or later poets.

The claim that Burns wrote careless verse has been perhaps too much emphasized. His poems and songs are surely not carefully carved jewels, but neither are they haphazard groupings of images and rhymes. The verses seem unlabored, but Burns worked patiently at them, and with considerable effort. That they seem to have been casual utterances is only further tribute to his ability.

It may be that the highest praise of all was paid to Burns, both as man and poet, by Keats when the great Romantic said that we can see in Burns's poems his whole life, and, though the life reflected was not an altogether happy one, the poet's love of freedom, people, and of life itself appears in nearly every line.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF EDWARD TAYLOR

Type of work Poetry

Author Edward Taylor (c 1645-1729)

First published 1939

Lord, let thy Glorious Body send such rays

Into my Soule, as ravish shall my heart,

THE POETICAL WORKS OF EDWARD TAYLOR. Excerpts reprinted by permission of the publishers Princeton University Press. Copyright 1939 by Rockland Editions. Copyright 1943 by Princeton University Press.

That Thoughts how thy Bright Glory
 out shall blaze
 Upon my body, may such Rayes thee
 dart
 My Tunes shall dance then on these Rayes and Caper
 Unto thy Praise when Glory lights
 my Taper
 —Meditation Seventy Six, Second Series

Edward Taylor, an orthodox Puritan minister, was New England Puritanism's sweetest singer before the Lord, but for more than two hundred years after his death his poems were unknown since he did not allow their publication and directed that his heirs should not publish them. The 400 page manuscript containing his poetical works was presented to Yale University in 1883 by Henry Wyllys Taylor. Thomas H. Johnson, a specialist in American literature, discovered the poems and received permission from the university to publish them. The Poetical Works of Edward Taylor, published in 1939, contains what Mr. Johnson regards as the best of Taylor's poems.

The Poetical Works contains a long verse sequence titled "God's Determinations Touching His Elect," a group of five occasional poems, and selected poems from two long series of "Sacramental Meditations." "God's Determinations" is largely in dialogue form, and the speakers—Mercy, Justice, Christ, Satan, the Soul, and a Saint—are reminiscent of characters in early English morality plays. The several poems in the sequence are written in a variety of stanzaic patterns, and the style (as in all of Taylor's poems) is that of the seventeenth century English metaphysical poets like John Donne and George Herbert. The lines abound in homely comparisons and metaphors drawn from New England life and in extravagant conceits which are a distinguishing mark of all metaphysical poetry.

This long work, which embodies a contest between Christ and Satan for mankind, is typically Puritan in thought in that it attempts to justify the Calvinistic doctrine of the Covenant. According to this doctrine, God made a covenant with Adam that he and his descendants would possess eternal happiness if they did not eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. By disobeying, Adam and Eve lost their immunity to suffering and death. But through a new Covenant of Grace, God gave men another chance to save themselves from condemnation. If they would believe in Christ, who had willingly died for them, certain elect souls would be saved. They would not really earn this salvation through any good works they might do, but they would receive it out of God's abounding grace. No one knew how many of these elect there were, but each believer in Christ might hope that he was included.

Though Calvinism, greatly modified, is still present in the doctrines of many of the Protestant churches of today, most modern readers find tedious the long discussions of grace, faith, redemption, and damnation which course through the poetry and prose of the New England Puritans. For this reason, much of "God's Determinations" is of less interest than Taylor's other poems, in which the poet's lyricism and fanciful turns of thought are not subdued or distracted by theological argument.

There is nothing to distinguish many of Taylor's lines in "God's Determinations" from the writing of perhaps a dozen of his poetizing Puritan contemporaries in America and England. Mercy's reply to Justice, for example, concerning the respective fates of the Devil's disciples and of the true believers is no more than rhymed Calvinism:

I will not onely from him Sin him free,
 But fill him with Inherent grace also Though none are Sav'd that wicked
 nesse imbrace,
 Yet none are Damn'd that have In herent Grace

If Taylor were capable of nothing better than this, he would never have been hailed as America's best poet before the appearance of William Cullen Bryant in the nineteenth century

But Taylor possessed more than the inherent grace of Calvin's theology, he was also gifted with the inherent grace (in a different sense) of the true poet. In the "Prologue" to "God's Determinations," he humbly seeks aid from the great God whom he would praise. He asks

Lord Can a Crumb of Earth the Earth outweigh
Outmatch all mountains, nay the Chrystall Sky?
Imbosom in t designs that shall Display
And trace into the Boundless Deity?

Even if this "Crumb of Earth" had an angel's quill dipped in liquid gold, he says, "It would but blot and blur yea, jag and jar," unless God made both "Pen and Scribener." He then admits that he himself is this Crumb of Dust which is design'd

To make my Pen unto thy Praise alone,
And my dull Phancy I would gladly grinde
Unto an Edge on Zions Pretious
Stone
And write in Liquid Gold upon thy
Name
My Letters till thy glory forth doth flame

He prays that God will not laugh to scorn his attempts and that He will overlook any failings as "being Slips slipt from thy Crumb of Dust." If God will but guide his pen he may then write,

To Prove thou art, and that thou art
the best,
And shew thy Properties to shine
most bright
And then thy Works will shine as flowers on Stems
Or as in Jewellery Shops, do
jems

One of the most charming passages in "God's Determinations" is found in the opening stanzas of Christ's lengthy reply to a soul who "groans for succour" in his struggles against the fierce assaults of Satan, characterized as a cur who "bayghs and barks veh'mently." As Christ begins to speak, He is not God's Son clothed in majesty or dignity but simply a loving father comforting a frightened child

Peace Peace, my Hony do not Cry,
My Little Darling, wipe thine eye,
Oh Cheer, Cheer up, come see
Is anything too deare, my Dove,
Is anything too good, my Love,
To get or give for thee?

The cur barks, Christ explains, only because this soul belongs to Him, and "His barking is to make thee Cling/Close underneath thy Saviours wing." To make it clear that fright is needless, Christ uses a simile from New England rural or village life

As Spot barks back the sheep again,
Before they to the Pound are tane,
So he and hence 'way goes

Continuing with other endearing names ("Fear not, my Pritty Heart Why did my sweeten start?"), Christ even employs New England dialect

And if he run an inch too fur,
I le Check his Chain, and rate the Cur
My chick, keep close to me

Suddenly, in the next line, Christ's language is transformed, and it is as though John Donne or George Herbert had taken over the pen to finish Taylor's stanza for him

The Poles shall sooner kiss and greet,
And Parallels shall sooner meet,
Than thou shall harmed bee

Of Taylor's occasional poems included in the Poetical Works, the best known (through many reprintings in anthologies) is "Huswifery," a poem of three six line stanzas of the type which Taylor uses in his "Sacramental Meditations." Also, as in the "Meditations," the whole poem develops a single "conceit" or extended metaphor. The poet prays to his

Lord, "Make me thy Spin[n]ing Wheele compleat," and the process of becoming a Christian is described in terms of the making of clothing which he will wear When, with Distaff ("Thy Holy Worde"), Swift Flyers ("mine Affections"), Spool ("my Soule"), and Reel ("My Conversation"), the yarn has been spun, the poet prays again

Make me thy Loom then, knit therein
 this Twine
 And make thy Holy Spint, Lord, winde quills
 Then weave the Web thyselfe The yarn is fine
 Thine Ordinances make my Fulling
 Mills
 Then dy the same in Heavenly Col ours Choice,
 All pinkt with Varnish't Flowers of Paradise

When the poet's Understanding, Will, Affections, Judgment, Conscience, Memory, Words, and Actions have been dressed in this God made cloth,

Then mine apparell shall display before yee
 That I am Cloathd in Holy robes for glory

Taylor's "Sacramental Meditations" were written over a period of forty four years, 1682 to 1725 His purpose in writing them is suggested in his complete manuscript title "Preparatory Meditations before my Approach to the Lords Supper Chiefly upon the Doctrin[e] preached upon the Day of administration" Each meditation is in Taylor's favorite six line stanza, rhyming ababcc, and each is numbered, with a Biblical text to provide the theme In view of the sensuousness in the language and imagery of so much of Taylor's poetry—despite his Puritan religious orthodoxy—it is significant that of ninety seven texts which he chose from the Old Testament, seventy six are from the Song of Solomon (Taylor uses the alternate name Canticles), which is filled with the passion and imagery of Oriental love poetry The orthodox interpretation of the book as an allegory describing Christ's love for the Church permitted Taylor to return repeatedly to it without a twinge of his Puritan conscience, but the modern reader may wonder whether it was not Taylor's own natural ardor which drew him so often to Canticles for his texts Yet reading the "Meditations," one never questions the sincerity of his love for Christ in such lines as these

Oh! that my Heart, thy Golden Harp might bee
 Well tun'd by Glorious Grace that ery string
 Screw'd to the highest pitch, might unto thee
 All Praises wrapt in sweetest Musick bring
 I praise thee, Lord, and better praise thee would,
 If what I had, my heart might ever hold

Though the "Sacramental Meditations" are often awkward and uneven in development and sometimes repetitious in phrasing or imagery, they form altogether a remarkable group of poems, filled with light and warmth and beauty and proclaiming the poet's love for the Christ whom he served devotedly for so many years

THE POETICS

Type of work Philosophical essay
Author Aristotle (384-322 B.C.)
First transcribed Fourth century B.C.

Although Aristotle's reputation as one of the greatest philosophers of all time rests principally on his work in metaphysics, he nowhere shows himself more the master of illuminating analysis and style than in the Poetics. The conception of tragedy which Aristotle developed in this work has perpetuated the Greek ideal of drama through the ages.

Aristotle begins his essay with an exposition of the Greek idea that all poetry, or art, is representative of life. This conception—that art is imitative—is also to be found in Plato's Republic, a work in which Plato, who was Aristotle's teacher, portrays Socrates as urging that poets be banned from the ideal state for, as imitators, they are too far removed from reality to be worthy of attention. For the Greeks the idea of poetry as imitative or representational was a natural one since, as a matter of fact, a great deal of Grecian art was representational in content. Furthermore, by "representation" was meant not a literal copying of physical objects, although it was sometimes that, but a new use of the material presented by sense.

Aristotle's intention in the Poetics is to analyze the essence of poetry and to distinguish its various species. The word "poetry" is used in translation as synonymous for "fine art." Among the arts mentioned by Aristotle are epic poetry, tragedy, comedy, dithyrambic poetry, flute-playing and lyre playing. These arts are regarded as all representative of life, but they are distinguished from each other by their means and their objects. The means include rhythm, language and tune, but not all the arts involve all three, nor are these means used in the same way. For example, flute playing involves the use of rhythm and tune, but dancing involves rhythm alone.

When living persons are represented, Aristotle writes, they are represented as being better than, worse than, or the same as the average. Tragedy presents men somewhat better than average, while comedy presents men somewhat worse. This point alone offers strong evidence against a narrow interpretation of Aristotle's conception of art, for if men can be altered by the poet, made better or worse than in actual life, then poetry is not a mere uncreative copying of nature. Furthermore, a comment later on in the Poetics tells us that the poet in representing life represents things as they are, or as they seem to be, or as they should be. This concept certainly allows the artist a great deal more freedom than "imitation" suggests.

The origin of poetry is explained by Aristotle as the natural consequence of man's love of imitation and of tune and rhythm. We enjoy looking at accurate copies of things, he says, even when the things are themselves repulsive, such as the lowest animals and corpses. The philosopher accounts for this enjoyment by claiming that it is the result of our love of learning, in seeing accurate copies, we learn better what things are. This view is in opposition to Plato's idea that art corrupts the mind since it presents copies of copies of reality (physical objects being considered as mere copies of the universal idea or kind). Aristotle believed that universals, or characteristics, are to be found only in things, while Plato thought that the universals had some sort of separate existence.

Comedy represents inferior persons in that, laughable, they are a species of the ugly. The comic character makes mistakes or is in some way ugly, but not so seriously as to awaken pity or fear.

Epic poetry differs from tragedy in that it has a single meter and is narrative in form. A further difference resulted from the Greek convention that a tragedy encompass events taking place within a single day, while the epic poem was unlimited in that respect.

Tragedy is defined by Aristotle as a representation of a heroic action by means of language and spectacle so as to arouse pity and fear and thus bring about a catharsis of those emotions.

The relief, or catharsis, of the emotions of pity and fear is the most characteristic feature of the Aristotelian conception of tragedy. According to Aristotle, tragedy arouses the emotions by bringing a man somewhat better than average into a reversal of fortune for which he is responsible, then, through the downfall of the hero and the resolution of the conflicts resulting from the hero's tragic flaw, the tragedy achieves a purging of the emotions in the audience

The audience feels pity in observing the tragic hero's misadventures because he is a vulnerable human being suffering from unrecognized faults, and then fear results from the realization that the hero is much like ourselves—we, too, can err and suffer

Aristotle defines "plot" as the arrangement of the events which make up the play, "character" as that which determines the nature of the agents, and "thought" as what is expressed in the speeches of the agents "Diction" is the manner of that expression

The plot is the most important element in the tragedy (the others being character, diction, thought, spectacle, and song) because a tragedy is a representation of action. The characters exist for the sake of the action, not the action for the sake of the characters

The two most important elements of the tragedy and of its plot are "peripety" or reversal and "discovery." By "peripety" is meant a change of a situation into its opposite state of fortune—in tragedy, a change from a good state of affairs to the bad. A "discovery" is a revelation of a matter previously unknown. The most effective tragedy, according to Aristotle, results from a plot which combines peripety and discovery in a single action, as in Sophocles' Oedipus

To modern readers Aristotle's definitions of the "beginning," "middle," and "end" of a tragedy may seem either amusing or trivial, but they contain important dramatic truths. The philosopher defines the beginning as that which does not necessarily follow anything else but does necessarily give rise to further action. The end necessarily follows from what has gone before, but does not necessarily lead to further events. The middle follows the beginning and gives rise to the end

The sense of Aristotle's definitions is found once we realize that the important thing about the beginning of a play is not that it is the start, but that relative to the audience's interest and curiosity no earlier event is needed, but further events are demanded. Similarly for the ending, the closing events of a play should not be merely the last events presented, but they should appear necessary as a result of what has already happened, and, furthermore, they should not give rise to new problems which must be solved if the audience is to be satisfied

Aristotle writes that anything that is beautiful must not only have parts orderly arranged, but must also have parts of a large enough, but not too large, size. An animal a thousand miles long or something too small to be seen cannot be beautiful. A play should be as long as possible, allowing a change of fortune in a sequence of events ordered in some apparently inevitable way provided the play can be understood as a whole

In his conception of unity Aristotle emphasizes a point that continues to be useful to all who compose or criticize works of art: if the presence of a part makes no difference, it has no place in the work

A good tragedy should not show worthy men passing from good fortune to bad, for that is neither fearful nor pitiful but shocking. But even worse is to show bad men acquiring good fortune, for such a situation irritates us without arousing pity and fear

The tragic hero, consequently, should be a man better than ourselves, but not perfect, and he should suffer from a flaw which shows itself in some mistaken judgment or act resulting in his downfall. There has been considerable discussion about the kind of flaw Aristotle meant, but it seems clear from the examples he gives, like the Oedipus, that the flaw should be such that, given it, a man must inevitably defeat himself in action, nevertheless, it is not inevitable that man have that flaw. All men are liable to the flaw, however; hence, the tragic hero arouses fear in all those who see the resemblance between the hero's situation and their own. The hero arouses pity because, as a human being, he cannot be perfect like the gods; his end is bound to be tragic.

Aristotle concludes his Poetics with a careful discussion of diction and thought, and of epic poetry. Among the sensible comments he makes is one to the effect that what is believable though not possible is better in a play than an event which is possible but not believable.

Throughout the Poetics Aristotle offers remarkably clear analyses of what Greek tragedy actually was and of what, according to Aristotle, it ought to be. He shows not only an adroit analytical intellect but also an understanding of the practical problems of the art of poetry, and he is sophisticated enough to realize that most questions as to the value, length, beauty, and other features of a work of art are settled relative to the kind of audience the judge prefers.

THE POETRY OF AUDEN

Type of work Poetry

Author W(ystan) H(ugh) Auden (1907)

Principal published works Poems 1930 The Orators, 1932 The Dance of Death, 1933 Poems, 1934 Look, Stranger 1936, Spain, 1937 Another Time, 1940 The Double Man, 1941, For the Time Being 1944 Collected Poetry 1945 The Age of Anxiety, 1947, Nones, 1951, The Shield of Achilles, 1955 The Old Man's Road, 1956

W. H. Auden, for twenty years ranked among the best modern poets, is, like his contemporary T. S. Eliot, the product of both the English and the American traditions. Auden was raised in the industrial midlands of England and educated at Oxford during the bleak 1930's. There he became one of a group of young poets, including C. Day Lewis, Louis MacNeice, Stephen Spender, and Christopher Isherwood, who directed their writing toward a search for meaning in a world which seemed to them empty and mechanical.

Growing up during the great depression, when unemployment was at a peak in England, Auden and his contemporaries, in sympathy with the problems of the working class, looked to Marxism as a possible solution to social conditions and to Sigmund Freud and George Walther Groddeck for answers to the spiritual barrenness resulting from these conditions. Auden's continual search for meaning and faith during this period led him away from these ideas to the orthodox Christianity of the theologians like Reinhold Niebuhr and Søren Kierkegaard. The most complete expression of his Christianity is his Christmas Oratorio, For the Time Being, possibly his finest, most cohesive work.

Auden's acceptance of Christianity coincided approximately with his move to New York, just before the outbreak of World War II. His more recent work combines American images, rhythms, and colloquialism with English ones, but his poetry is almost always universal rather than regional.

Auden's wide reading is reflected in the development of his technique and his philosophy. In the inaugural address delivered when he became Professor of Poetry at Oxford in 1956 he named Thomas Hardy as his first real model; the younger poet found in his master's work an expression of the disillusionment he himself felt. Hardy wrote of an apparently meaningless universe, governed by chance, and Auden found men going through life as a ritual in which there is

THE POETRY OF W. H. AUDEN. Excerpts reprinted from THE COLLECTED POETRY OF W. H. AUDEN by permission of the publishers Random House Inc. Copyright 1945 by W. H. Auden

no meaning The soldiers of "Which side am I supposed to be on?" are "aware of our rank and alert to obey orders," but they have no idea of what they fight for Like Hardy, Auden often speaks in abstract tones, and he may have acquired his fondness for experimenting with verse forms from the late Victorian poet

William Blake's concern for the mistreated laboring class and the paradoxical religious views expressed in The Marriage of Heaven and Hell are reflected in Auden's poetry Blake's Songs of Innocence and Songs of Experience also suggest the form of many of the poems in "Songs and other musical pieces" in Auden's Collected Poetry Especially reminiscent of Blake is

Now the leaves are falling fast,
Nurses flowers will not last
Nurses to the graves are gone,
And the prams go rolling on

Auden's rhythms also reflect his interest in Anglo Saxon and Middle English verse The Age of Anxiety, "a Baroque Eclogue," is written almost entirely in the old alliterative four stress line, which is used also in the lines of the Voices of the Desert in For the Time Being The colloquial style of William Butler Yeats's later poetry also influenced some of Auden's work Critics have pointed out the similarity between Yeats's "September 1913" and Auden's "September 1, 1939"

I sit in one of the dives
On Fifty Second Street
Uncertain and afraid
As the clever hopes expire
Of a low dishonest decade

It is difficult to assess the effect of T S Eliot on Auden, the latter is reported to have told his Oxford tutor that Eliot was the only poet to be seriously considered by the prospective writer The social criticism of The Waste Land and The Hollow Men was certainly an inspiration to the young poet who felt the same cultured barrenness that Eliot had described Auden has adopted a few of Eliot's symbols, the desert is a recurrent image of the present civilization for both men

A particularly striking similarity between Eliot and Auden is their acceptance of Anglo Catholic Christianity However, Eliot writes in Ash Wednesday and The Four Quartets of a contemplative ideal, while Auden preaches the necessity for human relationships and mutual concern His view is well expressed in these lines from For the Time Being

Space is the Whom our loves are needed
by,
Time is our choice of How to love and Why

Several related themes run throughout Auden's work He sees man as an individual isolated in society a "lonely" "Musée des Beaux Arts" emphasizes this separation, suffering, Auden says, "takes place while someone else is eating or opening a window or just walking dully along"

In Brueghel's Icarus, for instance, how everything turns away
Quite leisurely from the disaster, the ploughman may
Have heard the splash the forsaken cry
But for him it was not an important failure

The Wanderer is another recurrent figure in Auden's poetry The isolated man searches, sometimes aimlessly, for meaning in life An early poem, "Doom is Dark and Deeper Than Any Sea Dingle," whose title comes from a Middle English poem translated by Auden, describes the strange impulse which drives a man away from home to wander "a stranger among strangers" Man's quest is portrayed more elaborately in The Age of Anxiety, in the section called "The Seven Stages" The four characters, three men and a woman, travel, sometimes together, sometimes separately, through different scenes, passing through the pit falls of modern culture and their own dreams, but they lack the courage to cross the desert which is the final stage. They cannot take the "leap of faith" in which Auden found the end to his own quest. Only Rosetta, who possesses the vestiges of her Jewish heritage, has roots and conviction enough to allow her to face the future, whatever happens she believes that peace lies in reconciliation with her earthly and heavenly fathers. Malin, the Air Force officer, expresses the paradoxes which confront the prospective Christian and the tension which is an integral part of Auden's faith.

For the others, like me, there is only the flash
Of negative knowledge

In both his pre-Christian and Christian poems Auden writes of love as the saving force for mankind but both humanistic and Christian love in his poetry are extremely impersonal. Concern for others is a familiar theme, but there are almost no descriptions of personal relationships. Even the so-called love lyric, "Lay Your Sleeping Head My Love," is strangely abstract.

Auden is a highly skilled technician. His volume of collected poems includes sonnets, lyrical songs, colloquial meditations, and complex medieval and Renaissance stanza forms like the sestina. His long poems—The Sea and The Mirror, in which he discusses the place of the artist in society, using the characters from Shakespeare's The Tempest, and

For the Time Being—contain passages of excellent prose. This virtuosity, one of the poet's greatest assets, is also a defect, verbal tricks intended to produce striking effects succeed only in seeming slick and insincere in some of his work. Many a potentially good poem is marred by the intrusion of a too clever phrase or forced aural effects. Nevertheless, Auden's skill makes his best work inimitable. In the elegiac "In Memory of William Butler Yeats" he interweaves imagery from several of Yeats's own poems and uses three rather different styles of his own to produce one of the finest elegies of the twentieth century. In the concluding lines of this poem one will find Auden's concept of the function of the poet.

Auden has adopted a long, free verse line for many of his more recent poems including parts of The Shield of Achilles and "In Praise of Limestone," a "moral landscape" published in 1951. His limestone hill is not the habitat of "saints to be" or of "intendant Caesars," the water-carved stone attracts the men of imagination who see statues, vineyards, in the natural formations, those who climb "arm in arm, but never, thank God, in step."

It is too early to evaluate Auden's work as a whole, he may yet write the masterpiece which his best poems indicate he is capable of creating. But whatever the future direction his work may take, he will certainly be remembered, on the basis of his published poetry and criticism, as one of the outstanding literary men of our time.

THE POETRY OF BASHÔ

Type of work Verse and poetic prose
Author Matsuo Bashô (1644-1694)
First published 1672-1748

No poet in Japan has had a greater effect upon his contemporaries or his posterity or has been accorded greater acclaim and honor than Matsuo Bashô. Throughout Japan, wherever his poetic wanderings took him, there are stone memorials, more than three hundred all together, inscribed with his compositions and many mounds believed to contain objects he owned. Although his remains were buried in a Buddhist temple, on his centennial and sesquicentennial anniversaries

saries he was deified in at least three Shinto shrines, one of which was actually named after two of the words in his famous poem

Furu ike ya
Kawazu tobi komu
Mizu no oto

Many have tried it, but no one has successfully translated this poem. However, it seems to refer to the sound of the water when a frog jumps into a pond. Thus, the name of the shrine might be translated as "Shrine of the Jump sound."

Born the third (some say the second) son of a warrior family, Basho not only studied haikai poetry, but also read widely in the Japanese and Chinese classics and poetry. He was a student of Zen Buddhism, calligraphy, and painting, and had at one time been a student of Taoism and of medicine. With this rich and varied background Basho, after a few youthful indiscretions common to his age and society, developed into a man of high virtue, possibly because of the shock he experienced at the death of his feudal lord and fellow poet, the privations he met during his wanderings, and his serious studies in Zen Buddhism.

Haikai, the origins of which may be traced back to the very beginnings of Japanese poetry, developed from a form in which a series of seventeen syllable verse were linked together. During the middle of the sixteenth century, this form split into the seventeen-syllable haiku and linked verse (renga), the former a humorous, sometimes bawdy, type of epigram. By the middle of the seventeenth century, haiku had again split into two schools, one emphasizing the form itself, the other seeking greater freedom for the expression of wit and the unusual at the expense of form. Ibara Saikaku (q.v.) was in his verse a follower of the latter school. Neither school, however, produced superior poetry.

Basho lived in a peaceful period following a century of wars and internecine strife. More than half a century before, Ieyasu had unified Japan under the rule of his house. The warriors who had fought under him and their descendants now were busy with peaceful enterprises. There was also a rising moneyed class made up of merchants in the urban trading centers of Osaka and Edo, now Tokyo. The concentration of power and resources in the shogunate, the concentration of cash money among the merchants, the philosophical clashes between the rigid codes of feudal loyalty on the one hand and the power of money on the other, and peaceful times, produced three of the greatest literary figures in Japanese history almost at the same time. Basho was the poet among them, and the only one who forsook material wealth for matters of the spirit.

In 1666, when Basho was twenty-three, his feudal lord died. Basho left feudal service in spite of the fact that such a step made him a semi-outcast from his society, and in 1672 he arrived in Edo already versed in the two schools of the haiku. For the rest of his life he devoted himself to bringing this form back to true poetry and, in the course of this effort, created a third school which is named after him. In the three centuries since, haiku poetry has had its vicissitudes, but each revival has been a movement back to Basho. His influence is felt not only in his own school, but also in the other two. His death anniversaries are still strictly observed by his followers, and admiration for him amounts to bare idolatry. The latest revival was begun by Masaoka Shiki (1867-1902), haiku poet and novelist, in the 1890's.

There is no single adequate word for the essence of Basho's poetry, but it has been described as the illustration of an old man girding on his armor and fighting on the battlefield, or clothing himself in the richest brocades to attend a banquet. In either case he cannot hide the fact that he is beyond his physical prime. The gayest of Basho's haiku contain an element of lingering pathos, but such pathos is not to be gained by seeking it per se.

It must be a development of one's nature as the result of the varied experiences of life

The best of the poems by Bashō and his disciples are collected in the Haikai Shichibu shu (Seven Collected Works) in twelve volumes compiled by Sakuma Ryūkyō (1686-1748). The seven collections contained are Fuyu no Hi (Winter Days), Haru no Hi (Spring Days), Arano (Fields of Wilderness), Hisago (The Gourd), Saru Mino (Coats of Straw for Monkeys), Sumi dawara (Bags of Charcoal), and Zoku Saru Mino (Saru Mino Continued).

Other well known collections of his verse and prose writings are the following: Kai oi, a collection of sixty haiku in pairs, each like the two shells of a clam, which gives this collection its title. The verse of thirty seven persons is contained as well as Bashō's comments. The preface is dated 1672, when Bashō was twenty eight. The poems combine snatches of popular songs and expressions of the time, and Bashō's comments indicate that if he himself did not indulge in a gay life in his youth, he was at least in sympathy with those who did. This work is representative of his earlier years.

The remaining books are accounts of his wanderings and journeys, each liberally sprinkled with poems. These include Nozarashi Kiko (In the Face of Wind and Rain), 1685, an account of a trip from Edo to the Kyoto-Nara-Ise area, particularly Nagoya in 1684-1685, Kashima Kiko (Moon Viewing to Kashima), 1687, Oi no Obumi (Scraps from my Letterbox), 1687, an account of a journey in the Yamato area, believed to show Bashō at his peak as a poet and philosopher, Sarashina Kikō (Moon Viewing to Sarashina), 1688, a brief work like the Kashima Kikō and similar in style, Oku no Hosonichi (The Narrow Road of Oku), an account of a trip in 1689 from Edo to Sakata in northeastern Japan via Nikkō and Matushima, and thence down toward the Japan Sea to Kanazawa, Tsuruga and then southward to Ise, covering about 1,467 miles in seven months. This work, the greatest of Bashō's travel accounts, inspired numerous followers, both of his own time and later (including at least one American), to make trips by the same route. The Saga Nikki (Diary at Saga), 1691, is Bashō's diary written during a month's stay in 1691 at the Rakushisha, a modest residence in Saga, near Kyoto. The style reveals Bashō at his best in describing his enjoyment of a simple, uncluttered life.

Some examples of Bashō's prose and poetry have been translated into English, German, and Spanish. Among the English translations, his Genjūan no ki ("Prose Poem on the Unreal Dwelling") is included in Donald Keene's Anthology of Japanese Literature (New York, 1955). There are two translations into German of the Kashima Kikō. The Oku no Hosonichi has been translated by Isobe Yachiro (Tokyo, 1933). A partial translation is included in the Keene Anthology. It also appears as "Bashō, the Wanderer," by Richard Lane, in the Journal of Oriental Literature (IV, 1951). The Saru Mino appears in "Bashō (1644-94) and the Japanese Political Epigram," by Basil Hall Chamberlain, in the Transactions of the Asiatic Society of Japan (XXX, 2, 1902). Harold G. Henderson has a number of unique translations of Bashō's poems in his An Introduction to Haiku: an Anthology of Poems and Poets from Bashō to Shiki (New York, 1958).

THE POETRY OF BLAKE

Type of work Poetry

Author William Blake (1757-1827)

Principal published works Poetical Sketches 1783 There Is No Natural Religion, c. 1788 1794, All Religions Are One, c. 1788-1794, Songs of Innocence, 1789, The Book of

Thel, 1789 The Marriage of Heaven and Hell, c 1790, The French Revolution, 1791, For the Sexes The Gates of Paradise, 1793 Visions of the Daughters of Albion, 1793, America, A Prophecy, 1793 Songs of Experience, 1794 Europe, A Prophecy 1794 The First Book of Urizen, 1794 The Song of Los, 1795 The Book of Ahania, 1795, The Book of Los, 1795, Milton, 1804 1808, Jerusalem, The Emanation of the Giant Albion, 1804 1820, Laocoon, c 1820, The Ghost of Abel, 1822

The poetry of William Blake, an artist, printer, prophet, and revolutionary, varies widely in style and substance, from youthful imitations of Spenser to lyrics of seemingly naive childish wonder to obscure and pretentious mysticism. Apart from his earliest productions, his work shows a powerful originality in form, images, and technique.

His juvenile work, written between the ages of twelve and twenty, was published in 1783 as Poetical Sketches. The poems, which are slight and at times even crude, show a strong Elizabethan influence. Occasional flashes of lyrical brilliance are visible, however, such as this stanza from a song known to have been written before he was fourteen:

With sweet May dews my wings were wet,
And Phoebus fir'd my vocal rage,
He caught me in his silken net,
And shut me in his golden cage

Although he remained poor and generally unknown throughout his life, Blake was well acquainted with a number of leading social and political radicals, and he belonged to a discussion group which included Henry Fuseli, Thomas Holcroft, Mary Wollstonecraft, Thomas Paine, and others. Through such stimulation he was able to develop his own radical views about Christianity, Swedenborgianism, and the American and French revolutions. His dual concern with mysticism and political radicalism about 1788-1789 marks his intellectual and artistic maturity. These two strains were immediately evident in Blake's two major collections of lyrics, Songs of Innocence (1789), and Songs of Experience (1794), printed together in 1794 as Songs of Innocence and Experience. All three volumes were illustrated by the author's powerfully imaginative engravings, which contribute greatly to the reader's appreciation of the text. By "innocence" and "experience" Blake meant two contrary, though not clearly defined, states of the human soul. The two groups of poems directly oppose their subject matter. We are given "Infant Joy" against "Infant Sorrow," "The Blossom" against "The Sick Rose," "The Lamb" against "The Tiger," "The Divine Image" against "The Human Abstract," and opposed treatments of "The Chimney Sweeper," "A Little Boy Lost," and others. The poems are remarkable for their simple grace and direct emotional expression. "Innocence" is something like happiness, a state of wonder and acceptance and endurance of life. The "innocent" chimney sweep, for example, although aware of his misery, retains his vision and faith:

There's little Tom Dacre, who cried
when his head
That curled like a lamb's back was shaved so I said
'Hush Tom! never mind it, for when your head's bare
You know that the soot cannot spoil
your white hair."

In contrast, the chimney sweep of the opposed poem in Songs of Experience understands the earth-bound social cause and the destructive aspects of life. His complaint is bitter:

And because I am happy and dance and sing
They think they have done me no injury,
And are gone to praise God and His
Priest and King
Who make up a Heaven of our misery

The poet's opposition of "innocence" and "experience" reflects the develop ment of his Doctrine of Contraries, a philosophical view which was to dominate his poetry for the rest of his life. He defines this doctrine in The Marriage of Heaven and Hell (c 1790) "Without Contraries is no progression. Attraction and repulsion, reason and energy, love and hate, are necessary to human existence." Elsewhere in the same work he casts these oppositions as a "Prolific Force" against a "Devouring Force"

But the Prolific would cease to be prolific unless the Devourer as a sea, received the excess of his delights. Some will say 'Is not God alone the Prolific?' I answer 'God only acts and is in existing beings or men.'

Blake apparently viewed progress as cyclical, as a period of creation following one of destruction. Such a view is present in the mythology of his later works. Specifically, The Marriage of Heaven and Hell attacks the rationalism of eighteenth-century Protestantism, which, Blake felt, reduced complex moral problems to oversimplified formulas. By means of paradox he hoped to stress a truer and more complicated awareness of the human condition. In "The Little Vagabond," for example, a later lyric associated with Songs of Experience, the young narrator complains "Dear mother, dear mother, the Church is cold, / But the Ale house is healthy and pleasant and warm." Although apparently uncomplicated, Blake's lyrics are written in a complex vision.

Blake's prophetic and mystical writings include The Book of Thel (1789), Tiriel (c 1789), Visions of the Daughters of Albion (1793), America, A Prophecy (1793), Europe, A Prophecy (1794), The First Book of Urizen (1794), The Song of Los (1795), The Book of Ahania (1795), The Four Zoas (c 1797), Milton (1804-1808), Jerusalem (1804-1820), and The Ghost of Abel (1822). These poems generally employ a kind of free verse, although there are some memorable lyrical passages, and an obscure and at times incomprehensible personal mythology. Various critics have produced widely differing interpretations.

These writings may be profitably divided into four groups which indicate different directions in the author's thought. The first such group contains Thel and Tiriel, works that are allegorical rather than symbolic. Thel argues for a benevolent providence found in all things. Tiriel is an Ossianic imitation with the theme of defiant children against a tyrannical father. Neither poem shows the paradoxical views Blake was soon to develop.

The second group marks the beginning of Blake's characteristic mystical thought. It includes the prose work, The Marriage of Heaven and Hell, and two subgroups of related poems. The first group, consisting of A Song of Liberty, Visions of the Daughters of Albion, America, A Prophecy, Europe, A Prophecy, and The Song of Los, employs relatively uncomplicated symbolism. They stress the doctrine of man's regeneration through a revolt against common moral standards to produce an apparently an archaic society. The second group, which includes The First Book of Urizen, The Book of Los (1795), and The Book of Ahania, introduces a myth which challenges the Hebraic Christian and Miltonic views of cosmology, man, and sin. These poems are intellectually significant in that the action is set against a background of blind fate. The power of God to direct the universe is implicitly denied.

Vala, an earlier form of The Four Zoas, is representative of a third development in Blake's mythology. To his earlier symbolism he added new qualities and powers. Urizen, Luvah, Tharmas, and Urthona or Los are associated respectively with the intellect or the Brain, the affections or the Heart, the appetite or the Tongue, and the Ear or the prophetic and creative activity. He apparently wished either to base his myth in psychology or to include human attributes in a story about the origins of the universe.

About 1797, however, while still working on Vala, Blake radically shifted his views to a belief in a beneficent God, although he maintained his attack against conventional theology and moral codes. The Four Zoas, Milton, and Jerusalem belong to the fourth group, which features a more extensive use of symbols derived from Christianity and a more elaborate view of his theories about reality and knowledge. His theory of salvation through revolt, as well as Orc, its symbol, finally disappears. At the same time Blake more closely identifies his mysticism with art. Instead of creating a new mythology to express his new views, Blake rewrote and patched up the old symbolism, inevitably confusing it still further. He left no fully coherent myth.

Milton consists of two separate parts, the obscure and shadowy Satan Palambron myth, and the descent of Milton into the world to correct his theological errors in Paradise Lost, such as having regarded Satan as punished by God for his sins. Blake often claimed to have spoken to Milton in visions. Crabbe Robinson, an acquaintance of Blake, wrote to Dorothy Wordsworth "Now, according to Blake, atheism consists in worshipping the natural world, which same natural world, properly speaking is nothing real but a mere illusion produced by Satan. Milton was for a great part of his life an atheist, and therefore his fatal errors in Paradise Lost, which he often begged Blake to refute." Milton is also noteworthy for the striking lyric with which it begins, "And did those feet in ancient time"

Jerusalem deals with Albion's (man's) conquest of error on earth and with his return to Eternity. It celebrates the law of Forgiveness of Sins. The text as we have it is obscured by many revisions, but in 1809 the poet published a clear description of its theme: "(The Strong Man, the Beautiful Man, and the Ugly Man) were originally one man who was fourfold, he was self divided, and his real humanity slain on the stems of generation, and the form of the fourth was like the Son of God. It is voluminous and contains the ancient history of Britain and the world of Satan and of Adam."

THE POETRY OF BRYANT

Type of work Poetry

Author William Cullen Bryant (1794-1878)

Principal published works The Embargo, or Sketches of the Times A Satire, 1808. Poems, 1821. 1834, 1836, 1839, The Fountain and Other Poems, 1842, Poems, 1854, The Poetical Works of William Cullen Bryant, 1876

William Cullen Bryant was one of the first authentic voices of the Romantic Movement in America. At his best, he combined the essential simplicity and emotion of a romantic with careful observation of and allegiance to the world of nature about him. His poems demonstrate this minute observation and this simple care, fashioned into verse that is clear, sometimes moving, and easily communicated.

Bryant was a precocious boy who demonstrated an early interest in politics and literature. In 1808, before he was fourteen years old, his first volume of poetry,

The Embargo, or Sketches of the Times A Satire, was published. "The Embargo," the principal poem in this volume, was an attack on President Jefferson in which the young poet set down in heroic couplets all the slanderous epithets he had heard his elders use against Jefferson. Bryant's next poem was "Thanatopsis." First written in 1811, and published in the North American Review in 1817, it is an instance of genuine precocity. A meditation in blank verse, developing its theme with quiet power and a simple sense of movement, the poem reflects movingly on the spectacle of man going to his death secure in the knowledge that ultimate salvation is his. Avowedly moral in purpose, it became one of the most frequently read poems in American literature.

Bryant never lost his tendency to use poetry as a vehicle for his explicit moral and religious convictions. He felt that poetry should uplift and ennoble, and his work is filled with poems enjoining man to recognize the truths of nature and of God and to live his life in accordance with them. Bryant's poems indicate that the author felt no shame or self-consciousness in preaching to his fellows. For contemporary readers, however, Bryant is remembered far more for his simple and direct observation of nature than for his moral teaching. Poems like "The Yellow Violet," "To A Waterfowl" and "To the Fringed Gentian," verse acute, precise, and unpretentious, seem now to represent Bryant's highest poetic achievement. The simplicity and ease of stanzas like the following from "To the Fringed Gentian" demonstrate something of the ease and directness of Bryant's nature poetry.

Thou comest not when violets lean O'er wandering brooks and springs
unseen
Or columbines in purple dressed,
Nod o'er the ground bird's hidden nest

Bryant is often thought of as the American Wordsworth, the Nature Poet extraordinary. Like Wordsworth, he could be didactic in his moral certainty, direct and simple in his treatment of nature. If Bryant's best work has not the power and the simple force of Wordsworth at his best, neither does Bryant have long sections of poems as completely prosaic and undistinguished as sections of The Prelude.

Bryant wrote in a variety of stanza forms. Although he often used blank verse, he also frequently wrote his nature poems in simple quatrains. He also attempted other stanza forms, in fact, he experimented, at one time or another, with most of the forms regularly used in English poetry. An early poem, "The Ages," written for delivery before the Phi Beta Kappa Society at Harvard in 1821, was written in the nine line Spenserian stanza, other poems attempted the various forms used in the ode. Although not an innovator, Bryant served a genuine function in making Americans more aware of the structural variety in English poetry, of incorporating into the American tradition the forms and the possibilities of the English tradition. Bryant's work, as he himself was well aware, was, by its example, the work of the conscientious and enlightened teacher.

Bryant, in his effort at romantic simplicity and smoothness, often was distinguished for his sure sense of poetic diction. His aim was, like Wordsworth's, to use simple language and to avoid the stylized or "poetic." Yet his poetry demonstrates that, along with his belief in simplicity of diction, he felt a strong allegiance to the notion of propriety. He attempted to get a certain elevation or majesty into his poetic language, a quality that, at its best, succeeded, although at other times it led him into vast and flat abstractions. In a poem called "The Poet," he both articulated and illustrated his sense of language as the combination of the concrete and the majestic in a carefully wrought passage.

Yet let no empty gust
Of passion find an utterance in thy lay,
A blast that whirls the dust
Along the howling street and dies away,
But feelings of calm power and mighty sweep,
Like currents journeying through the windless deep

Despite the apparent calm, this passage shows that Bryant had a great deal of variety and power within his simple language. At other times, inversion and abstract pretense mar what might otherwise be simple and moving poetry, as in the poem called "October, 1866," written just after his wife's death

Yet was the home where thou wert lying dead
Mournfully still save when, at times, was heard
From room to room, some softly moving tread
Or murmur of some softly uttered word

Feared they to break thy slumber? As we threw
A look on that bright bay and glorious shore,
Our hearts were wrung with anguish, for we knew
Those sleeping eyes would look on them no more

Bryant's poetry covered a great number of themes. In addition to his interest in nature, he also demonstrated his sympathy for various causes throughout the world: the fight for freedom in Italy, the Greek revolt for independence from the Turks. His opinions on social and political questions were generally on the liberal side (he was, for example, an ardent abolitionist), but these opinions, on domestic issues, seldom found their way into his verse. He also frequently mourned the death of friends and famous contemporaries in verse and used his foreign travels as the motivation for other poems. But his most frequent theme was nature, the change of the seasons, the appearance of flowers, the beauty of the familiar world: were all his constant preoccupation.

For Bryant, nature was never very far from God, a merciful and forgiving God whose bounty was evident in all his works. He wrote a number of hymns which demonstrate the same simple and genuine devotion, the same sense of pervading goodness, that emanates from his poems on nature. No human tragedy seemed to him so deep or meaningful that the calm, the peace, the divine reason behind it could not be seen. His poetry was full of a generous and pervasive faith.

Bryant was also a translator of many poems from the Spanish and German lyricists of his time. Late in his career he translated Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, but unfortunately his versions do not convey the boldness, sweep, and power of the Homeric style. Bryant's peaceful faith, particularly as it functioned in his later poetry, was not an effective filter through which to convey Homer's grandeur.

Bryant's poetry has had a great influence on poetry in America. His variety, his enthusiasm for expressing individual emotions, his genuine interest in nature, and his interest in many forms of poetic expression helped to educate generations of American poets and readers. Although his influence has been far less notable during the past thirty or forty years, he helped to introduce poetry to a young country that would have been highly suspicious of more sophisticated practitioners. In his poems he seemed an ordinary man developing simple emotions in a variety of styles, managing each in a clear, clean, dignified way. For American poetry in the middle of the nineteenth century, no more was required before his time, no one had accomplished as much.

In addition to his historical value, Bryant still merits the modern reader's attention for his careful diction and his simple observation of nature. At its best, his verse has a simple power and precision. If the contemporary reader cannot appreciate Bryant's easy assurances about ultimate peace and justice or is disturbed about the poet's lapses into flat and banal language, he can still appreciate the fact that Bryant was often a poet of skill and simple directness, still acknowledge the poetic achievement of lines such as the following from "The Burial Place":

Yet here,
Nature, rebuking the neglect of man,
Plants often, by the ancient mossy stone,
The brier rose, and upon the broken turf

That clothes the fresher grave, the strawberry plant
Sprinkles its swell with blossoms, and lays forth
Her ruddy, pouting fruit

As these lines show, Bryant could often describe what he saw with clarity, emotion, and poetic force

THE POETRY OF CARDUCCI

Type of work Poetry

Author Giosuè Carducci (1835-1907)

Principal published works Rime, 1857, Inno a Satana, 1865 (Hymn to Satan), Levia Gravia, 1868, Odi barbare, 1877-1889 (Pagan Odes) Rime e ritmi 1899

Rarely has a poet in modern times been awarded the admiration and adulation during his lifetime that was accorded by the people of Italy to Giosuè Carducci. Regarded as a national prophet, as well as the unofficial poet laureate of Italy, he was, for many years prior to his death, something of an Italian institution. In addition to his career as poet and essayist, he was a highly successful member of the academic world. For more than forty years he served as a professor of literature at the University of Bologna. He was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature in 1906.

As a poet Carducci was a nonconformist in his time, a fact which accounts for much of his popularity in Italy and his importance in the history of Italian literature. When he began his career, Italian poetry was and had been for many years inferior to Italian prose. A romantic interest in the past and its glories had become a curse to poetry. Carducci pointed the way to a new view, however, by looking at contemporary events and the possibilities of the future: the greatness of Italy, its culture and its national unity, in the nineteenth century. Carducci felt that poetry had a part to play in the great awakening—political, religious, and literary—that seemingly was about to break in his native country.

From the beginning, Carducci reacted consciously against romanticism. As a member of the "Amici Pedanti," a circle of young Italian writers, he worked to return Italian poetry to classicism. This change, hoped Carducci, would revitalize the poetry of his native land. The poetry he wrote at the time is typical in many ways of work produced throughout his career. His verse is simple, but at the same time heroic and solemn in tone. There is none of the excessive verbiage, emotion, or metaphor typical of romantic literature. All is restrained and controlled.

Carducci also tried to revive the classical meters. This interest may be explained partly by the strong humanistic element in his education and academic environment. In his first volume of poems, Rime, he presented a collection which decried two influences on Italian culture: romanticism and Christianity. Carducci expressed through his early poems a belief that classicism in art and paganism in religion were needed to invigorate Italian art and culture.

Two volumes of poems, mainly about contemporary political events, followed. They were Levia Gravia and Giambi ed Epodi (1882). Critics in Italy and abroad have felt that the political slanting of the poems in these volumes weakened the effort and that the two volumes represent the least valuable in his work. One of Carducci's best known and most controversial poems, Hymn to Satan, was published in 1865. Invoking Satan as other poets had invoked the muses, Carducci complained that Christianity was moribund and was carrying the world to death with it, that rust was gnawing at the mystical sword of the Archangel Michael. He went on to call back paganism as a means of freeing man and his mind. Satan in the poem was made a spirit of paganism, the spirit that evoked the marbles, the pictures, the literature of classical antiquity, as well as the pantheon of gods and goddesses Carducci wrote, too, that this was the spirit behind such great rebels against the Roman Catholic Church as Wycliffe, Huss, Savonarola, and Martin Luther, men who unbound human thought from the fetters with which orthodoxy had, according to Carducci, bound it Satan became in the poem not one symbol, but many He symbolizes progress, intellectuality, anti clericalism, the idea of progress, and the good influence of classical thought Satan becomes for Carducci more a helper than an adversary of man

The political aspects of Italian culture and life were never far from Carducci's mind and art Sometimes he favored those in power and sometimes he did not In the 1850's he was for a time the darling of the monarchists because of such poems as "La Croce di Savoia" and the "Canzone a Vittorio Emanuele," for as the years went by, Carducci tended away from his earlier republicanism and became satisfied with a monarchy for his beloved Italy That he was finally reconciled is evident in the poems, especially such a poem as "Piedmonte," an ode which appeared in 1890 and was included in Rime e ritmi

Carducci did not, on the other hand, change his mind very much about the Church Although he became less bitter about the cultural significance of the Roman Catholic Church in Italy, he could not reconcile his views of art with Christian theology, as the "Hymn to Satan" had proved Carducci believed that beauty had reached its best expression in Greek and Roman art It was this belief that caused him to try to return to classical expression, even the meters of classical poetry It was in this pagan view of the world, which he tried to express, that the poet found tranquil loveliness When Carducci wrote of his native land, he found in pagan religion and its spirit something which welcomed the reality of the land and its creatures, instead of repressing the things of this world as Christianity seemed to do, with its emphasis on another, more spiritual world In Carducci's poems about the Italian countryside there is a suggestion of the early Vergil It is as if the poet, sometimes tired of struggling in political and cultural battles, retired to the country for peace, security, and contentment

Carducci differs, however, from the English poets of the nineteenth century Unlike Wordsworth, Carducci does not moralize about what he finds in nature and the rural life, unlike Keats, he shies away from the sensuous, from the emotional, and the subjective Carducci seems merely to have looked for and found contentment of a kind Such expression is found, for example, in "Il Bove," a poem about the mild, strong and patient ox, whose eyes mirror for the poet the green and divine silence of the fields It is not strange to find that the poet says in a poem to Vergil that the Roman poet's verse is to him like the sea, a line of mountains, or the breeze in tall trees Again, in "A un Asino," Carducci used the donkey as a symbol of ancient patience and asks, at the same time, if it may not be love that moves the donkey to bray Even "Presso una Certosa," a poem written about landscape near a monastery, is a poem on the loveliness of the countryside, a loveliness which leads the poet to think of pagan times and things, and ends with the hope that the poet may be visited by the spirit of Homer

At times Carducci seems to feel that he could have chosen a better life by living in the countryside, instead of writing about the disturbances of his native land His "Idyl of the Maremma" finds him writing of a vigorous countrywoman meant for bearing vigorous sons and daughters Better to have loved and won her, to have lived with such a one in the country amidst a large and healthy family, writes the poet, than to sweat in small rhymes, to write painfully of sad and miserable things, and to seek out the ambiguous answers to the riddles of the universe

Although he was a reformer in poetry and the foe of slavish imitation of the past, Carducci revered the great poets, as his poems to Dante, to Vergil, and to Homer testify. The poet of nineteenth-century Italy did not deny the greatness of his predecessors; he simply wished to find his own vein of work which might be as productive for him and his age as those the great poets of the past had found for themselves and their ages. Even though he could not use the same materials as Dante, Carducci realized the greatness of The Divine Comedy and praised Dante for it. But, wrote Carducci, the greatness of Dante's time was gone and only the greatness of the song remained.

Few American readers know Carducci and his poetry. He was essentially a lyric poet, and too much is lost when a lyric is taken from one language and remade in the words of another. In Carducci's case this is particularly true. His materials, spirit, and style remain essentially Italian, resistant to adequate translation in another tongue.

THE POETRY OF CHRISTINA ROSSETTI

Type of work Poetry

Author Christina Rossetti (1830-1894)

Principal published works Goblin Market and Other Poems, 1862, The Prince's Progress and Other Poems, 1866 Sing Song, 1872, A Pageant and Other Poems, 1881, Verses 1893 New Poems, 1896

The sister of Dante Gabriel Rossetti, one of the founders of the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, Christina Rossetti began writing poetry in her early teens. Her verse, always simple, pure, direct, never lost some of the childlike and direct quality evident in her earliest work. Indeed, she later wrote a nursery rhyme book (Sing Song), full of pleasant and sharp little rhymes for children. She even included a rhymed alphabet, containing six or eight onomatopoeic references for each letter. Her skill and facility in light verse can be seen in the lines like the following from "An Alphabet"

K is a King or a Kaiser still higher,
K is a Kitten or quaint Kangaroo
L is a Lute or a lovely-toned Lyre
L is a Lily all laden with dew

Her deftness in children's verse and in slight lyrics lasted throughout her poetic career.

Christina Rossetti is, however, far more frequently remembered for her religious or devotional poetry. Living in partial seclusion with her family (primarily with her mother until the latter's death in 1886), Christina Rossetti saw little of the London around her but lived intensely within her own private world of religious contemplation and meditation. Her poetry, the product of inward contemplation rather than a weapon for a public cause like that of the Pre-Raphaelites, was most frequently devotional. Her themes were faith and the peace of the eternal spiritual life.

Her religion was not theological or doctrinal, however, in the manner of many Victorians; for she concentrated on simple faith and applied her simple and pure lyrics to celebration of that faith. In this simple faith, Jesus being the object of much of her devotion, she wrote a number of poems on the incidents in His life and used Good Friday and the Resurrection as a subject for several of her best poems. In devoting her poems, the products of her faith, to Jesus, she idealized the peace that the individual could find in his dedication to Christianity and the life of the spirit. She seemed, often, to picture herself as humble and unworthy, to long for the peace of eternal rest without ever being sure she could obtain it.

She made religion a haven, frequently in her poetry presenting religion as a resting place from the cares of a troubled life. This theme, along with her simple diction, is evident in the following passage from "I Do Set My Bow in the Cloud"

Then tell me is it not enough
To feel that, when the path is rough
And the sky dark and the rain cold,
His promise standeth as of old?
When heaven and earth have past away
Only His righteous word shall stay
And we shall know His will is best
Behold He is a haven rest,
A sheltering rock a hiding place,
For runners steadfast in the race
Who, toiling for a little space,
Had light through faith when sight grew dim
And offered all their world to Him

This passage illustrates many of Miss Rossetti's frequent attitudes: the darkness and difficulty of this world, usually portrayed in wintry images, the sense of God's promise to man emanating through all human experience, the idea of the "sheltering-rock," the haven of faith in which the poor human being could "hide," the sense that religious faith, without question, is more important for man than are any of his own attempts to see and understand the world about him.

In her devotional poetry she frequently presents simple images of nature through which she demonstrates her devotion. Flowers, the coming of spring and hope, the simple natural details of the world around her, form the pattern of images through which her faith is conveyed. The fields and the meadows, like her simple reflections, all demonstrate the power of God and man's necessary faith in the mercy and forgiveness of Christ. The most common symbol in her poetry is the rose. Standing for a kind of spiritual beauty, an emanation of the spirit of Christ, the rose figures centrally in her work. Roses are, in a poem like "Three Nuns," the flowers planted in paradise, the sure indications of the existence of divine love. The rose is also, in this and other poems, the symbol of purity, of a virginal and spiritual beauty that emanates from the divine. In addition, the rose is often solitary, blooming alone in a dark and wintry landscape. As a figure of solitary beauty, the rose becomes an emblem for faith and virtue in the midst of a dark and corrupt world.

Christina Rossetti's faith was not simply a private matter. In her poetry she demonstrated a great deal of concern for her family and her small circle of friends, and she included them in her poetic requests for the blessings of a merciful Christ. Many of her poems mark family occasions: birthday greetings, valentines to her mother, hopes that her talented brothers could find the peace and rest latent in the true faith. Sometimes she questions her worthiness for salvation, although she generally concludes that Christ is sufficiently merciful to receive her in paradise. In these poems she often comments on the vanity of worldly ambition and the folly of man's pride. Although she humbly includes her own inclination to judge others as one of the most damning of sins, she often speaks out against those less faithful to the divine spirit than she, giving her work qualities of precision and sharpness.

Not all of Christina Rossetti's verse is religious or devotional. She can be light and witty, some of her early epigrams have the flavor of Jane Austen's quiet, civilized, cutting comments. She also wrote a few satirical poems, like one called "The P R B" which begins

The two Rossettis (brothers they)
And Holman Hunt and John Millais,
With Stephens chivalrous and bland,
And Woolner in a distant land—
In these six men I awestruck see
Embodied the great P R B
D G Rossetti offered two
Good pictures to the public view,
Unnumbered ones great John Millais,
And Holman more than I can say

William Rossetti, calm and solemn,
Cuts up his brethren by the column

Some of this sharpness and directness also appears in the poems she wrote about neighboring farm girls. These poems sometimes begin with a simple characterization or a simple account of the circumstances in which the farm girl lived. From this point, the writer goes on, as in "Margery," to demonstrate that the unhappy girl should not have been so obvious in letting her boy friend know that she loved him, or she may urge the simple farmer to speak up and tell his love. These poems have a direct, homely quality of easy and unpretentious diction. If they frequently add a didactic tag that spoils them for modern ears, the moral is also kept in the language and the area of concern in the poem. Wit and homely common sense distinguished much of Christina Rossetti's nonreligious poetry, an indication that her observation of the world around her was as sharp, though restrained, as her allegiance to the world of spirit was thorough and genuine.

Praised in her own time for the clarity and sweetness of her diction as well as for the purity of her faith, Christina Rossetti was widely read, although not widely imitated, for she introduced little in the way of technical innovation or a new area of poetic subject matter. Faith is often more bitter in the twentieth century, and the simplicity of her faith seems remote and unworldly to many contemporary readers. Yet the simplicity of her diction and the ability to state a perception with ease and grace and point are still qualities that endear this writer to many modern readers. Although her public is not wide, it is faithful and appreciative.

THE POETRY OF DANTE GABRIEL ROSSETTI

Type of work Poetry

Author Dante Gabriel Rossetti (1828-1882)

Principal published works Poems, 1870, Ballads and Sonnets, 1881 Collected Works, 1886

Some glimpse into Rossetti's ideas on poetry can be obtained from the statement made, at almost the end of his life, to Hall Caine, that when, as a youth, he had first encountered early English ballad literature, he had said to himself, "There lies your line." He read the collections made by Thomas Percy (1765) and by Sir Walter Scott (1802-1803) as well as Scott's original poetry, and he spent many hours in the British Museum poring over medieval romances in a search for words to use in poems that he planned to write.

He began his career, however, as a painter, and entered literature through the coterie which called itself the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood. This loosely knit group, formed in 1848 by Rossetti, Holman Hunt, and J. E. Millais, had as its artistic goal the return to the "fidelity to nature" of medieval Italian painters prior to Raphael. Thus both as painter and as poet Rossetti was directed towards medievalism. The new group soon needed a periodical through which the members could make their views known, so, in 1850, they founded The Germ. Its life was short—only four numbers appeared—but in it some of Rossetti's early work was printed.

Surely no manuscript in all of English literature had a stranger or more macabre history than did Rossetti's first volume of poems. When, on a February night of 1862, he returned to his home to find his wife dead from an overdose of laudanum, he was so conscience-stricken by the possibility that her death had been suicide that he resolved on the melodramatic gesture of placing the manuscript in her coffin under her famous red gold hair. Even his brother William, who knew that of some of the poems no other copies existed, while of others there were but imperfect copies, was sufficiently influenced by the tension charged atmosphere to approve the act. The manuscript contained some of Rossetti's most famous poems "The Blessed Damozel," "Jenny," "Sister Helen" (first titled "The Witch"), and "Love's Nocturn." But further melodrama was to come. In October, 1869, Rossetti, who now wished to publish the poems and had even advertised their appearance, had the grave opened and the manuscript disinterred by C. A. Howell and Dr. Llewellyn Williams. For this exhumation, which he somewhat lamely tried to justify, Rossetti has been much criticized, one biographer even calling him a "changeable widower rifling his dead wife's grave at the dictate of literary ambition."

The pieces that Rossetti included in this first volume can be divided, at least roughly, into three classes—"medieval" poems, love poems, and sonnets for pictures. By the first category is meant those verses employing medieval settings or imitations of medieval techniques. Rossetti derived his literary medievalism from two sources, the romance and the ballad. From the romance he obtained the colorful background of knights, ladies, and castles found in "The Staff and Scrip", from the ballad he got the terse, tragic story as well as such devices as the refrain and the question and answer method of narration. These two technical devices, which were common enough in the traditional border ballads, Rossetti—as well as the other Pre-Raphaelite poets—developed into artistic elements of considerable effectiveness. From the simple refrain of the old ballads they created what has been called the "incremental" refrain—that is, a refrain which, by changing with the progress of the narrative and its emotional pattern, helps to build up the climax of the story. The trick is best seen in "Sister Helen," which has been considered one of the best literary ballads of the nineteenth century. This poem has the starkness of the traditional ballad plus modern psychological handling. Usually, however, Rossetti tended to overlay the simplicity of the old ballads with the luxuriant detail so dear to the Pre-Raphaelites.

Another side of Rossetti's medievalism appears in his three translations from Villon, one of which, the "Ballad of Dead Ladies," is perhaps the most famous short piece of translation in English.

Rossetti's love poetry, both of this time and later, presents a difficult problem. To understand the work of any poet, one must know something of his life, and this statement is particularly true of Rossetti. Even on the surface, his love poems are not easy reading, for they are densely woven, at times enigmatic. The mystery turns on his attitude toward his dead wife, Elizabeth Siddall, and on the circumstances of her death. It is now fairly well agreed among Rossetti biographers that her death was an act of suicide, and that the suspicion—or even the knowledge—of this fact haunted Rossetti for the rest of his life and was responsible for the gloom of his later years. Some critics even go so far as to say that he never wrote a good poem or painted a good picture after 1862. On the other hand, it seems also true that his brief marriage, after a prolonged engagement, was unhappy. It has been customary to say that these passionate, even sensuous, love poems were inspired by Elizabeth or that they expressed a yearning for a reunion with her, but in recent years it has been claimed that the real inspiration of the poems was Jane Burden, who married William Morris in 1859. She, it is said, was the woman Rossetti really loved. Having married Elizabeth out of a sense of duty and having seen Jane become the wife of one of his best friends, he poured his frustrated love for Jane into "The Stream's Secret" and the sonnet sequence "The House of Life." So anxious was he, according to the proponents of this theory, to conceal the autobiographical aspects of these poems that he deliberately falsified the dates of composition so as to throw readers off the scent Since all the facts, even after so many years, have never been made public, the matter must remain conjectural

Rossetti's poetry was, on its publication, generally well received by critics But a storm was brewing In 1871 there appeared in the Contemporary Review an article, over an assumed name, called "The Fleshly School of Poetry" Twenty years earlier, Rossetti, along with the other Pre Raphaelites, had been attacked for his paintings, now he was to be attacked for his poetry The writer of this article was one Robert Buchanan, an almost unknown Scotsman The whole situation was complicated by personal feuds and animosities But the (to us) almost unbelievable prudery of Victorian England made Rossetti peculiarly vulnerable to this kind of attack His poems were, for those days, extremely frank, his sonnet "Nuptial Sleep" and especially "Jenny," the description of a prostitute, with such lines as

Your silk ungirdled and unlaced
And warm sweets open to the waist,

were genuinely shocking to the contemporary reading public Also, Rossetti's well known friendship with Swinburne, the real enfant terrible of the period, added to the suspicions of the Victorian public It is certainly true that Rossetti's love poems were far more sensuous than nineteenth century poetry had been used to But Buchanan's attack hurt Rossetti deeply and increased his tendency to ward melancholia

Few styles are as out of fashion these days as the Pre Raphaelite To the modern mind, these men seemed far too self conscious and artificial in their medievalism But both as poet and painter Rossetti exercised a considerable influence over the artistic taste of the subsequent decades He and the other Pre Raphaelites were in part responsible for the "aesthetic movement" of the 1880's and 1890's, the chief ornament of which was Oscar Wilde Perhaps the most important contribution of Rossetti as a poet was his part in shattering the prudery that had strangled so much of Victorian literature

THE POETRY OF DONNE

Type of work Poetry

Author John Donne (1572-1631)

Principal published works An Anatomy of the World The First Anniversary, 1611 Of the Progress of the Soule The Second Anniversary, 1612, Poems by J D., 1633

It was in the early years of the twentieth century that John Donne was first acknowledged to be a major English poet, and his achievement meaningfully evaluated Pope "translated" Donne's Satires so thoroughly that they were unrecognizable, and Dryden misleadingly declared that he wrote "nice speculations of Philosophy" and not love poetry at all The poets of the nineteenth century show, with the exception of Gerard Manley Hopkins, the influence of Milton rather than of the metaphysical poets The poets of this century have learned much from Donne's poetic method, by which emotions are expressed by ideas and ideas defined in their emotional con text Ironically, both Donne and Dryden, by writing in what are essentially speech rhythms and not in the current poetic mode revitalized the language of poetry in their generation

Dryden was in error when he called Donne's poetry philosophical Donne was not committed to a particular philosophic system, but he was interested in the fascinating, conflicting, and often disturbing philosophies of his period The scholastic way of thought, in which systems tended towards synthesis and unity, was giving way to the European scientific renaissance, which was analytical Ptolemaic astronomy was challenged by Copernicus, Aristotle was challenged by Galileo What interested Donne, however, was not the ultimate truth of an idea but the fascination of ideas themselves. His images are drawn from whatever belief best expressed the emotion he had to communicate.

Donne was not the first man to write metaphysical poetry. That is, he was not the first poet to describe an emotional state by its intellectual equivalent. However, before Donne wrote, this technique was confined, with the exception of some of Shakespeare's sonnets and Ben Jonson's poetry, to the drama and was most frequently found in the plays of Ford, Jonson, and Webster. Also, the Elizabethan tradition of love poetry had already begun to be rivaled by witty and cynical courtly verse. Donne's own reaction against the Elizabethan tradition was as successful as it was complete.

In some poems, as in "The Indifferent," Donne celebrated variety in love, and in "Go and Catch a Falling Star" he insisted that no woman remained faithful. As well as in these poems of wit and fancy where Donne directly mocked literary convention, there are serious love poems in which he is seen to have absorbed and surpassed it. In "A Feaver" the world would not merely be a place of darkness after the lady's death, it would disintegrate.

But yet thou canst not die I know,
To leave this world behinde, is death,
But when thou from this world wilt
goe,
The whole world vapours with thy breath

A further departure from the tradition in which the lady was invariably unattainable is the glory Donne finds in sexual as well as spiritual love. In only two or three poems does he praise platonic relationships, and the poems that describe a relationship in which the beloved woman is not the poet's mistress are extremely bitter and mocking, as, for example, in "The Apparition."

The element of hyperbole in these poems is central also in the poems of consummated love and continued devotion, where it is one of the means by which the strength and sincerity of the poet's passion is conveyed. "The Good Morrow" begins

I wonder, by my troth, what thou and I Did till we lov'd? were we not wean'd till then?

and continues

For love all love of other sights con-troules
And makes one little roome, an every where

At first Donne's images may amaze rather than delight, however, they communicate effectively the idea through which the emotion is conveyed.

The areas from which Donne's images were drawn—astronomy, geography, philosophy, and alchemy among others—were those of interest to educated readers of his time. Donne's images do not evoke general or remembered sensation, but explain the particular one of which he wrote. In "A Valediction forbidding mourning," the central idea is that love is not destroyed by death. Donne compares his love to "the trepidation of the spheres" which on earth is not destructive, although the lesser "moving of the earth brings harms and fears." Further, his love is beyond the ordinary love and includes the soul (love to Donne always involved the entire being), thus separation by death is not a "breach" but an "expansion"—"Like gold to airy thinness beat." The most striking image in this poem is that of a pair of compasses: the mistress who stays alive is the "fixt foot" around which the dead soul revolves and which, invisibly, circles with it. The poem ends

Thy firmness draws my circle just,
And makes me end where I begunne

The circle in Donne's poetry is always a symbol of infinity.

The rhythm of Donne's poetry is as varied and accurate in conveying the sense as the imagery he employs. Its texture is sinewy and often irregular. The speech cadences of the verse are heard in the mind and are essentially dramatic. It is not smooth verse, but it is exact and musical. The opening of "The Sunne Rising" is illustrative of his quick, tense quality.

Busie old foole, unruly Sunne,
Why dost thou thus,
Through windowes, and through cur-
taines call on us?
Must to thy motions lovers seasons run?

Compare these lines with the tranquility and sensuousness of his close

Thine age askes ease, and since thy duties bee
To warme the world, that's done in warming us
Shine here to us, and thou art every where
This bed thy center is, these walls, thy spheare

"Aire and Angels" has lines in which the vowel sounds are long and the consonants soft, when love is contemplated, and short vowel monosyllabic lines which express love's actuality. The sound in Donne's poetry not only echoes the sense but in part communicates the emotion.

The power and beauty of Donne's poetry is its synthesis of emotion, passion, and thought. "The Anniversary," which was presumably written to his wife Ann More, is a triumphant expression of confidence in love. In the opening stanza of this poem Donne contrasts the mutability of kings, courts, and even the sun with their love.

Only our love hath us decay
This, no to morrow hath nor yesterday,
Running it never runs from us away,
But truly keeps his first, last, everlasting day

The discussion of death in the second stanza of this poem is not, here or in other of his lyrics, a morbid preoccupation but, as is true of all Donne's poetry, an illustration of the all-embracing and inquiring quality of his mind. Death will not destroy love, love will increase in the souls released from the grave. In the third stanza the lovers themselves are kings and thus they will know physical change and decay, however, since the love in their souls after death is inviolate, so are they, while they live. The evolution of this paradoxical idea and the simplicity and directness of the language carry dramatic conviction. The poem ends

Let us love nobly, and live and adde
again
Yeares unto yeares, till we attaine
To write threescore this is the second of our raigne

Probably the Songs and Sonets are the best known of Donne's poems, but some of the Elegies and religious verse are of the same quality. In 1615, Donne was ordained an Anglican priest and became Dean of St. Paul's Cathedral in London. The poetry that Donne wrote after his ordination was as passionate, as intellectually inquiring, and often as tormented as his love poetry. He spoke of God and the Church in the same terms as he spoke of secular love. For many years before he became a priest he had studied theology and was converted to Protestantism, from the Catholic faith to which he had been born. He discussed the difficulty of finding true religion in his poetry and was apparently almost overwhelmed by the knowledge of his sinfulness.

The "Holy Sonnets" are vibrant and impassioned cries, infused with the knowledge of the need for grace. They, too, are highly personal and dramatic. Number XIV begins

Batter my heart, three person'd God,
for, you
As yet but knocke, breathe, shine, and seeke to mend,

That I may rise, and stand, o erthrow
mee and bend
Your force to breake, blowe, burn and make me new

It ends

Take mee to you, imprison mee for I Except you enthrall mee, never shall be free,
Nor ever chaste, except you ravish mee

Sometimes the paradoxes in the religious poetry are superb and convincing, but occasionally the ideas are pursued to the point of tedium and a seeming detail is over elaborated. One of Donne's most successful devotional poems is "A Hymne to God the Father," on sin, fear, and forgiveness which, with its repeated phrase "Wilt thou forgive," has a simplicity and humility which is equaled only by the poetry of George Herbert.

Donne was the greatest of the metaphysical poets. In some few of their poems he was equaled by Vaughan and Marvell and in religious poetry by Herbert. But the body of his work is poetry of a quality which, when compared with that of any other of these poets, is unsurpassed. When his images are understood in their function of communicating a state of mind, and his ideas in their power to give expression to emotions, Donne's poetry is appreciated for its wit, beauty, and perception.

THE POETRY OF DRAYTON

Type of work Poetry

Author Michael Drayton (1563-1631)

Principal published works The Harmonie of the Church, 1591 Idea, the Shepherd's Garland, 1593 Piers Gaveston, 1593 Idea's Mirror 1594 Matilda, 1594 Endymion and Phoebe, 1595 The Tragical Legend of Robert, Duke of Normandy 1596 Mortimeriados 1596 England's Heroical Epistles 1597 Legend of the Great Cromwell 1607 Poly Olbiou, 1612 1622, Nymphidia, 1627 Shepherd's Sirena 1627, The Muses Elizium, 1630

Held in high esteem by his contemporaries, Michael Drayton was one of the first professional poets whose entire life was devoted to his muse. He was thought to have been with Shakespeare during the last merry evening of the playwright's life, or so legend has it. Drayton is almost as elusive a figure for the biographer. According to his own word, he turned to poetry at the age of ten, when he was a page in the service of Sir Henry Goodere—a connection he maintained by worshipful devotion to Goodere's youngest daughter Anne throughout his bachelor life time.

His first published work, The Harmonie of the Church, is seldom read now even by scholars, so much like the weaker works of his contemporaries is this collection of Biblical studies in verse. But some of the prayers, the songs of thanksgiving, and especially his rendition of the Song of Solomon give indications of his latent talent. His admiration for Spenser led to the writing of a pseudo Shepherd's Calendar, pastoral eclogues called Idea, the Shepherd's Garland. This work is not to be confused, however, with Drayton's fine sonnet sequence of a later period. In 1605 or 1606 Drayton brought out a collection of old and new work, Poems Lyric and Pastoral, which contained "The Ballad of Agincourt," a celebration of Henry V's great victory, and "Ode to the Virginian Voyage," a patriotic poem commemorating Raleigh's conquests in the New World. This latter is among the first to present America as the new Garden of Eden ("Earth's only paradise").

Where nature hath in store
Fowl, venison, and fish,
And the fruitful soil—
Without your toil,
Three harvests more,
All greater than you wish

Among Drayton's other odes are two often anthologized because they are among the most graceful, felicitous verses in the language "To His Coy Love"—a canzonet, as Drayton calls it, but meant to be sung, like his other odes—calls back the poet's heart from a half love, starved for pleasure "amidst an ocean of delight" Rejecting many of the lady's physical charms, he pleads

Come nice thing, let thy heart alone,
I cannot live without thee

About this same time Drayton published a number of historical verses titled Mortimeriados (republished as The Baron's Wars in 1603), a criticism of civil strife in which he presented the disturbed career of Edward II He produced a more interesting work of poetic history in England's Heroical Epistles, an imaginary exchange of the love letters supposedly written by twelve English lovers such as James and Mary Suffolk, Edward IV and Jane Shore, Henry II and the fair Rosamond Along with Endimion and Phoebe, verses in imitation of Marlowe, and a miscellany of conventional verses such as his Fig for Momus, Drayton during this period seems to have given more time to dramatic productions and social life than to the diligence in writing which characterizes his later life

After Queen Elizabeth died, Drayton failed to enjoy the favor of King James The first benefit postently gained from this lack of acceptance was an excellent satire, The Owl (1604), that wise bird so hated by the crows and kites who made up the new court With a return to his scriptural preoccupations, he published in that same year Moses in a Map of His Miracles While not an original genius, Drayton displayed in this work a spirit of courtliness and an expert use of conventional themes a lament over a loved one, a comparison of youth and age, a clearly patriotic celebration of the great Elizabeth, a lament for the dead Sidney, a praise of Idea (Anne), a song of deceased though venerated worthies of England

The next year saw the publication of a sequence made up of fifty one sonnets, four of which are still remembered and read Here, in Idea's Mirror, the platonic conception is lost in what is clearly passionate love Drayton, often thought of as a lesser Daniel and as the great imitator, struck out on his own here rivaling the early Shakespeare and the later Cavalier poets The sonnet form, here three iambic pentameter quatrains and a final couplet, reaches a maturity of style, especially in the poems starting with the line "To nothing fitter can I thee compare," continuing through "When first I ended, then I first began," to a climax of despair in "You're not alone when you are still alone," and then to the gravely beautiful conclusion

Since there's no help, come, let us kiss and part Nay, I have done, you get no more of me
And I am glad, yea, glad with all my heart
That thus so cleanly I myself can free

"To His Rival" is thought to be autobiographical in that it reflects a page's aspiration to marry into the nobility In this poem Drayton gives the victorious lover saucy advice and warning

Though out of favor now, the long poem was the mark of distinction in renaissance England Unfortunately for Drayton, he planned his greatest work as a cartographer might by mapping out seas, lakes, streams, hills, islands, forests, towns—a complete poetic excursion from offshore islands through the southern districts to the Tweed River In "Poly Olbion" he intended to go right on north through Scotland and to add at least another 10,000 couplets to the 15,000 extant Some critics have praised his use of Alexandrines for this literary excursion, saying that the ambling meter of twelve syllable lines fits the pleasant landscapes viewed leisurely Others feel that the meter, unnatural in our language, is dreary and boring. Certainly, all the couplets are not poetry or even good verse but certainly some of the descriptive passages are beautiful. For this great work of thirty books a learned scribe Selden, wrote notes nearly as voluminous and in some ways more interesting especially those concerning the legendary and antiquarian sections. For Drayton included history and folklore as well as topography in the poem.

Drayton, by his own admission was disappointed in the reception of what he hoped was an account of the Elizabethan discovering his own England, a panegyric of lofty dimensions which was also scholarly and profound. He was most successful in evoking the fairy glens, the legendary figures of saints and warriors. His pastoral scenes with shepherds still offer in verse the peace and tranquility of a life no longer possible in the bustling seventeenth century. He starts with an argument or prelude to each book or song which can be read as a gloss or summary, as this passage illustrates:

The sprightly Muse her wing displays,
And the French islands first surveys,
Bears up with Neptune and in glory
Transcends proud Cornwall's promontory

The really interesting thing, as the argument suggests and the first book reveals, is the intermingling of place and legend, for example, the river where Arthur's blood "By Mordred's murderous hand was mingled with her flood." Add to this material the lovely prospect, the homely cottage, the toiling peasant, and Old England lives on.

Two other works, inferior in length but superior in all other ways, need be mentioned. Nymphidia and The Muses' Elizium the first a miniature epic of fairyland and the latter an ironic self-portrait of the poet in a pagan paradise. Like Shakespeare and Chaucer, Drayton combines the lusty and the magical, farm and fay, in "The Court of Faery," as the subtitle of Nymphidia reads, where the reader encounters Oberon the duped, Queen Mab, mischievous teasing Puck, and Pigwiggen, the fairy knight.

A kind of epilogue to the life of the friend of Shakespeare, Spenser and Ben Jonson is the brilliant work, The Muses' Elizium. Though the idea is classical, the earthly paradise presented is English: the rills, the flowers, the seasons (apart from the fact there is no winter), and especially the pastimes. Divided into Nymphalls, or books, which correspond to the epic struggles between the Eliziums and the Felicians, the last embattled satyr takes refuge in the imaginary, Elizium, though his heart is still in a world no longer felicitous. Here we may see in ironic portraiture the disappointed, embattled old poet writing in praise of earlier and happier times.

THE POETRY OF EMILY DICKINSON

Type of work Poetry

Author Emily Dickinson (1830-1886)

Principal published works Poems, 1890 Poems Second Series, 1891, Poems Third Series, 1896 The Single Hound, 1914 Further Poems, 1929 Unpublished Poems, 1936, Bolts of Melody New Poems, 1945, The Poems of Emily Dickinson, 1955

The life and literary career of Emily Dickinson were filled with irony. In deciding that some of the poems she sent him were not strong enough for publication, the essayist and critic Thomas Wentworth Higginson is said to have remarked that they were "too delicate." This judgment is only one of the many strange blunders made in connection with a woman who has finally been accorded the rank of a major poet

THE POETRY OF EMILY DICKINSON Excerpts reprinted from POEMS BY EMILY DICKINSON by permission of the publishers Little Brown & Co. All rights reserved.

Proper evaluation of a contemporary writer is an uncertain business in any era, but literary criticism in Emily Dickinson's time produced some especially ironic judgments. Of those who saw her poems during her lifetime, only Helen Hunt Jackson seems to have appreciated their real worth, Emily herself (and Emerson, who was astute enough as a critic to recognize the genius of Walt Whitman) thought Mrs. Jackson to be one of the great poets of her time, but she is now remembered almost solely for her championing of Emily. "Creative editing" is another irony that has plagued the work of the inspired recluse of Amherst. Only six of her poems appeared in print before her death; the mutilation of these by zealous editors who wanted to "correct" her vagaries of rhyme, meter and punctuation was a factor in her decision not to seek publication but to take her chances with fame after death. Well-meaning editing continued to haunt her work long after she died and only recently, in The Poems of Emily Dickinson, edited by Thomas H. Johnson and published in three volumes in 1955, has the world been allowed to read her lyrics as she wrote and punctuated them.

The bare facts of the life of Emily Dickinson were so simple that they would seem to permit no garbling, no misinterpretation, but even here what might be called "creative tampering" has also been at work. Legend says she fell madly in love with the Reverend Charles Wadsworth and he with her. Supposedly he was willing to give up family and career for Emily, to renounce everything for love, but, true to her Puritan background, she refused him. Now biographers are certain that no such double renunciation ever took place, that while she was greatly influenced by her feelings for Wadsworth and addressed to him many of her finest poems, their acquaintance was largely restricted to letters and he was probably never aware of her deep attachment.

Out of these tangles that have long surrounded her life and career, the reader is now able to judge and enjoy the work of one of America's most original and remarkable poets. Using the Bible as her chief source of inspiration and the rhythms of the hymn books as a metrical starting point, Emily Dickinson developed with care a technique that produced poems breath-taking in construction; they are full of the magic of a child who balances blocks on top of one another, performing feats impossible for a shaky adult hand. Almost as daring as the rhythms are her experiments in all the variations on part rhymes. With the help of Whitman, Emily Dickinson pushed open the door through which the "modern" poets have rushed to find new ways of expressing themselves. Here is an example of her metrics and musical effect:

Success is counted sweetest
By those who ne'er succeed
To comprehend a nectar
Requires sorest need

Not one of all the purple Host
Who took the Flag today
Can tell the definition
So clear of Victory

As he defeated—dying—
On whose forbidden ear
The distant strains of triumph
Burst agonized and clear!

Poems in this characteristic style were what brought forth Higginson's pronouncement—"too delicate." The judgment now seems particularly obtuse, for the very delicacy he objected to is one of the poet's chief charms, and sometimes that delicacy conceals the strength of iron.

The Soul selects her own Society—
Then—shuts the Door—
To her divine Majority—
Present no more—

Unmoved—she notes the Chanots—pausing—
At her low Gate—
Unmoved—an Emperor be kneeling
Upon her Mat—

I've known her—from an ample nation—
Choose One—
Then—close the Valves of her attention—
Like Stone—

The spirit of Emily Dickinson's poems has been compared with that of the great metaphysicals, John Donne and William Blake, she is indeed like them in her ability to expand the little particularities of her everyday existence into ideas that are timeless and universal. For Emily Dickinson, who as her life slipped by confined herself almost entirely to her home and its grounds, these particularities were birds, flies, frogs, sunrises and sunsets, cups, saucers, doors, even a snake, that "narrow Fellow in the Grass" whom she never met "without a tighter breathing and Zero at the Bone." Broadening these simple subjects, the poet expresses her feelings about God, death, and immortality.

Her relationship with God is an interesting one, for even in her childhood she could not force herself to be orthodox. As a schoolgirl she had great difficulty in professing herself to be a Christian. The harsh God of the Old Testament—the God who created man in His own image, restricted him with all sorts of "thou shalt nots," and then destroyed the image with death—had little appeal for Emily. In her poems her God is a very personal one, to be treated like a friend, praised for his good deeds and chided for his faults. Pompous piety has no place in any of her religious poems and when her feelings of intimacy lead her to address the Deity as "Papa above!" we are charmed rather than shocked by poetry that lets us become a part of a delightful woman to whom the trivialities of existence and the untouchable virtues are of equal importance.

Like most poets, Emily Dickinson was intrigued by death, characteristically, she made it seem just another event in human experience. In one of her best known poems, death is the driver of a carriage which picks her up slowly takes her past a school where children are playing during recess, past fields, past the setting sun, until finally

We paused before a House that seemed A Swelling of the Ground—
The Roof was scarcely visible—
The Cornice—in the Ground—

Since then—'tis Centuries—and yet
Feels shorter than the Day
I first surmised the Horses Heads
Were toward Eternity—

But death is not something the poet takes lightly. The loss of those she loved—particularly her father and Dr. Wadsworth—were blows from which she reeled, to one whose circle of acquaintanceship was so constricted each death assumed such great importance that it inspired a flood of little elegies in which the poet records both her grief and her love.

"Time," "eternity," and "immortality" are words that are insistently repeated in these poems. Always a skeptic, she once asked the question, "Is immortality true?" and like a proper metaphysician she lets her mind play with the two possible answers. In one of her last poems she seems to say that a person's identity can never be blotted out, the poem concludes with this stanza

To die is not to go—
On Doom's consummate Chart
No Territory new is staked—
Remain thou as thou art

Many readers of Emily Dickinson feel that she is a poet whom one may like or not like, that those who judge her a major poet have developed a sort of gourmet's taste in literature, preferring the delicate and dainty to the robust and wholesome. There are indeed times when her poetry is quaint to the point of being cranky, when her eccentricities, compressions, and indirections lead to incomprehensibility but if the reader will give her a second or third chance he, like others

before him, will find that her best poetry provides the essence of great literature—contact with a powerful, original, fascinating mind

THE POETRY OF FRENEAU

Type of work Poetry

Author Philip Freneau (1752-1832)

Principal published works A Poem on the Rising Glory of America, 1772 (with H. H. Brackenridge) The American Village, 1772 General Gage's Confession, 1775, The British Prison Ship, 1781 The Poems of Philip Freneau, 1786, Poems Written Between the Years 1786 and 1794, 1795 Poems Written and Published during the Revolutionary War, 1809 A Collection of Poems Written Between the Year 1797 and the Present Time, 1815

The fact that Freneau's collected poetic works, at least in a definitive edition, were not published until over a hundred years after he had stirred the American conscience heightens the irony of the title of the best biography of the poet, That Rascal Freneau: A Study in Literary Failure (1941). The phrase comes from George Washington, who more than anyone had occasion to be grateful to Freneau, not only for the several laudatory poems addressed to him but also for lifting soldier morale during the nadir of the Revolution. Freneau's political poetry served the same purpose as Paine's incendiary essays, and was perhaps more effective.

These facts alone would make Freneau interesting historically, but his poetry of nature, of American life and culture, add an important dimension to his memory. Most literary historians and critics consider Freneau our first outstanding poet: a liberal in form as well as content. He dared to introduce native themes and idioms into poetry at a time when other writers remained slavishly Anglophile. While a student at Princeton he wrote a poem in collaboration with Hugh Henry Brackenridge, "A Poem on the Rising Glory of America," a cue to later cleverly designed propagandist pieces, written first in praise of British imperialism and then revised to express sharp denunciation of British usurpation. Significantly, the account that the poem was received at commencement, 1771, "with great applause," mentions only Brackenridge's name. In blank verse and dramatic dialogue, the work traces the history of America as the story of freedom seeking men, establishing on this Eden-like continent, prophetically, a haven for all the oppressed.

And when a train of rolling years are past
(So sung the exiled seer in Patmos isle)
A new Jerusalem, sent down from heaven
Shall grace our happy earth,—perhaps this land,

and such America at last shall have When ages yet to come have run their round,
and future years of bliss alone remain

From this patriotic writing Freneau turned to the often quoted "The American Village," a poem in praise of this land in contrast to "The Deserted Village" of a decadent England. Though written in heroic couplets, the sentiments expressed, the names, and the idiom are American.

To yonder village then will I descend,
There spend my days, and there my ev'nings spend,
Sweet haunt of peace whose mud' wall'd sides delight,
The rural mind beyond the city bright

Perhaps the neglect of his early poems caused him to retreat to a more romantic life in the West Indies. Some memorable verse came out of this period in the 1770's, notably "The House of Night," a poem worthy of Poe with its vivid description of death attended by weird phantasms and graveyard symbols

Around his bed, by the dull flam
beaux' glare,
I saw pale phantoms—Rage to madness
vext,
Wan wasting grief, and ever musing care
Distressful pain, and poverty perplex

Several times Freneau was captured by the British while going to and fro among his island paradises. Finally he was so incensed over the ruthless war on the sea and the sad disposition of prisoners that he wrote in 1781 his most powerful early work of condemnation, "The British Prison Ship," which contains a notable picture of horror on the high seas

The various horrors of these hulks to tell,
These Prison Ships where pain and horror dwell,
Where death in tenfold vengeance
holds his reign,
And injur'd ghosts, yet unaveng'd,
complain,
This be my talk—ungenerous Britons,
you
Conspire to murder those you can't subdue

Though these were not Freneau's first satiric thrusts, his earlier diatribes had not the stuff of conviction. But the war on the sea he had suffered at first hand and he wrote about it from personal knowledge.

From that time on, Freneau followed closely the progress, or lack of it, of the Revolution, writing stirring patriotic pieces to boost morale, scourging lines to incense the colonials against their oppressors, rollicking ballads and celebrations of American victory or British defeat. He edited and editorialized during the latter days of the war, his poems being a special feature of various journals with which he was associated. For this work he was credited by Jefferson with saving the Constitution from the Monarchists and the Federalists. Attacked by critics and forgotten by his countrymen, he abandoned poetry and spent the years immediately following the war as a captain of coastal vessels. A collection of his early poetry and essays was published in 1786. He was aroused to celebrate the French Revolution to some memorable lines written in 1793, on Bastille Day

The chiefs that bow to Capet's reign,
In mourning now their weeds display
But we, that scorn a monarch's chain
Combine to celebrate the DAY
Of Freedom's birth that put the seal,
And laid in dust the proud Bastille

This partisan feeling eventually gave rise to the Probationary Odes by Jonathan Pindar, Esq., some of the most mature of Freneau's satires against the decay of liberal, democratic sentiments. At the same time he wrote masterful, idiomatic prose under the pseudonym of Robert Slender. These together brought the wrath of the pompous against him, a prelude to the journalistic battle of the United States Gazette vs the National Gazette, Hamilton vs Freneau. From this affair came the abuse from which Freneau never recovered during his lifetime.

Freneau was first a poet, then a politician and patriot, as these very late lines in "The Brook in the Valley" reveal

The world has wrangled half an age,
And we again in war engage,
While this sweet, sequester'd mill
Murmurs through the valley still

But, with all your quiet flow,
Do you not some quarrels know!
Lately, angry, how you ran!
All at war—and much like man

Of his work, the poems remembered and anthologized today are his unpretentious, indigenous nature lyrics such as "The Wild Honey Suckle" ("Fair flower, that dost so comely grow") or "On a Honey Bee" ("Thou, born to sip the lake or spring") Also, his celebration of the first Americans deserves mention, especially "The Indian Burying Ground"

In spite of all the learned have said,
I still my old opinion keep,

The posture that we give the dead
Points out the soul's eternal sleep

Recently, Freneau's verse has been reclaimed from neglect very much as his reputation has been cleared of calumnious attacks by his contemporaries Near his former home at Mount Pleasant, New Jersey, stands a monument inscribed

Heaven lifts its everlasting portals high
And bids the pure in heart behold their God

THE POETRY OF FROST

Type of work Poetry

Author Robert Frost (1874-)

Principal published works A Boy's Will, 1913 North of Boston 1914 Mountain Interval, 1916 New Hampshire A Poem with Notes and Grace Notes 1923 West Running Brook, 1928, A Further Range 1936, A Witness Tree 1942 A Masque of Reason, 1945, Steeple Bush, 1947, A Masque of Mercy, 1947 How Not to Be King 1951

They would not find me changed from him they knew—
Only more sure of all I thought was true

In a sense this early prediction by Robert Frost is an accurate description of the course of his writing career Frost's poetry has not changed, it has simply grown stronger The dominant characteristics of his work—his impeccable ear for the rhythms of speech, his realistic handling of nature that transcends the ordinary "love" we ascribe to poets of the outdoors his revelation of human character by means of dramatic events his warm philosophy that combines a whimsical poet with a dirt farmer whose feet are not only planted on the ground but in it—all these qualities were apparent (at least to some readers) early in his career And they are still there, handled with greater precision, displaying more depth As an example of this strengthening process, this growth of sapling into tree, look first at the little poem, "The Pasture," the last stanza of which invites the reader into Frost's A Boy's Will

I'm going out to fetch the little calf
That's standing by the mother It's so young
It totters when she licks it with her tongue
I sha'n't be gone long—You come too

The Frost charm is evident in these lines, but there is also a somewhat juvenile, Rileyesque quality When one compares "The Pasture" with "Come In," a much later and firmer treatment of the same general theme, the superior diction is immediately apparent in such magnificent lines as these

Far in the pillared dark Thrush music went—
Almost like a call to come in
To the dark and lament

But equally apparent is a greater depth of psychological complexity a stronger suggestion of the "death wish" that John Ciardi discusses in his controversial analysis of "Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening," the more famous lyric to which "Come In" is certainly a superb companion piece

THE POETRY OF ROBERT FROST Excerpts reprinted from COMPLETE POEMS OF ROBERT FROST by permission of the publishers, Henry Holt & Co Inc Copyright, 1930 1949 by Henry Holt & Co Inc

Frost has not changed, only grown surer, but there has been an amazing change, down through the years, in the attitude taken toward his poems. First, his fellow Americans could not see this most American of writers as a poet at all; it was necessary for him to go to England to be hailed for his talent. Secondly, when the English had pointed him out to us, we catalogued him as another cold New England poet who saw everything in black and white. This astonishing judgment becomes superegregious when we consider that A Boy's Will contains a poem of such warm understanding as "The Tuft of Flowers" and that North of Boston, his second volume, includes "The Death of the Hired Man," "Home Burial," and "The Fear," three dramatic poems that are intensely emotional. After Frost's reputation finally became established, the critics forced him into a third stage of his career: he was recognized as a major poet, but one not very interesting to talk or write about because his poetry was thought too simple and because Frost held aloof from the free verse poets whose efforts, he felt, lacked discipline. Now, at last, Frost has entered a fourth period in which his great talents are fully recognized, and he is regarded as a poet of far more depth and subsurface complexity than anyone had previously realized. Two of Frost's poems that are provocative enough to satisfy the most eager analyst are "Directive," with its Grail imagery, and "The Subverted Flower," with its tantalizing psychological horror.

But Frost will always be a poet more loved than analyzed. He expresses himself in such an attractive way that his readers identify themselves with the poet, they would like to be Frost. The descriptive lines one finds in "After Apple Picking," for example, have a perfection that seems the only, the inevitable, way of describing the dream that the poet feels coming on. Many other poems by Frost contain this same perfection of word choice. "Two Tramps in Mud Time" is so meticulously written (and yet so effortless, with its touches of the famous Frost wit) that the reader feels surrounded by April weather, and he clearly sees those two hulking tramps who stand around idly, waiting for the poet to hire them to chop his wood.

If Frost had limited his poetry to descriptive and philosophical lyrics, he would still rank as a major poet, fortunately, his poems are also full of people, characters who are understandable and vividly real. In "The Death of the Hired Man" four people come alive: Mary, the sympathetic wife; Warren, the practical, somewhat cynical husband; Harold Wilson, the boy "who studied Latin like the violin because he liked it"; and Silas, the harmlessly wastrel hired man who had come "home" to die. Other people are scattered like old friends throughout the poems: Magoon, the timid professor; and Lufe, the burly bill collector, in "A Hundred Collars"; the casual witch in "The Witch of Coos"; the newlyweds who philosophize so well in "West Running Brook"; the old farmer in "The Mountain" who lives at the foot of a mountain he refuses to climb simply because he sees no practical reason for doing so, and that other dour farmer in "Brown's Descend" who takes a hilarious ride down a mountain on a slick crust of snow.

There are others equally memorable, but perhaps the outstanding character in all the poems is Frost himself. Every thing he writes is warmed by his own personality, and he emerges from his volumes as a great and charming man who feels deeply but who never breaks the restraining tether of good taste. Emotional but never overly sentimental, he is dramatic but never melodramatic, conservative but not reactionary, sometimes pessimistic but never defeated, humorous without being flippant.

Trying to sum up the beguiling effect of Frost's outlook on life is difficult, for his writing personality is many-sided. Certainly he strikes the reader as a man who looks at life in a way that is both poetic and practical. The concluding lines of "Birches" beautifully illustrate this remarkable blend. In the poem the speaker has expressed a desire "to get away from earth awhile" and then come back for a new start.

I'd like to go by climbing a birch tree,
And climb black branches up a snow
white trunk
Toward heaven, till the tree could bear
no more
But dipped its top and set me down
again
That would be good both going and coming back
One could do worse than be a swinger
of birches

Frost's wise outlook is not always concerned with only the broad generalities of life; sometimes he becomes specific about the events of our times, as in "To a Thinker," which gives advice to a President, and in "U S 1946 King's X," which is a mordant piece of irony.

Having invented a new Holocaust,
And been the first with it to win a war,
How they make haste to cry with fingers crossed,
King's X—no fairs to use it any more!

A poet must be more than a dramatist,
an analyst of human emotion, a humor

ist, and a philosopher: he must above all be a poet. Frost meets this difficult test. He chooses to write in the rhythms of human speech, and by sounding as natural as a man talking to his neighbor in simple language he has produced some of America's greatest poetry. His approach seems casual and disarming, rather like that of a champion athlete who breaks records without straining, who never tries too hard. To claim perfection for any one—athlete or poet—is absurd. Frost has his defects. At times he is like a kindly teacher whose whimsicality is so sly as to be irritating, whose wisdom sometimes descends to mere crankiness. But Frost has written magnificent poetry—simple, sure, strong. Listen to this beautiful (but not often quoted) lyric called "Moon Compasses":

I stole forth dimly in the dripping pause Between two downpours to see what there was
And a masked moon had spread down
compass rays
To a cone mountain in the midnight
haze
As if the final estimate were hers,
And as it measured in her calipers,
The mountain stood exalted in its place
So love will take between the hands a face

THE POETRY OF GRAY

Type of work Poetry

Author Thomas Gray (1716-1771)

Principal published works Elegy in a Country Churchyard, 1751, Six Poems by Mr T. Gray, 1753, Odes by Mr Gray, 1757, Pindaric Odes, 1758, Poems by Mr Gray, 1768

Although the poem now titled "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard" is justly the most famous of Thomas Gray's poems, anyone reading through the whole of his work will decide that he is not a poet of only one tone or one mode of sensibility. True, Gray could strike and maintain admirably a specific mood, such as that of gentle melancholy and regret that informs the "Elegy." This, however, was only one of his effects. The poetry of his great contemporary, Samuel Johnson, is sustained in one mode from beginning to end—abstract, moralistic, improving—but not so Gray's.

Although Gray's poetry was expressive of his time and displayed often enough the neo-classic qualities admired by eighteenth-century critics and readers, its small body displays a wide variety of interest that must be recorded in any report of a poet who withdrew as a boy from the playing fields of Eton (he was not one of the "idle progeny" who knew how to "chase the rolling circle's speed,/Or urge the flying ball") and spent a quiet adult life as a fellow commoner at Cambridge. He did, in his twenties, take an extended Grand Tour with his friend Horace Walpole, and to the end of his life he varied the quietude of his life at Cambridge with frequent journeys. But Gray, in his travels, showed the qualities of the observer, the tourist. Capable of wide ranges of curiosity and considerable imaginative response to what he saw, he was willing to be entertained and diverted by sights and experiences that Samuel Johnson would simply have dismissed as foreign and barbarous. Gray also resembled other men of his time, even his friend Walpole of Strawberry Hill fame, he was willing to be amused, but the one price he would not pay for his amusement was his self-possession.

This reserve is what gives Gray's poetry the kind of unity it has. He attempts many things, and the variety of his poetry gives him minor importance as a forerunner of the Romantic Movement, both in the subjects he sometimes chose and in the simple language he sometimes employed. But those who want to claim Gray for the eighteenth century and neo-classicism have no trouble in doing so. Even Gray's best work, poems like "Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eton College," "Hymn to Adversity," and the "Elegy" abound in the elevated, figurative diction and the excessive personification popular in his time. In some of his verse fish hardly swim, and the poet himself is overshadowed by a thick penumbra of such literary abstractions as Adversity, Melancholy, and others. Often there cluster in the same poem so many of these that the effect becomes clotted and obscure. Consider these lines from "Ode on the Pleasure Arising from Vicissitude":

Smiles on past Misfortune's brow
Soft Reflection's hand can trace,
And o'er the cheek of Sorrow throw
A melancholy grace,

While Hope prolongs our happier hour

Succeeding verses present "rosy Pleasure," "a kindred Grief," "Misery," "Bliss," and a line which announces "Humble Quiet builds her cell."

These tendencies are the marks of some of Gray's greatest poems, lines which have gained the immortality of proverb. The lines of the "Eton" ode ring with many a remembered, self-possessed phrase, such as "where ignorance is bliss," "Tis folly to be wise." Similarly, a moving and notable sadness, admirably kept within bounds, throws out phrase after phrase in the "Elegy" and enriches our common speech. The paths of glory lead but to the grave, "Full many a flower is born to blush unseen,/And waste its sweetness on the desert air," "Some mute inglorious Milton here may rest." Truly noble is Gray's contemplation of the burial mounds, the rude inscriptions on the stones, the truncated careers, and the unanswerable silence of the modest graveyard at Stoke Poges. For the in glorious Miltons a tear is shed. This shedding of tears may, it is true, anticipate future Romantic glorification of the emotions, but the measured shedding keeps Gray the child of his century. Significantly, most of Gray's poems were written for sympathetic friends and were published only when pirated versions, as with the "Elegy," were about to appear.

The fact of Gray's self-control—the fact that he possessed a considerable range of feeling and powers of taste but was not possessed by them—is testified to by several items. He was a master of the going eighteenth-century style and could, for example, compose restrained and sincere epitaphs ("Epitaph on Mrs. Clerke," "Epitaph on Sir William Williams"). At the same time, with brilliant if trivial results, he could compose his "Ode on the Death of a Favorite Cat." He could be really dull, as in his "Alliance of Education and Government", yet this sober earnestness did not inhibit his "Satire on the Heads of Houses," in which he ridicules the university masters to whom he was speaking soberly in his "Alliance"

Similarly, Gray had enough taste and curiosity to imitate the use of "Barbarian" materials in "The Fatal Sisters," "The Bard"—called a "Pindaric ode"—and "The Triumphs of Owen." True to the tone of his sources, he speaks in accents quite different from those of neo classic convention, screams, mantic possession, and direct language sustain many passages in these pastiches from the Norse and other languages. But the Cambridge resident was no more possessed by savagery than he was by the refined sensibility expressed in the "Elegy" or the "Eton" ode. He moved from sincere epitaphs to a lament for a cat, he moved, at least once, from his recreation of bardic song to "A Long Story," in which much of the general machinery of Romantic narrative is burlesqued in advance.

As Gray indicated in "The Progress of Poesy," he believed that he lived in an age of twilight, the great luminaries of Greek, Roman, and English poetry had long since set ("Oh! Lyre divine, what daring Spirit/Wakes thee now?") He shows us, however, that a conscientious connoisseur can find his way through twilight—perhaps toward a new dawn—and throughout follow a memorable course.

THE POETRY OF HOPKINS

Type of work Poetry

Author Gerard Manley Hopkins (1844-1889)

Principal published works Poems of Gerard Manley Hopkins, Now First Published, with Notes by Robert Bridges, 1918, Complete Poems, 1947

Twenty nine years elapsed from the time the poet Robert Bridges first published his edition of Gerard Manley Hopkins' Poems to publication of the definitive collection edited by the great Hopkins scholar, W. H. Gardner. Within that time Hopkins had been firmly established as an important if not a major British poet, not of his age but of the present. Undoubtedly, many of the conflicts over his life and work will have been resolved by the hundredth anniversary of the year Bridges first presented a small number of Hopkins' poems in important anthologies (1893).

Certain it is that the interest when this brilliant genius was in vogue, during the decade after 1918, has changed to something more deeply critical and scholarly. The letters, notebooks, and essays as well as the complete poems—no one now believes the best of the poet's work was destroyed—are now available to all, and hardly a year passes without the appearance of a volume of criticism or biography of the extremely paradoxical G. M. Hopkins.

Of utmost importance in understanding the very powerful poetry of this often misunderstood poet is his eclecticism, his wide knowledge and deep insights. While it is true that the preponderance of criticism has dwelt on Hopkins' innovations in rhythm, rhyme, and imagery ("instress" and "inscape" summarize the two main facets), his whole poetic output indicates that he followed in the great European poetic tradition from Homer to Matthew Arnold. Hopkins' greatest poems are unique in powerful rhythmic effect, equal to or surpassing that of any other poet of like output, historically speaking, his poems prove that the genius of our language lies in stress rhythms (often "sprung") of our oldest traditional poetry, at least as important as syllabic meters in effect His poetic diction, his use of common idiom as well as ingenious coinages, is without exact parallel His ear for language was so acute, though highly individual, that he helped restore poetry as an oral aural art, a fact the late Dylan Thomas so brilliantly demonstrated

THE POETRY OF GERARD MANLEY HOPKINS. Excerpts reprinted from POEMS OF GERARD MANLEY HOPKINS, third edition edited by W. H. Gardner, by permission of the publishers Oxford University Press, Inc. Copyright 1948 by Oxford University Press, Inc.

The lack of bulk, the slender volume of three hundred pages encompassing less than two hundred poems or fragments, makes arbitrary the distinction of whether Hopkins was a major poet Certainly he is a classic in a very special sense His central vision was deeply Christian, Jesuit, even mystical, often ecstatic though intellectually controlled One of his greatest poems, "The Wreck of the Deutschland," was inspired as much by the "happy memory of five Franciscan Nuns" as their tragic death in 1875 by drowning By his own account, the thirty-one-year-old theologian, deeply affected by the newspaper account of these nuns, exiled by the Falk Laws, who drowned in the Thames on a ship carrying them from Germany to America, responded to his rector's suggestion that a commemorative poem should be written of this Hopkins was eager to try a new rhythm which had been haunting his ear, as he puts it In spite of Robert Bridges' disapproval, he kept the rhythmic "oddnesses" because the technique was irrevocably bound to the sentiment he wanted to express, the sprung rhythm or "expressional rhythm" a vital fusion of the internal rhythm of thought and emotion and the external rhythm of sounds," as Gardner describes this phenomenon As a threnody the poem is unique An invocation to God to master rebellious feelings, a narrative of the tragic event, an elegy of one nun's heroism, a meditation on God's beneficence, a plea for intercession—all these and other arguments within the poem demanded a flexibility and felicity of form The result is one of the great poems in English or any language Stanza thirty-two, a poem of praise to a merciful God, will illustrate these subtleties

I admire thee, master of the tides,
Of the Yore flood, of the year's
fall,
The recurb and the recovery of the
gulf's sides,
The girth of it and the wharf of
it and the wall
Stanching, quenching ocean of a motionable mind
Ground of being, and granite of it past all
Grasp God, throned behind Death with a sovereignty that heeds but hudes bodes but abides

While no one definition of "inscape" or "instress" will suffice, this stanza contains both the former is seeing of the internal and fundamental, significant form or nature of, say, the ocean in motion, and the latter would include the access to God's grace and a celebration of this, though the rhythmic expression is also implied

Perhaps the searching eye and the recording ear are best illustrated in Hopkins' most famous lyric, "Pied Beauty" Here the poet as painter and musician is displayed, showing his deep concern for bringing to bear in a poem all the senses

Glory be to God for dappled things—
For skies of couple colour as a brindled cow,
For rose moles all in stipple upon
trout that swim,
Fresh firecoal chestnut falls, finches'
wings,
Landscape plotted and pieced fold,
fallow and plough,
And all trades their gear and tackle and trim

All things counter, original, spare,
strange,
Whatever is fickle, freckled (who knows how?)
With swift, slow, sweet, sour,
adazzle, dim,
He fathers forth whose beauty is past change
Praise him

Here are rhythmic contrasts dramatic juxtapositions, unique word manipulations, a compelling meter as dappled and indescant as the things described

Another facet of Hopkins' talent, one of his most pronounced achievements was his variation on the sonnet form, a revolt against the stilted structures and concepts of Victorian poesy This is not to say he wrote loosely or without thought, quite the contrary is true, for his critical writings reveal the depth of his study and experimentation Ascetic by habit and temperament, he elevated the form to a new lyricism by breaking with or modifying many old systems and establishing his own

"The Starlight Night," a well known sonnet not too revolutionary, illustrates the nervous counterpointed rhythms, the startling pauses, the jarring sound clashes, the harmonic word fusion among many other interesting poetic, semantic, and linguistic devices

Look at the stars! look, look up at the skies!

O look at all the fire folk sitting in the air!

The bright boroughs the circle
citadels there!

Down in dim woods the diamond
delves! the elves eyes!

The grey lawns cold where gold, where quickgold lies!

Wind beat whitebeam! airy abeles set on a flare!

Flake-doves sent floating forth at a farmyard scare!—

Ah well! it is all a purchase, all is a prize

Buy then! bid then!—What?—Prayer, patience alms vows

Look, look a May mess, like on orchard boughs!

Look! March bloom, like on mealed with yellow sallows!

These are indeed the barn, withindoors house

The shocks This piece-bright paling
shuts the spouse

Christ home Christ and his mother and all his hallows

This sonnet also illustrates Hopkins' childlike joy in fairy lore, his deep love of nature, and a metaphysical rapture over God's munificence, a simple joy born of a deep religion In the Deutschland poem Hopkins is critical of man's questioning of God's ways, but his later poems show this questioning in his own lack of balance—a conflicting of personal desires, private impulses, and his theology This unrest is perhaps best expressed in the priest poet's sonnet "Peace" (1879)

When will you ever, Peace, wild wood dove, shy wings shut,

Your round me roaming end and under
be my boughs?

When when, Peace, will you, Peace?
I'll not play hypocrite

To own my heart I yield you do come sometimes but

That piecemeal peace is poor peace
What pure peace allows

Alarms of wars, the daunting wars, the death of it?

O surely, reaving Peace, my Lord should leave in lieu

Some good! And so he does leave
Patience exquisite,

That plumes to Peace thereafter And when Peace here does house

He comes with work to do, he does not come to coo,

He comes to brood and sit

Here he seems to have found some measure of this peace through virtuous acts, selfless serving of an often thankless mankind

As most critics point out, Hopkins combined in his interesting person a depth of humanity with a height of mystical insight, with a whole spectrum of emotions and attitudes infused Most of the contradictions in his nature, the ambiguities within his poetry, can be resolved by a thorough reading not only of his poems, but of his letters, diaries, and essays

THE POETRY OF HORACE

Type of work Poetry

Author Horace (Quintus Horatius Flaccus, 65 B C)

Principal transcribed works Satires 35, 30 B C Epodes 30 B C, Odes 23 13 B C, Car men Seculare, 17 B C

Born two years before the Emperor Augustus, Horace, the son of a freed slave, was sent to Rome for the education he could not get in Venusia, Italy. In 44 B C he went to Athens for further study. There he met Brutus, after the assassination of Julius Caesar, and was appointed an officer in the republican army routed at Philippi in 42 B C. Back in Rome, disillusioned, with his possessions confiscated and his father dead, he began verse writing. Vergil, attracted by his poetry, presented the country boy to Augustus' cultured minister, Maecenas.

Horace had the good taste to destroy his early angry poetry. His first published poems were his Satires in 35 B C, followed by his Epodes. Then, still more mellow, he published three books of Odes in 23 B C. During the last years of his life, Horace wrote his Epistles. In one ode, III, xvii, having heard of Maecenas' illness, he wrote "If any untimely stroke snatches you away, you the half of my life that day shall bring the end of us both." His wish was granted. He died in 8 B C, only a few weeks after his protector, and their ashes were buried on the Esquiline hillside.

The early poetry of Horace betrays lack of self confidence, as in his references to his "pedestrian Muse." But the publication of his Odes gave him assurance, and after the death of Vergil, in 19 B C, he was commissioned by the emperor to compose and read an ode for the imperial secular games. Later Augustus demanded odes to celebrate the military victories of his stepsons, Drusus and Tiberius.

In his poetry, especially in his Satires, Horace re creates his era with tolerance and good humor. He attacks the vanity of human desires, yet stresses the need to enjoy the pleasures of the world. While professing the epicurean philosophy, he generally practiced stoicism. Though praising the pleasures of wine, his health was too delicate to let him drink deeply. And his poems to women were just as conventional. For only one woman, Cinara, did he show real feeling. His affection was reserved for the men he knew, and his sincerity and ability to project himself beyond the lines of his poems have won him unnumberable friends through the centuries.

The poetic satire was the invention of the Roman Lucilius, "untouched by the Greeks," as Horace declared, with its name derived from a dish composed of a variety of ingredients. Horace composed eighteen satires, in two volumes, but he made them more a friendly conversation than the bitter lampooning of his predecessor.

Book I, containing ten satires presented in no chronological order, was completed between his introduction to Maecenas in 38 B C and their appearance three years later. Number I, appropriately addressed to his patron, deals with Horace's favorite theme, the folly of the discontented man who wants something he does not have. "Oh, happy trader!" cries the soldier, while the trader, in his ship belabored by the south winds, envies the soldier. The poet follows this craving to its most unreasonable form, the hoarding of money, though he does not advocate being a spendthrift. His counsel is that a man should so live that he can leave his life, as he leaves a banquet table, contented.

In Satire IV, Horace explains why he uses this form. His father trained him for a good life by pointing out as bad examples those who lived it evilly. Besides, the form allows him "smilingly, to tell the truth." Satire V, describing a journey made with his protector, contains the poet's reply to those who charged he was cultivating Maecenas for personal profit, a subject taken up again in Satire IX. His first contacts with the wealthy statesman are described in the following poem, which take a side glance at the vice of aspiring to a higher position than one merits.

The eight satires of Book Two, which appeared five years later, are longer and generally in dialogue form. In one, the Lawyer Trebatius Testa clears the poet of the charge of being too bitter in his first volume. Paradoxes serve as themes for two others. All except the wise are mad, and all but the wise are slaves. Three express Horace's delight in plain living and his disgust at the rapid conversations overheard at formal banquets. He ends with an outburst against a woman he calls Canidia, who also figures in his later writings.

The earliest form of Horace's lyric poetry is his collection of epodes, as the grammarians called them. Horace named them 'Iambi,' a meter of alternating long and short lines designed by Archilochus for invectives. In these poems he expresses his pet dislikes, sometimes humorously, as in Number III, where he inveighs against the garlic in the food served at Maecenas' table. At other times he really hated the object of his verse, as in Number IV, written about a freed man who proudly strutted along the Via Sacra, or in the poem which expresses his hope that the ship will be wrecked when the poet Maevius goes on a sea voyage. In two epodes, V and XVII, he comes back to Canidia, first accusing her of being a witch who uses her spells on men, and then, when he apologizes, portraying her as threatening to use her vile charms against him.

Several others have the form, but not the substance, of an epode, as in Number I, written when Maecenas was departing for the battle of Actium and begging his patron not to endanger himself. Best known of all is probably the "Beatus ille," classified as an epode because of its surprise satirical ending.

How happy is his low degree,
How rich in humble poverty is he
Who leads a quiet country life
Discharged of busyness and void of strife

After an enumeration of the joys of life in the country, the poem is revealed as the idle words of the usurer Alphrus.

He called his money in,
But the prevailing love of pelf
Soon split him on the former shelf
He put it out again

To lovers of poetry, Horace probably makes his greatest appeal through his Odes, the artistic work of a mature writer. Composed after Actium, these poems were written between 23 and 13 B.C. The ideas are commonplace—the uncertainties of life, the joys of friendship—but they endure because they express sentiments that appeal to all readers. Number III, for instance, contains the much quoted line, "Sweet and fitting it is to die for the fatherland." Poets good and bad ever since have enjoyed translating these poems into their own idiom.

In his Odes, Horace used a variety of meters to suit his subjects. The earliest are the gayest, the later odes, reflecting his own failing health and the deaths of friends, reveal an artist of subtle elegance and an effective arrangement of words. Even his pensive reflections conceal subtle humor.

The culminating form of Horace's genius was his Epistles. "You were the inspiration of my earliest Muse, Maecenas, and must be of my latest," he says, beginning this form. One, Number IX, is a fine example of a letter of introduction, presenting Septimius to the future Emperor Tiberius. The others, however, are letters only in form, being more in the nature of informal moral essays. "Modernism is wisdom" is the theme of the first, but instead of angrily attacking vice, the aging but kindly poet gently rebukes folly. At the end he sets himself up as critic of the poets and poetic movements of his age Surprisingly, Horace devotes little time to Lucretius and Catullus, the greatest of his predecessors Carelessness marred the verses of both, perhaps the fault which he considered the gravest of all blinded him to their many virtues

Having completed twenty two epistles, Horace wrote "You have played and eaten and drunk enough It is time for you to depart the scene" He died, at the age of fifty seven, one of the most genial and attractive of poets who have written undying verse

THE POETRY OF LANIER

Type of work Poetry

Author Sidney Lanier (1842 1881)

Principal published works Poems, 1877, Poems of Sidney Lanier, 1884

The poetic fame of Sidney Lanier, after Poe the most important nineteenth-century poet of the Southern United States, rests upon a small body of poetry found in the posthumous volume, Poems of Sidney Lanier, which contains the verse Lanier included in his Poems, along with a number of pieces which had received only magazine publication before the poet's death in 1881, plus a group of unrevised early poems that his wife felt were worthy of publication Of approximately one hundred titles in the posthumous volume, only fifteen or twenty are known today except to students especially interested in Lanier Most of the critical discussions of Lanier's poetic significance cite primarily these some fifteen or twenty poems in illustrating both his merits and his defects

Lanier was a poet of both theory and practice His theory of technique was influenced by his great love for music Precociously musical, he was in manhood a brilliant flutist who played with symphony orchestras in Dallas and Baltimore His moralistic theory of poetic content was possibly influenced by his early training in a devoutly Christian family as well as by his own fundamentally religious nature, which shows itself, in some of his nature poems, as a passionate love for God's plants and creatures approaching that of St Francis of Assisi

Lanier's theory of prosody is expounded principally in The Science of English

Verse (1880), which develops in extensive detail and with copious illustration the thesis that the same laws govern both versification and music Three brief quotations will illustrate this thesis

when we hear verse, we hear a set of relations between sounds, when we silently read verse we see that which brings to us a set of relations between sounds when we imagine verse, we imagine a set of relations between sounds

When those exact coordinations which the ear perceives as rhythm, tune, and tone color are suggested to the ear by a series of musical sounds, the result is MUSIC

When those exact co-ordinations which the ear perceives as rhythm, tune, and tone color, are suggested to the ear by a series of spoken words, the result is VERSE

there is absolutely no difference between the sound relations used in music and those used in verse

Lanier's application of his prosodic theory may be studied in many of his poems, but it may be easily seen in such poems as "The Symphony," "The Marshes of Glynn," and "Song of the Chattahoochee"

In "The Symphony," Lanier attempted the difficult task of composing a poem somewhat as a musician would Such instruments as violins, flute, clarinet, horn, and hautboy (oboe) are personified and used to develop the theme of Love, the enemy of Trade (maternalism), which pervades the poem. Nowhere is Lanier's belief in the essential identity of sound relations in music and in verse better illustrated than in the four lines which introduce the horn passage in the poem

There thrust the bold straightforward
horn
To battle for that lady lorn
With hearthsome voice of mellow scorn,
Like any knight in knighthood's morn

It has been objected that Lanier tried the impossible in "The Symphony" and that his achievement, though notable, is successful only in part. Perhaps his theory is better illustrated in "Sunrise" and "The Marshes of Glynn." In "Sunrise," one easily catches the sibilance of the forest

Ye lispers, whisperers singers in storms,
Ye consciences murmuring faiths under forms,
Ye ministers meet for each passion that grieves,
Friendly, sisterly, sweetheart leaves

In "The Marshes of Glynn" the sounds and even the silence of the great marshes near Brunswick, Georgia, may be heard and felt by the reader. A passage near the close of the poem describes in this fashion the coming of the high tide of evening

The creeks overflow a thousand rivu lets run
"Twixt the roots of the sod, the blades
of the marsh grass stir, Passeth a hurrying sound of wings that westward whirr,
Passeth, and all is still, and the currents
cease to run,
And the sea and the marsh are one

In these lines the sounds of the moving waters and grasses and of the whirring wings are followed by a silence that is palpable

Because of Lanier's repeated use of onomatopoeia in his verse he has often been compared with Poe, but Lanier's theory of poetic content is quite different. Poe, in "The Philosophy of Composition," concedes that "passion, or even truth, may be introduced, and even profitably introduced, into a poem"; but, he asserts, "Beauty is the sole legitimate province of the poem." In another essay, "The Poetic Principle," Poe attacks what he calls "the heresy of The Didactic." "Every poem, it is said, should inculcate a moral," he reminds us "and by this moral is the poetical merit of the work to be adjudged." But, he continues, would we but permit ourselves to look into our own souls, we should immediately there discover that under the sun there neither exists nor can exist any work more thoroughly dignified—more supremely noble than this very poem—this poem per se—this poem which is a poem and nothing more—this poem written solely for the poem's sake

Lanier loved art as much as Poe did, but Lanier was on the side of the moralists. In the series of lectures posthumously published as The English Novel and the Principle of Its Development (1883), he leaves no doubt as to his position when he states that

We may say that he who has not yet perceived how artistic beauty and moral beauty are convergent lines which run back into a common ideal origin, and who therefore is not afire with moral beauty just as with artistic beauty—that he, in short, who has not come to that stage of quiet and eternal frenzy in which the beauty of holiness and the holiness of beauty mean one thing, burn as one fire, shine as one light within him, he is not yet the great artist

Although Lanier wrote occasional poems such as his verse narrative "The Revenge of Hamish," in which the moral element is not a major one, most of his poetry is charged with moral purpose or shines with "the beauty of holiness." "The Symphony" bitterly indicts the cruel, greedy practices of Trade and sings the gospel of brotherly love In "The Marshes of Glynn," he writes

As the marsh hen secretly builds on the watery sod,
Behold I will build me a nest on the greatness of God

Even a dialect poem like "Thar's More in the Man than Thar Is in the Land" contains a moral lesson, as the title itself suggests Occasionally his moral earnestness dims Lanier's artistic sight, however, as in "Song of the Chattahoochee" in which the river is made to say

I am fain for to water the plain
Downward the voices of Duty call—

This is a flagrant example of what John Ruskin called the "pathetic fallacy" People may act with moral purpose, when the Chattahoochee River flows downward, however, it is not because it knows that

The dry fields burn, and the mills are to turn,
And a mynad flowers mortally yearn,

but because, as Lanier himself very well knew, the law of gravity is a part of the earthly scheme of things

Though Lanier is not primarily a regional poet, many of his lines sing eloquently of his Southern origin He is in love with the beautiful Marshes of Glynn, with their "moss bearded live oaks" He mourns that "Bright drops of tune, from oceans infinite/Of Melody" were ended when a pet mockingbird "died of a cat, May, 1878" He grieves in "Corn" that the rich soil of his native state is being washed away because of the greed of cotton farmers who lay the surface bare and then leave their erosion ruined areas and head for Texas to repeat their folly In "A Florida Sunday," he holds "in my being" rich scented orange trees, pea green parrakeets, "pranked woodpeckers that ne'er gossip out," palmettos, pines, and mangroves In such poems Lanier is as clearly a Southern poet as Robert Frost is a New England one when he describes his New Hampshire country side

A fault that many readers have found with Lanier is that, as a poet, he too often lets his heart overflow and his whole being "quiver with the passionate thrill", at times a noble emotion may descend into sentimentality and at others the poet's feeling may blur the expression of "the great thought" The lush music of Lanier's lines may also create the lulling mental effect that one finds in Swinburne Part of Lanier's trouble seems to be that he is striving too hard to attain the right combination of "rhythm, tune, and tone color" He sometimes forces his comparisons so that they become too obvious poetic conceits, as in 'Marsh Song—at Sunset,' with its metaphors drawn from Shakespeare's Tempest Some of his sentences, such as the thirty six line one which opens "The Marshes of Glynn," lack clarity because of their great length and intricate structure

In spite of the undisciplined emotionalism, hazy thought, and strained effects of his lesser poems, Lanier seems well assured of a permanent place in American literature The melody of his best lines the love of God, man, and nature found in poems like "The Marshes of Glynn" and "The Symphony", the simple beauty of "A Ballad of Trees and the Master", and the stoic acceptance of "The Sturup Cup," in which the consumptive poet says uncomplainingly to Death, "Hand me the cup whene'er thou wilt"—for these Lanier will continue to be loved

THE POETRY OF LEWIS

Type of work Poetry

Author Cecil Day Lewis (1904)

Principal published works Beechen Vigil and Other Poems, 1925 Country Comet, 1928 Transitional Poem, 1929, From Feathers to Iron, 1931 The Magnetic Mountain 1933 A Time to Dance and Other Poems, 1935, Overtures to Death 1938, Poems in Wartime 1940 Word Over All, 1943 Short is the Time Poems 1936 1943, 1943, Poems, 1943 1947, 1948, An Italian Visit, 1953 Pegasus and Other Poems, 1957

Cecil Day Lewis began writing poetry at Oxford along with his literary friends, W H Auden, Stephen Spender and Louis MacNeice, but his early work shows little resemblance to that of his contemporaries. His first well known work, Transitional Poem, was a long, Whitmanesque, searching work containing different styles and verse forms and filled with classical allusions. Although a few of its sections satirized contemporary life, it was generally diffuse and had little in common with the early sharp, ironic Auden or the early lyric MacNeice. It was followed by another long poem, From Feathers to Iron. More carefully controlled and more somber in tone, this work displayed a shrewd observation of contemporary English life. In it, Day Lewis criticized the flat, industrial suburb and contrasted the hardness of the iron life of most men in modern society. The poet also praised the natural process of birth, pitting the idea of creation and the child against the overwhelming industrialism of the age. He felt that there was, however, some limited amount of space left for the natural and spiritual. In this early poem several characteristics of Day Lewis' work are evident: his contemporary references and language and the loose, conversational quality of his style.

Day Lewis' poetry became more like that of his contemporaries, at least in theme, with his next long poem, The Magnetic Mountain. Here he attacks the complacent person who ignores social issues, the fool who does not see them, and the escapist who purposely avoids them.

The poem satirizes the old English, public school tradition, the tradition which assumes that inviolable guides for conduct exist, formulas for meeting every problem of society. Day Lewis pleads for all who would reform society, who would fashion a world based on the heart of man, to join him in his journey to the "Magnetic Mountain." The mountain symbolizes both the heart or faith of man and the enduring power or iron in his character, for iron is a magnetic and compelling substance. In his attack on the English colonizing and commercial past, Day Lewis calls for social action, for a "communal sense" in order that man may realize his full potentiality. His stinging reproach to the gray, gritty present and his great faith in the possibility of a new social order, as well as the qualities revealed in his earlier writing, are in evidence throughout this work. In this rhetorical declaration of faith, Day Lewis' writing is loose and allusive, with none of the hard, cryptic quality of Auden's work. Yet the looseness of Day Lewis' structure is frequently, as in the above passage, balanced by unexpected, musical alliteration.

Day Lewis' faith in the new social order began to wane in his next volume, A Time to Dance and Other Poems, a volume including a number of shorter lyrics. Although his allegiances were still just as strong to the new social order, he began to demonstrate an awareness of some of the difficulties of bringing about a reformation. He claimed, however, that he still wrote his poems in order to keep his faith and courage. The following volume, Overtures to Death, demonstrates an even keener realization that man was not likely to become perfect within a generation or so by joining in a communal assault on the "Magnetic Mountain." The verse in this book is crisper, less shrill, and less rhetorical, conveying a deeper insight into man and the issues that face him. Although Day Lewis still attacks the complacent and those who love tradition for the simple reason that it is tradition, he realizes that he, too, may be bound to some sterile tradition, some impossible notion of human conduct. He develops this theme in one of his best short poems, "Regency Houses." The vague influence of Yeats in this poem has given it a terseness and power not always present in Day Lewis' work. At the same time the introspective quality, the realization of his own limitations, has given the poem a depth not apparent in his earlier calls to social action.

THE POETRY OF CECIL DAY LEWIS Excerpts reprinted from AN ITALIAN VISIT by permission of the publishers Harper & Brothers Copyright 1953 by Harper & Brothers

Day Lewis, alert to the dangers of Nazism, had attacked the complacent people who refused to acknowledge that war was imminent. During the war, however, his poetry became less social, less political, more personal. He began to write autobiographical poems dealing with childhood memories and concerns. He also wrote a number of poems on the theme of love, presenting both its pleasures and its difficulties. The range of the subjects he treated widened greatly: the life of the simple country man, the impact of the war, places, poems in praise of literary figures such as Thomas Hardy and Walter de la Mare, the pleasures of Christmas. His thoughtful and introspective side continued, but his subjects grew more personal, more concerned with direct experience, and less dominated by the intensity of a single vision for mankind's salvation. In this shift of interest to more personal and direct concerns, Day Lewis mirrored the changing trend of a whole generation of English writers and intellectuals. Day Lewis still used satire, as he does in his most recent volume, Pe- gasus and Other Poems, but it was and has continued to be, a far more gentle and understanding kind of satire.

In 1953 Day Lewis published An Italian Visit, a long versified account of a journey to Italy. This is a thoughtful, descriptive work full of powerful and often startling images. The style is conversational like the easy flow of imaginative language and rich contemplation from an urbane and cultured gentleman. It is perhaps this kind of loose, ruminative writing that best suits Day Lewis' talent, for he has never been, save in rare moments, a poet of great intensity or linguistic magic. The poem, in its descriptions of Rome, Florence, and numerous smaller towns, also displays a deep appreciation of both art and tradition. Day Lewis is, for the contemporary reader, far more convincing as the guardian of tradition and culture than he was as the voice crying out for a new order. His conversational ease, along with his skill in fashioning images, is evident in the following passage which can also serve as his final comment on his pseudoprophetic role in the 1930's.

We who flowered in the Thirties
Were an odd lot, sceptical yet susceptible,
Dour though enthusiastic, horizon addicts
And future fans, ternibly apt to ask what
Our all very fine sensations were in aid of
We did not you will remember, come to coo
Still, there is hope for us Rome has absorbed
Other barbarians yes, and there's nobody quite so Sensuously rich and reckless as the reformed
Puritan

Day Lewis has become the intelligent gentleman of letters, able, with both richness and humor, to see his past convictions in perspective. Never a poetic innovator, he has been overshadowed, in critical accounts of his generation, by his more brilliant contemporaries. But he has produced a great variety of thoughtful and introspective verse, and he has written with honesty and intelligence on a wide range of subjects. In his maturity he has found the kind of verse and the kind of subject, as well as the gentle and ruminative tone, that he is making definately his. Poems like the An Italian Visit and "Moods of Love" in his most recent volume are admirably readable and demonstrate the poetic attractions of a witty, cultured gentleman reporting on his travels, his observations of people, his feelings about himself. Cecil Day Lewis, though not a great poet, is an honest and attractive one.

THE POETRY OF LINDSAY

Type of work Poetry

Author Vachel Lindsay (1879-1931)

Principal published works General William Booth Enters into Heaven, 1913, The Congo and Other Poems, 1914, The Chinese Nightingale and Other Poems, 1917, The Golden Whales of California and Other Rhymes in the American Language, 1920, Going to the Sun, 1923, Going to the Stars, 1926, The Candle in the Cabin, 1926, Johnny Appleseed and Other Poems, 1928, Every Soul Is a Circus, 1929

No complete collection of Vachel Lindsay's poetry has ever been published nor does it seem likely that this would be a profitable venture for publisher, reader, or scholar. The vogue for this poet died out even before his death, the excellent collections of selected poetry and anthologies contain all that is likely to survive, and a consensus among scholars has already been established—Lindsay was a vital minor poet whose interesting experiments and some fifty poems will be remembered.

Setting aside his earliest poems, including the famous "Rhymes to be Traded for Bread," and his late ones, excluding "Johnny Appleseed," the critical reader will find a corpus of poetry which, if no longer startling, is at least substantial. These first collections sometimes include sketches which do not illuminate and poems without substance; they were a part of the poet's years when he considered himself a traveling mystic, an artist-writer with a rather vague creed based loosely on Swedenborgian philosophy. His later years before his suicide were clouded over by a despondency which the poems reflect.

In January, 1913, Poetry A Magazine

of Verse published "General William Booth Enters into Heaven," published in book form later that year along with other poems by the same author. The immediate—and lasting—popularity of this poem is justified perhaps more so than that of the familiarly anthologized "The Congo." With cues for instruments and singing, the writer's very real tribute to the religious leader is a studied cacophony which ends in deep reverence.

And when Booth halted by the curb for prayer
He saw his Master thro' the flag filled air
Christ came gently with a robe and crown
For Booth the soldier, while the throng
knelt down
He saw King Jesus. They were face to face,
And he knelt a weeping in that holy place
Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?

Here is Lindsay's meter, the rhythmic portrayal of almost legendary persons: Lincoln, Bryan, Chapman, Altgeld, Sullivan, Jackson, and Alexander Campbell, the founder of his religious sect, among

THE POETRY OF VACHEL LINDSAY. Excerpts reprinted from SELECTED POEMS OF VACHEL LINDSAY by permission of the publishers The Macmillan Co. Copyright 1936 by The Macmillan Co.

others In these poems he created a new kind of poetic tribute, as unlike the usual versifying obituary as his own life was from those he celebrated

Less successful, though even more popular on chautauqua and college platforms where he appeared for so many years in so many cities, are the "travel" poems, the sweeping Whitmanesque vistas of the Santa Fe Trail, the Congo, the Great Plains Here, too, his poetry has its strongly personal and syncopated quality, a stress here and a manipulation there, which stamps it with a form no longer usable because, perhaps, he himself over-used it 'The Congo' begins

Fat black bucks in a wine barrel room,
Barrel house kings with feet unstable
Sagged and reeled and pounded on the table
Pounded on the table,
Beat an empty barrel with the handle of
a broom,
Hard as they were able,
Boom, boom, BOOM,
With a silk umbrella and the handle of
a broom
Boomlay, boomlay boomlay, BOOM

This is the four stress line, with a kind of added syncopation which one critic has called "star spangled jazz" Poems of this type are most effective when read aloud in keeping with the instructions Lindsay supplied in a marginal gloss

A third category, and in some ways the most successful because the poems seem so artless, is that of "children's" poetry—the kind which is enchanting to all, the large child reading and the small one listening "The Chinese Nightingale," although sullied by adult overtones, is the best known of this group with its chiming, clanging pigeon Chinese symbols

He lit a joss stick long and black
Then the proud gray joss in the corner stirred
On his wrist appeared a gray small bird,
And this was the song of the gray small
bird
"Where is the princess, loved forever,

Who made Chang first of the kings of men?'

A group of poems on all kinds of mice still delights youngsters when they are reprinted in children's anthologies These little poems are more of a delight than those which Lindsay thought would charm children

On the other hand, his exploitation of sounds always pleases, as in "The Kally ope Yell"

Music of the mob am I,
Circus day's tremendous cry —
I am the Kallyope Kallyope Kallyope!
Hoot toot hoot toot hoot toot hoot toot,
Willy willy willy wah HOO!
Sizz fizz

or the second part of "The Santa Fe Trail'

Listen to the iron horns, rapping rack ing
Listen to the quack horns slack and clacking
Way down the road, trilling like a toad
Here comes the dice horn here comes the vice horn,
Here comes the snarl horn, brawl horn
lewd horn
Followed by the prude horn, bleak and squeaking —
(Some of them from Kansas, some of them from Kansas)

The first echoes calliope dissonances, the latter, the klaxon racket

From his last volume, Every Soul Is a Circus, comes what Lindsay thought was a tribute to P T Barnum, but which was really, as the opening lines reveal, an apology for his own works

My brothers of the poet trade
Leave your ivory towers, and stand
On the porch, and watch this ardent band
And praise, with me,
This Masquerade
From a cloud by the dark Art Institute
That old Barnum comes,
Followed by serene Greek Gods,
And the lake breeze hums

The Art Institute is the place where Lindsay started his career, like Barnum, he ended in the tent Both brought thrilling moments, Barnum his Lind Lindsay his Salvation Army hero leader A note from the poet suggests this poem is to read "with bardic and troubadour chanting," and Lindsay's postlude might well grace his epitaph

So, come, let us be bold with our songs brothers,
Come, let us be bold with our songs

THE POETRY OF LOVELACE

Type of work Poetry

Author Richard Lovelace (1618 1658)

Principal published works Lucasta, 1649 Posthume Poems, 1659

To most readers, Richard Lovelace is remembered for two lines each of two songs He caught for all those spirits who have suffered in prison, who have thought or composed thoughts in gaols the perfect expression of the free will in

Stone Walls doe not a Prison make,
Nor I ron bars a Cage,

and he expressed his own high standards as a gentleman, soldier, scholar, and poet in lines which he wrote when going off to war

I could not love thee (Deare) so much,
Lov'd I not Honour more

A Royalist by birth and politics, the poet lost a modest fortune upholding his own high standards he suffered imprisonment twice, ironically, and his entire life he spent surrounded by war's tragedies He lost his father and a brother in battle, and he and his remaining brothers fought valorously for England (he attained the rank of colonel) His poetry, of limited popularity, was virtuous and modest in extreme and, as critics hasten to point out, the most moral written by the Cavalier poets His most famous series, Lucasta (from lux casta, light of virtue), is his testimonial

No conclusive evidence has yet come to light concerning the Lucasta of Lovelace's first volume, though it is now certain that this idealized figure was not Lucy Sacheverell The woman to whom he addressed most of his early poems may have been a Lucas, however, hence the play on words

Lovelace wrote in the age of the "conceit," that witty and often barbed line popularized by John Donne, but he must always rank in second place in its use His two famous songs written also in an age of words set to music, surpass those of his betters, but on moral grounds "To Althea, from Prison," demonstrates Lovelace's indomitable spirit and "To Lucasta, Going to the Warres," his incorruptible soul Lovelace was an amateur poet, a man of action whose education made of him a man of parts, and he is often compared to Sir Philip Sidney, "A Scholar, Souldier, Lover, and a Saint," as one epitaph verse reads

The diversified poetry within Lucasta indicates that Lovelace followed in that great tradition of the Renaissance gentleman His varied activities and tastes led sometimes to the exercise of a talent thinly spread, to poor taste, but especially to haste—Lovelace's besetting sin His first volume lacked care, proofreading (even at a time of variable spellings, indifferent typography, and fanciful punctuation), not to mention chronological arranging, collating of stanzas, and other matters so necessary to a really professional work One wonders, then, why Lovelace was a favorite poet of an age when better poets went begging for readers As a contemporary and professional said of him, "He writes very well for a gentleman"

Only twenty seven copies of the 1649 Lucasta, available in the seventeenth century for a few pence, are now known to be extant The portrait included makes one wonder at the extravagant praise of Lovelace's looks, but not of his poetry, which is courtly, exuberant, at times pleasingly fanciful, though often amateurish in tone and style. This slender book of some sixty poems is dedicated to Lady Anne Lovelace, wife of his cousin John, though not to be thought of as Lucasta. A group of commendatory poems follows the dedication, by his brothers Francis and Dudley, the latter, ten years later, the compiler of Lovelace's posthumous poems. The most interesting poem in this commendatory group is by the author's friend and fellow poet, Andrew Marvell, who suggests the verses will please the ladies more than the critics, those "Word peckers, Paper rats, Book scorpions."

The poems proper begin with two songs, both dedicated to ideal or Platonic love and both related to going overseas and fighting. Of the sixty, about a third were set to music and may still be found in books of "Ayres." Most of the poems conform to the seventeenth century pattern of odes written on memorable days or for sad occasions, pastorals, sonnets, satires, and elegies. An interesting example of the latter is one of the poet's earliest poems, written when he was twenty and addressed to Princess Katherine "borne, christened, buried in one day." The interesting contrasts of birth and death, swaddling and winding clothes, joy and sorrow, with the overtones of pomp and circumstance befitting her royal innocent lineage make of this poem a study in contrasts.

In addition to these varied types of poems, Lovelace wrote at least one acted play, a comedy called "The Scholars," the prologue and epilogue appearing in his first collection. Another play, "The Soldier," was a tragedy never acted because of the closing of the theaters in 1642. During the period of the Protectorate songs by Lovelace were probably sung in the so called masques, thinly disguised plays produced privately for an aristocratic audience.

Lovelace prepared his second book, Posthume Poems, before his death, though it remained for his brother to bring out the volume. It is dedicated to Sir John Lovelace, an indication this time of his patronage. The first poem, "To Lucasta Her Reserved Looks," epitomizes the gay sad theme so prevalent among the Cavaliers, even at death.

Lucasta frown and let me die,
But smile and see I live,
The sad indifference of your Eye
Both kills, and doth reprieve
You hide our fate within its screen,
We feel our judgment ere we hear
So in one Picture I have seen
An Angel here, the Devil there

The poems in this volume show a mature writer, even a practiced one and the salutary effect of careful editing by Dudley Lovelace assisted by Eldred Revett, makes this edition a more appealing one for the modern reader. Although the volume does not contain as many songs, the same types of poems appear, forty four in all, with a series of translations from Latin and French appended. There is also a group of nature verses on "The Ant," "The Grasshopper," "The Falcon," "The Spider," "The Snail," and others.

Thought by the critics to be devoid of playful talent, Lovelace disputes the charge effectively in the poem "A Black patch on Lucasta's Face," a sonnet in which a bee "Mistook her glorious Face for Paradise," and the plaster placed on the sting serves as "the sweet little Bees large Monument."

It may be significant that Lovelace's longest poems, in the first volume a pastoral titled "Amarantha" and in the second a satire, "On Sanazar's Being Honoured with Six Hundred Ducks by the Clarissimi of Venice," display the courtier as a gallant and then as a cynic. In the later poem Lovelace sees woman as something less than perfect, but so much gentler is this knight than the other Cavalier poets that he would almost fit Chaucer's famous description of knightly grace.

From the sentiments expressed in a group of elegies in which the poet's friends lament his death, the character of Lovelace was exemplary. Such expressions were a literary convention, of course, but so much of what is said rings true of his life that a backward glance reveals in epitome a man of his age. His brother, revealing something of a family talent, wrote the concluding lines to Richard Lovelace's literary epitaph, lines in which the tragedy of premature death—"Snatcht the bright Jewell from the Case"—is softened by bright memory

And now, transform'd, he doth arise
A Constellation in the Skies
Teaching the blinded World the way,
Through Night, to startle into Day
And shipwrackt shades with steady hand
He steers unto th' Elizian Land

THE POETRY OF MALLARMÉ

Type of work Poetry

Author Stéphane Mallarmé (1842-1898)

Principal published works L'Après-midi d'un Faune, 1876 (The Afternoon of a Faun),

Poesies, 1887 Vers et Prose 1893, Poesies completes, 1899

Because of the highly individual qualities of his writing and in spite of his tremendous impact on modern poetry, Stéphane Mallarmé has never been a popular figure known to the general reader. It is difficult, however, to overestimate his importance as an innovator and as an influence on other poets.

Certainly the most striking characteristic of Mallarmé's poems is their obscurity. The reader meets in them a subjective formation of imagery and a warping of the normal patterns of syntax and grammar that has puzzled, at times even infuriated, students of French poetry for more than a century. This obscurity is no accident and it plays an important part in the history of poetry. At the end of the Romantic period of French poetry (which paralleled that of English poetry), the figure of Charles Baudelaire loomed large, with his theory and practice of correspondances between things concrete and things human and emotional.

Of the followers of Baudelaire, Mallarmé assuredly holds first place as the leading exponent of the Symbolist school. It might be said that to understand Mallarmé, in itself a difficult task, is to understand Symbolism. Rimbaud and Verlaine are not so profound, although their personal lives reflected the rebellion that is often thought an important part of the movement. Mallarmé was a rebel only in his verse; outwardly he led a quiet, decorous life at home and in the classroom.

In a sense, Symbolism is to the regular run of poetry what Surrealism is to representational painting and there seems little doubt that the early Impressionists in painting may well have had some of Mallarmé's theories in mind even if only subconsciously. To Mallarmé, a symbol represented a feeling or sensation that cannot be logically explained or clearly expressed. Often, for him, the symbol was a very personal abstraction that remained unexplained even in the poem which it inspired.

This concept of the use of symbols was defended persistently by Mallarmé, who, like Baudelaire, was a poète critique. Unfortunately, many of Mallarmé's critical dicta are as abstruse as his verse. Difficult as the reading of this verse is, however, the concept and the examples of it in the work are intriguing, and those who have been willing to put forth the great amount of effort needed usually declare themselves highly rewarded by their grasp of these poems. For the person who reads only English, or to whom

French is a less familiar second language, the difficulty is compounded. Perhaps more so than for any other poet, the English speaking reader is dependent upon the translator for his interpretation of one of Mallarmé's poems, such a reader will surely be perplexed to observe the important differences in translations of the same poem by different scholars.

In spite of these difficulties there is about Mallarmé's verses a strange, haunting beauty that has captured the fancy of many great minds, from Gide's to Joyce's and T. S. Eliot's. Eliot suggests an important fact that must be known in order to understand Mallarmé's poetry. The poems of Eliot are also difficult for the general reader to understand, but usually for a different reason from Mallarmé's obscurity. Whereas Eliot relies frequently on little known allusions to convey his poetic meaning, Mallarmé used a very personal poetic diction and a chain of thought that puzzles the reader.

Like Browning, Mallarmé thought that poetry need not be simple and direct and that the reader should be willing to exert himself to discover the poet's meaning. For Mallarmé, however, the word "meaning" must be thought of in a very broad sense, for to say that his poems have "a meaning" may not be quite accurate. Often, all that Mallarmé wished to convey was a state of mind or an emotional mood, and certainly no poet ever worked harder at perfecting a poetic style designed for this purpose.

The basis of Mallarmé's poetic credo is fundamental, coming close to the essential nature of reality itself. To him the reality of an object was not in the object, or even in the poet's mind as he observes the object. True reality, he believed, lies in the poet's observation, his perception of the object, thus the poet must express the impression that he finds in a sort of reverie inspired by contemplation of the object within a twilight zone of awareness. Simply to describe the object is far from the poet's intention. Often the object will be transformed during a poem into one of its qualities, that one which strikes the poet as the true reality. In a well known short poem, "Brise Marine" ("Sea Breeze"), the sheet of blank paper under the lamp has whiteness as its salient quality, a whiteness that protects the paper and which symbolizes the poetic sterility of the poet.

This obsession with sterility—and Mallarmé's poetic thinking was virtually a series of obsessions—which possessed the poet for a long time in his youth, represents another part of his basic outlook. The poet must find first of all the spirit of nothingness ("le Neant") that pervades and underlies the visible universe. Then the poet must re-create the universe from his own mind. In this framework of thought, Mallarmé concentrated on the movement of his mind, not on the data it possessed.

With such a theory of poetry in his mind, it was easy for the poet to use the "black rock" in the opening line of "Tombeau" ("Tomb"), a very difficult poem written at the grave of Verlaine, to symbolize a black cloud, and the cloud to represent the cloud of somber religious ideas and the notions of sin which shade the earth. This symbolism appears to the penetrating reader, however, only after long consideration of the opening stanza of the poem.

As Mallarmé lost his fear of poetic sterility and began to achieve in his mind the grasp of the spiritual nothingness that was to him a prerequisite to worthy creativity, his verse became more and more obscure, so that his later work remains a mystery to almost all readers, even to some of the most diligent poets and scholars. Throughout his work, however, run more or less regular currents of thought, or obsessions. His preoccupation with absence, silence, and death is part of his central poetic philosophy, as his interest in music reflects his conviction that music and poetry are much akin in their expression of truth. L'Après-midi d'un Faune demonstrates and expresses this conviction, the poem, appropriately, was the inspiration for Debussy's famous tone poem

Side by side in Mallarmé's work the reader finds two other, very dissimilar "obsessions" religious belief—essentially a tragic subject for Mallarmé, as in "Toast Funebre" ('A Funeral Toast')—and an erotic preoccupation with nudity which is found in L'Après midi d'un Faune and in many other poems

Mallarmé's later poems evidence not only the profound convolutions of his very personal poetic thinking but also some experimentation with the form of the poem on the printed page One of his last works, "Un Coup de Des Jamais N'Abolira Le Hasard" ("A Throw of the Dice Will Never Abolish Chance"), will remind an American reader of the interesting arrangements of the poems of E E Cummings In this poem as in his other work, Mallarmé had the same over all purpose to express, not clearly but none the less accurately, an impression of reality

It may be said in Mallarmé's favor that he was, in his way, one of the most sincere of all poets He was, in fact, so critical of his work and so demanding in his standards that his total poetic output can be contained in one regular sized volume Further, Mallarmé's verses have a fluidity about them that the reader at first senses only vaguely As the poet was preoccupied with the movement of his mind, so the lines of his poems achieve a kind of movement words flow into words, meanings blend and change, images fade and reappear with new evocations of significance

Although the Symbolist movement as such can be said to have died with an immediate follower of Mallarmé, Paul Valéry, its influence, particularly in the English speaking world, is still strong to day The modern poet, trying to impose the discipline of order on his fragmented world, works partly in the shadow of this French writer wholeheartedly devoted to a poetic ideal

THE POETRY OF MARVELL

Type of work Poetry

Author Andrew Marvell (1621-1678)

Principal published works Miscellaneous Poems, 1681, Poems on Affairs of State, 1689, An Horatian Ode upon Cromwell's Return from Ireland, 1776

Andrew Marvell, influenced by the work of Ben Jonson and John Donne was the last major poet with their qualities and habits of mind All his great poems are metaphysical, that is, they present feeling intellectually and synthesize thought and passion Marvell is always aware of the multiplicity and the unity of the universe and the tension he maintains between them constitutes the peculiar poise and balance of his verse This metaphysical reconciliation of seeming opposites appears in the imagery of the poems, which with characteristic hyperbole combine many areas of ideas and experience

"An Horatian Ode upon Cromwell's Return from Ireland," generally acknowl edged to be the finest poem of its kind in the language, exemplifies both his political feeling and the balance of thought in his verse It is probably the last English poem in which the divine right of kings and a totally different type of rule could be presented simultaneously Marvell celebrates Cromwell's phenomenal rise to power "from his private gardens' to cast the Kingdoms old

Into another mould

The king's weakness rendered him helpless against the strength of Cromwell, and Marvell records the nobility of Charles I, who "adorned" the "tragic

Scaffold" The transition from the account of the king's death to the time of Cromwell's rule are terse and effective

This was that memorable hour
Which first assured the forc'd Power

Although he praises the efficiency and energy of Cromwell and acknowledges that he gave the government of the country to Parliament, Marvell sees also the necessity to continue fighting (after Ireland, Scotland remains to be subdued), and he concludes with a muted warning

The same Arts that did gain
A Pow'r, must it maintain

The equipoise of the "Ode" is maintained through its combination of praise, reticence, and admonition the recognition of the justice of Cromwell and of the tradition of kingship Desire for the good of his country outweighs the poet's feelings about specific acts He both disliked the execution of the king and declared that Cromwell's ability would be beneficial to England This sustained tension between forces gives the "Ode" its power

Marvell's reputation rests on a very few poems Some of the loveliest of these are the poems in which he employs nature images One of his outstanding characteristics is his use of a simple theme to develop a deeply serious idea Wit and brilliant imagery enhance the seriousness of his thought, so that an apparently slight subject will thus carry religious and philosophic implications and express the complex sensibility which is so much a part of the metaphysical poetic tradition In "The Bermudas," Marvell celebrates the joyous exile of a group of non-conformists who left England in the days of Anglican Bishop Laud Those islands, "far kinder than our own," sheltered and welcomed them and they were able freely to practice their religion The poem glows with joy and pleasure at God's grace manifested in the tropical luxuriance of the exiles' environment

He hangs in shades the Orange bright,
Like golden Lamps in a green Night

These images parallel their spiritual freedom

Religious significance is implicit in "The Nymph Complaining for the Death of her Faun" The huntsmen cannot cleanse themselves of guilt, even though the nymph forgives them, the faun's whiteness and purity are matchless The tone of gentle grief is perfectly maintained, however, and the precision of the images exactly conveys heartfelt emotion

So weeps the wounded Balsome so
The holy Frankincense doth flow
The brotherless Heliades
Melt in such Amber Tears as these

The most complex of the poems that draw their imagery from nature is "The Garden" Here Marvell's wit and resilience of mind are almost dazzlingly apparent Coleridge has described the poetic imagination as a "more than usual state of emotion with a more than usual order" This statement could well describe the impact of "The Garden" The pleasure of recognition symbolized by "the palm, the oak bays," with reference to the slight shade these individual leaves cast, is contrasted with the shade given by flowers and trees Quiet and innocence are not to be found among men

Society is all but rude
To this delicious solitude

No lovely woman is "As am'rous as this lovely green" The tree on which a mistress' name is carved is far more beautiful than she The hyperbole of these assertions contains its own irony, the passionate insistence with which they are made obliquely denies some of their validity The fourth stanza describes classical lovers who confirm the thesis that the garden contains all delights

Apollo hunted Daphne so
Only that she might Laurel grow

In the sensual delights of the garden, sexual pleasure is no longer sublimated but is provided by the fruit itself

The nectarine, and curious Peach,
Into my hands themselves do reach

Along with this sexual identification, the image of Eden and the fall of man is present in the image of "ripe apples" and the line, "Insuar'd with flowers, I fall on grass"

The sixth verse contains the climax of the poem. Here the tension and poise are most marked. The sensual pleasure has led to intellectual joy, and "the Mind, from pleasure less / Withdraws into its happiness." In the mind are images of all material things and from these it creates transcendent worlds of its own until the quintessence of nature is perceived.

Annihilating all that's made
To a green Thought in a green Shade

The remaining three stanzas are more relaxed, yet they carry the weight of, and are reinforced by, the previous argument. The poet's soul glides into the trees where "like a Bird, it sits and sings." It will stay there until it is ready to ascend. Meanwhile, it "Waves in its Plumes the various Light." Eden, the poet says, was like this, but the joy of solitude was "beyond a Mortal's share."

Two paradises t'were in one
To dwell in Paradise alone

The last stanza returns to a man made garden, where a sundial of herbs and flowers measures the "sweet and wholesome hours." The "skilled Gard'ner" is, of course, God as well as a human craftsman.

The levels of thought and feeling in this complex poem are so carefully wrought together that they could not exist alone. The ideas complement, balance, and reveal one another. The withdrawal of the mind to contemplation of paradise and its wry conclusion that such solitude is impossible are inextricable if their full force is to be appreciated. From the original conceit that all ambition can be satisfied by the delights of a garden, the themes are, through the allusive imagery, totally interdependent.

Marvell's two great love poems, "The Definition of Love" and "To his Coy Mistress," are passionate and urbane, in tense and witty, violent and civilized. The reconciliation of opposites is the theme of the definition; it is the metaphysical proposition that in perfect love separation is essential. The validity of this proposition relies on the jealousy of fate. The poet's love was "begotten by despair / Upon impossibility." The decrees of Fate

Us as the distant Poles have plac'd, (Though love's whole world on us doth wheel)
Not by themselves to be embraced

The conceit, that heaven would have to fall

And, us to join, the world should all
Be cramp'd into a Planisphere

before the lovers could be together, emphasizes the inevitability of separation.

Therefore the love which doth us bind,
But fate so enviously debars,
Is the conjunction of the mind,
And opposition of the stars

The punning conceit in these lines exemplifies the wit and logic of Marvell's verse.

The crowd of images, change of mood, and development of emotional tension combined with a subtle variation of rhythm and pace render "To His Coy Mistress" Marvell's greatest poetical achievement. His theme is the traditional one of "Gather Ye Rosebuds." The opening theme is that if there were time enough the lover would woo endlessly.

My vegetable love should grow
Vaster than Empires and more slow

An urbane note is sounded in the lines

For, lady, you deserve this state,
Nor would I love at lower rate

Then comes the surprising reversal

But at my back I always hear
 Times winged chariot hurrying near,
 And yonder all before us lie
 Deserts of vast eternity

The lines ring with passionate desperation and the awful vision of the unknown. The next image is one of destruction in the grave, where the lady's beauty shall no longer exist and honor and lust alike will turn to dust and ashes. From this vision of death the poet turns to an evocation of the lady's present beauty. He adapts the theory that souls shine through the flesh of people of exceptional purity to a reason for consummating their love.

And while thy willing Soul transpires
 At every pore with instant fires,
 Now let us sport us while we may

The ardor of the saint has become the heat of physical passion. The conceit of conquering time is developed in images of strength—they will “devour”—time, and will combine their powers “into one Ball” to force their pleasures “Through the iron gates of life”

Thus, though we cannot make our sun
 Stand still, yet we will make him run

The power of this love is conveyed in the witty and determined assault on unconquerable time.

These poems, with the addition of the “Dialogue between The Resolved Soul and Created Pleasure” and “Clorinda and Damon,” are those on which Marvell's reputation depends. His poetic ability was seemingly lost after the Restoration, and he wrote, in verse, only political satires. The flowering of his sensibility prior to this period is an outstanding example of that fusion of wit, passion, and intellect which had its roots in Latin culture and its last complete expression in the poetry of Andrew Marvell.

THE POETRY OF RONSARD

Type of work Poetry

Author Pierre de Ronsard (1524-1585)

Principal published works Odes, Books I-IV, 1550, Book V, 1552 Amours de Cassandre 1552, Hymns 1555 Elegies, mascarades et bergeries, 1565, La Franciade, 1572

Pierre de Ronsard was in his own time, and to a less degree in later times as well, the “prince of poets.” This was not merely an impression generally held. It was Ronsard's own conviction, and he did not hesitate to admonish a coy mistress by reminding her that her kindness to him was as nothing to his generosity in fixing her name in the midst of immortal lines. But the arrogance can, though infrequently, coincide with just estimate. Ronsard, the kings of France whom he served, and those enemies, Mary Stuart and Elizabeth of England, were at one in their estimate of his verses.

Some poets speak at variance with the conditions of their lives and their own time. Ronsard, however final and universal his accent, always speaks to us of his own era and the circumstances of his life. Great and moving as his poems are, they speak of Renaissance spirit as well as of humanity pure and simple.

The Renaissance, in France as elsewhere, was a time when several tendencies, not necessarily compatible, merged with each other. It was a time when nationalism was taking the place of the feudal loyalties that had once held society loosely together. At the center of Ronsard's political consciousness are the king and his court. From the king flow the favors, including ecclesiastical benefices, which allow a poet to live, and the king's court, the nobility that dine, talk, and dance there day after day, constitutes the audience for whom the poet writes. Ronsard addressed not a general public but a particular one in that it was small and self-conscious in its tastes. It expected a poet to be learned as well as moving, and it accepted and understood references to events known only to the privileged

Related to this rarefied centrality is the growing patriotism that led Ronsard's friend Du Bellay, also a member of the literary group called the Pleiade to which Ronsard belonged, to write La defense et illustration de la langue Française (1549), in which the tendency of the learned to write Latin verse is censured and, perhaps inconsistently, the importance of classical studies to any French writing poet is underlined. The result was that Ronsard's use of his mother tongue reflected literary conventions as old as Homer, Sappho, Theocritus, and Horace. Nymphs haunt Ronsard's home forest of Gastine, local fountains, like that of Balmerie, have all the grace and romantic significance of the ancient Arethusa and the real charms of Ronsard's various mistresses—Cassandre, Marie, Astrée, Hélène—receive additions from what Catullus, many centuries before, wrote about his Lesbians.

Like numerous other Renaissance persons, Ronsard was a full-blooded man as well as a literary person. He did not, for example, escape the serious political turmoil of the century which divided Catholic France against Protestant France and, of course, one part of the court against another. Though he could mingle Christian and Greek views of deity in the same poem, Ronsard died enjoying the full rites of the Church, and he earlier lived perceptive of the superior advantages, to a cultured man, of the rich traditions of the Catholic Church as opposed to the stern moralism, the "Hebraism" of many of the "sectaries." Because of his adherence to the Catholic faith, Protestant writers attacked the poet, not for his advocacy of pleasant and amorous pursuit alone, but for darker sins which had once been a part of the pagan world.

The pattern of Ronsard's personal career but intensifies the lines drawn in his world. He was wellborn and demandingly educated, he served at court, he went twice to Scotland and once to England and Germany. Suffering from early deafness, he subsided into the role of court poet, he received the tonsure in order to enjoy ecclesiastical benefices, and the rest of his long life was an alternation between the court and his three country estates. His background provided Ronsard with two of his main themes: the peril and hypocrisy of courts and the charm and natural beauty of a life that is rural and retired. (This contention between city and country finds reflection in the essays of Ronsard's great contemporary, Montaigne.) A poem like "Institution pour l'Adolescence du Roy très-crestien Charles IX^e de ce Nom" is a stern, moving record of Ronsard's estimates of the moral perils that threaten a king, and "A la Forest de Gastine" is an account of Ronsard's country pleasures which mingles classical memories with vivid recollections of the real forest, greensward, and flowers.

Testimony to a rich, energetic life that was both patriotic and passionate echoes through Ronsard's poetry, friendship and piety, playful wit and sober reflection mingle in such collections as Odes, Hymns, Bocage Royale, and Elegies. His one real poetic disaster is the Françade, an epic written at royal command, beginning with the tale of Troy and ending with the history of the Merovingian kings of early France.

No summary of Ronsard's poetic creation can omit the many sonnets which he wrote to his mistresses—some kind, some cruel. Here, too, recollections of Petrarch's Laura shape the diction of many a passionate declaration. But Ronsard, unlike many Elizabethan sonneteers in the last decades of the century, was always in pursuit of a flesh and blood woman rather than the "Idea" of Drayton. Passion was the occasion for extended poetic exercises, but the exercises were never, with Ronsard, an adequate substitute for passion gratified. Two of his mistresses, one early, one late, were cruel—Cassandre Salviati, who disappointed the young Ronsard by marrying, and Hélène de Surgères, who during several years never submitted to Ronsard's passion, dressed in black, and was painfully faithful to the shade of a dead sweetheart and the rites of amorous Platonism. It is to these two women rather than to more indulgent mistresses that his greatest sonnets are addressed. In one Ronsard declares to his servant that he wishes to shut himself up and read the Iliad of Homer in three days, unless a message comes from Cassandre. In another the name Hélène suggests to aging Ronsard some moving parallels with Homer's heroine, he adds, hopefully, that he believes his Helene may also turn out to be a Penelope, a comfort as well as a torment. Or, anticipating Shakespearean accents ("Shall I compare thee to a summer's day?") Ronsard writes of Hélène's chill perfection "Shall I compare your beauties to the moon?"

Ronsard's abundance, his revival of certain parts of the medieval French vocabulary, his personal note—all these were censured by Malherbe, the taste maker of the next century. Ronsard was also too direct for the oversubtle pre cieuses, the finicking, "learned" women of the Hôtel de Rambouillet. These seventeenth century women, ironically, had a good deal in common with Ronsard's Hélène. But an eclipse of several centuries is now over, and Ronsard's poetic fame has now revived.

THE POETRY OF SPENDER

Type of work Poetry

Author Stephen Spender (1909)

Principal published works Nine Entertainments, 1928 Twenty Poems 1930, Poems, 1933, Poems, 1934 Vienna, 1935 The Still Centre, 1939 Ruins and Visions, 1942, Poems of Dedication, 1947 Returning to Vienna, 1947, The Edge of Being 1949 Collected Poems, 1928 1953, 1955

Stephen Spender explains in a brief introduction to his Collected Poems that the volume does not contain his entire poetic output over a period of twenty five years, but rather a selection of those poems which he wished to gather together from earlier volumes with an aim "to retrieve as many past mistakes, and to make as many improvements, as possible, without 'cheating'." He admits that he has altered a few readings here and there in the interest of clarity or aesthetics, but adds that he has retained, in the interest of honesty and truth, certain passages in which he now recognizes youthful imperfections and a few poems which reflect views he no longer holds. As printed, the poems have been grouped to represent roughly his development as a poet, as well as his interest in contemporary history—chiefly the Spanish Civil War and World War II—and in such eternal themes as love and separation. He views his book as "a weeded, though not a tidied up or altered garden."

The volume gives an opportunity for a studied reappraisal of one of a group of English poets who first achieved fame between the two world wars. The members of the Oxford Group, as they have sometimes been called, included W. H. Auden, Christopher Isherwood, Cecil Day Lewis, and Louis MacNeice. Spender dedicates three of his groups of poems to the first three of these poets. Though Spender has written elsewhere of the "teacher to pupil" relationship between Auden and himself at Oxford, his later development as a poet has been largely an independent one.

This is not to say, however, that he has followed poetic paths never traveled

THE POETRY OF STEPHEN SPENDER Excerpts reprinted from COLLECTED POEMS 1928-1953 by permission of the publishers Random House Inc. Copyright 1934 by The Modern Library Inc. Copyright 1930 1942 1947 1949 1952 1955 by Stephen Spender

before Some of his critics have compared him to Shelley, for the young Spender was also a rebel against the society of his time, and in both poets criticism of their own eras is combined with a vision of a future better time Both saw themselves somewhat as prophets of their respective ages Shelley addressed the West Wind

Be through my lips to unawakened
earth

The trumpet of a prophecy! O Wind
If Winter comes, can Spring be far behind?

More than a century later Spender exhorted, in "Exiles from Their Land, History Their Domicile"

Speak with your tongues,
O angels, fire your guns

And let my words appear
A heaven printed world!

Though some similarities of attitude and theme are to be found in poems of Shelley and Spender, their poetic techniques are as different as the times in which they lived Spender is as romantically emotional as Shelley he believes in the unmistakable love of man for his fellow man, he often opposes the darkness of man's life with the bright sun which brings light and warmth into it But Spender's poems echo twentieth-century phrasing, though some lines might be described as Shelleyan, as in the beautiful lyric which begins, "I think continually of those who were truly great"

At times Spender reminds one of T. S. Eliot (and Auden too), as in "The Uncreating Chaos"

Shall I never reach
The fields guarded by stones
Rare in the stone mountains
Where the scytheless wind
Flushes the swayed grasses

Spender himself has said, however, that he was more influenced by Wilfred Owen than by Eliot Like Owen, Spender often employs subtle combinations of sound effects, as in the lines quoted above "Where the scytheless wind/Flushes the swayed grasses" Owen's poetry was principally inspired by World War I, which brought early death to the poet whose pity had been stirred by the suffering and dying which he had witnessed Spender seems to have been influenced not only by Owen's bitterness against the bloody injustices of the world, but also by what he himself had learned of war during his months in Spain and later in the Battle of Britain and even more directly, perhaps, by the content of certain of Owen's war poems Compare, for example, Spender's "Two Armies," which describes enemy forces resting at night only a few yards apart,

When the machines are stilled a common suffering Whitens the air with breath and makes both one
As though these enemies slept in each other's arms,

with Owen's "Strange Meeting," an unfinished poem in which a soldier dreams he meets in Hell the enemy whom he killed and discovers in that "strange friend" the same hope and pity and compassion that was in his own heart

In a critical essay on Auden which Spender published several years ago in the Atlantic Monthly (July, 1953), he pointed out that the essential direction of Auden's poetry has been toward a definition of Love The reader of the Collected Poems discovers that, like his slightly older friend and mentor, Spender has written a series of variations on the same theme In the early poems the love seems often like Whitman's "manly love of comrades," even to the point of suggesting Whitmanesque ambiguities, as in the poem which begins "How strangely this sun reminds me of my love" or another which addresses directly an unnamed "Abrupt and charming mover" One is reminded of Whitman again in the horta

tory "Oh young men, oh young comrades," in which the theme of loving comradeship is combined with the call to desert the dusty past, to leave the "great houses where the ghosts are prisoned," and to make a new and better world

Oh comrades, step beautifully from the solid wall advance to rebuild and sleep with friend on hill
advance to rebel and remember what you have no ghost ever had, immured in his hall

In other lyrics, as in the lovely sonnet "Daybreak," which describes a couple waking at dawn, first the man, then the woman, one finds both tenderness and the passionate intensity that suffuses so much of the poetry of D H Lawrence. But the mixture of desire and revulsion which unpleasantly mars so many of Lawrence's love poems is not in Spender. In Lawrence's "Lightning," for example, a lightning flash reveals to a lover the fear in the face of the woman he is preparing to kiss, and his passion is followed by hatred of both the woman and himself. Contrast with this Spender's "Ice," in which a woman comes "in from the snowing air" and is greeted by a kiss

Then my lips ran to her with fire
From the chimney corner of the room,
Where I had waited in my chair
I kissed their heat against her skin
And watched the red make the white bloom

The love of man and woman shows no hectic flush in Spender, the colors are those of radiant health

Another aspect of love is revealed in Spender's numerous poems about children. Several are about his daughter, but the group titled "Elegy for Margaret" are to or about the niece who died after a long, wasting illness on Christmas Day, 1945. Here, though there are morbid lines which describe the progress of the disease, the whole elegy is filled with pity and sorrow for both the child and her parents and the final poem, in which he attempts to console his "Dearest and nearest brother," is as moving as any thing that Spender has written

Many of the poems for which Spender is best known were published in his widely reviewed Poems (1933). In the Collected Poems these are reprinted in a group under the title "Preludes." Here one finds such familiar poems as "The Express" and "The Landscape near an Aerodrome," both of which illustrate Spender's early interest in enlarging the language of modern poetry through the use of terms drawn from science, machinery, and industry. The first opens

After the first powerful, plain manifesto
The black statement of pistons with out more fuss
But gliding like a queen, she leaves the station

The blending of the names of mechanical objects with language more usual in poetry is so skillfully achieved that the train becomes a mighty poem in motion. "The Express" is perhaps the finest train poem since Walt Whitman's portrait of a very different train in "To a Locomotive in Winter."

"The Landscape near an Aerodrome" contains poetic beauty like that in "The Express," but it is weakened by the attempt to combine arresting description with social commentary. The poem begins with the picture of a gliding air liner and then contrasts the quiet descent of the great machine with the scenes of squalor and misery which become clearer to the passengers as they approach the aerodrome. It ends with a sudden, trenchant last line that not only surprises the reader but seems totally uncalled for by the preceding descriptive lines

Then, as they land, they hear the toll
ing bell
Reaching across the landscape of hysteria,
To where, louder than all those bat
tenes

And charcoaled towers against the dying
sky,
Religion stands, the Church blocking
the sun

Several of the "Preludes" and two or three poems in the next group, "A Heaven Printed World," belong to the literature of protest of the 1930's and reflect Spender's leftwing politics which he later forswore. These poems, as Spender has said, "did not please the politicians." Notable are "The Funeral," "The Pylons," and "An Elementary School Classroom in a Slum." The last is full of the pity which is deep in Spender's poems, political or otherwise.

The introspective poems in the group called "Explorations" are as a whole less impressive than those in the other groups. Rather hazy and inchoate, these "explorations" when compared with Spender's other poems, lead one to conclude that he is a sensitive but not a cerebral poet.

It has been said that Spender is a humorless poet. He does usually take himself seriously, often too much so, but the gracefully witty conceit in one of his later poems called "Word" refutes the charge against him.

The word bites like a fish
Shall I throw it back free
Arrowing to that sea
Where thoughts lash tail and fin?
Or shall I pull it in
To rhyme upon a dish?

THE POETRY OF STEFAN GEORGE

Type of work Poetry

Author Stefan George (1868-1933)

Principal published works Hymnen, 1890 (Hymns), Pilgerfahrten, 1891 (Pilgrimages), Algabal, 1892 (Heliogabalus), Die Bucher der Hirten und Preisgedichte der Sagen und Sange, und der hangenden Garten, 1895 (The Book of Eclogues and Eulogies, Legends and Lays, and The Hanging Gardens), Das Jahr der Seele, 1897 (The Year of the Soul), Der Teppich des Lebens und die Lieder von Traum und Tod, 1899 (The Tapestry of Life and Songs of Dream and of Death), Maximin, 1906, Der siebente Ring, 1907 (The Seventh Ring), Der Stern des Bundes, 1914 (Star of the Covenant), Das Neue Reich, 1928 (Kingdom Come).

Stefan George was probably the strongest defender of the "art for art's sake" thesis ever to appear in Germany, and his exclusiveness led him to write his first poems in an invented language, a "lingua romana" similar to Spanish. For many years he printed his books privately and not before 1899 were they offered to the public. He disregarded the German rule of grammar which calls for capitalization of all nouns, the resulting loss in reading speed was a most desired effect for the author because he wanted his readers to note that words in themselves were artistic instruments which would evoke as many—or more—emotions as the colors of a painter's palette.

In 1890 George published his first series of poems, Hymns. The title of the first poem, "Initiation," indicates how conscious he was of his radical literary departure and of its limited appeal to an audience used to continuous outpour of modern naturalism. Nevertheless the signal was given.

The river calls! Defiant reeds unfurl
Their slender banners to the languid breeze
And check the coaxing ripples as they swirl
To mossy shores in tender galaxies

The theme is repeated in "Invitation"

"Let us leave pavements and grime!"
How dear your offer sounded!
Far, where more light and elate

THE POETRY OF STEFAN GEORGE. Excerpts reprinted from THE WORKS OF STEFAN GEORGE by permission of the publishers. The University of North Carolina Press. Translated by Olga Marx and Ernst Morwitz. Copyright 1949 by The University of North Carolina Press.

Thought and breath seem to chime,
We shall enjoy the flower
And resurrection fete'

Not expecting the applause of many—the poems were still published privately—the author treasured his small circle of friends. Most of his works carry dedications, that of his next work, Pilgrimages, was written for the Austrian poet, Hugo von Hofmannsthal (the friendship never matured)

Then I journeyed forth
And became a stranger,
And I sought for some one
To share my mournfulness,
And there was no one

Hymns and Pilgrimages reveal the conflict between the author's poetic ideals and the baseness of everyday life. He used for his next work earlier historical periods and the Orient as times and places for escape from the unpleasant realities of the present. Thus Algabal, written in Paris in 1892, is his own interpretation of a Roman emperor who moves in a world of time removed serenity and passionate feelings

The hall of yellow glitter and of sun!
On level dome among the stairs it reigns,
And from the fiery crater flashes run
Topazes interfused with amber grains

His sense of remoteness, however, never excluded his knowledge of the "mystical body of Christ" inherited from his Catholic childhood in a small town in the German Rhineland

For I, the one, comprise the multitude

The Book of Eclogues and Eulogies, Legends and Lays and The Hanging Gardens indicates a turn toward tranquility, the wanderer once in desperate search for beauty finds it in his own back yard

Struck with amazement, as though we were entering a region
Frost bound when last we had seen it,
yet now full of flowers,

We, who felt old and sorrowful, gazed at each other,
And our reflections were fused in the river below us

Thus the world of knighthood described in The Book of Legends and Lays contains much of this recognition of beauty around him

What a morning, what a day!
Breath of sun on brook and tree
Tunes your ear more swiftly to Melting promise melting plea
Which I shyly hid away

The Year of the Soul, probably George's best known book, indicates that the author no longer needed to search for remote backgrounds: an old park is sufficient for the description of images symbolizing the principles of nature and love. Beginning with autumn, the seasons of the year are portrayed, with the exception of the much used and abused season of spring. The poet invites an unseen friend

Come to the park they say is dead, and
 you
Will see the glint of smiling shores beyond,
Pure clouds with rifts of unexpected blue
Diffuse a light on patterned path and pond

In The Year of the Soul the lonely prophet speaks again

The word of seers is not for common sharing

In 1900 George published The Tapes of Life and Songs of Dream and of Death. Each part contains twenty-four poems. In the prelude he recollects his struggles up to the present

When pale with zeal, I searched for hidden store

and almost regrets that his stormy period has ended

Gave me the solemn breath that never failed,

Give me the fire again that makes us
young,
On which the wings of childhood rose among
The fumes our earliest offerings ex-haled

The Tapestry of Life, a poet's picture book, gave the author ample opportunity to employ his impressionistic power of words

When days are done with memory laden shadows
In half forgotten beauty's faded frame,
Waves of white lambs draw slowly
through the meadows
From the broad clearing to the darkened stream

It is not surprising that the author became also well known for his translations of Mallarmé, Baudelaire, and Rimbaud
Songs of Dream and of Death is dedicated to persons or occasions in the poet's life, the sequence ends with a forceful description of everlasting conflict

All this whirls, tears and pounds, flames
and flies,
Until late in the night vaulted skies
They are joined to a bright jewelled beam
Fame and glow, pain and bliss, death
and dream

When George published *The Seventh
Ring* in 1907, a decisive factor had entered his life. The partial fulfillment of his poetic vision was his encounter with a young man whom he called Maximin.
To George, this youth was the embodiment of a dream and temporarily—Maxi-min died very young—an end to loneliness. The poet described the appearance of Maximin "softened by the mobility and vague sadness that centuries of Christian civilization have wrought in the faces of the people youth in that unbroken fulness and purity that can still move mountains." When Maximin died George considered his death in the light of his mystical evaluation of the youth. He regrets his loss.

The forest shivers
In vain it clothed itself in leaves of spring
The field your foot made consecrate is numb
And cold without the sun you bring
The fragile blades on hilly pastures quiver
For now you never come

His death was almost a religious event

You also were elect so do not mourn
For all the days which unfulfilment sheathed
Praise to your city where a god was born,
Praise to your time in which a god has breathed!

George's next work, Star of the Covenant, a book of a thousand verses again deals in its "Introit" with the significance of Maximin. Some of the poems are not rhymed, but a strong rhythmic flow is present at all times.

You took away the pain of inner schism,
You, who were fusion made incarnate,
bringing
The two extremes together light and frenzy!

The poet pleads again for a spiritual life and complains that Germans do not listen to their prophets, as in the case of Nietzsche, who, according to George, delivered his message.

With such insistence that his throat was cracked
And you? The shrewd or dull, the false or true,
You acted as if nothing had occurred

The book ends with a chorus expressing a firm reminder that the power to lead a spiritual life is available to man.

God has locked us in filiation,
God has swept us with his blaze,
God has lit us with elation,
God has steeped us in his grace

In 1928 George published his last volume, Kingdom Come. In this collection

he remembered once again the rich literary inheritance of Goethe and Holderlin. The book also contains a poetic prophecy about war, written during World War I, which seems to anticipate the horrors of future world wars.

You shall not cheer No rise will mark
the end
But only downfalls, many and inglorious
Monsters of lead and iron tubes and rods
Escape their maker's hand and rage unruly

In "Secret Germany," George abhors again the present regime and asks for sincere understanding of the values which will remain part of the true German tradition.

Only what consecrate earth
Cradles in sheltering sleep
Long in the innermost grooves,
Far from acquisitive hands
Marvels this day cannot grasp
Are rife with the fate of tomorrow

Until his death in 1933 George abstained for unknown reasons from writing any more poetry.

George appealed to few, but his admirers recognized in him the high priest of German literature, a writer who appeared at a time when the ideals of Goethe were still venerated, but when poetic expression was already in danger of being suffocated by excessive romanticism and sentimentality. Under the leadership of the author a "George Circle" was founded and the idea of transforming life to mystical heights by way of art and not by scientific positivism was promoted by its members, who adhered to strict moral principles. George made the German language an instrument of art and as a poet he was best qualified to carry Germany's classical tradition into the twentieth century. After refusing to become identified with Hitlerian Germany's literary trends, George died in self-imposed exile in Switzerland in 1933. His inventiveness with the German language makes all translation efforts a most difficult undertaking, but The Works of Stefan George (1949), translated by Olga Marx and Ernst Moritz, succeeds in conveying much of George's intensity of feeling into English.

THE POETRY OF THEOCRITUS

Type of work Poetry

Author Theocritus (305? c. 250 B.C.)

Principal published works The Bucolics, the Epics

Theocritus is the originator of pastoral poetry, that form which displays to us the labors, the songs and loves, and the sufferings of more or less simple shepherd herds. In Western literature it is a poetic tradition that is as deathless as it is—or has become—conventional. When Marie Antoinette and her court played at the simple life in the village near Le Petit Trianon, they were reviving modes of sensibility to which the Hellenistic poet first gave expression. Indeed, it would be possible to say that no society can produce pastoral poetry until it has become keenly aware that it is non-pastoral in actuality, old and sophisticated and worldly.

Although Theocritus composed forms of poetry that fit other classifications, he is best remembered for his idealization in verse of the simple, rustic life of the Sicilian shepherds. In his idylls he tells us of herdsmen and their loves, he writes of country singing contests on a mountain hillside, for which the prize is a new set of pipes; he surrounds the occasions his poems celebrate with pastoral grace and occasional rural crudity. Among the best of his pastoral poems is the elegy Thyrsis, a lament for Daphnis, traditional hero of shepherds

It is highly likely that Theocritus' audiences included very few real country people. The bare facts of his life suggest that his ambition led him to courts and not to the country hillsides or gatherings of his verse. He was probably born in Syracuse in Sicily, and some of his poems were written in Alexandria, at the Egyptian court of Ptolemy Philadelphus, but some poems of praise to this ruler as well as to Hiero II of Syracuse suggest that Theocritus knew how to finger courtly instruments as well as oaten pipes. His tales of shepherds—their bucolic existence, simple fare, unsophisticated hopes in love, and rude sports and games—were never destined for country ears at all. Rather might a ruler like Ptolemy Philadelphus, after he had had his considerable fill of praise from the poet, command a song about Daphnis or Theagenus, drawn from Theocritus' recollections of his native Sicilian countryside.

Theocritus' poetry in short is one of the chief representatives of the Alexandrian period of Greek poetry. This was a time generally regarded as an era when the direct, authentic utterances of poets like Homer, Hesiod, and Sappho had given away to more self-conscious garlands of verses woven self-consciously and with as much variety as possible, a time when the idyll, the epigram, and the mime were the style. It was a time, too, when verses were first written and then polished and a poet like Theocritus was as aware of the art of poetry as he was of what themes he was expressing.

It is significant that Theocritus often falls back on the traditional stories of the Greek-speaking peoples. He tells us of Cyclops in love with the sea nymph Galatea—but Cyclops is no longer Homer's monster but a not entirely unattractive swain "sighing like a furnace" for a cold maiden. Or Theocritus takes incidents in the life of Hercules and uses the ancient web of the heroic tale as an occasion for elegant embroidery. We are less struck by the tale of Hercules strangling serpents that attack him in his cradle than we are by the deftness with which the poet elaborates the old brief tale, the gradual approach of the serpents is very gradual indeed, the confusion of the parents is very pretty, and the final triumph of the muscular infant is a foregone conclusion.

Theocritus is perhaps most brilliant and most himself in two fairly long poems that are far from the sloping fields of Sicily and which reflect the rather fetid, cynical, and jaded life of a city like Alexandria. "Love Magic," or the "Spell," tells of a young woman, Simaetha, and her servant working an incantation to bring back a vigorous young lover who has only recently gone elsewhere. The mixture of sick desire and sicker hatred in the girl's song is remote from the simple lays of shepherds and herdsmen.

Less morbid and certainly wonderfully charming and revealing of busy street life of a Hellenistic city, is "The Women at the Festival of Adonis." In this mime, a brief dramatic sketch not unlike some of the more extended efforts of Menander, two women, Gorgon and Praxinoa, chatter with each other and re-create a world for us. They meet, they plan an outing, comment on each other's costumes, and arrange for their households to be cared for in their absence. Then they go out and walk through the hot, jostling streets, out of their mouths tumble phrases that allow us to see the city streets and their abundant distractions as clearly as if we were there. Then the women, never losing breath or dropping a syllable, come to the palace of Ptolemy, where a famous young woman will sing the lament for Adonis, the slain god. The two women attend the religious rites.

All this should indicate that Theocritus had a considerable range. But his country poems, now elegant, now crude in their language, but always fresh and vigorous, have left a greater mark on the literature of the Western world. Vergil's celebration of the simple life (so far from luxury and the cynicism of Augustan Rome) have for twenty centuries implored readers to go back to a Sabine farm, and Vergil took his cue from Theocritus. From Vergil, if not from Theocritus, many poets have learned to hope for escape from courts and cities. Spenser,

Milton, Keats, Tennyson, Arnold are on the long list of English poets who have used the pastoral convention of Theocritus for their special purposes, often weaving into the plaintive rural song of pipe and voice political and religious themes that no shepherd—or even Theocritus for that matter—ever dreamed of.

THE POETRY OF YEATS

Type of work Poetry

Author William Butler Yeats (1865-1939)

Principal published works Mosada: A Dramatic Poem, 1886, The Wanderings of Ossin, 1889, Poems, 1895, The Wind Among the Reeds, 1899, In the Seven Woods, 1903, The Green Helmet and Other Poems, 1910, Responsibilities, 1914, The Wild Swans at Coole, 1917, Michael Robartes and the Dancer, 1920, Later Poems, 1922, The Cat and the Moon and Certain Poems, 1924, The Tower, 1928, The Winding Stair, 1933, Collected Poems, 1933, The King of the Great Clock Tower, 1934, A Full Moon in March, 1935, New Poems, 1938, Last Poems and Plays, 1940, Collected Poems, 1949

The conflict that the antimonies between dream and action caused in the mind of William Butler Yeats could not be resolved in the verse tradition of the Pre-Raphaelites. This was the poetry, together with that of Shelley and Keats and the plays of Shakespeare, with which he was most familiar. It was also the tradition to which he was closest in time. As he did not have a background of coherent culture on which to base his poetry, nor a personally satisfying faith, Yeats throughout his life had to create his own systems of thought—create, in fact, the convention in which he was to write.

In the introduction to A Vision, he said: "I wished for a system of thought that would leave my imagination free to create as it chose and yet make all it created, or could create, part of the one history, and that the souls." His search for reality in belief and feeling was aided by his knowledge that the Romantic poets expressed faith in the power of the imagination. This knowledge also strengthened his conviction that the problems of human existence would never be solved by science and that answers would have to come from quite different disciplines; therefore, both his philosophy and his actions were of paramount importance to him in the writing of poetry.

Yeats spent many years in the study of the occult, spiritualism, magic, mysticism, and theosophy. His feelings for Ireland and for the Pre-Raphaelites led him, early in his life, to the study and use of ancient Irish myths. His hopes of independence for Ireland and his periodic identification with Irish nationalism, also a part of the fabric of his verse, were influenced by his passion for Maud Gonne and his friendship with his patron, Lady Gregory. He believed the system expounded in A Vision was revealed to him by his wife's power as a medium. Thus for Yeats, as for all poets, the pattern of his relationships, interests, beliefs, and loyalties was the material of his poetry. However, great poetry is always the expression of one man's personality in such a way that it is generally or universally meaningful. Magic, nationalism, and myth partly formed Yeats's complex personality, and his prose writings in these areas are undoubtedly esoteric. Although it was through these studies that

THE POETRY OF WILLIAM BUTLER YEATS. Excerpts reprinted from COLLECTED POEMS by permission of the publishers The Macmillan Co. Copyright 1903, 1906, 1907, 1912, 1916, 1918, 1919, 1924, 1928, 1931, 1933, 1934, 1935, 1940, 1944, 1945, 1946, 1950 by The Macmillan Co. Copyright 1940 by George Yeats.

Yeats was able to write as he did, it is not through them that the reader appreciates his poetry. All Yeats's poetry can be enjoyed and understood when carefully read, without reference to any of his prose. Yeats, in fact, took care to make his work understandable, and one of the most interesting aspects in the study of his poetry is his lifelong preoccupation with clarity, simplicity, and exactness.

This clarity was the goal toward which he worked throughout his career. For Yeats, symbol was the means by which the natural and the supernatural could be fused and the antinomies be resolved. Writing in many personae, he worked toward this unified expression of reality, with the result that the continuous development of his powers and his ultimate success are both rare and exciting achievements. Yeats's dedication to his art was such that to the end of his life his conscious goals were always in advance of the poems he had completed.

Yeats was a lyric poet, but his belief in and practice of "active virtue"—that is, following a discipline that one has forged oneself—makes his verse essentially dramatic. His first volumes of poetry express the sensibility of the Pre-Raphaelites; the lyrics are slight and the emotion, incompletely realized, often expresses his indecision between the life of dream and that of action. Twilight and longing predominate in these poems.

In his fourth volume, In the Seven Woods, published in 1903, Yeats began to find his true voice. Emotion is particularized and he has started to speak with authority. His technique is more sure and his tone more varied. In "Adam's Curse," in which the poet discusses the labor of writing poetry with a woman whom he loves, he uses common words and speech idioms which firmly link the poem to reality.

Better go down upon your marrow bones
And scrub a kitchen pavement or break stones

Like an old pauper, in all kinds of weather

For to articulate sweet sounds together
Is to work harder than all these

In his verse plays of this period Yeats was beginning deliberately to eschew abstraction and to introduce more direct and bold speech into his work. His 1910 volume, The Green Helmet and Other Poems, shows this technique in his lyric verse, which is becoming more dramatic and assertive. In "No Second Troy" the use of Greek myth approximates a reconciliation between dream and reality.

The 1914 volume, Responsibilities, shows an increase in force. Here Yeats uses other voices, or personae, of beggars, fools, and hermits to present his ideas. At that time he was encouraged further in his progress toward exactness of expression and the use of only the most meaningful images by his contact with Ezra Pound, who insisted that Yeats remove all abstractions from his verse. He appears to have learned quickly and well from the younger poet, and in subsequent poems he is able to integrate completely his theories of history and personality, and his feelings of despair for Ireland. He also learned to pare his images so that they are totally relevant to his emotion.

Things fall apart, the centre cannot
hold,

Mere anarchy is loosed upon the world
The blood-dimmed tide is loosed and everywhere

The ceremony of innocence is drowned

The Tower, published in 1928, contains several of Yeats's finest poems. The most brilliant and complex of these is "Sailing to Byzantium." The dazzling civilization of Byzantium which had successfully withstood the power of Rome as Yeats would probably have liked Ireland to withstand that of England, became for him the symbol of eternal art and of the fusion of the creator with the work of art. The reconciliation of youth and age, passion and intellect, is effected by the symbolic representation of the wisdom of the inspired soul in a supernatural form

 In this poem, natural birds sing of the cycle of human life and the created birds of Byzantium, of the cycle of history
 The glory of the old and of the young is here presented with a single steady vision, and the conflict between them has been resolved

This is no country for old men The
 young
 In one another's arms, birds in the trees
 —Those dying generations—at their song
 The salmon falls the mackerel crowded seas,
 Fish flesh or fowl, commend all summer long
 Whatever is begotten, born, and dies

He continues

An aged man is but a paltry thing,
 A tattered coat upon a stick, unless Soul clap its hands and sing, and louder
 sing

The poet has sailed to Byzantium that he may thus sing His soul after death will not take "bodily form from any natural thing" but will be one of the singing birds of metal and enamel that the gold smiths make to amuse the Emperor,

Or set upon a golden bough to sing
 To lords and ladies of Byzantium
 Of what is past, or passing, or to come

Another unified vision of life which is not dependent upon the supernatural is communicated in the poem "Among School Children" The mastery of technique which gives "Sailing to Byzantium" its tour de force brilliance, enables Yeats in this poem to communicate the feeling of peace after storm The poet visits a convent school where the children
 see him as an old man, and as the children stare in mild curiosity, he is reminded of the "Ledaean body" of a woman he had loved, and this vision causes him to feel so joined in sympathy with her that he can visualize her as she must have been as a child

For even daughters of the swan share
 Something of every paddler's heritage

The vision of the childhood of the woman who caused him much pain leads him to the thought that women would not think motherhood worth while if they could see their progeny at sixty His suggestion that mothers as well as nuns worship images returns the poem to the convent school setting In the last stanza of the poem Yeats, by a unifying image of continuity and completeness, reconciles the opposing forces of age and youth
 at the level of reality

The poems written in the three years before Yeats's death at seventy four show no diminution of power He was still intent on his search for unity and reality of expression In "The Circus Animals' Desertion," he reviews his poetic output and says that until he was an old man
 the machinery of his poetry was still in evidence

My circus animals were still on show,
 Those stilted boys, that gilded chariot

He lists his old themes the Irish myths, his lost love, and his preoccupation with the theater, and he tells how he drama-tized his love in his plays He faces his own delight in dreams which he feared would inhibit him from reality "This dream itself had all my thought and love" He speaks of the personae in which he wrote and of the characters of Irish history

Players and painted stage took all my love
 And not those things they were the emblems of

The reversal and resolution of these ideas comes in the last verse where he evaluates the use of images in his poetry, by questioning their origin and finding that they indeed had their bases in reality

Thus his adolescent faith in the imagination had been justified and he could join the ranks of those whom he admired and who had fused the subjective and objective self into a meaningful whole

"The antithetical self comes to those who are no longer deceived, whose passion is reality"

The philosophy that Yeats so carefully constructed was the basis for a personal vision of life, which by unswerving dedication to craftsmanship and constantly renewed emotional and intellectual vitality he presented in his poetry in all its varied facets, and with always increasing significance

POLYEUCTE

Type of work Drama

Author Pierre Corneille (1606-1684)

Type of plot Religious tragedy

Time of plot Third century

Locale Mélite, the capital of Armenia

First presented c. 1643

Principal characters

FELIX, Roman governor of Armenia

PAULINE, his daughter

POLYEUCTE, his son-in-law, an Armenian nobleman

NEARQUE, Polyeucte's friend

STRATONICE, Pauline's friend

ALBIN, Felix's friend

SEVERE, a Roman warrior, in love with Pauline

Critique

Polyeucte, although a favorite of the general public in Corneille's time, was not considered his best play, that distinction being reserved for The Cid (1636).
Modern criticism, however, has reversed
this judgment. Despite its somewhat improbable plot, climaxed by miraculous conversions, the play holds for today's public particular religious interest, since it deals with the working of divine grace in the human soul. It is, however, the strong delineation of the main characters that has won for this work its present universal acclaim.

The Story

Pauline, daughter of Félix, the Roman governor of Mélite, had been married fourteen days to Polyeucte, an Armenian nobleman. Terrified by dreams which seemed to portend her husband's death,
she vainly sought to delay his departure on a secret mission, the nature of which was known only to his friend Nearque.
She related her fears to her friend Stratonice and told her of her earlier love for Severe, a Roman of high birth whom her father would not allow her to marry because of Severe's lack of fortune. When the Emperor Decius had appointed Félix governor of Armenia, she had accompanied him and dutifully married an Armenian nobleman of her father's selection. Meanwhile, they had heard that Severe had met a hero's death while aiding the emperor in battle against the Persians. According to the report, the young Roman's body had never been found.

Now Pauline had dreamed that Severe was not dead, but threatened her husband's life, that a band of impious Christians had thrown Polyeucte at the feet of Severe, and that she, Pauline, crying out for aid from her father, had seen him raise a dagger to pierce Polyeucte's breast.

Her fears were further stirred when her father approached and said that Severe was alive and was at that moment

POLYEUCTE by Pierre Corneille, from CHIEF PLAYS OF CORNEILLE. Translated by Lacy Lockert.
By permission of the publishers: Princeton University Press. Copyright 1952-1957 by Princeton University Press.

entering the city. It seemed that the King of Persia, struck by his gallantry, had reclaimed the body from the battlefield in order to gain the Roman honorable burial. But miraculously life had been restored to Sevère and the Persians had sent him to Rome in exchange for royal prisoners. Thereafter his greater deeds in war had bound him closer to the emperor, who had sent him to Armenia to proclaim the good news of his victories and to make sacrifices of thanksgiving to the gods.

Because his love for Pauline had really brought Sevère to Armenia, that Roman, informed by his servant that Pauline was wedded, decided that life was not worth living and that he would rather die in battle. But first he would see Pauline. When they met, she told him that if hers alone had been the choice she would despite his poverty, have chosen him; but that now she was married she would remain loyal to the husband whom she had learned to love. They bade each other farewell, he ready to die in battle, she to pray for him in secret.

Polyeucte returned from his mission, on which he had been secretly baptized a Christian. Ordered by a messenger from Félix to attend the sacrifices in the temple, he and Néarque planned to defy the idolatry of the worshippers there. Pauline told him of Sévère's visit but added that she had obtained his promise not to see her again.

Stratonice, a witness at the temple sacrifices, hurried to Pauline with the news that Polyeucte had become a Christian, a traitor to the Roman gods, he had mocked the sacred mysteries and, with Néarque, had declared that their god alone was the almighty king of earth and heaven. This defilement, Félix declared, would cost Néarque his life, but he hoped Polyeucte might come to his senses and recant after witnessing the punishment and death of his friend.

When Albin, the friend of Félix, brought news that Néarque was dead, he added that Polyeucte had witnessed his execution undismayed. Pauline, reminding her father that Polyeucte was his choice and that in marrying him she had but fulfilled her filial duty, begged him to spare his life. But Félix, fearing the thunderbolts of his gods and Sevère as well, refused to listen when Albin urged that Polyeucte's sentence be left to the emperor. Besides, he was tempted by the thought that Polyeucte's death would allow Sevère to wed his daughter and thus he would gain for himself a far more powerful protector than he now had. Meanwhile, Pauline visited Polyeucte in jail with the plea that if he must worship his chosen god he should do so silently and secretly, and thus give Félix grounds for mercy. To her importunings Polyeucte replied that he was done with mortal ties, that he loved her, but loved his God more.

Polyeucte called for Sevère and told him that even as his wedding had parted the true love of Sévère and Pauline, so now by dying he hoped to bring them happily together. He hoped also that they would die Christians. Declaring himself ready for death, he was marched off by his guards.

Sévère was amazed at this example of magnanimity, but his hopes were shattered when Pauline told him she could never marry him, that it would stain her honor to wed anyone who, even innocently, had brought Polyeucte to his sad fate. She begged him, however, to try to save her husband from the death her father had ordered. He consented, if for no other reason than to prove to Pauline that he could equal her in nobility and thus be worthy of her Félix, although he regarded this intervention on behalf of a rival as a trick to expose him to the full strength of the emperor's wrath, made one last effort to sway his son in law. He told Polyeucte that only on Sévère's account had he publicly taken his rigid stand and that he himself would adopt Christianity if Polyeucte would only pretend to follow the old gods until after Sévère had left the city. But Polyeucte saw through this wile and refused. Angered, Félix said he would avenge his gods and himself. When Pauline entered, Polyeucte commanded her to wed Sévère or die with him a Christian.

Again Pauline pleaded for Polyeucte's life, and again Félix was moved to make another attempt to persuade Polyeucte to abjure his new faith, but to no avail. Bidding farewell to Pauline, Polyeucte was marched out to death by Félix' order. Pauline rushed out after him, lamenting that she too would die if he were to die. Félix ordered Albin to deter her but is sued his order too late, Pauline had seen her husband executed. Seeing him die, she felt that his death had unsealed her own eyes, acting as a divine visitation of grace. She declared herself a Christian, ready for death.

Sévère upbraided Félix for Polyeucte's death and threatened retaliation. Félix, suddenly yielding to a strange feeling that overcame him, declared that his son-in-law's death had made him a Christian. This sudden conversion struck Sévère as miraculous. He ordered Félix to retain his position of authority, and promised to use all his persuasion to urge Emperor Decie to revoke his cruel commands and to let all worship the gods of their choice without fear of punishment.

THE POWER OF DARKNESS

Type of work Drama

Author Count Leo Tolstoy (1828-1910)

Type of plot Domestic tragedy

Time of plot Nineteenth century

Locale Russia

First presented 1886

Principal characters

NIKITA AKSMITCH TCHILIKIN, a laborer

ANÍSYA, his mistress

PETER IGNÁTITCH, Anísya's husband, a well-to-do peasant

MATRYÓNA, Nikita's mother

AKSM, Nikita's father

AKOULINA, Peter's daughter by his first marriage

MARINA, an orphan girl

Critique

This play on a theme of sin and redemption is embodied in the traditional Russian conflict of father against son of the natural against the artificial life. Nikita finds himself led into adultery and murder almost unknowingly, the implication being that evil is a state into which anyone can fall unless he is diligently wary of it. The plot may seem unexciting because of the didactic way in which Tolstoy deals with the evils of idleness, greed, and luxury, but his ability to depict the triumph of spiritual humility over materialistic arrogance must still be admired.

The Story

Peter Ignátitch, a well-to-do peasant, was forty-two years old and sickly. His second wife, Anísya, was only thirty-two. She still felt young and had started an affair with Nikita, their hired man. Peter, who considered Nikita a loafer, had thought of dismissing him. As he was explaining his intention to his wife, they learned that Nikita was talking about getting married and leaving their farm. Anísya complained to Peter that Nikita's departure would leave her with more work than she could handle.

When Anísya and Nikita were alone, he told her that in spite of his marriage

THE POWER OF DARKNESS by Count Leo Tolstoy from THE PLAYS OF LEO TOLSTOY Translated by Louise and Aymer Maude. By permission of the publishers. Amen House. Copyright 1910 by Constable & Co. Copyright, 1923 by Oxford University Press, Inc. Renewed. All rights reserved.

plans he would always come back to her Anisya threatened to do violence to her self if Nikita went away, adding that when her husband died Nikita could marry her and become master of the farm Nikita declared, however, that he was satisfied with his lot Then Matryona, Nikita's mother, came in and said that Nikita's marriage was his father's plan, not her own, and that he need not worry about it She then asked Nikita to leave the room

Left alone with Matryóna, Anisya confessed her love for Nikita Matryóna, who said that she had known of their affair all along, gave Anisya some poison and advised her to bury her husband before spring, she suggested also that Nikita would make a good master on the farm Concerning the marriage, she explained that Nikita had had an affair with Marina, an orphan girl, and that when Akim, his father, learned about it he had insisted that Nikita marry her Matryona had suggested that they talk the matter over with Peter who was Nikita's master Having explained the situation, Matryona again urged Anisya to use the poison on Peter, who was near death any way

At that point Peter and Akim came in, discussing Nikita's proposed marriage Peter seemed to approve of the match until Matryona told him that Marina was promiscuous and so had no claim on Nikita To determine the truth of this charge, Peter sent for Nikita, who falsely swore that there had been nothing between him and Marina As a result, the marriage was called off Nikita was then visited by Marina, who pleaded her love and said that she had always been faithful to him Nikita sent her away, saying that he was no longer interested in her

Six months later Anisya and Matryóna were worried because Peter was about to die but had not told anyone where his money pouch was hidden Anisya also told Matryóna that she had put the poison into Peter's tea As they stood talking in the courtyard, Peter appeared on the porch of his house, saw Nikita, who was happening by, and asked his forgiveness, a formal request made by the dying Nikita was temporarily struck with remorse Matryóna who then helped Peter back into the house, discovered that the money pouch was hanging by a cord around the sick man's neck Anisya went into the house and came out again with the money pouch, which she gave to Nikita She then returned to the house, only to reappear a short time later, wailing a formal lament for Peter, who had just died

Nine months after Peter's death Nikita, who had married Anisya and become the master of the farm grew tired of his wife and began an affair with Akoulina, Peter's daughter by his first marriage Anisya was afraid to say anything for fear that her murder of Peter would be discovered

In the following autumn, Matryona arranged a marriage for Akoulina, who had become pregnant by Nikita Matryóna told the father of the suitor that Akoulina herself could not be seen because she was sickly at that moment, in fact, Akoulina was delivering her child in the barn Nikita could not decide what to do about the child, but Anisya gave him a spade and told him to dig a hole in the cellar Nikita balked at the suggestion feeling that he was not to blame for all his troubles Anisya, happy that she could force Nikita into sharing her own guilt, told him that he was already guilty because he knew that she had poisoned Peter and because he had accepted Peter's money pouch At last Nikita went to the cellar and dug the hole

When Anisya brought the baby to him, covered with rags, Nikita was horrified to discover that the infant was still alive Anisya and Matryóna pushed Nikita into the cellar, where he murdered the baby After he had completed the deed he reappeared in a frenzy, threatening to kill his mother and claiming that he could still hear the baby whimpering

He then went off to forget his troubles in drink

Some time after that Akoulina's wedding feast was held at Nikita's farm Nikita saw Marina, who had been able to marry respectably and who was now a wedding guest Alone and troubled, he told Marina that his only happiness had been with her Distracted, Marina left Nikita to himself Then Matryóna and Anisya came to tell him that the bridal pair awaited his formal blessing Feeling that it would be impossible to give his blessing, Nikita thought of committing suicide until Mitritch, a drunken ex-soldier, appeared and began to talk of his experiences, concluding with the thought that a person should never be afraid of anyone With this thought in mind, Nikita decided to join the wedding feast

When Nikita appeared before the guests he was holding Akim by the hand Suddenly, instead of blessing the bridal pair, he fell on his knees before his father Proclaiming that he was guilty and wished to make his confession, he begged forgiveness of Marina, whom he had misused, and of Akoulina, saying that he had poisoned Peter Although Akoulina said that she knew who had poisoned her father, a police officer, who happened to be a guest at the wedding, wanted to arrest Nikita immediately Akim prevented him by saying that his son must attend to God's business first Nikita then confessed that he had seduced Akoulina and murdered her child Finally, turning again to his father, Nikita asked for his forgiveness Akim told him that God would forgive him and show him mercy Nikita was then bound and led away

PRAGMATISM

Type of work Philosophical essays

Author William James (1842-1910)

First published 1907

No more illuminating or entertaining account of pragmatism has ever been written than James's Pragmatism A New Name for Some Old Ways of Thinking But this is more than a popular exposition prepared for the academic audiences of Lowell Institute and Columbia University during the winter of 1906-1907, it is historic philosophy in the making Although James was profoundly influenced by Charles Sanders Peirce, who invented the basic statement and name of pragmatism, he was an independent thinker with a distinctive creative direction of his own

Peirce's essay, "How to Make Our Ideas Clear," introduced the pragmatic notion that ideas are clarified by considering what we would expect in the way of experience if we were to act in a certain manner The whole of our conception of the "sensible effects" of an object is the whole of our conception of the objects, according to Peirce This essay, clear, radical, entertaining, appeared in the Popular Science Monthly in January, 1878 But professional philosophers were not interested in theory advanced by a mathematician, particularly when the theory went against the prevailing idealism of American philosophers It was not until James revived the idea in 1898 with a talk on "Philosophical Conceptions and Practical Results" that the pragmatic philosophy began to stir up controversy With the lectures on meaning and truth which were published under the titles Pragmatism and The Meaning of Truth, the former in 1907 and the latter in 1909, James brought pragmatism into the forefront of American thought

In his first lecture on "The Present Dilemma in Philosophy," James distin

guished between the "tender minded" and the "tough minded" in temperament, the former inclining toward a philosophy that is rational, religious, dogmatic, idealistic, and optimistic, and the latter, the tough minded, inclining toward a philosophy that is empirical, irreligious, skeptical, materialistic, and pessimistic. He then went on to state his conviction that philosophy can satisfy both temperaments by becoming pragmatic.

His lecture on the pragmatic method begins with one of the most entertaining anecdotes in philosophical discourse. James describes a discussion by a group of philosophers on this question: Does a man go around a squirrel that is on a tree trunk if the squirrel keeps moving on the tree so that the trunk is always between himself and the man? Some of the philosophers claimed that the man did not go around the squirrel, while others claimed that he did. James settled the matter by saying, "Which party is right depends on what you practically mean by 'going round' the squirrel." It could be said that the man goes around the squirrel since he passes from the north of the squirrel to the east, south, and west of the squirrel. On the other hand, the man could be said not to go around the squirrel since he is never able to get on the various sides of the squirrel—on the right of him, then behind him, and so forth. "Make the distinction," James said, "and there is no occasion for any further dispute."

James then applied the method to a number of perennial philosophical problems, but only after a careful exposition of the meaning of pragmatism. He described the pragmatic method as a way of interpreting ideas by discovering their practical consequences—that is, the difference the idea's truth would make in our experience. He asks, "What difference would it practically make to anyone if this notion rather than that notion were true?" and he replies, "If no practical difference whatever can be traced, then the alternatives mean practically the same thing, and all dispute is idle."

In his lecture James argued that the pragmatic method was not new. Socrates, Aristotle, Locke, Berkeley, and Hume had used it. But what was new was the explicit formulation of the method and a new faith in its power. Pragmatism is to be understood, however, not as a set of grand theories but as a method which turns attention away from first principles and absolutes and directs it to facts, consequences, and results in our experience.

A bare declaration would hardly have been enough to make pragmatism famous. James devoted a considerable part of his lectures to brief examples of the application of the pragmatic method. He cited with approval Berkeley's analysis of matter as made up of sensations. Sensations, he said, are the cash value of the term. The difference matter makes to us by truly being is that we then get such sensations. Similarly, Locke applied the pragmatic method, James claimed, when he discovered that unless by "spirit" we mean consciousness, we mean nothing by the term.

Is materialism or theism true? Is the universe simply matter acting and interacting, or is God involved? James considers this problem pragmatically and reaches a curious result. As far as the past is concerned, he says, it makes no difference. If rival theories are meant to explain what is the case and if it makes no difference in our experience which theory is true, then the theories do not differ in meaning. If one considers the difference now and in the future, however, the case is different. "Materialism means simply the denial that the moral order is eternal. Spiritualism means the affirmation of an eternal moral order and the letting loose of hope."

To this kind of analysis some critics have answered with the charge that James is one of the "tender minded" philosophers. He spoke harshly of in his earlier lectures. But throughout the course of this series of lectures and in subsequent books James continued to use pragmatism as a way of combining the tough and tender temperaments. He extended the use of the term "difference" so that the meaning of an idea or term was no longer to be understood merely in terms of sense experiences, as Peirce had urged, but also in terms of passionate differences, of effects upon human hopes and fears. The essays in Pragmatism show this liberalizing tendency hard at work.

The temperate tone of James's suggestions concerning the religious hypothesis is clear in one of his later lectures in the book, "Pragmatism and Religion," in which he writes that "Pragmatism has to postpone dogmatic answer, for we do not yet know certainly which type of religion is going to work best in the long run." He states again that the tough minded can be satisfied with "the hurly burly of the sensible facts of nature," and that the tender minded can take up a monistic form of religion, but for those who mix temperaments, as James does, a religious synthesis that is moralistic and pluralistic, allowing for human development and creativity in various directions, is to be preferred.

Pragmatism is important not only as a clear statement of the pragmatic method and as an illustration of its application to certain central problems, but also as an exposition, although introductory, of James's pragmatic theory of truth. His ideas were developed more fully two years later in The Meaning of Truth.

Beginning with the common notion that truth is a property of ideas that agree with reality, James proceeded to ask what was meant by the term "agreement." He decided that the conception of truth as a static relation between an idea and reality was in error, that pragmatic analysis shows that true ideas are those which can eventually be verified, and that an idea is said to be verified when it leads us usefully to an anticipated conclusion. Since verification is a process, it becomes appropriate to say that truth "happens to" an idea, and that an idea "becomes true, is made true by events." A revealing summary statement is this: "'The true,' to put it very briefly, is only the expedient in the way of our thinking, just as 'the right' is only the expedient in the way of our behaving."

The ambiguity of James's account, an ambiguity which he did not succeed in removing, allows extremes of interpretation. On the one hand, a reader might take the tender minded route, something in the manner of James himself, and argue that all kinds of beliefs about God, freedom, and immortality are true in so far as they lead a man usefully in the course of his life. On the other hand, a tough minded reader might be inclined to agree with James that an idea is true if the expectations in terms of which the idea makes sense are expectations that would be met, if one acted—but he might reject James's suggestions that this means that a great many ideas which would ordinarily be regarded as doubtful "become true" when they satisfy the emotional needs of a believer.

One difficulty with which James was forced to deal because of his theory of truth resulted, it might be argued, not from his idea of truth as the "workableness" of an idea, but from his inadequate analyses of the meanings of certain terms such as "God," "freedom" and "design." James maintained that, pragmatically speaking, these terms all meant the same thing, viz, the presence of "promise" in the world. If this were so, then it would be plausible to suppose that if the idea that the world is promising works out, the idea is true. But if James's analysis is mistaken, if "God" means more than the possibility of things working out for the better, James's claim that beliefs about God are true if they work loses its plausibility.

Whatever its philosophic faults, Pragmatism is saved by its philosophic virtues. For the general reader it offers the rare experience of confronting first rate ideas by way of a clear and entertaining, even informal, style.

THE PRAISE OF FOLLY

Type of work Essay

Author Desiderius Erasmus (1466? 1536)

First published 1511

Although written some four hundred and fifty years ago, The Praise of Folly is still an effective analytic examination of man's abilities and vanities. It not only gives the modern reader an idea of the struggle of the early humanists in their effort to rid the world of the conventions and forms of the Middle Ages, but it also gives him some insight into those problems of living with which we are still faced today.

Erasmus himself never thought very highly of this work which, even though written quickly and as something of a jest, is the one for which he is best remembered. He wrote it in about seven days in 1509 while he was recovering from an illness at the home of his English friend, Sir Thomas More. And it was not until two years after its writing that he had the book secretly printed in France. However, the fact that there were at least seven editions within a few months proves its immediate success and popularity.

Because of this work and several others Erasmus became one of the most popular men of letters of his time, and, consequently, he became one of the most influential. He was of prime importance in the spread of humanism throughout the northern part of Europe and was instrumental in many aspects of both the Reformation and the later phase of the Renaissance. Everything he did was to aid man in tearing away the veils of foolish traditions and customs and to help him find the road back to the true God and to his true self.

The form itself is an immediate indication of the type of work that the book is to be. Written as a parody of a classical oration, the essay sets Folly as the orator. Her subject is society and she quickly becomes a many-sided symbol which stands for all that is natural in man, for all his misdirected effort, and for all of his attempts to get the wrong things out of life. She discusses the problem of man's wisdom and tells how it can be united with man's action to gain success in a world of folly; she is concerned with the way in which reason and simple Christian advice can be presented to mankind; she wonders what the Christian humanist can do for himself and the world. Parody, irony, and satire are used throughout the essay to show man what he does and what he should do. And no one is spared. Neither king nor prince, pope nor priest, aristocrat nor working man escapes the indignation which Erasmus feels toward society.

At the beginning of her oration Folly declares that she is giving a eulogy of herself, and she justifies the impertinence by saying that she knows herself better than anyone else and that no one else will do it for her. Her father, she says, is Plutus, the real father of all men and gods, and she was born out of his passion for Youth. Significantly, her birth took place in the Fortunate Isles, and she lists among her followers Drunkenness, Ignorance, Self love, Flattery, Forgetfulness, Laziness, Pleasure, Madness, Sensuality, Intemperance, and Sound Sleep—all of whom help her to gain control of all things.

It is Folly, for instance, who leads man to marriage and the conception of life, thus prolonging this life that is so foolish. It is Pleasure, one of her followers, who makes life bearable at all. It is Forgetfulness who makes youth such a care-free time, and who restores this same characteristic to old age, thereby bringing about a second childhood. By throwing off care and avoiding wisdom, we are told, one can achieve perpetual youth.

Folly goes on to say that she is the source of all that is pleasurable in life

Man will never be completely divorced from Folly because he is ruled more by passion than by reason, and the two most important aspects of passion are anger and lust. One of the chief sources of man's pleasure, of course, is women who are even more subject to folly than men. Men's coarser looks are a result of the infection of wisdom.

Friendship also derives from Folly because it makes us ignore the faults and defects of other people. Marriage itself is held together with compromise, infatuation, and duplicity. Without Folly man could not get along with others; he would soon begin to hate himself and everything would seem sordid and loathsome.

Folly praises herself under the guise of Prudence because she allows man to have first hand experience with the world. She frees us from the shame and fear which cloud our minds and inhibit our actions, thus preventing any real experience. Because of Prudence we go along with the crowd, which is Folly. Indeed, it is Folly who has caused all the great achievements of mankind, wisdom and learning are no great help. Everything that man does is motivated by self love, vainglory, flattery, or other followers.

To lead such a life of folly, error, and ignorance is to be human, it is to express one's true nature. All other forms of life are content with limitations but man is vainly ambitious. The most ignorant men are the happiest and some of the most deluded men are those who delight in telling lies. As an example, we are asked to consider the priests—those who propose to gain happiness by relying on magic charms and prayers, saints and particular rites. One cannot find happiness, we are told without Folly, since all our emotions belong to Folly, and happiness depends on expressing our human nature which is full of Folly.

One of the most foolish of men, therefore, is that person who tries to deny his true nature and find happiness through the Christian religion. Folly proves that this religion has more to do with her own nature than with wisdom by showing that children, women, old people and fools take more delight in it than anyone else. It is they who are always nearest the altars. In the way that Christianity is most often taught and practiced, man must deny his true nature by disdaining life and preferring death. He must overlook injuries, avoid pleasure, and feast on hunger, vigils, tears, and labors. He must give up and scorn all physical pleasures, or at least he must take them more lightly than he does spiritual pleasures.

Folly is at her most serious when she tells us that this is the most foolish way, and the only sure way, to true happiness. Only by forgetting our bodies and everything physical can we approach this goal. We must give ourselves up completely to the spiritual aspects of life in order to achieve it. Only a very few men are able to accomplish this task completely enough while in this world, in order to approach an experience which she tells us is very close to madness. This madness, in turn, is similar to the heavenly joys that one will experience after death when the spirit has completely left the body.

PREJUDICES Six Series

Type of work Essays on social and literary themes

Author H. L. Mencken (1880-1956)

First published 1919-1927

During the fantastic decade of the 1920's, few literary events were so eagerly awaited as the appearance of a new volume of Mencken's Prejudices, so that one might enjoy the spectacle of the Sage of Baltimore as he pulled yet another popular idol down from its moss-covered pedestal and gloated over the fragments. This iconoclasm was accomplished with so much gusto and with such vigorous and picturesque language as to enchant a whole generation that had grown weary of the solemnity of much American writing. And the decade badly needed an iconoclast, for it must be remembered that what is now thought of as "the jazz age" was also the era of the Ku Klux Klan and the Anti Saloon League, of Babbitt and Boosterism.

The essays in these volumes can be divided into two categories: literary criticism and criticism of the American scene as it appeared at that time. Literary criticism Mencken defined as a "catalytic process," with the critic serving as the catalyst. Actually, as a critic Mencken derived mainly from James Huneker, whom he enormously admired and had known personally. Huneker had been familiar with Continental writers, then not too well known in America; his criticism was essentially impressionistic, often written in breezy, epigrammatic language. Mencken carried certain of these characteristics much further, indeed, his verbal acrobatics became his hallmark. It was a racy, pungent style, very effective for the "debunking" then so popular and deliberately calculated to drive conservative readers into frenzies. His chief target, at which he never grew tired of heaving bricks, was the Puritan tradition in American literature with its consequent timidity, stuffiness, and narrow-mindedness. As he saw it, the Puritan was afraid of aesthetic emotion and thus could neither create nor enjoy art. This fear had inhibited American literature, he claimed, and had made American criticism equally timid and conventional. Further, criticism had fallen into the hands of the professors, and there was nothing—not even a prohibition agent—that Mencken detested so much as the average American university professor. Hence, such men as Paul Elmer More, Irving Babbitt, Stuart P. Sherman, and William Lyon Phelps had scorn poured over them for years.

It is ironic that the critical writings of some of these men have withstood the passage of time more successfully than have those of Mencken. For though less a geographical provincial than they, he was more provincial in time and was interested mainly in the contemporary. Of the older native writers, he really admired only Poe, Twain, and Whitman—the non-conformists. Even among the moderns his preferences were curiously limited. He had great regard for Conrad and Dreiser, but he overlooked much of the talent that was budding during the 1920's. That he should have overpraised some of his contemporaries, Cabell, for example, should not be held against him; few critics are sufficiently detached to escape this fault. Dreiser was an important writer but not the "colossal phenomenon" that Mencken called him. But his greatest failure as a critic was his blindness to poetry. In the Third Series of Prejudices he included an essay, "The Poet and His Art," a study so full of false assumptions, logical fallacies, and plain misstatements of fact that it is a gruesome relic for a critic to have left behind him. And his remarks on Dante stagger belief. Dante's theology was unacceptable to Mencken, therefore, Dante could not really have believed it, and The Divine Comedy was, he said, a satire on the whole Christian doctrine of heaven and hell. Surely no gem that Mencken garnered from the Bible Belt could equal this statement in absurdity.

The essays dealing with the national scene were written in the same slashing manner and naturally infuriated far more readers, since Mencken attacked men, institutions, and ideas more familiar to them. Obviously, many of these pieces have little significance now, for they dealt with situations peculiar to that decade. But some of them are still valid. "The Sahara of the Bozart" (Second Series) is in some ways almost as true of the South today as it was in 1920, his comments on the farmer ("The Husband man," Fourth Series) are even more appropriate. And his dissections of such eminent figures as Theodore Roosevelt and Thorstein Veblen are still funny.

Of Americans in general, Mencken had a low opinion, considering them a mongrel people incapable of high spiritual aspiration. His opinion of democracy was equally low. It was, he felt, merely a scheme to hearten the have nots in their unending battle with the haves. The inferiority of Americans Mencken attributed to the lack of a genuine aristocracy and to Puritanism. Without an aristocracy there could be no real leadership in America, and the vacuum would inevitably be filled by politicians, whom he detested. Nor did he have any faith in reform or reformers.

As for Puritanism, Mencken believed that it had always been the dominant force in our history and had left Americans the narrow minded victims of religious bigotry. The predominance during the 1920's of the more extreme forms of Fundamentalism gave some support to his argument. But in his attacks on religion he made the mistake of throwing the baby out with the bath water, since he was himself a complete skeptic, he simply could not conceive of such a creature as a sincere and yet intelligent Christian. The terms were to him incompatible, quite genuinely, he could see no difference between Billy Sunday and Archbishop Temple.

Mencken's enemies were always urging him, in anguished tones, to leave this country if he found it so distasteful. His reply was that nowhere else could so much entertainment be had so cheaply. According to his calculations, it cost him personally only eighty cents a year to maintain Harding in the White House. Where could a better show be found for the money?

In spite of his exaggerations, crudities, and often bad taste, Mencken performed a valuable service. America always needs a gadfly, and his cynical wit provided the sting at just the right moment. Unfortunately, he has had no successor.

THE PRELUDE

Type of work Poem

Author William Wordsworth (1770-1850)

First published 1850

Planned as the introductory portion of a long autobiographical and philosophical poem that was never finished, The Prelude, or, Growth of a Poet's Mind, was not published until shortly after Wordsworth's death in 1850. The projected, long poem, The Recluse, was to present a comprehensive development of the poet's views on man, society, and nature, but of the projected three parts, only the second, The Excursion (1814) was ever completed and published.

The Prelude was to provide the autobiographical introduction to The Recluse, tracing the development of the poet and his mind to the point where he was ready to formulate his beliefs and philosophy. Written between 1799 and 1805 and addressed to Coleridge as the important "Friend," the poem is a long and ambitious work, an attempt in blank verse to trace the history and development of the poet's feelings, ideas, and convictions.

Since Wordsworth so strongly advocated the use of poetry for individual emotions and insights, it is appropriate that we should have such a thorough description of the development of his mind. In addition, The Prelude contains some fine passages that illustrate the clarity and force of Wordsworth's use of language to convey both a precise description and a sense of the meaning of nature. Although the poem suffers from long prosaic stretches, it also contains much of the sense of the calm beauty and power of nature which distinguishes Wordsworth's verse.

The poem begins with an account of the poet's childhood in the English Lake

Country, and Wordsworth, with many digressions addressed to nature and its power, wisdom, and infusing spirit, tells of the influence of nature on his solitary childhood. Some of the sense of awe and pleasure that he found in nature, as well as some of his clearest and most penetrating use of diction, is evident in the following passage. Young Wordsworth has found a boat in a cave, unchained the boat, and rowed out into the center of a lake. He continues

lustly

I dipped my oars into the silent lake,
 And as I rose upon the stroke, my boat
 Went heaving through the water like a swan
 When from behind that craggy steep
 till then
 The horizon's bound a huge peak,
 black and huge
 As if with voluntary power instinct
 Upreared its head. I struck and struck
 again,
 And growing still in stature the grim shape
 Towered up between me and the stars,
 and still,
 For so it seemed, with purpose of its own
 And measured motion like a living thing,
 Strode after me

The image of the peak is invested with such simplicity and power that it is transformed into a kind of force holding terror and beauty for the guilty boy who has stolen a ride in a boat.

In describing his early years, the poet speaks of his youthful love of freedom and liberty. He found this sense of freedom in his rambles through the woods and on mountain paths where he did not feel fettered by the claims of society and school work. But, he reassures the reader, he was docile and obedient externally, keeping his rebellion and sense of freedom as a matter of the spirit. This mixture of the calm and docile exterior with the independent and rebellious interior seems part of the origin of Wordsworth's ability to control highly individualistic thought in calm, dignified unostentatious verse forms and diction. It is not that, in The Prelude, Wordsworth uses the speech of common man. His speech is often abstract, speculative, pervaded with a sense of the mystery and meaning of nature. Rather, Wordsworth's diction, at its best, has a dignity and calm control, a lack of pretense, through which the force of his inner meaning gently radiates.

Wordsworth continues his journey through Cambridge, telling of experiences there, discussing the fact that he neither was nor cared to be a scholar. He still, despite his studies, concentrates inwardly on the spirit of things, the power of nature and the impetus nature gives to his feelings. At this point, Wordsworth begins to speculate on the differences between reason and emotion or passion, to equate the reason with the scholars and the emotion with his own apprehension of the world of nature.

But all the meditations of mankind
 Yea all the adamant holds of truth
 By reason built, or passion, which itself
 Is highest reason in a soul sublime,

Throughout the poem, Wordsworth makes the distinction between reason and passion, attributing an ultimate sterility to the quality of reason, while glorifying the element of passion or imagination.

Wordsworth tells next of his journey to the Alps after leaving Cambridge. The mountains there reminded him of the mountains familiar in his childhood, and he felt again, even more keenly, the majesty and awe of the scenery reflected in his spirit. He begins, more strongly, to feel his kinship with nature. In perhaps the dullest section of the poem, he describes his life among the crowds and industries of London, along with his tours of the historical monuments, after his return from Europe. Dissatisfied with life in London, he then went to France during the early stages of the French Revolution. In this section he expresses his feeling that he had not cared for man sufficiently, that, in his devotion to nature, he has neglected his feeling for his fellow creatures. Recalling his early love for freedom and liberty and adding his new conviction of the importance of political liberty for man, Wordsworth became strongly attracted to the cause of the French Revolution, feeling, as he said in The Prelude, that he was tied emotionally and spiritually to the popular struggle against the monarchy. But the bloodiness of the revolution popular in gratitude and popular refusal to acknowledge the heroes who championed its cause with greatest fervor and sincerity, soon disillusioned Wordsworth. Beginning to feel that blood had poisoned the cause of liberty, he returned to England.

Wordsworth relates how, disillusioned and alone, he sought to bring meaning back into his life. The penultimate section of The Prelude is titled "Imagination and Taste, How Impaired and Restored." At that period of his life he turned back to nature, finding there not solace alone but a sense of law and order that was lacking in man. He began to realize the difference in scale between nature and man, the range and effect of nature in comparison to the tiny ineffectuality of man. His sections of resolution frequently include passages like the following interpolation in the midst of a narrative section:

O Soul of Nature! that, by laws divine Sustained and governed, still dost over flow
With an impassioned life, what feeble ones
Walk on this earth!

In his view, nature provides not only awe and spiritual impetus for man, but also order, rules of conduct, and the means of man's molding his behavior on this planet. In the final sections of the poem, Wordsworth uses nature as the authority for his new morality and assumes a much more overtly moral tone. He didactically advocates the importance of faith, of obedience, of not relying on man's unaided reason in human affairs. What was, in the earlier sections the praise of emotion and freedom in opposition to rational restraint becomes the praise of the restraint of faith and spirit in opposition to rational license. This change is illustrative of the change in Wordsworth's whole career from the poet advocating the simple joy and freedom of nature to the sage defending abstract and conventional truths. His attitude is demonstrated in the following passage from the conclusion of the poem:

but, the dawn beginning now
To reappear, 'twas proved that not in vain
I had been taught to reverence a Power
That is the visible quality and shape
And image of right reason that matures
Her processes by steadfast laws gives birth
To no impatient or fallacious hopes
No heat of passion or excessive zeal,
No vain conceits provokes to no quick turns
Of self-applauding intellect but trains
To meekness, and exalts by humble faith

As The Prelude shows Wordsworth's changing attitudes toward nature and man, both relating and illustrating the changes and development in his mind, so the poem also shows the different characteristics of Wordsworth's diction and poetic power. No other single poem has so much of his clear reverence for nature expressed with greater power and simplicity along with so much of his moralizing expressed with repetitive flatness. The Prelude is truly an autobiographical poem, a monument to the career, the changing ideas, and the changing use of poetry of and by William Wordsworth.

THE PRINCE

Type of work Philosophy of politics
Author Niccolò Machiavelli (1469 1527)
Time Fifteenth and sixteenth centuries
Locale Principally Italy
First published 1532

Principal personages

CESARE BORGIA, Duke of Valentinois and Romagna

FRANCESCO SFORZA, Duke of Milan

POPE ALEXANDER VI, Roderigo Borgia, father of Cesare and Lucrezia Borgia

POPE JULIUS II

CATERINA SFORZA Countess of Forlì

LOUIS XII, King of France

This is the book that gives meaning to the critical adjective "Machiavellian." It is an ingenious and fascinating study of the art of practical politics, composed by a man who never rose higher than the position of secretary to the Second Chancery in Florence. The success of his book is due partly to his wit and partly to his having known some of the most clever and powerful rogues of the Renaissance. His model for the "Prince" was Cesare Borgia, a man who used all means of conquest, including murder, to achieve and hold political position.

Machiavelli never pretended that his book was a guide to the virtuous. On the other hand, he did not set out to prescribe the way to wickedness. He meant his account to be a practical guide to political power, and through a combination of experience, logic, and imagination he constructed one of the most intriguing handbooks of Western civilization: a primer for princes.

In beginning a discussion concerned with the manners and attitudes of a prince—that is, a ruler of a state—Machiavelli writes

Since it has been my intention to write something which may be of use to the understanding reader, it has seemed wiser to me to follow the real truth of the matter rather than what we imagine it to be. For imagination has created many principalities and republics that have never been seen or known to have any real existence, for how we live is so different from how we ought to live that he who studies what ought to be done rather than what is done will learn the way to his downfall rather than to his preservation.

This passage makes it clear that Machiavelli intended to explain how successful politicians actually work rather than how they ought to work.

The Prince begins with a one paragraph chapter which illustrates Machiavelli's logical approach to the problem of advising prospective princes. He claims that all states are either republics or monarchies. Monarchies are either hereditary or new. New monarchies are either entirely new or acquired. Acquired states have either been dominated by a prince or been free, and they are acquired either by a prince's own arms or by those of others, and they fall to him either by fortune or because of his own character and ability.

Having outlined this inclusive logical bifurcation, Machiavelli first discusses the problems connected with governing a hereditary monarchy, and then goes on to discuss mixed monarchies.

In each case, as his argument develops, Machiavelli considers what the logical alternatives are, and what should be done in each case if the prince is to acquire and hold power. In writing of mixed monarchies, for example, having pointed out that acquired states are either culturally similar to the conquering state or not, he then considers each possibility. If the acquired state is culturally similar, it is no problem to keep it, but if the acquired state is different in its customs, laws, or language, then there is a problem to be solved. One solution might be to have the ruler go to the acquired territory and live there. As an example, Machiavelli refers to the presence of the Turkish ruler in Greece.

Another possibility for solving the problem which arises when an acquired territory differs culturally from the conquering state is the establishment of colonies. Colonies are inexpensive to acquire and maintain, he argues, because the land is acquired from a few land owners of the conquered territory and they are the only ones who complain. Such a plan is preferable to maintaining soldiers, for policing a new state is expensive and, in addition, offends the citizens being policed.

Thus, by the somewhat mechanical device of considering logical alternatives, Machiavelli uses his limited experience to build a guide to power. What he says, although refreshing in its direct approach to the hard facts of practical politics, is not entirely fanciful or naïve. Not only did Machiavelli, through his diplomatic missions, come to know intimately such leaders as Louis XII, Julius II, the Emperor Maximilian, and Cesare Borgia, but he also used his time to advantage noting political tricks that actually worked and building up his store of psychological truths.

It is doubtful that any ruler or rebel ever succeeded simply because he followed Machiavelli to the letter, but it may well be that some political coups have been the result of inspiration from The Prince. (Indeed, shortly after Fidel Castro's overthrow of the Batista government in Cuba in 1959, a newspaper account reported that among the books on Castro's revolutionary reading list was Machiavelli's The Prince.)

What is inspiring for the politically ambitious in The Prince is not the substance but the attitude, not the prescription but the unabashed, calculating, and aggressive air with which the author analyzes the means to power.

For the reader without political ambition The Prince is a sometimes amusing and sometimes frightening reminder of the realities of political fortune. For example, Machiavelli writes that anyone who helps another to power is bound to fall himself because he has contributed to the success either by his cleverness or his power, and no prince can tolerate the existence of either in another person close to him. This is a lesson which would have been useful to some of the men close to the top in the U.S.S.R.

Machiavelli considers this question: Why did the kingdom of Darius, occupied by Alexander the Great, not rebel after Alexander's death? The answer is that monarchies are governed either by a prince and his staff or by a prince and a number of barons. A monarchy controlled by the prince through his representatives is very difficult to conquer, since the entire staff owes its existence to the prince and is, consequently, loyal. But once such a monarchy is captured, power is easily maintained. So it was in Alexander's case. But a nation like the France of Machiavelli's day is ruled by a king and barons. The barons are princes of a sort over their portions of the state, and they maintain control over their subjects. It is easy to conquer such a state because there are always unhappy barons willing to join a movement to overthrow the king. But once conquered, such a state is difficult to hold because the barons may regroup and overthrow the new prince.

Sometimes power is acquired through crime, Machiavelli admits, and he cites a violent example: the murder of Giovanni Fogliani of Fermo by his nephew Oliverotto. Machiavelli advises that the cruelty necessary to attain power be kept to a minimum and not be continued, for the purely practical reason that the prince will lose power otherwise. The best thing to do, says the author, is to commit one's acts of cruelty all at once, not over an extended period.

This cold practicality is echoed in such injunctions as those to the effect that if one cannot afford to be generous, accept with indifference the name of miser, it is safer to be feared than to be loved, if one must choose a prince need not have a morally worth while character, but he must appear to have it if a prince's military support is good, he will always have good friends, to keep power one must be careful not to be hated by the people, it is always wiser for a prince to be a true friend or a true enemy than to be neutral, a prince should never listen to advice unless he asks for it, and it is better to be bold than cautious.

Machiavelli's prime examples are Francesco Sforza and Cesare Borgia, particularly the latter. The author writes that he is always able to find examples for his points by referring to the deeds of Borgia. Considering the value of using auxiliary arms, the military force of another state, Machiavelli refers to Borgia's unfortunate experience with auxiliaries in the capture of Romagna. Finding the auxiliaries untrustworthy, Borgia turned to mercenaries, but they were no better, so he finally used only his own troops. Machiavelli's conclusion in regard to auxiliary troops is that "If any one wants to make sure of not winning he will avail himself of troops such as these."

After reviewing Cesare Borgia's rise to power (with the remark that "I could not suggest better precepts to a new prince than the examples of Cesare's actions"), Machiavelli concludes that "I can find nothing with which to reproach him, rather it seems that I ought to point him out as an example to all those who have risen to power by fortune or by the arms of others." This praise follows a description of such acts as Borgia's killing of as many of the hapless lords he had despoiled "as he could lay hands on."

Machiavelli praises the actions of other leaders, such as Francesco Sforza and Popes Alexander VI and Julius II, but only Cesare Borgia wins unqualified praise. Sforza, for example, is recognized as having become Duke of Milan "by the proper means and through his own ability," but later on he is criticized because of a castle he built when he should have been trying to win the good will of the people.

The Prince concludes with a plea to the Medici family to free Italy from the "barbarians" who ruled the republic of Florence and kept Italy in bondage. Machiavelli makes a plea for liberation, expresses his disappointment that Borgia is not available because of a turn of fortune, and closes with the capitalized cry that "THIS BARBARIAN OCCUPATION STINKS IN THE NOSTRILS OF ALL OF US."

Unfortunately for the author, his plea to the Medici family did him no good, and he died with the Republic still in power. Perhaps he himself was not bold enough, perhaps he was not cruel enough. In any case, he left behind a work to be used by any leader willing to be both.

THE PRINCE OF HOMBURG

Type of work Drama

Author Heinrich von Kleist (1777-1811)

Type of plot Historical tragedy

Time of plot 1675

Locale Prussia

First presented 1821

Principal characters

FREDERICK WILLIAM Elector of Brandenburg

THE ELECTRESS

PRINCESS NATALIE OF ORANGE niece of the elector

FIELD MARSHAL DORFLING

PRINCE FREDERICK ARTHUR OF HOMBURG

COLONEL KOTWITZ of the regiment of the Princess of Orange

COUNT HOHENZOLLERN, of the elector's suite

Critique

Heinrich von Kleist led a short, turbulent life as a poet and died by his own hand at the age of thirty four. Predestined by family tradition to spend a life of service to his own country, he entered the army at the age of fourteen. However, constant yearnings toward creativeness led him to secure a discharge. He then embarked on a course of study which included Kant's philosophy and the theories of Rousseau. He began to pour all of his creative powers, which were singular for a man in his mid twenties, into a series of plays. One of these was the farcical The Broken Jug, the only light piece he was to compose. His early works met with little success, for he had a limited knowledge of the techniques of writing for the stage. He was essentially a romanticist. The Prince of Homburg, his last dramatic work, employs romantic poetic imagery, but its subject presupposes a vital, realistic framework. The play contains rich characterizations which convey the Prussian virtues of discipline and obedience. Its chief fault lies in the lack of stage techniques, it is episodic, lacking in action, and cluttered with a number of secondary characters.

The Story

After three days of heading a cavalry charge in pursuit of the Swedes, Prince Frederick Arthur of Homburg had returned to Fehrbellin. Exhausted and battle weary, the prince fell into a dream like sleep, weaving a laurel wreath as he half dozed. The Elector Frederick William was informed by Count Hohenzollern of the prince's strange condition, and as the elector, the electress, and their niece, Princess Natalie, appeared in the garden where he slept, a strange thing occurred. The elector took the wreath from the prince, entwined it in his neck chain and gave it to Natalie. They backed away as the somnambulist prince followed murmuring incoherently, and as they retreated inside, the prince snatched a glove from Natalie's hand.

When the prince awoke, he told Count Hohenzollern about the occurrence, which he thought had been a dream. Hohenzollern reproved him for his romantic fantasies and urged him to make ready for the coming battle with the Swedes.

The field marshal of Brandenburg was dictating the orders of battle to his officers, but the prince, who was to play an important role in the battle, was absorbed with his thoughts. Hoping to remember from whom he had got the glove, he wore it in his collar. The electress and Natalie were present, and plans were being formed to send them to a place of safety. As the field marshal reached the section of the orders which pertained to the prince, Natalie, preparing to depart, suddenly realized that she had but one glove. The prince, who loved Natalie, quickly became aware that he held the missing glove. In order to be sure it was hers, he dropped it on the floor in front of him. Natalie claimed it, and the prince, in a fit of ecstasy, did not hear his battle orders clearly though his mission was to be a key one.

The battlefield of Fehrbellin resounded with cannon and the elector's forces were sure of victory. As the rout of the Swedes became apparent, the prince precipitously gave orders to advance. His colleagues made an effort to dissuade him from this impetuous action, insisting that he hear the order of battle again he was definitely supposed to remain in his position until a given signal. However, when the arduous prince rebuked Kottwitz, an elderly colonel, for lack of fervency, Kottwitz, rather than appear unpatriotic, joined the prince in the advance.

The electress and Natalie had paused during their journey to safety at a house in a nearby village, where news reached them that the elector had died in battle, both he and his great white horse were reported killed during the bombardment. The prince sought out the women and took the opportunity to tell the distraught Natalie of his love for her, and to offer her his protection. The elector was her last relative, now that he was dead she had no one to turn to.

But the elector was not dead. He had changed horses with one of his officers, and the officer astride the white horse had been mistakenly identified as the elector. The same messenger who brought word that the elector was still alive had further news for rejoicing. The war was over for the time being, and the elector had returned to Berlin.

It became apparent to the elector that Prince Frederick was responsible for ignoring the battle order, and although terms for peace with the Swedes were being discussed, the strong military spirit of the elector prompted him to punish the prince for failing to follow orders. The prince was sentenced to die and placed in prison to await the day of his execution.

The prince, given permission to visit the electress, begged clemency through her. She was touched by his plea, as was Natalie, who threw herself at the feet of the elector to beg for the prince's life. In addition to Natalie's plea, the officers of the elector's army circulated a petition asking that the prince's life be spared. At last the elector agreed to pardon him.

Natalie took the letter of pardon from the elector to the prince's cell. But upon his reading the pardon, events took a different turn. In his letter the elector had specified that the prince's sword would be returned if the young man thought the elector had been unjust in his sentence. The prince then refused the pardon, his military training and nationalistic spirit prompted him to realize that the sentence was just.

The officers of the army visited the elector to plead on the prince's behalf. Count Hohenzollern made the strongest case. Had the elector not deceived the young prince by snatching the laurel wreath and entwining it with his neck chain, the prince would not have felt an uncontrollable destiny forcing him into battle. Therefore, it was the elector's own fault that the prince's mind had been clouded by what he thought was a vision foretelling valorous deeds. The elector countered by blaming Count Hohenzollern himself for the whole affair, for he was the one who had led the elector to the sleeping prince.

When the prince appeared before the assembled officers and the elector, he was ready to die, nevertheless, he made such a strong plea to the elector that he was able to save himself. Meanwhile, peace with Gustaf Karl of Sweden had been effected by promising Natalie's hand to a Swedish nobleman. The prince begged the elector to revoke the agreement and to attack the Swedes instead. The elector, ordering his troops to resume battle, tore up the death warrant. Prince Frederick Arthur was hailed as the hero of the field of Fehrbellin.

PURPLE DUST

Type of work Drama
Author Sean O'Casey (1884-)
Type of plot Satiric comedy
Time of plot The present
Locale Clune na Geera, Ireland
First presented 1940

Principal characters

CYRIL POGES a pompous English businessman
O KILLIGAIN a foreman stonemason
BASIL STOKE Poges' colleague
SOUHAUN, Poges' mistress
AVRIL, Stoke's mistress
THREE IRISH WORKMEN

Critique

In Purple Dust, Sean O'Casey returned to certain stylistic aspects of his earlier plays the mixture of moving poetry with extravagant comedy. However, though the occasional poetic passages of the Irish workmen concerning their noble past are indeed beautiful, the emphasis of the play is on the profoundly comic aspects of two stuffy Englishmen trying to adjust to the rigors of the bucolic life. O'Casey, as usual, is extolling the hardy Irish, and quite disapproves of men who cling to the past without partly looking to the future. When men venerate the past without a true sense of understanding and appreciation, as do Poges and Stoke, the result is especially disastrous.

The Story

Three workmen were standing languidly in a large, gloomy room that obviously was once the living room of a ruined Elizabethan mansion. The three pondered on the wisdom of two English gentlemen, Cyril Poges and Basil Stoke, in coming to live in such a decaying old house. Though the fresh paint had brightened things up a bit, it covered, for the most part, rotting wood. The sudden appearance of the sixty-five year old Poges and the thirtyish, serious Basil followed by their mistresses, Souhaun and Avril, confirmed the workmen's suspicions that the owners were slightly awry in their thinking, the group danced in, boisterously singing of the joys of country living. The handsome foreman, O'Killigain, explained to the workmen that these were people who saw historical loveliness in decaying ruins, and who took foolish delight in any locale with a story behind it. With the reappearance of the pretty Avril, O'Killigain exerted his poetic Irish charm to entice her into a rendezvous later that night.

Poges, Basil, and Souhaun returned from a tramp in the fields. Poges and Basil talked excitedly about the glories of past history and its better times, much to the disgust of O'Killigain, who firmly believed that life in its present state was far more worth living. His philosophy was lost on the other two, who went about their comic business of hanging pictures and discovering new aspects of country living—new business for them, but common enjoyment for the hardy Irish workmen.

Although Poges wanted to forget the outside world and its ways, his reverie was constantly interrupted by prosaic occurrences—arguments with Basil and the girls, altercations with his butler over men outside who wished to know if he desired roosters and hens, and interruptions by one of the workmen, who informed him of an excellent buy in a cow Poges raged that he would get in touch with the Department of Agriculture At Poges' displeasure over the disconnected telephone, another workman lost his temper Poges heard himself scorned as a man who thought that the glory of the world could be stuffed into a purse, a man who was patronizing toward the Irish, a mighty race a thousand years older than his own Basil and Avril left for a horseback ride, in spite of warnings that Irish horses were true horses instead of English animals The predictions were accurate, a battered Basil appeared shortly afterward and announced that his horse indeed had become a wild animal, and that when last seen, Avril was riding away quite naked with O'Killigan

PURPLE DUST by Sean O'Casey. By permission of the publishers The Macmillan Co. Copyright 1940 by Sean O'Casey.

The next day brought a cold dawn Though Poges and Basil had spent the night fully clothed, they had almost frozen to death in the old house, along with the rest of the household Poges still tried to rationalize, the cold air would revitalize them and exhilarate them Barney, the butler, and Cloyne the maid, were none the less disgusted with the whole situation, they thought the place an unlighted dungeon As Barney struggled to light a damp fire, Cloyne rushed back into the room to scream that there was a wild bull in the entrance hall This announcement caused a great panic among the transplanted city dwellers Basil reentered with a gun, then ran for his life as Poges roared for help and Cloyne fainted A workman saved them all by shooting out a harmless cow which had innocently wandered into the hallway

Later Poges thought he had found a friend in the same workman, who reminisced with him over glorious days in the past Once again Poges expressed his philosophy that all the greats had gone with their glory, their finery turned to purple dust, and that today's man was shallow by comparison However, O'Killigan and another workman later transfixed Poges by their poetic visions of the glorious Irish past and the fight for independence Although Poges was momentarily surprised to find that these country workers had such depth, his spirit of English nationalism soon reasserted itself

Poges' calamities continued His next misadventure was with an oversized, heavy garden roller Though his friends warned him, Poges persisted in his efforts to operate the machine The result was a wrecked wall, as Poges let the roller get away from him to roll into and through the side of the house Following closely on this incident, a terrified Basil shot and killed the indolent cow which had earlier invaded the hallway

An interview with the local canon lifted Poges' spirits when the churchman praised Poges for restoring a portion of the past to slow down the reckless speed of the present As the workmen continued to bring in furniture, Souhaun, like Avril to O'Killigan, almost succumbed to one of the workmen and his poetic charm The moving into the room of a gilded desk bureau proved to be another disaster The top was first scarred by a workman's boot, then the bureau and the entrance were both damaged as the piece of furniture was pushed and pried through the door

Because the wind was rising and storm clouds were brewing ominously, the workmen were sent away, but not before O'Killigan and the workman had entertained Avril and Souhaun to accompany them The beautiful picture of Irish life conjured quickly by the man left the girls quite unsettled, but Poges and Basil made great fun of the workmen's poetic proposals As the day grew darker and the rain fell, Poges found still other troubles, the postmaster arrived to complain about Poges' midnight phone calls to him Suddenly the sound of a galloping horse was heard over the howl of the wind

Warned that the river was rising, the terrified group in the darkened room made plans to climb to the roof before the house was flooded Souhaun was nowhere to be found, she was with the workman on the galloping horse O'Kill-ligain, who had said that he would come for Avril when the river rose, appeared as he had promised Avril left, renouncing Basil as a gilded monkey Basil ran for the roof and a defeated Poges followed slowly, longing, once more, for dear England

PYGMALION

Type of work Drama

Author Bernard Shaw (1856 1950)

Time c 1900

Locale London

First presented 1913

Principal characters

HENRY HIGGINS, a phonetician

ELIZA DOOLITTLE, a flower girl

ALFRED DOOLITTLE, her father, a dustman

COLONEL PICKERING, another phonetician

FREDDY EYNSFORD HILL, a poor young gentleman

Throughout his career Shaw agitated for the reform of the vagaries of English spelling and pronunciation, nevertheless his assertion is immaterial that Pygmalion was written to impress upon the public the importance of phoneticians in modern society Pygmalion, like all of Shaw's best plays, transcends its author's didactic intent The play will continue to be performed and read, not for indoctrination into one of Shaw's pet theories, but for the laughter its characters provoke

The play is a modern adaptation of the Pygmalion myth (though some have claimed that it is a plagiarism of Tobias Smollett's Peregrine Pickle), in which the sculptor king Pygmalion falls in love with a creature of his making, a statue which Aphrodite, pitying him, brings to life The Pygmalion of Shaw's play turns up as Henry Higgins, a teacher of English speech, his Galatea, Eliza Doolittle, a cockney flower girl whom Higgins transforms into a seeming English lady, mainly by teaching her to speak cultivated English In the process of transforming a poor girl into a lady, Higgins irrevocably changes a human life By lifting Eliza above her own class and providing her with only the appurtenances of another, Higgins makes her unfit for both On this change and Higgins' stubborn refusal to accept its reality and its consequences, Shaw builds his play

From the beginning, when Higgins first observes her dialectal monstrosities, Eliza is characterized as a proud, stubborn girl, even though educated only by the cruelties of poverty and the gutter Brassy enough to ask Higgins to make good his boast that he can pass her off as a duchess within three months, she calls on him and offers to pay him for elocution lessons which will take her off the streets and into a position as saleswoman in a flower shop Like all the proud, she is also sensitive, and she tries to break off the interview when Higgins persists in treating her as his social inferior Little wonder, then, that months later, when Higgins has indeed proved his boast, she resents his indifference toward her and her future, and, after telling him what a cad he is, runs away to his mother, who has befriended her

Higgins can best be understood in contrast to Colonel Pickering, his foil, who finances the transformation As a fellow phonetician, Pickering approves of the project as a scientific experiment, but as a gentleman he sympathizes with Eliza as a sensitive human being It is Higgins' uproariously tragic flaw that he, like all of Shaw's heroes, is not a gentleman He is brilliant and cultured, but he lacks manners and refuses to learn or even affect any, believing himself to be superior to the conventions and civilities of polite society and preferring to treat everyone with bluntness and candor. He is, or so he thinks until Eliza leaves him, a self-sufficient man. When he discovers that she has made herself an indispensable part of his life, he goes to her and in one of the most remarkable courtship scenes in the history of the theater pleads with her to live with Pickering and himself as three dedicated bachelors. At the end of the play he is confident that she will accept his unorthodox proposition, even when she bids him goodbye forever.

As a matter of fact, Shaw himself was never able to convince anyone that Eliza and Higgins did not marry and live happily ever after. The first producer of the play, Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tree, insisted on leaving the impression that the two were reconciled in the end as lovers, and this tradition has persisted. Enraged as always by any liberties taken with his work, Shaw wrote an essay which he attached to the play as a sequel denouncing any sentimental interpretation of Pygmalion.

He concedes that Pygmalion is a romance in that its heroine undergoes an almost miraculous change, but he argues that the logic of the characterization does not permit a conventional happy ending. Higgins is, after all, a god and Eliza only his creation, so that an abyss separates them. Furthermore, Shaw contends, their personalities, backgrounds, and philosophies are irreconcilable. Higgins is an inveterate bachelor and likely to remain one because he will never find a woman who can meet the standards he has set for ideal womanhood—those set by his mother. Eliza, on the other hand, being young and pretty, can always find a husband whose demands on a woman would not be impossible to meet. Therefore, Shaw insists, Eliza marries Freddy Eynsford Hill, a penniless but devoted young man who played only an insignificant role in the play itself. Stubbornly, Shaw would not even permit them the luxury of living happily ever after; they have financial problems which are gradually solved by opening a flower shop subsidized by Colonel Pickering. Shaw's Pygmalion is too awe-inspiring for his Gala tea ever to presume to love him.

Even with the addition of such an unconventional ending to the play, Pygmalion would be highly atypical of Shawian drama were it not for the presence of Alfred Doolittle, Eliza's father. Through Doolittle, Shaw is able to indulge in economic and social moralizing, an ingredient Shaw could not dispense with. Like Eliza, Doolittle undergoes a transformation as a result of Higgins' meddling, a transformation that is unpremeditated, however, in his case. Early in the play Doolittle fascinates Higgins and Pickering by his successful attempt to capitalize on Eliza's good fortune. He literally charms Higgins out of five pounds by declaring himself an implacable foe of middle class morality and insisting that he will use the money for a drunken spree. Delighted with the old scoundrel, Higgins mentions him in jest to a crackpot American millionaire who subsequently bequeathes Doolittle a yearly allowance of three thousand pounds if he will lecture on morality. Thus he becomes a dustman transformed into a lion of London society, a reprobate changed into a victim of bourgeois morality. Although he appears only twice in the play, Doolittle is so vigorous and funny that he is almost as memorable a comic character as Higgins.

The truth of the matter is that the play itself is memorable because of its vigor and fun, notwithstanding Shaw's protestations about its didacticism. The reason why Shaw did protest so much in his insistence on the serious intent of the play may lie in his realization that Pygmalion was his least serious, least didactic, play.

THE RAMAYANA

Type of work Poem

Author Valmiki (fl fourth century B C)

Type of plot Religious epic

Time of plot Remote antiquity

Locale India

First transcribed c 350 B C

Principal characters

RAMA, a prince and incarnation of Vishnu

SITA, his wife

LAKSHMAN, his brother and loyal follower

DASA RATHA, his father, King of the Kosalas

RAVAN, Demon king of Lanka (Ceylon)

KAIKEYI, one of King Dasa ratha's wives and enemy of Rama

Critique

Although relatively unknown to Western readers, the story of Rama is one of the most popular tales among the people of India, where the story holds great religious significance. In India, where the tale has been recounted for untold generations, there are several versions of the story, but the main outlines remain the same, with Rama and Sita the idealized versions of Man and Woman. To the Western reader the characters may appear to be human beings with supernatural powers, roughly equivalent to certain figures in Greek legend and myth, but to Hindus the characters of the Ramayana (The Fortunes of Rama) are more than this, they are gods, to be revered today as they have been in ages past. Scholars disagree on the various versions of the Ramayana, and the problem of the original story and additions by later generations of storytellers will perhaps never be solved. The best approach for a general reader is probably to accept the story and enjoy it.

The Story

King Dasa ratha of the Kosalas, who kept his court at Ayodhya, had four sons, though not all by the same mother. According to legend, the god Vishnu, in answer to King Dasa-ratha's supplications, had given a divine liquor to each of the king's wives, so that they might bring forth sons, each of whom was partly an incarnation of Vishnu. Of the sons born, Rama was the handsomest and strongest of all, his mother having drunk more of the magic beverage than Dasa ratha's other wives.

When Rama grew to manhood he heard of Sita, beautiful, talented, and virtuous daughter of King Janak and the Earth mother. King Janak was the possessor of a wondrous bow, a mighty weapon that had belonged to the gods, and King Janak resolved that whoever could bend the bow should have Sita for his wife. The king knew, of course, that no ordinary mortal could possibly accomplish the feat.

Rama and his brothers traveled to the court of King Janak and were granted permission to try drawing the mighty bow. With ease Rama bent the bow, with such strength that the weapon snapped in two. King Janak promised that Sita should be Rama's bride and that each of his half brothers, too, should have a noble bride from the people of Videha.

So Sita became the wife of Rama; her sister Urmila became the bride of Lakshman, Rama's favorite brother; Mandavi and Sruta-kriti, cousins of Sita, became the wives of Bharat and Satrugna, the other half brothers of Rama. When all returned to Ayodhya, Dasa ratha, fearing that rivalry between his children might create unhappiness and tragedy in his house, sent Bharat and Satrugna to live with their mothers' people

Years passed, and King Dasa ratha grew old. Wishing to have the time and opportunity to prepare himself for the next life, he proposed that Rama, his favorite son, should become regent. The king's council and the populace rejoiced in the proposal, and plans were made to invest Rama with the regency and place him on the Kosala throne. Before the preparations had been completed, however, Manthara, a maid to Queen Kaikeyi, one of King Dasa ratha's wives, advised the queen that Rama's succession to the throne should be prevented and that Bharat, Queen Kaikeyi's son, should become regent. The ill advice was heard, and Queen Kaikeyi remembered that she had been promised two boons by her husband. So when King Dasa ratha came to her she asked that Bharat should be made regent and that Rama should go into exile for fourteen years. King Dasa ratha was sad, but he had given his word and he must fulfill his promises. Like a dutiful son, Rama heard his father's decision and prepared to go into exile. He expected to go alone, but his wife Sita and his brother Lakshman prepared to go with him to share his lonely and uncomfortable exile in the dismal Dandak forest. The Kosala people mourned his departure and accompanied him on the first day of his journey away from Ayodhya.

Leaving his native country, Rama journeyed south. He and his companions crossed the Ganges River and came to the hermitage of Bharad vasa, a holy man. After visiting with him they went on to the hill of Chitrakuta, where stood the hermitage of Valmiki, a learned and holy man. There they learned that King Dasa ratha had died the day after Rama's departure from Ayodhya, remembering in his hour of death a curse laid on him by a hermit whose son he had accidentally killed. Rama stayed with Valmiki for a time. Bharat returned to Ayodhya to become regent, as his mother had planned. However, he recognized Rama's claim and set out on a journey to find Rama and to ask him to become King of the Kosalas. But Rama, having given his word, remained in exile as he had vowed to do. Bharat returned to Ayodhya to place Rama's sandals on the throne as a symbol of Rama's right to the kingship.

In order that his kinsmen might not find him again, Rama left Valmiki's hermitage and after a long journey he established his own hermitage near the dwelling of Agastya, a holy and learned man. There Rama, Sita, and Lakshman lived in peace until they were disturbed by a demon maiden, enamored of Rama, who had been repulsed in her addresses by both Rama and Lakshman. Spurned and seeking revenge, she went to her brother, Ravan, demon king of Lanka (Ceylon) and asked his help. Ravan was a powerful being who through asceticism had achieved power even over the gods. His domination, according to legend, could be broken only by an alliance of men and the monkey people. Ravan sent a demon in the disguise of a deer to lead Rama astray while on the hunt. When Rama failed to return, Sita insisted that Lakshman go look for him. In the absence of the brothers, Ravan came and abducted Sita.

Rama, having learned what had happened, allied himself with the monkey people in order to make war upon the demons and win back his beloved wife. Hanuman, one of the monkey people's leaders, found Sita at Ravan's palace and led Rama and the forces of the monkey people to Ceylon. There Ravan's city was besieged and many battles were fought, with combat between the great leaders of both sides and pitched battles between the forces of good and evil. Finally Ravan and his demon forces were defeated, Ravan was killed, and Sita was rescued and restored to her husband. Sita, who had remained faithful to Rama throughout her captivity, proved in an ordeal by fire that she was still virtuous and worthy to be Rama's wife.

Rama, Sita, and Lakshman returned in triumph to Ayodhya, where Rama was welcomed and became king of the Kosala people. Rumors were spread, however, that Sita had not been faithful to her husband, until at last Rama sent his wife away, and she went to live at the hermitage of Valmiki. Shortly after her arrival at the hermitage she gave birth to Rama's sons.

More years passed and the two sons grew up, tutored in their youth by the wise Valmiki, who took his charges eventually to Ayodhya. There Rama, recognizing them as his sons, sent for Sita and had her conducted to his court. Since her virtue had been in doubt, she was asked for a token that she had been true to her marriage vows. The earth opened to a great chasm, and the Earth mother herself rose up on her throne to speak on behalf of Sita and to take her to the land of the gods. Thus Sita was taken away from the husband and the people who had doubted her.

RAMEAU'S NEPHEW

Type of work Novel in the form of a dialogue

Author Denis Diderot (1713-1784)

Time 1761

Locale Paris

First published In German, translated by Goethe, 1805; in French, 1823

Principal characters

RAMEAU, nephew of Jean Philippe Rameau, a French composer

DIDEROT, the author, French encyclopedist and writer

Rameau's Nephew could hardly have been other than the work of a French author. It submits to no simple classification, although fictional, the characters were actual persons and their ideas, in all probability, were their own. But there is the problem—for those who concern themselves about such matters—of deciding how much of Diderot can be found in the character Rameau, and how much of Rameau was in Diderot. On the one hand, the character Diderot is a mild champion of traditional values, and Rameau is a vivacious apologist for roguery. But the brilliant turns of this satirical dialogue suddenly force upon the reader the suspicion that Diderot, the author, is delighted with the convention-defying attitudes of his friend Rameau, perhaps Diderot believes Rameau more than Rameau believes himself.

The dialogue is a satirical critique of manners and morals. It makes particular reference to prominent writers, musicians, politicians, critics, and other leading figures of eighteenth-century France. Many of the comments are unkind, and some are painfully so—or would have been had the work been published at the time of its composition. But Diderot kept his lively satire under wraps, not only because of its references to living persons but also because of a reluctance to stir up the censor and all others to whom Rameau's carefree morality might prove intolerable.

The character Rameau is marvelously wrought to suit Diderot's intention. Although Rameau is clearly an individual and is convincing, as witty rogues in literature usually are, he is not simply one thing or another. On the contrary, Diderot states that Rameau is his own opposite. Sometimes Rameau is thin, sometimes fat, sometimes he is filthy, sometimes powdered and curled. His physical vacillation is matched by a vacillation of mood. Sometimes he is gay, sometimes depressed, sometimes he is courageous, sometimes timid to the point of fear. Rameau is a sensualist, a lover of wine and wenches. But his passionate defense of an egoistic hedonism is a sign of his need to apologize for his manner, his morality is a device to prop up his manner. Underneath Rameau's abandon the reader perceives a poignant longing for depth and respectability

Having created a character whose contrary traits reveal the human being at odds with himself—thus providing the motive for a discussion of morality—Diderot provides Rameau with a gentlemanly antagonist, the man of ideas, Diderot himself. Diderot's mild responses, ostensibly intended to counter Rameau's philosophy, actually prompt Rameau with the acuity of a Socrates, stimulating Rameau to a lively defense of the sense gratifying life of a social parasite.

Rameau, who contradicts himself within himself, and Diderot, who contradicts Rameau, together bring out the difficulty of all moral problems and of morality itself. Man is neither merely intellectual nor merely sensual, his desire to understand is often in conflict with his desires, and his desires are in conflict with each other. Consequently, no one moral rule or set of principles will do. To be a good man, a person must have a kind of moral genius. For such a person, rules are instruments to be used only with ingenuity and sometimes to be discarded altogether. If a person is at war with himself, or with another, as Rameau is with himself, or with Diderot, a just victory is not always possible. Sometimes there is no such thing as the proper answer. For a good man, life is a creative struggle that must be judged as works of art are judged, without dogmatism and with respect for the impossible goals the human spirit sets for itself. Perhaps the theme of the dialogue is best understood dialectically without the restraint of reason and human consideration, the human being becomes something worse than a fool, but without attention to the fact of human appetites the moralist becomes something less than a human being.

For Rameau is the fool and Diderot is the moralist. But Rameau fancies himself as something of the classic fool, the darling of the courts, the discerning jester who makes the bitter truth palatable. The fact is that he comes close to being a compromising sponger, a guest in great houses only because he is sometimes an amusing conversationalist. Although he comes close to being merely parasitical, he is saved by his own need for apology. A man who must speak to Diderot is already more than a professional guest.

The dialogue is presented against a background of chess. The narrator takes shelter in the Regency Café where the finest chess players of Paris compete with each other. When Rameau enters and engages Diderot in conversation, he begins a kind of verbal chess game that shows him to be the brilliant and erratic player while Diderot is slower but more canny. Rameau's attitude is revealed at once. In response to Diderot's expression of interest in the games, Rameau speaks scornfully of the players—although they are the best in Paris—and when Diderot remarks that Rameau forgives nothing but supreme genius, Rameau retorts that he has no use for mediocrity.

One must read carefully for, to continue the chess metaphor, the moves are deceptive. Rameau argues that evil comes from men of genius, that the genius—and he cites his uncle as an example—is so absorbed in his own work that he neglects family and state, and he concludes that a child showing the mark of genius should be smothered or thrown to the dogs. Diderot asks whether it would have been better if Voltaire had been a "good soul" attending to his business and family and doing nothing more, or whether it was better that, though deceitful, ambitious, and mean, he wrote great plays. The implication is that Diderot prefers the latter. But when Rameau says it would have been better for Voltaire himself if he had been the former, Diderot acknowledges that this is true.

As the conversation continues, each man forces upon the other an appreciation of a perspective quite different from his own. Diderot is fascinated by the antics of Rameau, for Rameau is not only a rascal and a wit but also a great mume whose conversation is enlivened by spontaneous performances in which he shows, by the economy of caricature, the manners of those with whom he must associate

Because Diderot responds to Rameau's zest for life he is saved from unrealistic moralizing. Nevertheless, Rameau can go too far. When he applauds the behavior of an informer whose act resulted in the execution of the informer's friend, Diderot is quick to say that he finds such an attitude repulsive. He considers it almost unbearable to be in the presence of a man who regarded a great crime as something worthy of the same critical admiration one might give to a work of art. But although nothing more is said on the subject, the fact that Diderot admits to being pursued by "dark fancies" suggests that the moralist has caught something of Rameau's aesthetic attitude toward great acts, whether heroic or foul, and feels himself at grips with the problem of evil within himself.

Diderot and Rameau fall into a long critical discourse on music. Rameau is all for music which honestly expresses the passions. The true, the good, and the beautiful are his Father, Son, and Holy Ghost—but his truth and beauty are close to the earth, allied to the passions of men. Diderot admits that there is a great deal of sense in what Rameau says, but he regrets that Rameau talks of nothing but gold, wine, good food, and women.

The moralist must reconcile himself and his morality to the facts of human passion. Somehow Diderot must come to acknowledge Rameau's importance as the creative beast, but as a man of ideas he finds it almost intolerable that not every thing about human action can be reduced to a categorical formula. For Diderot the problem was what it remains for contemporary man, the problem of reconciling Freud's view of man with Christ's conception. In fact, Diderot anticipates Freud twice, within two pages—once, by having Rameau envious of Diderot's literary talent, for in so doing, Rameau accords with Freud's theory of the artist's motive again, when Rameau asserts that were his son to develop without interference, he would want good food and dress, fame, and the love of women, Diderot replies that if the child were left in his natural state, he would grow to manhood knowing no better than to murder his father as a rival and then seduce his own mother.

Like Dostoevski, Diderot appreciated the exceptional man who stepped beyond the bounds of conventional morality, unlike Nietzsche, he did not deify the immoralist. Rameau's Nephew is a skillful and satirical attempt to do justice to man the moralist and also to man the animal.

THE REBEL GENERATION

Type of work Novel

Author Johanna van Ammers Kuller (1884-)

Type of plot Social chronicle

Time of plot 1840-1923

Locale Leyden, Holland

First published 1925

Principal characters

LOUIS CORNVELT, an upper middle class Hollander

NICHOLAS, and

DAVID CORNVELT, his sons

SARAH, and

KATIE CORNVELT, his daughters

MARIE ELIZABETH SYLVAIN (LYSBETH, "SYLVIA"), his niece

THE REBEL GENERATION by Johanna van Ammers Kuller. Translated by M. W. Hoper. By permission of the agent, Curtis Brown, Ltd. Copyright 1928 by E. P. Dutton & Co., Inc. Renewed. All rights reserved.

DR WILLIAM WISEMAN Katie Cornvelt's husband
 (DR) ELIZA WISEMAN daughter of William and Katie
 LOUIS CORNVELT David's son
 CLARA CORNVELT, David's daughter
 MILLICENT CORNVELT great granddaughter of Louis Cornvelt Sr
 STEPHEN CORNVELT Millicent's cousin, in love with her
 DOROTHY CORNVELT, Stephen's wife
 PUCK and
 KITTY CORNVELT, daughters of Stephen and Dorothy

Critique

The Rebel Generation is a sociological novel presenting the changes in middle class Dutch culture through several generations of a single family. It demonstrates how the ethical standards and the mores of the people changed, especially the relationships between parents and children. The novel also presents the struggle by women for equality with men. The presentation of the attempts by women to achieve equality with men shows how seriously nineteenth century women faced the problem and how the solution appeared to women of a later generation to be a mixed blessing. The Rebel Generation is usually considered Johanna van Ammers Kuller's greatest success. It has been translated into several languages and has had a successful production on the stage.

The Story

In 1840, Louis Cornvelt was a prosperous owner of a weaving mill in Leyden. Strongly orthodox and conservative in every way, he was a staunch Calvinist whose beliefs colored his treatment of his family and his employees. His wife, his sons, and his daughters were expected to be completely submissive to his will and the way of life he represented.

Outwardly, at least, they were, until the arrival in the Cornvelt home of an orphaned niece, Marie Elizabeth Sylvain. Reared in a much more permissive atmosphere in the home of her French father, she brought new ideas and an air of rebellion into the Cornvelt home. Three of the sons fell in love with her, but she refused their overtures of love and marriage, for she could not stand the idea of placing herself under the domination of a man. Her rebellion extended so far as to cause her to run away to France when her uncle refused to allow her to earn a living for herself; he felt that such a course might demean him and his family in the eyes of their friends and neighbors.

Marie Elizabeth Sylvain's cousins, fired by her arguments and example, tried to rebel, too, but in the end each submissively accepted their father's domination. Katie Cornvelt married a young medical doctor, William Wiseman, as her father wished, although she found the man's profession and person repugnant to her. Nicholas Cornvelt ran his father's woolen mill in the old way, as his father dictated, even though the younger man realized that more progressive methods were needed if the mill were to compete with more progressive business houses. Sarah Cornvelt gave up the young man she loved when their fathers refused to countenance their marriage. David Cornvelt, in love with his French cousin, gave her up too when his father demanded that he do so. The young people had been so used to domination that they could not break from the habit of obedience, even after they were grown.

By 1872 the children of Louis Cornvelt were themselves middle aged and had children of their own who were approaching maturity. Having been reared in a home completely dominated by their father, the children attempted to rule their families in much the same way and to require of the new generation absolute obedience to parents and loyalty to a harshly conservative code. In their time, however, the new generation was supported and encouraged to rebellion by changes in the life of the time. In Holland as in other European countries, new liberality in politics, new theories in sociology, a breakdown of orthodox religion, and other changes contributed to an outlook that fostered rebellion against paternal domination of children and masculine domination of women.

Dr. William Wiseman and his wife were horrified when their daughter Eliza announced she wished to become a doctor, for such a career had previously been unheard of for a woman. Although her father wanted a son to be a doctor, he could not imagine his daughter becoming one, and he fought to check her interest in medical studies.

Eliza Wiseman found help and encouragement when her mother's cousin, Marie Elizabeth Sylvan, returned to Holland from France to work for the emancipation of women. Marie Elizabeth had received a considerable fortune which she devoted to the cause of equality of the sexes, using the money to assist capable young women to gain an education and to publish periodicals in support of feminine equality. Eliza Wiseman was not the only one in the Cornvelt clan to receive help from their cousin, who called herself Sylvia.

Sarah Cornvelt had married a retired army officer. When her husband died, leaving her with almost no income and several daughters almost grown, Sarah's brothers attempted to take over her affairs, offering her a small allowance from their pockets in return for their domination. Encouraged by her French cousin, Sarah refused to accept the men's proposals and established herself and her daughters as professional dressmakers. Sarah, like her sisters, had had too much domination under the rule of father and husband to accept the domination of her brothers.

David Cornvelt, a distinguished professor, found rebellion in other quarters than his sister Sarah's household. In his own home the younger generation refused to follow his dictates, even though rebellion hurt them and other members of the family. David's son Louis became a political radical and wrote pamphlets that kept his father from appointment to a post in the national cabinet. David's daughter Clara persisted in being a social worker among the lowest classes, even though she gave in to her father in matters of love.

In 1923 the senior members of the Cornvelt family found themselves in their turn faced with a generation of young people who were in rebellion against their parents. By this time even the older generation was dissatisfied. The changes in family relationships were unsatisfactory. So far as women were concerned, emancipation and equality with men had been achieved. Dorothy Cornvelt, married to Dr. Eliza Wiseman's nephew, was a lawyer and a member of Parliament. But her home life was empty, for both her husband and children were indifferent to her professional and political life. Her husband, Stephen Cornvelt, became infatuated with Millicent Cornvelt, a distant cousin from a branch of the family which had migrated to England. His infatuation with the girl was so great that he asked for a divorce, and neither he nor the young girl could see why his wife should deny the request.

The children of Stephen and Dorothy Cornvelt also felt that life was too loose for them. Although they were well educated and free from most parental restraints, they were unhappy. They felt a need for a return to the safety of a stable home and the guidance of older people, even though they disliked interference by their elders. When Stephen tried to dissuade his daughter Kitty from a career as a dancer, she rebelled as violently as any earlier Cornvelt had done. Her sister Puck, however, a successful business woman, indicated by her behavior the course that later generations might take. She gave up her career to marry the man she loved, expecting to find happiness in family life and the influence of her husband. She also rebelled, but her rebellion was against too much freedom, rather than too little.

THE RED ROOM

Type of work Novel

Author August Strindberg (1849-1912)

Type of plot Realistic satire

Time of plot 1870's

Locale Stockholm and X köping, a provincial town in Sweden

First published 1879

Principal characters

ARVID FALK, a writer

CHARLES NICHOLAS FALK, his brother, a businessman

MRS. CHARLES NICHOLAS FALK

SELLEN, a painter

LUNDELL, a practical painter

OLLE MONTANUS, a philosopher and sculptor

YGBERG, a philosopher

REHNHJELM, a would-be actor

LEVIN, a post office clerk

NYSTROM, a schoolmaster

SMITH, a publisher

FALANDER, an actor

AGNES (BEDA PETTERSON), a young actress

STRUVE, a journalist

BORG, a young doctor

Critique

A biting satire leveled against contemporary Swedish society, The Red Room was Strindberg's first published novel. The story deals with the fortunes of a group of young Swedish intellectuals and artists trying to get along in Stockholm of the 1870's. The intellectuals and artists, dedicated to their tasks and to honest appraisals of the society about them, are constantly tricked, defeated, and victimized by the insensitive bourgeois world in which they live. They are constantly faced with poverty (although there are a few examples of unpredictable and temporary success when the artist happens, quite by chance, to catch the public fancy), scorn, or indifference. By the end of the novel, all the artists have either gone mad, committed suicide, or sold out to the commercial society. Various institutions are also satirized: the government agency where a large staff does no work, the newspaper that makes or breaks reputations to suit its purpose without regard to factual accuracy, the Parliament that endlessly debates inconsequential matters, the charitable organization out of touch with reality.

The Story

Arvid Falk, a young government worker who wanted to be a poet, told Struve, a journalist, some facts concerning the waste and inadequacy of a government department where he, Arvid, had worked. Struve worked this material into an exposé for a newspaper that was looking for sensational stories. Arvid was discharged for giving out the information.

Arvid's brother, Charles Nicholas, a flax merchant, liked to feel that he was supporting Arvid by lending him money, offering him cigars, and inviting him to dinner. He could not believe that Arvid,

THE RED ROOM by August Strindberg. Translated by Ellie Schlessner. By permission of the publishers G. P. Putnam's Sons. Copyright 1913 by G. P. Putnam's Sons. Renewed. All rights reserved.

despite certain unconventional opinions, would give out such information for publication. Charles Nicholas was a rising merchant, but his favorite cronies were a beaten clerk named Levin and an apathetic schoolmaster named Nystrom. Levin and Nystrom would flatter Charles Nicholas and write him fulsome verses of appreciation for the small sums of money he lent them. Charles Nicholas had a young wife who slept until noon every day and aspired to become a social and civic leader.

Arvid visited his friends Sellén and Lundell, who were painters, Rehnjelm, who ardently desired to be an actor, and Olle Montanus and Ygberg, who spent all day arguing the fine points of philosophy. All were serious about their art or their arguments, and all were poor. Although the practical Lundell made a living by doing magazine illustrations, the group had little money, frequently they were forced to combine their credit or pawn some of their clothes in order to scrape together enough money for dinner.

Out of a job, Arvid brought some of his verses to Smith, a successful publisher who offered Arvid the job of writing about Ulrica Eleonora, a Swedish historical personage and doing hack work on other trite and uninteresting subjects. Arvid tried to do the work, in which he had no interest at all, but was unable to complete his dull assignments. He joined his friends in the Red Room, a café where they gathered, argued, and spent as little money as possible.

Arvid finally got a job on a newspaper. As a reporter on the affairs of Parliament he did his work successfully, although he was privately outraged at the time wasted in interminable and senseless discussions. Most of the Swedes, however, were proud of their new, more democratic Parliament.

About this time Sellén had succeeded in getting a picture hung in the Academy show. At first it was pointed out as an example of the new decadent, Bohemian art, and as such was criticized by one of the papers. For reasons having nothing to do with art, another paper defended Sellén's painting, and he became a hotly debated and highly successful young man. For the moment all the members of this Bohemian group were working, they were able to pay for their drinks at the Red Room and recover the overcoats they had pawned.

When a group of unscrupulous men organized a marine insurance company called Triton, Charles Nicholas Falk was pleased and flattered to be a member of their board. At the same time his wife was pleased to be on a committee organized to erect a large crèche for a church. Charles Nicholas helped to forward his wife's social ambitions by making a large donation for the crèche, but he made the donation with shares of the marine insurance company. When Mrs. Falk was accepted by society, she made visits to the homes of poor people and tried to convert them to believing in her church. She had little success and assumed that the poor people were simply ignorant and uncouth. Later, when the marine insurance company was proved to be a hoax and collapsed, the project for the crèche, along with Mrs. Falk's social aspirations, had to be abandoned.

In the meantime, Rehnjelm had gone to the town of Xköping and joined a theatrical company. He played only minor parts and the theater manager took advantage of him, but he felt that he was learning the profession. He was impressed by Falander, a suave older actor, and he fell in love with Agnes, a sixteen-year-old ingénue. His love for Agnes was pure and idealistic, and he did not know that she had long been Falander's mistress. When he finally and belatedly discovered this fact, he thought he would commit suicide in his despair at the wickedness in the world. Instead, he returned to Stockholm and the security offered by his wealthy family.

Arvid became a successful journalist and his poems were published at last. He moved from paper to paper every so often in the hope that each would offer him the opportunity to report the news as honestly as he saw it, but the papers were interested only in versions of news or scandal that would fit their particular needs. Frustrated in his efforts, Arvid became friendly with Borg, a cynical and iconoclastic doctor, and he fell in love with Beda Petterson, a young girl who worked in a Stockholm cafe. The vogue for Sellén's work had ended and he was again poor. In the meantime Lundell had become a society portrait painter. One night Borg found Arvid in a low dive with two representatives of a paper even lower than the conventional papers. Arvid had found so unprincipled. Arvid had gone raving mad. Borg took him on a ship voyage under treatment for his nervous breakdown.

When Arvid recovered and returned to Stockholm, he found that the old group at the Red Room had broken up. Olle Montanus, unable to work except as a stonemason, had finally committed suicide. Sellén's painting had again become fashionable. Charles Nicholas had, strangely enough, emerged unscathed from the Triton disaster and was about to establish a bank. Arvid discovered that Beda Petterson and Rehnshjelm's Agnes were really the same woman, a kind of symbol for the faithless woman whose only allegiance is a physical connection to some man. None of his living friends or associates retained any semblance of the idealism and honesty that had once motivated all their actions and conversations. Arvid himself became a conventional schoolmaster, married a schoolmistress, and studied numismatics in his spare time. Only Borg, the skeptic who expected nothing, remained unchanged.

THE REDSKINS

Type of work Novel

Author James Fenimore Cooper (1789-1851)

Type of plot Historical romance

Time of plot 1842

Locale Upstate New York

First published 1846

Principal characters

HUGH ROGER LITTLEPAGE, the narrator and the heir to Ravensnest

HUGH ROGER LITTLEPAGE, called Uncle Ro, his uncle

MARY WARREN, a friend of the Littlepage family

THE REVEREND MR. WARREN, her father

SENECA NEWCOME, an anti-renter

OPPORTUNITY NEWCOME, his sister

MRS. URSULA LITTLEPAGE, Hugh's grandmother

PATT LITTLEPAGE, Hugh's sister

JOSHUA BRIGHAM, another anti-renter

SUSQUESUS, an old Onondaga Indian living at Ravensnest

JAAF (JAAF), an old colored servant at Ravensnest

HALL, a mechanic

Critique

The Redskins, or, Indian and Injin, is the final novel in Cooper's Littlepage series. Like many of Cooper's novels, this work deals with the conflict between a cultured upper class of high principles and an uncultured middle class with no principles except those of self-interest.

Cooper's characters are drawn in keeping with their sympathies, according to whether they sympathize with the rights of the land-owning Littlepage family or with the grasping Newcome family. Cooper stacks the cards in favor of the landowners and makes the conflict one between the patroons and the poltroons. He tends to caricature his villains and to treat them with satire and irony. In spite of the rather restricted interest of the anti-rent controversy around which The Redskins centers, the novel has suspense, action, romance, villainy, conflict, and some sharp, if limited, insights into the structure of American society. Cooper saw clearly the perpetual struggle for power within America, and he described it with compelling logic.

The Story

Hugh Littlepage and his Uncle Ro, the owner of Satanstoe and Lilacsbush, had been traveling through Europe and the East for five years, and they had not heard from their family in America for eighteen months. Upon arriving at their apartment in Paris they received a bundle of letters and packages from the family. Among other things the letters told them that the Littlepages' Ravensnest estate was in danger from tenants who had formed a terrorist party known as the "Injuns." Since Hugh was now master of the estate and the rents were due in the fall, he and his uncle decided to return home early, even though they were not expected before autumn. They decided to travel under the name of Davidson in order to keep their return a secret.

Arriving in New York, they went to see the Littlepage agent, Jack Dunning, who informed them that the estate was threatened from two sides. On the one hand, there were the Ravensnest tenants led by the demagogue lawyer named Seneca Newcome, on the other there were the Albany politicians, who depended on the tenants for votes. The politicians had already raised the taxes on the estate, and the tenants were petitioning for a removal of the rents and a chance to buy the property at their own low prices. To speed up the process the tenants had resorted to terrorizing the landlords with tar buckets, rifles, and calico hoods. To mask their greed for land, they claimed that their activities were carried on in the name of liberty, equality, and justice.

Because it would be dangerous to visit Ravensnest openly, Hugh and his uncle disguised themselves as a watch peddler and an organ grinder, acquired a broken German accent, and started for Ravensnest. On the boat to Albany they met Seneca Newcome, who, thinking that they might make good Injuns, invited them to Ravensnest. They got off at Albany and went from there to Troy. In that city they made the acquaintance of the Rev. Mr. Warren and his daughter Mary. In his new role as an organ grinder, Hugh invented a false history for himself and his uncle, a story accepted by the Warrens. Hugh soon learned that the Warrens lived at Ravensnest, where Mr. Warren was an Episcopal clergyman, and that Mary was a close friend of Hugh's sister Patt. Mary proved to be a charming, well-bred girl in striking contrast to Opportunity Newcome, who was also present at the inn. After Seneca Newcome joined the group, the conversation turned from Opportunity's pretentious learning to anti-rentism. Mary and her father argued gracefully and well in marked contrast to Seneca's and Opportunity's ill-constructed logic.

After a journey by train and carnages, Hugh and his uncle arrived in Ravensnest. Still in their new roles as a peddler and an organ grinder, they traveled about the area to see for themselves how matters stood. At the tavern where they stopped overnight, they heard two men arguing over anti-rentism. While a lawyer took a mild stand against it, Hall, a mechanic, stood firmly against it and the greed behind it.

After a day's walk the travelers arrived at Ravensnest manor. They decided, however, to retain their disguises and visit the two old men on the place, the Indian, Susquesus, and the colored servant, Jaap. While they were at the hut of these faithful old retainers, Hugh's grandmother, Mrs. Ursula Littlepage, his sister Patt, Mary Warren, and his uncle's two wards, Henrietta Coldbrook and Anne Marston, rode up. None penetrated the disguises. After the others had gone, Susquesus revealed that he knew who Hugh and his uncle were, but he promised secrecy.

The two also visited the Miller farm where they learned that Tom Miller was hostile to anti-rentism and that a farm hand of his strongly favored it. The farmhand, Joshua Brigham, was extremely greedy, Miller pointed out. While they were at the Miller farm, the five women again rode up, and Uncle Ro showed them some watches. Mrs. Littlepage, who wished to buy a very expensive watch for Mary, told them that they could receive payment for the watch at the manor.

That evening, still dressed as peddlers, they went to the Littlepage home. Hugh, asked to play his flute, performed very well, but when the flute was passed around his grandmother recognized it. When she drew her grandson aside he confessed to the deception. Soon he and his uncle were reunited with Mrs. Littlepage and Patt, who also promised secrecy. Later that evening Hugh slept in the Miller house next to Joshua Brigham. Drawn into a discussion on anti-rentism, the farmhand, thinking Hugh shared his sentiments, told of his plans for robbing the Littlepages of their land. He also revealed that the Injuns were to hold a meeting the next day.

On the following day Hugh and his uncle, riding in a wagon to the meeting at the town of Ravensnest, were stopped on the way by a gang of hooded Injuns who wanted to know their business. Interrupted by the appearance of Mr. Warren and Mary, the hoodlums disappeared into the bushes. The Littlepages, trying to pacify the hiding Injuns by expressing mild anti-rentist sentiments, provoked Mr. Warren to argue with them, whereupon the Injuns came out of hiding. The Injuns then drove Uncle Ro and Mr. Warren to the meeting, leaving Hugh to drive Mary. On the way he disclosed to her his true identity and motives.

At the meeting house the imported lecturer began to rant about liberty, equality, and justice, accused the Littlepage family of standing for slavery, aristocracy, and injustice, and declared that they were no better than other folks. When he had finished, Hall, the mechanic, got up to speak. He said that the true aristocrats of America were demagogues and newspaper editors, that the Littlepages had as much right to their ways as he did to his, and that if the Littlepage property should be divided, that of the tenants should be too. His speech was interrupted by several Injuns who came whooping into the meeting house. Most of the people fled, but Mary, Hall, and the Littlepages remained, comporting themselves with dignity.

The Injuns ran wild, stealing calico and wagons from their own sympathizers. After seeing the Warrens off, Hugh and his uncle got into their wagon and rode toward the manor. They could see a party of armed men following them. On the way they met some anti-renters who had been deprived of their wagon. They walked alongside, still talking about the virtues of anti-rentism. Suddenly a group of real Indians appeared in the road. Surprised, Uncle Ro forgot his German accent, and the anti-renters, realizing who their companions were, ran into the bushes. The Littlepages learned that the Indians had come from Washington and were seeking Susquesus, the old Onondaga who lived at Ravensnest manor. When the terrorist Injuns appeared, the real Indians let out a war whoop and the Injuns ran. Two, Joshua Brigham and Seneca Newcome, were captured but were soon released. The Littlepages invited the Indians to stay in an old farmhouse at the manor. When Hugh and his uncle arrived home, everyone knew who they really were, and there was great rejoicing.

That night the Indians held a confer ence on the lawn in which Susquesus was the center of attention. The Indians spoke about the old days, the coming of the white man, and the different types of men with force, eloquence, and reserve. Hugh felt that they were as much gentlemen in their own way as he and Uncle Ro were in theirs.

Later that night Hugh, looking from his bedroom window, saw Opportunity Newcome riding toward the house. The ostensible purpose of her visit was to tell him that the Injuns were trying to get a legal charge against him and that they were planning arson. He immediately warned Mary to keep an eye out for trouble and then went to tell the Indians to do the same.

A short time later Mary signaled to him as he was patrolling the grounds. She said that two Injuns were setting fire to the kitchen. Hugh rushed to the kitchen window and fired a shot into the air as the men came out. He clubbed one over the head and fell grappling with the other. Hugh might have been overpowered if Mary had not come to his aid. At that moment the Indians, attracted by the shot, arrived on the scene. The prisoners turned out to be Joshua Brigham and Seneca Newcome. A short time later a few Injuns set fire to a load of hay and then ran off, the Indians close at their heels.

Sunday morning was peaceful. The Littlepages went to church and sat in the canopied pew that the tenants rented. After church, following a brief meeting down the road, three anti-renters presented Hugh with a petition to remove the canopy; he refused. On the way home Opportunity coyly asked Hugh to release her brother, but he was noncommittal. After leaving her he learned that the canopy had been torn down and placed over the Miller pigeon. On arriving home he was told that Seneca had tried to escape arson charges by proposing to each of the four young women at the manor.

Later that day a final ceremony was held in honor of Susquesus. The peace pipe was passed around, and Jaap, the colored companion of Susquesus, was invited to make a speech. He was interrupted, however, by the appearance of a large group of Injuns. While the Littlepages waited to see what was intended, Opportunity rode up, drew Hugh into the house, and told him that these Injuns were not afraid of Indians. She said that Hugh was standing over an earthquake if he did not release her brother. Hugh was called outside again when it was discovered that the Injuns had surrounded the Warrens. Mr. Warren and Mary maintained their composure, however, and managed to go free. The Injuns were duly warned about the ferocity of the Indians, and the ceremony was continued. The Indians told how the white men broke their laws for selfish reasons and hid their shame under calico hoods, while the red men upheld their laws even at great personal sacrifice. The Injuns were humiliated by this speech. While they were listening, Jack Dunning, the business agent, arrived with the sheriff and a posse to drive off the Injuns. But by this time the Injuns had lost public support and were thoroughly disgraced. Taking advantage of the confusion, Opportunity released her brother and Joshua Brigham, and the two were never seen in that part of the country again. The Supreme Court upheld the rights of the landlords and the anti-rent wars ended.

Uncle Ro gave a good portion of his estate to Mary when she and Hugh were married. Hugh heard that Opportunity Newcome intended to sue him for breach of promise, but nothing ever came of that threat.

R E LEE

Type of work Biography

Author Douglas Southall Freeman (1886 1953)

Time 1807 1870

Locale Mostly the Confederate States of America

First published 1934 1935

Principal personages

GENERAL ROBERT E LEE

MARY CUSTIS LEE his wife

GENERAL WINFIELD SCOTT, U S A

PRESIDENT JEFFERSON DAVIS C S A

THOMAS JONATHAN ('STONEWALL') JACKSON,

JAMES LONGSTREET,

JAMES EWELL BROWN STUART,

RICHARD STODDERT EWELL,

AMBROSE POWELL HILL, and

JUBAL ANDERSON EARLY, Generals of the Confederacy

GENERAL ULYSSES S GRANT, U S A

By heritage, education, profession, and talent Douglas Southall Freeman was ideally fitted to write the definitive biography of Robert Edward Lee. The son of a Confederate veteran, a Doctor of Philosophy in history from Johns Hopkins University, editor of the Richmond News Leader, whose "chief avocation" was "the study of military history" and whose prose style was fascinating, he accepted in 1915 a publisher's invitation to tell the life story of the South's best beloved hero. It seems that Douglas Freeman's ambition to compose such a book was born in 1903, when as a youth of seventeen in the company of his father he attended a reunion of Confederate veterans in Petersburg, Virginia. Incidentally, the elder Freeman lived to see his son's work come from the press. At first the biographer expected to write only a single volume, but a wealth of compelling material, much of it scarcely tapped, expanded his number to four. Even then he had not exhausted the accumulations of his research, with the result that, after completing the work originally planned, he brought out Lee's Lieutenants, a three volume "Study in Command." As a title for his monumental production Dr Freeman chose the general's autograph R E Lee.

Volume I, containing thirty six chapters, covers a period of fifty five years, from Lee's birth on January 19, 1807, to the beginning of the War between the States in 1861 and the early months of 1862. It takes its reader with never flagging interest through the West Point years, marriage, gradual rise in the United States Army, the Mexican War, the capture of John Brown, "The Answer He Was Born to Make," and the early, unsuccessful operations in western Virginia. Concerning Lee's momentous decision, which has entailed much dispute by many persons, the author states "The spirit of Virginia had been alive in his heart every hour of his life." He was a United States officer who loved the army and had pride in the Union, but something very deep in his heart kept him mindful that he had been a Virginian before he had been a soldier.

Volume II, of thirty five chapters, recounting the Seven Days' Battles east of Richmond against McClellan, Second Manassas against Pope, the Sharpsburg Campaign in Maryland with McClellan again the adversary, and the Battle of

R. E. LEE by Douglas Southall Freeman Excerpts from the Foreword and from Volume I by permission of the publishers Charles Scribner's Sons Copyright 1934 1935 by Charles Scribner's Sons

Fredericksburg against Burnside, all in 1862, concludes with the victory over Hooker at Chancellorsville and the death of Stonewall Jackson in May, 1863. Through these pages painstaking, absorbing military analysis continues.

Volume III, twenty nine chapters in length, proceeds from the beginning of the Gettysburg Campaign through that fateful conflict with the full power of Dr Freeman's critical study. Then comes the "hammer and rapier" matching of Grant against Lee in 1864, with such battles as the Wilderness, Spotsylvania Courthouse, and Cold Harbor, the historian's expositions being precise but never tiresome. Grant crosses the James, and the long, encircling blue lines outside Petersburg are held in check by Lee's thin gray battalions for nearly ten months, with the unique Battle of the Crater furnishing a new, strange story for the history of war. The reader lives with freezing, starving Southern veterans to the end of the winter of 1864-1865.

The first eleven chapters of Volume IV relate the close of the war in Virginia with the surrender at Appomattox Court house. The next sixteen chapters picture General Lee—body, mind, and soul—as he turns to civilian pursuits and works sincerely and consistently for peace and reconciliation. He maintains his dignity and grandeur as college president at Lexington, until his death on October 12, 1870. The final chapter, "The Pattern of a Life," is Freeman's masterpiece. Epitomizing Lee's career and character, it can be designated properly by one term only: a classic.

R E Lee was a labor of love. For nine teen years, from its inception in 1915 to its publication in 1934-1935, the author, discarding apocryphal and legendary tales, scrupulously winnowed and used documented facts. Avowing that he was "fully repaid by being privileged to live, as it were, for more than a decade in the company of a great gentleman," Dr Freeman adds in his foreword: "There were no 'secrets' and no scandals to be exposed or explained. Neither was there any occasion to attempt an 'interpretation' of a man who was his own clear interpreter." The reader enjoys the biography as he shares the author's uplift of spirit.

Though detailed, the narrative is never boring. Minor, no less than major, incidents are recorded delightfully, for instance, Lieutenant Lee's riding double on horseback with a brother officer along Pennsylvania Avenue in Washington, kissing a little boy whom he mistook for his own son, picking up under shellfire a small sparrow and putting it back in a tree from which it had fallen, smiling upon hearing a colored attendant explain that he had not been shot because he stayed back where the generals stayed.

Dr Freeman would have transcended human ability if he had never erred in his minutiae. Few and inconsequential, however, are such slips as entitling the Right Reverend John Johns "Bishop of Virginia" in 1853, whereas at that time he was Assistant Bishop, and calling Colonel David A. Weisiger "Daniel" Weisiger. Generally Freeman's accuracy of research and transcription equals his natural stylistic charm. Moreover, R E Lee retains freshness and vigor throughout its length. Nor have verbal mannerisms become so patent in it as the author's often repeated "doubtless" in his later George Washington.

Promptly upon the appearance of the first two volumes, R E Lee was awarded a Pulitzer Prize, and, in the years which have followed, neither the scholar nor the mere average reader has been prone to dispute the judges' logic. Definitely this life of an unspotted American hero is the magnum opus of an unexcelled American biographer.

THE REPUBLIC

Type of work Philosophic dialogue

Author Plato (427-347 B.C.)

Time Fifth century B.C.

Locale The Piræus, Greece

First transcribed Fourth century B.C.

Principal personages

SOCRATES, the Athenian philosopher

CEPHALUS, an old man

POLEMARCHUS, his son

THRASYMACHUS, a Sophist

GLAUCON, and

ADEIMANTUS, Plato's brothers

The Republic is Plato's masterpiece, not only because it presents a fascinating defense of the author's conception of the ideal state, but also because it gives us the most sustained and convincing portrait of Socrates as a critical and creative philosopher. Other dialogues, such as the Phaedo and the Apology, may be superior as studies of the personality and character of Socrates, but the Republic is unexcelled as an exhibition of the famed Socratic method being brought to bear on such questions as "What is justice?" and "What kind of state would be most just?"

Although the constructive arguments of this dialogue come from the mouth of Socrates, it is safe to assume that much of the philosophy is Platonic in origin. As a rough reading rule, we may say that the method is Socratic, but the content is provided by Plato himself. Among the ideas which are presented and defended in the Republic are the Platonic theory of Ideas—the formal prototypes of all things, objective or intellectual—the Platonic conception of the nature and obligations of the philosopher, and the Platonic theory and criticism of poetry. But the central concern of the author is with the idea of justice in man and the state. The pursuit of this idea makes the Republic the longest of the dialogues with the exception of the Laws.

The dialogue is a discussion between Socrates and various friends while they are in the Piræus for a festival. The discussion of justice is provoked by a remark made by an old man, Cephalus, to the effect that the principal advantage of being wealthy is that a man near death is able to repay what he owes to the gods and men, and is thereby able to be just in the hope of achieving a happy afterlife. Socrates objects to this conception of justice, maintaining that whether a person should return what he has received depends on the circumstances. For example, a man who has received dangerous weapons from his friends while sane should not, if he is just, return those weapons if his friend, while mad, demands them.

Polemarchus amends the idea and declares that it is just to help our friends and return to them what they are due, provided they are good and worthy of receiving the good. Enemies, on the other hand, should have harm done to them for, as bad, that is what they are due.

Socrates compels Polemarchus to admit that injuring anyone, even a wicked man, makes him worse, and since no just man would ever sanction making men worse, justice must be something other than giving good to the good and bad to the bad.

Thrasymachus then proposes the theory that justice is whatever is to the interest of the stronger party. His idea is that justice is relative to the law, and the law is made by the stronger party according to his interests. In rebuttal, Socrates maneuvers Thrasymachus into saying that sometimes rulers make mistakes

If this is so, then sometimes the law is against their interests, when the law is against the interests of the stronger party, it is right to do what is not to the interest of the stronger party

The secret of the Socratic method is evident from analysis of this argument. The term "interest" or "to the interest of" is ambiguous, sometimes meaning what a man is interested in, what he wants, and at other times what he could want if he were not in error, as when we say, "But although you want it, it is not really to your interest to have it." Socrates adroitly shifts from one sense of the expression to the other so that Thrasymachus apparently contradicts himself. In this indirect way Socrates makes it clear both to the "victim" and to the onlookers that the proponent of the claim—in this case, Thrasymachus—has not cleared it of all possibility of misinterpretation.

Socrates then goes on to say that justice must be relative to the needs of those who are served, not to the desires of those who serve them. The physician, for example, as physician, must make the health of the patient his primary concern if he is to be just.

Socrates suggests that their understanding of justice would be clarified if they were to consider a concrete case, say the state. If by discussion they could come to understand what a state must be in order to be just, it might be possible to generalize and to arrive at an idea of justice itself.

Beginning with an account of what a state would have to be in order to fulfill its functions as a state, Socrates then proceeds to develop the notion of an ideal state by asking what the relations of the various groups of citizens to each other should be.

Every state needs three classes of citizens: the Guardians, who rule and advise the rest, the Auxiliaries, who provide military protection for the state, and the Workers, the husbandmen and other providers of food, clothing, and such useful materials.

In a just state these three classes of citizens function together, each doing its own proper business without interfering with the tasks of the other classes.

Applying this idea to the individual person, Socrates decides that a just man is one who gives to each of his functions its proper task, relating them to each other in a harmonious way. Just as the state has three distinct elements, the governing, the defending, and the producing bodies, so the individual person has three corresponding elements, the rational, the spirited, and the appetitive. By the spirited element Plato means the passionate aspect of man's nature, his propensity to anger or other irrational emotions. He so uses the term anger that he allows for what we call righteous indignation, the passionate defense of reason against desire. The rational element is the discerning and calculating side of man's nature, and it is what enables man to be wise and judicious. The appetitive side of man is his inclination to desire some things in preference to others.

A just man, then, is one who keeps each of the three elements of his nature doing its proper work with the rational element in command. A person is brave, says Socrates in the dialogue, if his spirited element remains always in the service of reason. He is wise if he is governed by reason, for reason takes into account the welfare of the entire person, and he is temperate if his spirit and appetite work harmoniously under the guidance of reason.

In order to discover those citizens best suited to be Guardians, Socrates proposed that the ideal state educate all its citizens in music and gymnastics, continually observing them to decide upon the sort of occupation for which they would best be fitted. He also argued that the Guardians and Auxiliaries should have no private property, and that they each should share a community of wives and children.

These obvious communal features of the ideal state have led many critics to dismiss Plato's construction as unacceptable. But it is well to remember that in the dialogue Socrates tells his listeners that he is not concerned about the practicality of his state, the conception of the state is constructed merely to bring out the nature of justice.

In considering the education of the Guardians, Socrates builds the conception of the philosopher as the true aristocrat or rational man, the ideal ruler for the ideal state. The philosopher is a lover of wisdom, and he alone manages to keep appetite and spirit in harmony with reason. Consequently, the Guardians of the state should be educated as philosophers, supplementing their training in arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, and music with training in the philosophic skills of dialectic. But the prospective Guardians should not be allowed to undertake philosophic education until they are old enough to take it seriously, not as mere amusement. After his philosophic training the prospective Guardian should take part in the active life of his times, so that at fifty he can assume political power with some knowledge of the actual matters with which he shall be concerned.

In connection with his discussion of the philosopher, Socrates introduced his famous myth of the cave. Men are like prisoners in a cave that faces away from the light. Unable to see themselves or anyone else because they are shackled, the men observe only the shadows of things on the wall in front of them, not realizing that the reality is something quite different from the shadows. The philosopher is like a man who leaves the cave, comes to know things as they really are, and returns reluctantly to help the shackled men who think that shadows make up the true world.

The philosopher comes to know reality through a study of the Ideas or Forms of particular things. The world of our experience is like the world of shadows, but the world of Ideas is the true reality. For every class of objects, such as beds (Socrates' example), there is an Idea bed, a form shared by all particular beds. The man who studies only the individual beds made by carpenters, or only the pictures of beds made by artists, knows only copies of reality (and, in the case of the imitative artist, only copies of copies), but the philosopher, making the effort to learn the Idea itself, comes closer to reality.

Socrates objects to poetry and to art whenever they are imitative, which they usually are. Although he admits that some poetry can be inspiring in the patriotic training of the Guardians, he stresses the point that imitative art is corrupting because it is misleading. Physical things, after all, are merely copies of the Forms, the Ideas, hence they are one step removed from reality. But works of art are copies of physical things, hence they are at least two steps removed from reality. Furthermore, the artist paints only a single aspect of a thing, hence, strictly speaking, art is three steps removed from reality. It is on this account, as well as because of the immoral effect of the poetic style of all but the most noble poets, that Socrates recommends that imitative poets be banned from the state.

The Republic closes with Socrates' reaffirmation of his conviction that only the just man is truly happy, for only he harmonizes reason, appetite, and spirit by loving wisdom and the Form of the Good. The soul is immortal, he argues, because the soul's illness is injustice, yet injustice itself does not destroy a soul. Since the soul cannot be destroyed by any illness other than its own, it must be immortal. Socrates concludes by using a myth about life after death to show that the just and wise man will prosper both in this life and "during the journey of a thousand years."

RESURRECTION

Type of work Novel

Author Count Leo Tolstoy (1828 1910)

Type of plot Social criticism

Time of plot Late nineteenth century

Locale Russia

First published 1899

Principal characters

PRINCE DMITRI IVANOVITCH NEKHLÚDOFF, a gentleman

KATERINA MIKHAELOVNA MASLOVA (KATÚSHA), a prostitute

VALDEMAR SIMONSON, and

VERA DOÚKHOVA, political prisoners

Critique

Resurrection (Voskraeseniye) is characteristic of one of Russia's foremost novelists because of its rich visual record of people and settings, its deftness in presenting the vices of petty officialdom, the humor of small people who want to seem great, and the hollowness of ritualistic orthodoxy. For Tolstoy, evil begins when one ceases to listen to his conscience and becomes self centered. The public theme of the novel concerns the shortcomings of social organizations. The personal theme, which involves the need for forgiveness, takes a form characteristic of Tolstoy: human failure revealed by a sin committed in semi ignorance, followed by a long and soul strengthening atone ment.

The Story

Katerina Máslova, better known as Katusha, was being led out of prison to attend her own trial for murder. Born illegitimate, she had been taken in by Sophia and Mary Ivanovna, well to do sisters who cared for her and began to educate her. When she was sixteen Katusha was seduced by her guardians' nephew, Prince Dmitri Ivánovitch Nekhludoff. When she learned that she was to become a mother, Katusha went to stay with a village midwife. When her child was born it was taken to the foundling hospital, where it soon died. After various tribulations Katusha became a prostitute. When she was twenty six she was accused of complicity in the murder of a Siberian merchant, the charge on which she was to be tried.

While Katusha was being led into court, Nekhludoff, her seducer, lay in bed considering his position. Although he had been having an affair with a married woman, he was almost engaged to marry Princess Mary Korchágin. He thought also of how he had given away some of his lands to the peasants. When Nekhludoff arose, he was reminded that he had to serve that day as a juror in the criminal court.

In court, Nekhludoff was astonished to see that the defendant was Katusha, falsely accused of helping to rob and poison the merchant from Siberia. The trial was disgusting because of the self interest of the officials, who were vain, stupid, and more concerned with formalities than with the fair judgment of the accused.

When Nekhludoff was a student at the university he would spend his summers with his aunts, and it was there that he first came to know and to like Katusha. He gave her books to read and eventually fell in love with her. When he next returned, three years later, military life had made him depraved and selfish, and he seduced her. The next day he gave her some money and left for his regiment. When he returned after the war, he learned that she had become pregnant and had gone away. Somewhat relieved, he had tried to forget her.

Now, at the trial, Nekhludoff saw Katusha with a mixture of loathing and pity At first he was afraid that his relation to her would be discovered, but Katusha did not recognize him, then he began to feel remorse for the life to which he had driven her Because of a careless legalistic oversight by the jury, the innocent Katusha was sentenced to four years at hard labor in Siberia Moved by his uneasy conscience, Nekhludoff went to a lawyer to discuss the possibility of an appeal

Later, when Nekhludoff was with the Korcháguins, he realized that their life was empty and degenerate, and he felt the need to cleanse his soul He determined that he would marry Katusha and give up his land

When Nekhludoff went to the prison and revealed himself to Katusha, the girl treated him coldly She seemed proud of her occupation as a prostitute, because it alone gave some meaning to her otherwise empty life The next time he visited her, she behaved coarsely to him, and when he said that he wanted to marry her, she became angry with him and returned to her cell

On his next visit to the prison Nekhludoff was told that Katusha could not be seen because she had become drunk on vodka bought with money he had given her He then went to see Vera Doukhova, a revolutionist acquaintance who had sent him a note from the prison He was surprised at the inordinate pride Vera took in the sacrifices she had made for the revolutionary cause Vera told him to get Katusha into the prison hospital as a nurse, so that conditions would be better for her Nekhludoff arranged to have Katusha transferred

By this time Nekhludoff was no longer joyful at the prospect of marrying Katusha Still determined to go through with his plan, however, he started out on a journey to settle his estates in anticipation of his departure for Siberia At Panóvo he saw the miserable conditions of the people He saw Matrona Khárina, Katusha's aunt, and learned about the death of his child at the foundling hospital He gave up his title to the land at Panovo and arranged for the peasants to have communal holdings in it, an act which brought him great joy

Nekhludoff then went to St Petersburg His chief reason was to appeal Katusha's case to the Senate and to try to secure the release of Lydia Shoustova, an innocent prisoner who was Vera Doukhova's friend In St Petersburg he came within the aristocratic circle of his aunt, Katerina Ivanovna Tcharsky, who claimed to be interested in evangelism but who had no pity for the unfortunate of the world Nekhludoff went to see various prominent people on the business which had taken him to St Petersburg The next day he learned that Lydia Shoustova had been released

Katusha's case was put before the Senate Because one of the senators styled himself a Darwinian and thought that Nekhludoff's morality in the case was disgusting, the girl's sentence was upheld On the same day Nekhludoff met an old friend, Selenin, now a public prosecutor, an intelligent, honest man but one who had been drawn into the tangled web of "correct" society and its standards Nekhludoff began to see the same principle at work in all official circles condemn some who might be innocent in order to be assured of catching the truly guilty

Back in Moscow, Nekhludoff went to see Katusha to have her sign a petition to the emperor During his visit he felt love taking hold of him once more Katusha also loved Nekhludoff, but she felt that marriage to a woman like herself would be bad for him

While Nekhludoff was preparing for his journey to Siberia with Katusha, he began to study and to think about the nature of criminal law Although he began to read much on the subject, he could not find the answer to his desire to know by what right some people punish others He also began to feel that the only reasonable kinds of punishment were corporal and capital, which were unfortunate but at least effective, while imprisonment was simply unfortunate

On the long march to Siberia, Nekhludoff followed the prisoners and saw Katusha whenever possible. He also saw the horrible conditions of the exiles. Nekhludoff began to have a new love for Katusha, a feeling composed of tenderness and pity. He also learned to understand the point of view of the revolutionists, since Katusha had been allowed to travel with the political prisoners. One of these, Valdemar Simonson, fell in love with Katusha. He told Nekhludoff that he wished to marry the girl but that she wanted Nekhludoff to decide for her. Nekhludoff said that he would be pleased to know that Katusha was well cared for. When she learned of his answer, Katusha would not speak to Nekhludoff.

At a remote town in Eastern Siberia,

Nekhludoff collected his mail and learned that Katusha's sentence to hard labor had been commuted to exile in a less remote region of Siberia. When he went to tell Katusha the news, he realized how much he wanted to have a family. Katusha said that she preferred to stay with Simonson; however, she refused to say that she loved him. She told Nekhludoff that he would have to live his own life.

Nekhludoff felt that he was not needed any longer and that his affair with Katusha was ended. He saw that evil existed because those who tried to correct it were themselves evil, and that society had perished, not because of systems of punishments, but because of human pity and love. Because he realized that the Sermon on the Mount could indeed be a practical law, that night Nekhludoff's new life began.

THE REVENGE OF BUSSY D'AMBOIS

Type of work Drama

Author George Chapman (c. 1559-1634)

Type of plot Tragedy of blood

Time of plot Sixteenth century

Locale Paris

First presented c. 1610

Principal characters

CLERMONT D'AMBOIS brother of Bussy d'Ambois, a soldier of fortune recently murdered

BALIGNY, Clermont's brother-in-law

CHARLOTTE, Clermont's sister

MONTSURF, Bussy's murderer

TAMYRA, his wife

THE DUKE OF GUISE

HENRY III King of France

MAILLARD, Baligny's lieutenant

Critique

The Revenge of Bussy d'Ambois is a portrait of Chapman's ideal tragic hero. All other elements of the play are subordinated to the revelation of the character and philosophy of Clermont d'Ambois. Clermont, with his stoic idealism, is indeed an interesting and compelling figure. Unfortunately, however, his character is not one that lends itself well to the dramatic situation. He is essentially a man of reflection, not of action; he lacks the tragic flaw upon which the plot might be developed. As a result, Chapman wrote a superb character study, but a poor drama.

The Story

Clermont d'Ambois had vowed to avenge the murder of his brother. Although he doubted the virtue of repay-

ing violence with violence, he had made a solemn promise to Bussy's ghost His sister Charlotte, unambiguous in her feelings, was impatient for immediate revenge, and her marriage to Baligny had been made under the stipulation that he, too, pledge himself to effect the death of Montsurry, Bussy's murderer Tamyra, the wife of Montsurry and former mistress of Bussy, had returned to her husband, but she made no secret of her hatred of him and her desire for his death But the design of these people was obstructed by the cowardly Montsurry, who had barricaded himself in his home

Clermont, who insisted on a fair duel and who would allow no one else to discharge his duty, had instructed Baligny to deliver his challenge Baligny's entrance to Montsurry's home was accomplished with the help of a decayed nobleman, the Marquess Renel Renel, visiting Montsurry on business, bribed the guards to admit Baligny When Baligny entered, Montsurry was terrified and refused to accept the proffered challenge Baligny left the challenge with Tamyra, who promised to make her husband read it

This plot was not the only one in which Baligny was involved A treacherous man he based his actions on the belief that troubles for others meant blessings for himself Wearing a different mask for every acquaintance, he was able to gain men's confidence and thus discover their dissatisfactions and sow the seeds of further discontent In dealing with King Henry III, he expounded the doctrine that any evil done out of loyalty to a king was justified Such a philosophy being agreeable to King Henry, Baligny had become his trusted agent In talking to the Duke of Guise, on the other hand, he expressed the belief that conspiracy was sometimes defensible

The principal object of jealousy in the court at this time was the Guise faction King Henry was fearful and jealous of the increasing influence of the Duke of Guise, and Baligny strove to increase his distrust Guise's closest friend was Clermont d'Ambois, whom Guise not only admired but endeavored to emulate He saw in Clermont a valor equal to Bussy's and, more important, a profound knowledge of life Clermont's principles of restraint, unworldliness, and stoic acceptance guided the actions of the powerful duke Because of the close relationship between the two men, jealousy of Guise was often extended to include Clermont Thus Baligny was able to convince King Henry of the advantage of getting rid of Clermont He suggested that Clermont be invited to visit Cambrai and there, away from his friends at court, be arrested

Balgny induced Clermont to go to Cambrai on the pretext of reviewing a muster of the king's troops In his conversation with Clermont, Baligny attempted to weaken Clermont's tie with Guise by criticizing the latter for his part in the St Bartholomew Massacre But Clermont was one man on whom the schemer's efforts were wasted because he was convinced of Guise's virtue

While Clermont was being entertained by his sister in Cambrai, he received an anonymous letter informing him of the betrayal and of Baligny's complicity in it Refusing to think evil of his sister's husband, he dismissed the letter as false Charlotte, who could think of little but avenging Bussy's death, regarded the message as an effort further to enfeeble Clermont's weak will in carrying out his duty

Maillard, Baligny's lieutenant, had been instructed by the king to apprehend Clermont When Maillard came to Charlotte's house, ostensibly for the purpose of accompanying Clermont on a tour, the latter asked him if he were charged to arrest him Maillard's obvious signs of guilt convinced Clermont that earlier presentiments he had felt about the journey had been justified Clermont offered to let Maillard take him peacefully, but Maillard denied that any intrigue was afoot Although quite certain of the consequences, Clermont, with characteristic acceptance of fate, followed Maillard

It was planned that Clermont be taken while he was reviewing the troops. Two soldiers disguised as lackeys were to lead him into an ambush where several men would seize him. But Clermont's strength exceeded even the estimate of his attackers. The disguised soldiers succeeded only in unhorsing him. Afoot, he easily beat them off and drove straight through the ambush. He ran until, exhausted, he fell to the earth and was captured.

Believing that outer circumstances had no power to touch the inner man without his will, he accepted his capture with little concern. His only worry was that he would be unable to keep an appointment with his mistress, the Countess of Cambrai, and his one request was that a message be sent to her. Other people, however, did not accept his internment with so much complacency. Upon receiving his message, the countess sent him jewels that she hoped would effect his release and vowed that she would cry until her eyes poured out. When the Duke of Guise heard the news, he rushed to King Henry and spoke so passionately and eloquently of Clermont's virtues that the weak-willed king, unable to answer Guise, ordered that Clermont be released.

After his release Clermont went to the house of the Duke of Guise. There he again met Bussy's ghost who chided him for not having exacted the revenge Guise, who had been implicated in Bussy's murder, felt that the ghost should thunder threats against him, but Clermont asserted that the duke had fully compensated for his error. Guise was also worried about a plot against him; he believed that his efforts at propagating the Catholic cause were endangered. Clermont wanted him to retire from his plans, but Guise regarded withdrawal as an abandonment of France.

A plot was indeed threatening the Duke of Guise. King Henry, with Baligny's encouragement, had ordered his murder. The king, in addition to his long-standing jealousy of Guise, had been angered at having his hand forced over Clermont. As the duke was on his way to visit the king, Henry's men stepped from behind an arras and killed him.

With the assistance of Tamyra, Clermont gained access to Montsurry's house. There he found Charlotte, disguised as a man. She had planned to kill Montsurry herself but had been stopped by the ghost. When Clermont drew his sword, Montsurry at first refused to defend himself and did so only after Clermont offered to let Tamyra stab him. Although Montsurry at last gained sufficient courage to conduct himself courageously in the duel, Clermont succeeded in killing him. Soon after Clermont had fulfilled his duty to his brother, he received the news that the Duke of Guise had been killed by the king's men. The death of his friend and patron was a severe blow to Clermont, whose life had been centered around his relationship with the powerful duke. Believing that his purpose in this world was now destroyed, he took his own life.

THE REVENGER'S TRAGEDY

Type of work Drama

Author Cynl Tourneur (c 1575-1626)

Type of plot Tragedy of blood

Time of plot The Renaissance

Locale A city in Italy

First presented c 1607

Principal characters

VENDICE the revenger, often disguised as Piato

HIPOOLITO, his brother, sometimes called Carlo

CASTIZA, their sister, a near victim of Lussurioso's lust

GRATIANA their mother a widow
 THE DUKE, the lecherous ruler of an Italian principality
 LUSSURIOSO, his legitimate son
 SPURIO his illegitimate son
 THE DUCHESS, his recent bride
 AMBITIOSO,
 SUPERVACUO and
 THE THIRD SON the Duchess sons by an earlier marriage
 ANTONIO, an Italian nobleman the Duke's final successor

Critique

There has been considerable scholarly wrangling over the relative dates and even the authorship of the two plays associated with the name of Cyril Tourneur, but today they are both ascribed to him, and The Revenger's Tragedy is held to be the earlier. The tragedy of blood, with its themes of betrayal and revenge, had its vogue during the entire Elizabethan period beginning with Kyd's The Spanish Tragedy as far back as 1585, and helped bring about the closing of the theaters in 1642. With Webster, Tourneur represents the final stage of this dramatic genre. The plot of this play is melodramatic, murder is piled upon murder and horror upon horror to a point at which the reader is driven either to revulsion or to a refusal to take the play seriously. Yet the overdrawn plot is redeemed by the splendor of the language. John Addington Symonds described The Revenger's Tragedy as "an entangled web of lust, incest, fratricide, rape, adultery, mutual suspicion, hate, and bloodshed, through which runs, like a thread of glittering copper, the vengeance of a cynical plague-fretted spirit."

The Story

As the Duke, accompanied by his new wife and his two sons, passed through the city in the glare of torches, they were watched by Vendice, the revenger. In his hand he carried the skull of his dead betrothed, poisoned by the Duke when she had resisted his lecherous advances. To the hate engendered by this horrible murder had been added further incentive to revenge—the death of Vendice's father at the hands of this same decadent ruler. Now his brother Hippolito added fresh fuel to the flame by reporting that he had been asked by Lussurioso, the Duke's heir and a man as depraved as his father, to employ a procurer in order to ensnare their sister Castiza. Vendice's numble brain at once saw the possibility of revenge in this situation, he disguised himself, took on the role of a panderer, and was presented to Lussurioso under the name of Piato, thus gaining access to the ducal household.

The sons of the newly married Duchess were as evil as their stepbrothers. The youngest had recently raped the wife of Antonio, a highly respected nobleman, and that poor lady had committed suicide. But when the young villain was brought to trial and sentenced, the Duke put off his execution and merely ordered that he be kept in prison. His older brothers promised to find a way to help him escape. Meanwhile, their depraved mother was revealing her love for Spurio, the Duke's illegitimate son and a man who hated his father for his own illegitimate birth. He accepted the Duchess' advances since adultery with her would avenge him on his father.

In pursuance of his plan, Vendice undertook Lussurioso's commission, and still disguised, went to tempt the virtue of his sister Castiza. His delight was great when she spurned Lussurioso's suit, but this delight was soon turned to horror when their mother tried to persuade her daughter to yield. Vendice rightly felt that, were it not for gold and women, there would be no damnation.

Having returned to the palace with news of his mission, Vendice found out from Hippolito that the Duchess and Spurio had been seen together and were planning an assignation for that very night. Taking quick advantage of this news, he informed Lussurioso, the latter, ostensibly eager to protect his father's honor but really wishing to get rid of his hated half brother, went with Vendice to the Duke's bedchamber and stabbed the man sleeping in the bed with the Duchess. This man, however, proved to be the Duke himself and not Spurio. But the surprise was to Vendice's advantage for Lussurioso, whose blows had not killed the Duke, was led to prison under sentence of death.

The Duchess' sons, eager to eliminate their stepbrothers, attempted the trick of urging the Duke to mercy, in the expectation that their pleas would have the opposite effect. The crafty ruler, however, saw through their game and surprised them by granting their request and sending them to release Lussurioso. But Ambizioso and Supervacuo determined to reverse the Duke's orders and then pretend that their errand of mercy had been too late. What they did not know was that Lussurioso had already been released through a prior order of the Duke's. When they informed the gaoler that it was the Duke's command that "their brother" was to die, the gaoler, having now only the Duchess' youngest son in custody, naturally executed him. Thus the first of the villains was disposed of.

Meanwhile, Vendice's plot was going forward apace. The Duke had commanded him, still in the disguise of the panderer Piatto, to bring him a woman in some secluded spot. Knowing that the Duchess and Spurio were to meet in a lodge in the palace grounds, Vendice selected this spot and brought to it the skull of his betrothed decked out, in some manner, in rich attire. On the fleshless mouth of the skull he had smeared the same poison that the Duke had used to kill her. In a scene of unmitigated horror, the Duke kissed the poisoned skull, his own teeth and mouth were consumed by the vitriol, while Vendice and Hippolito, holding their daggers against him, compelled him to spend his last agonized moments of life in watching the meeting of his wife and his illegitimate son. So the second stage of the revenge was finished.

Before the meeting with his supposed mistress to be, the Duke had given word that he was riding off on an undisclosed journey, hence no one knew where he was nor made an attempt to find him. Lussurioso, meanwhile, had resolved to dismiss Piatto, whom he had come to regard as an inefficient panderer, and he ordered Hippolito, whom he knew to have a brother unknown to the court, to bribe that brother to kill Piatto. Thus Vendice was in the strange position of being hired to murder himself. Again his quick wit saw how advantage could be taken of this fantastic situation. He and Hippolito resolved to dress the still undiscovered body of the Duke in the clothes discarded by Piatto, a dagger thrust into the corpse would then account for the Duke's death. While this macabre scheme was in preparation, they had their family affairs to settle—that was, to punish their mother because she had urged their sister to yield to Lussurioso. But they were so moved by her sincere repentance that they spared her life and returned to the ducal palace to complete their plot.

The Duke's corpse, now dressed in the old clothes of Piatto, was still lying in the lodge. It was the brothers' plan to show it to Lussurioso, tell him the manner of his father's death, and then kill him. But Lussurioso spoiled the plan by coming, not alone as they had expected, but with a group of courtiers. So the best they could do was to point out the form of the supposed Piatto lying on a couch, say that he was drunk, and then stab him on Lussurioso's command. The son immediately discovered the true identity of the corpse, but was sufficiently deceived to absolve the brothers of any guilt in his father's death. He was hardly grief stricken, for this death made him the duke. He gave three orders as the new ruler: to search for Piato, the suspected murderer, to hold revels in honor of his accession to the title, and to banish the Duchess. After he had left the lodge, the Duchess' two remaining sons resolved to take advantage of the revels to murder him.

Vendice, Hippolito, and other disaffected nobles also determined to take advantage of the revels and to do away with the new ruler. Having heard that a masque was to be a part of the entertainment, they planned to copy the masquers' costumes and, having thus got into the hall of state, to assassinate Lussurioso. As the duke and his nobles sat at a table and argued over the ominous portent of a comet blazing in the sky, Vendice, Hippolito and two other lords, in the fantastic costumes of masquers, entered and performed their dance. At its conclusion they drew their swords and killed Lussurioso and his companions.

Hardly had they left the scene when Ambitoso, Supervacuo, Spurio, and a fourth noble came into the hall, dressed in the same costumes and bent upon the same bloody errand. Finding Lus-surioso and his companions already dead, the would-be murderers fell out among themselves over the succession to the dukedom, and Spurio killed Ambitoso, only to fall himself at the hand of the noble who had accompanied them. When Antonio and the guards burst in, they naturally assumed that the masquers whom they found there had been the murderers, nor could the surviving lord convince them otherwise. But Lussurioso was not yet quite dead. It was his dying voice that had summoned Antonio, and now he had to undergo the last agony of having Vendice whisper in his ear the full story of the revenge.

The ducal line having now been wiped out, Antonio was proclaimed the ruler. It was now that Vendice's bitter wit betrayed him: he could not resist telling the new duke that he and his brother had been the avengers. Instantly Antonio ordered them to execution, not wishing to condone their actions even though he had benefited from them. Further, he knew that the men who had murdered the old Duke and his family might well murder him. Vendice accepted his sentence calmly, his task was accomplished, and it was time for him to die.

THE REVOLT OF THE MASSES

Type of work Essay on political science
Author José Ortega y Gasset (1883-1955)
First published 1930

Among the few modern Spaniards known beyond his national boundaries is Ortega y Gasset, professor of metaphysics, literary critic and journalist, and a representative of the school that believes in the rule of an intellectual aristocracy or small group of superior men, not the privileged caste of the old feudal nobility.

Born in Madrid, José Ortega y Gasset sought in Malaga the thorough training of a Jesuit college, then took his doctorate in philosophy at the Central University of Madrid in 1904. Further study in Germany preceded his teaching career in Madrid. When Rivera became dictator, Ortega, a critic of the monarchy, stopped teaching and began to write for the influential El Sol. In 1923 he founded the Revista de Occidente, the leading Spanish intellectual publication until Franco drove its editor out of Spain in 1936. Later Ortega traveled widely, lecturing in Buenos Aires, Paris, and the United States. Returning to Spain, he died in Madrid in 1955.

The Revolt of the Masses had its seeds in an earlier book, España invertebrada (1922), in an article titled "Masas" in El Sol (1926), and in several lectures delivered in Argentina in 1928. As he wrote in a footnote to the title of the first chapter: "My purpose now is to collect and complete what I have already said, and so to produce an organic document concerning the most important fact of our time."

Repetition and interpolated material weaken the structural unity of the book, and the colloquial style may grate on the reader before the final pages. Nevertheless, the work is seminal and provocative. Ortega advocates a European confederation with judicial and political unity, an "integration, not a lamination," of nations, ultranational rather than international, where a new liberalism and a totalitarian form will each correct the excesses of the other. The resulting equilibrium, he promises, would produce a new faith.

In his final paragraph, Ortega acknowledges that the present day situation results from basic defects in European culture, but he postpones any consideration of that problem, and so the work is incomplete. However, for the Buenos Aires edition of 1938, Ortega added a prologue for French readers and an epilogue for English readers, in which he denied the accusation that his theme was the decadence of Spain since 1580. He is no pessimist. While he does look back on the good old days, he insists that a return to the past is impossible for modern man. Stressing the advances and improvements of today, he asserts that if anything superior is eventually evolved, it will be based on technical knowledge and liberal democracy.

Ortega's main thesis is that among human beings there are two types of individuals: the excellent or superior man, who makes demands on himself, and the common man, who is content with what he is. The development and activities of these types are shown against the perspective of Western history.

Greece and Rome evolved from rural communities and became cities. The ancients concerned with their past, were unconscious of a future. Gradually the State came into existence, built in the Middle Ages by the feudal nobles. The State was relatively small. Ortega quotes the economist Werner Sombart for the statement that Europe, from 700 to 1800, never had a population of more than 180,000,000. Each state was directed by its superior individuals, without whom humanity would cease to preserve its essentials. The mass man accepted higher authority, and in general followed the orders of a select minority.

The first divergence came when the bourgeoisie adopted gunpowder, which the nobles never thought of using, and with it won battles against the nobility. Eventually a middle class took over the State and made it so powerful that "state intervention" has become a symbol of danger. What were once privileges are now rights, even though the masses attack the institutions by which these rights are sanctioned.

During the nineteenth century the population of Europe rose to 460,000,000, and part of it overflowed to settle in the Americas. In Ortega's view, however, those who look with astonishment at the rapid growth of the New World should turn their eyes to Europe, where the population increase has been even more spectacular.

Nietzsche foresaw a "flood tide of Nihilism rising." Actually, the world as it was organized during the nineteenth century automatically created a new type of man, provided with formidable appetites and powerful means of satisfying them. The nineteenth century left these new men to their own devices. Believing in direct action, they intervened violently in everything. Having been previously guided by others, these "barbarian products of modern civilization" determined to govern the world for and by themselves, and in their self-satisfaction, according to Ortega, they now threaten the degeneration of human culture.

In tracing the development of the mass man, Ortega repeats his assertion that the civilization of the nineteenth century can be summed up under two headings: Liberal democracy and technology. Modern technical advance represents the cooperation of Capitalism and Experimental Science. The scientist is likely to become a mass man, a primitive, since he confines his knowledge to so small an area. There was a time, the author asserts, when men could be divided into the learned and the ignorant, but today even those learned in science are frequently ignorant of the inner philosophy of the science they cultivate.

Ortega discusses historians, or "philologists," as he calls them, who turn their attention to sources instead of the future. The author does not believe in absolute determinism of history, because in his view the past does not tell us what to do, but what to avoid. Life is now greater in scope than ever before, presenting a greater choice. Circumstances offer a dilemma for the mass man to decide, but he has no concept of the future. In the Mediterranean countries, where the triumph of the masses has made its greatest advance, the mass man lives for the moment, with no consideration for future existence.

Life has become world wide in character, but time and space cannot be easily obliterated. The "purchasing power of life" has been broadened. Man believes himself capable of creation without knowing what to create. Power has brought insecurity. Liberal democracy based on technical knowledge is the highest type of public life yet known. The perfect organization of the nineteenth century gave the impression that it represented natural things, and therefore should belong to everybody, but all that it represents had earlier beginnings.

According to Ortega, bolshevism and fascism are examples of retrogression in politics, because they handle rational elements in an anti-historical, even archaic, way. Consequently, the political hope of Europe lies in contemporaneous men who abhor archaic and primitive attitudes.

Ortega does not believe in the "decadence of Europe," a legend begun by intellectuals who felt themselves stifled by their nationality and who longed to borrow from other literatures, or by politicians similarly motivated. If there should be a decadence among European nations, the result, he argues, would be the creation of a United States of Europe. There is no one else to "rule," by which Ortega means "to control public opinion." New York and Moscow represent two sections of European order. Writing in 1929, Ortega believed that Russia would need centuries before she could aspire to rule, but that she would never succeed if there was in Europe a political union with a new Western moral code and a new inspirational program of life.

In one important sense, the title of this work is misleading, in the light of recent history. The author is not referring to either actual revolt—rebelión is the Spanish word he uses—or the Marxian proletariat. What he had in mind was the mass man whose claim to the right to act is, in effect, a rebellion against his own destiny. Since that is what he is doing at the present time, Ortega y Gasset considered his efforts a revolt of the masses.

RHADAMISTUS AND ZENOBIA

Type of work Drama

Author Prosper Jolyot de Crébillon (1674-1762)

Type of plot Romantic tragedy

Time of plot About A.D. 60

RHADAMISTUS AND ZENOBIA by Prosper Jolyot de Crébillon from CHIEF RIVALS OF CORNEILLE AND RACINE. Translated by Lacy Lockert. By permission of the publishers. Vanderbilt University Press. Copyright 1956 by Lacy Lockert.

Locale Artanissa capital of Iberia
First presented 1711

Principal characters

RHADAMISTUS King of Armenia
ZENOBIA (ISMENIA), his wife
PHARASMANES, King of Iberia, Rhadamistus' father
ARSAMES, Rhadamistus' brother
HIERO Armenian ambassador, Rhadamistus confidant
MITHRANES captain of the guards of Pharasmanes
HYDASPES Pharasmanes' confidant
PHENICE, Zenobia's confidante

Critique

Rhadamistus and Zenobia contains elements of greatness but lacks firmness and symmetry of structure as well as vigor of style. Now and then a line reminds one of Shakespeare, but the more revealing comparison is to Voltaire. Crebillon's rival and enemy Voltaire's Zaire is in many respects a better play, the action is continuous and the exposition is effectively simple—yet Rhadamistus and Zenobia, for all its static presentation of background material in the first act, is more successful at creating the tragic sense, the realization of the self-defeating character of human passion. Few members of a contemporary audience would tolerate Crebillon's play on the stage; the lengthy expository passages, the unmotivated antipathies, the awkward and precipitous close—all are distasteful. But for the reader the play still offers passages of quiet force and power, and within the faulty whole there are parts to be remembered.

The Story

Zenobia, wife of Rhadamistus, was the prisoner of Pharasmanes, King of Iberia. When Phenice, her companion, attempted to persuade her that she should accept the love Pharasmanes was offering her in the hope that she would become his queen, Zenobia, who had been using the name Ismenia, revealed that she could not accept Pharasmanes because the king was her uncle and the father of Rhadamistus. Zenobia explained that her father, Mithridates, had reared Rhadamistus as if the boy were his own son, but when Pharasmanes invaded the Armenian kingdom of Mithridates, Mithridates turned against Rhadamistus and refused to allow him to marry Zenobia as Rhadamistus had expected. Rhadamistus had then attacked the kingdom of Mithridates and had driven the king into exile. Zenobia, to protect her father, had offered to wed Rhadamistus, only after the wedding had she learned that Rhadamistus had murdered her father. In rage, Rhadamistus had then attacked his bride and thrown her into the Araxes. Believing her dead, he had no knowledge of her rescue. Zenobia ended her account by telling Phenice that Rhadamistus had been killed by his own father, who had been jealous of his son's rise to power. The most compelling reason against marrying Pharasmanes, Zenobia told Phenice, was that she was in love with Rhadamistus' brother and Pharasmanes' son, Arsames.

When Arsames came to Zenobia from a campaign in Albania, he asked her whether she intended to marry Pharasmanes that day, as he had heard. He declared his love for her and his jealousy of his father. Zenobia assured him that she would not marry Pharasmanes, but she also declared that she could never consider marriage with Arsames. Arsames, knowing Zenobia only as Ismenia, was forced to accept her decision.

Pharasmanes appeared and criticized Arsames for returning to Iberia without permission. When Arsames declared that he came in support of his father to meet the invasion planned by Corbulo on behalf of Rome and Syria, Pharasmanes dismissed the excuse and forbade his son to profess love for Ismenia or ever to see her again. Pharasmanes, having dismissed Arsames, warned Ismenia that he would not tolerate refusal. In desperation, Zenobia appealed to Phenice to tell the Roman ambassador of her plight.

But Rhadamistus still lived. Tortured by repentance, knowing himself to be the murderer of Zenobia's father, and believing himself to be the murderer of his wife, he arrived in Iberia as the representative of Rome and the Roman choice for king of Armenia. Rhadamistus told his companion Hiero how he had been wounded by Pharasmanes' soldiers and how Corbulo had rescued him. Rhadamistus, vowing revenge on his father, had joined forces with Corbulo and been appointed Roman ambassador. Hiero told Rhadamistus that the Armenians, fearing Pharasmanes, hoped to persuade Arsames to become their king.

When Pharasmanes entered, Rhadamistus told him that Nero did not choose to have Pharasmanes become king of Armenia. Pharasmanes answered that Rome had better get its legions together, for he was determined to invade Armenia. He then supported his claim to the throne by referring to his brother, Mithridates, and to his son, Rhadamistus. Rhadamistus, who had managed to keep his identity hidden from his father, then angered Pharasmanes by declaring that the king should not expect to be heir to those he had murdered. Only Rhadamistus' status as ambassador kept Pharasmanes from ordering him seized.

Arsames, not recognizing Rhadamistus, refused to join with him in a revolt against Pharasmanes, but he urged the ambassador to take Ismenia from Iberia. Arsames also told Rhadamistus of his love for Ismenia, which for some hidden reason she could not return. Rhadamistus, who had no way of knowing that Ismenia and Zenobia were the same, agreed to help Ismenia.

When Zenobia came to Rhadamistus he recognized her immediately, but only his outcry made her realize that the ambassador was the husband who had tried to murder her. Rhadamistus, throwing himself at her feet, blamed himself for all his deeds, and Zenobia, partly from duty and partly from pity, forgave him his crimes.

Zenobia, who thought herself guilty because of her love for Arsames, could not wholly condemn Rhadamistus. When Arsames again told her of his love, she revealed that Rhadamistus was alive and that he was her husband. Rhadamistus interrupted the conversation and gave way to angry jealousy when he learned that Zenobia had revealed his identity. Zenobia remonstrated with him, pointing out that she would never have admitted her love for Arsames had not Rhadamistus' anger prompted her. Rhadamistus, ashamed of his outburst, begged their forgiveness.

Pharasmanes, fearing that Arsames was in league with the Romans, for he had seen his son talking to the Roman ambassador, arrested Arsames and sent his soldiers to capture the envoy. His anger was further aroused when he observed that the ambassador had taken Ismenia with him. He pursued Rhadamistus and wounded him with his sword. Arsames' grief stirred Pharasmanes strangely; he felt that somehow he had done a terrible act. Rhadamistus, dying, appeared before Pharasmanes and by a reference to Mithridates made his identity known to his father. Pharasmanes, realizing at last the fatal consequences of his jealousy and his lust for power, directed Arsames to take the Armenian throne. Sacrificing his own love for Zenobia as punishment for having killed his son, Pharasmanes relinquished Zenobia to Arsames and told them to flee from him lest his jealousy once again lead him to slay one of his own offspring.

RIGHT YOU ARE—IF YOU THINK SO

Type of work Drama

Author Luigi Pirandello (1867-1936)

Type of plot Expressionistic parable

Time of plot Early twentieth century

Locale A small Italian town, the capital of a province

First presented 1917

Principal characters

LAMBERTO LAUDISI, an observer of human nature

PONZA, secretary to the provincial councilor

SIGNORA FROLA, his mother-in-law

SIGNORA PONZA, his wife

COMMENDATORE AGAZZI, a provincial councilor

AMALIA, his wife

DINA, their daughter

THE PREFECT

CENTURI, a police commissioner

Critique

Pirandello's Così è—se vi pare!—which has been given such varied English titles as Right You Are—If You Think So, Right You Are If You Think You Are, and It Is So! (If You Think So)—develops one of Pirandello's favorite themes: the relativity of truth. Laudisi, who mocks the determination of the townspeople to pry out the secret of Signora Frola and the Ponzas and who several times vainly tries to stop them, serves as the author's spokesman and the explicator of his theme. Despite the philosophic nature of this theme, the drama is an eminently actable one.

The Story

There was much talk in the small capital of an Italian province about the peculiar family arrangements of old Signora Frola and her daughter, the wife of Ponza, a newly appointed secretary to the provincial councilor, Commendatore Agazzi. Why was Signora Frola living by herself in a fine apartment next door to the Agazzis and not with her daughter and her son-in-law? Why were Ponza and his wife living in fifth-floor tenement rooms on the edge of town? Why did Ponza visit the old lady every evening and sometimes during the day, but always by himself? Why did Signora Frola never visit her daughter, and why did her daughter, whom no one except Ponza ever saw, never visit her? Why would the old lady not even permit Signora Agazzi and her daughter to pay a social call?

While the enigma was being discussed by Agazzi, his family, and several visitors in the Agazzi parlor, Signora Frola came in to apologize for having refused to admit the Agazzis when they came calling, and also to explain why she lived apart from her daughter. She did not want to interfere, she said, in the home life of her daughter and Ponza. She lived by herself; it was true, but she was not unhappy about it, and she kept in contact with her daughter even though there were no face-to-face visits. Signora Frola had hardly left when Ponza—a fierce, nervous, even sinister-looking man—came in to explain about his poor mother-in-law. The truth was she was mad. Actually, her daughter had been dead for four years and he had married again two years later. But he had prevailed upon his second wife to humor the old woman by carrying on shouted conversations from a fifth-floor balcony and writing notes to be let down in a basket from the balcony to the old woman on the ground.

RIGHT YOU ARE—IF YOU THINK SO by Luigi Pirandello. Translated by Arthur Livingston. By permission of the publishers E. P. Dutton & Co., Inc. Copyright 1922 by E. P. Dutton & Co., Inc. Copyright renewed 1950 by Stefano Fausto and Lietta Pirandello.

No sooner had Ponza gone than Signora Frola returned. Though the company at first denied it, she knew what Ponza had been telling them. The sad truth was, however, that he was the mad one. The real truth, which she wished she did not have to tell, was that when he married her young and innocent daughter he so frightened her with his passionate attentions that she had to be put into an institution for a while. When she finally returned, Ponza himself was in such a nervous state that he could not be convinced that she was his wife, and she was prevailed upon to pretend that she was a second wife taking the place of the one he had lost.

Before long a plot was hatched to have Signora Frola and Ponza confront each other in the presence of Agazzi and the others in order that the truth might be uncovered. Lamberto Laudisi, the brother-in-law of Agazzi, even from the beginning of the gossip, inquisitorial discussion, had been of the opinion that the private domestic lives of the Ponzas and Signora Frola were their own affair and should remain so. They were harming no one, they were not seeking anyone's aid, they should be let alone. But Laudisi was overruled. Agazzi left and came back shortly to get some papers which he had purposely left in his study so that he might bring Ponza back with him to get them. As they came in, Ponza heard a piano in the next room playing a tune which had been a favorite with his wife Lena. Signora Frola was playing, and when she stopped her voice could be heard through the doorway. She was discussing her daughter's cherished melody in such a way as to suggest that Lena was still alive. When she confronted Ponza a moment later in the study, he furiously insisted that Lena was dead, that he was now married to Julia, and that the piano which Lena used to play had been smashed to pieces long ago.

While he was frenziedly shouting at her, she was occasionally glancing about at the others in the room as if to call attention to his piteous state and to her forbearance in humoring him. After bursting into tears, Ponza suddenly ordered her out of the room and she soon left, sobbing. When she had gone, Ponza immediately grew calm again and explained the reason for his actions. The old woman, he said, was so convinced of his madness that he had to pretend to be mad. Now he must go and see her. Laudisi, who had earlier insisted that truth is a relative thing and that what is one person's truth is not necessarily another's, laughed at the confusion of the Agazzis and their visitors. Now, he mocked, they had the truth they had wanted!

Still the puzzle remained: who was telling the truth and who was lying, either knowingly or unknowingly? Earlier someone had suggested that documents such as a marriage certificate for the second marriage, or the letters which the second—or first—Signora Ponza wrote to the old woman, might be secured to prove who was right. One of those interested, Commissioner Centuri, arrived with some data which he had uncovered and which might yet clear up the puzzle, but the data turned out to be as inconclusive as the information already at hand.

A chance remark that Signora Ponza might as well be in another world since no one had ever seen her made Laudisi wonder whether there really was a Signora Ponza.

Still another solution to the enigma was suggested. Let Ponza go and get his wife so that she might be seen by everybody, to prove that she existed, and let her be questioned by the prefect himself in the presence of everyone so that the truth might be generally known. Ponza left after he had been assured that his wife and his mother-in-law would not be compelled to face each other. But in his absence the old woman returned to say that, since she could not live her own life in peace, she would leave town and not come back. To pacify her, the prefect pretended to believe her version of the truth though he had earlier said he believed Ponza's. When Ponza returned with a heavily veiled woman dressed as if she were in deep mourning, he was shocked and angry to see his mother-in-law, since he had been assured that she would not be there. Signora Ponza, to quiet the clamor, asked Ponza to take the old woman away. Both Ponza and his mother-in-law went out weeping and with their arms about each other's waists.

Now the truth would finally come out.

Signora Ponza would tell the entire group the whole truth. But again and for the final time the decision was left to each of her hearers. She was the daughter of Signora Frola, she was also the second wife of Ponza, and, for herself, she was nobody. When the prefect insisted that she must be one or the other of the two women, she answered that she was the person she was believed to be. Hearing that reply, Laudisi, saying that everybody now knew the truth, burst out laughing.

LE RIME OF PETRARCH

Type of work Poetry

Author Francesco Petrarch (1304-1374)

First transcribed After 1327

Of the 366 poems included in the collection which Petrarch made of his poetry, 317 are sonnets, twenty-nine canzoni, nine sestine, seven ballate, and four madrigals. According to the introduction by Theodor E. Mommsen to Anna Maria Ann's translation of the sonnets and songs the collection has no definite title but is sometimes called the Rime or Canzoniere. Petrarch called the collection Rerum vulgarium fragmenta, calling attention to the fact that the brief poems were written, not in Latin, but in the vernacular.

The comparison between Dante and Petrarch is inevitably made when one considers the sonnets and songs of Petrarch for both were Italians writing in the vernacular, both centered their poems about some gracious lady suddenly discovered, idealized, and praised throughout a lifetime, and both became giants of Italian literature. Dante wrote his Vita Nuova about Beatrice Portinari, whom he met when he was nine and she was eight and whom he continued to worship as the ideal woman and to celebrate in his poetry even after her death. Petrarch's ideal woman was Laura, possibly Laura de Noves, whom he met in 1327, in his twenty-second year.

Like Dante, Petrarch kept his passion at a distance—one might say at a poetic distance—from the woman who charmed him, and cynics can add that that is the secret of enduring poetic love. When one reads the poems of either Dante or Petrarch, however, it is difficult to believe that the love is merely an excuse for poetry somehow in the midst of creative passion, something of human passion burned as well to supply the warmth which survives the centuries. It may be that this enduring emotion can be attributed to those distant ladies who set the poets to writing immortal poetry but it is more reasonable to suppose that poetic genius worked in both cases to turn a sudden fancy into a lifelong poetic enterprise.

Naturally, critics have wondered who Laura was, or whether she was. Even Petrarch's contemporaries were not certain, and some of them contended that the Laura of the poems was an invention, an ideal based on no model whatsoever. Petrarch denied the charge, but, more significantly, the poems also deny it by the force of their feeling and imagery. One sympathizes with Petrarch, who pointed out that it would be madness to spend years writing hundreds of poems about an entirely imaginary woman.

For both Dante and Petrarch the idealization process took them beyond earth to heaven. That is, neither Beatrice nor Laura, as a poetic figure, is merely mortal, physical woman as she ideally could be; she is also spiritually significant, by her person and manner a being who symbolizes the highest values to which the human soul can hope to attain. Dante made Beatrice an inspiration even in Paradise and used her as the central guiding figure of the latter half of The Divine Comedy. In writing of the painter Simon, Petrarch comments

But certainly Simon saw paradise
Wherein this gentle lady had her place
There he saw her and portrayed in such guise
That is the witness here of her fair face
(From LXXVII)

Later, writing more explicitly of Laura after her death, Petrarch speaks of "Seeing her now on such intimate term/With Him who in her life had her heart's right," and, in the same sonnet, he concludes

For fairer than before, my inner eye
Sees her soar up and with the angels fly
At the feet of our own eternal Lord
(From CCCXLV)

It has been traditional to divide the sonnets and songs into two major parts, the one including poems written while Laura was living, and the other including those poems written after her death. Petrarch first saw her on April 6, 1327, and she died on the same day of the year, in 1348, from the plague.

Poem III of the collection tells us of the first meeting

It was the day when the sun's rays turned white
Out of the pity it felt for its sire,

When I was caught and taken by de sire,
For your fair eyes, my lady, held me quite

In V Petrarch works the syllables of the name "Laura" into his verse in order to describe what happens when his sighs call her with the name that Love wrote on his heart: "Così LAUdare e REVerme insegna/La voce stessa" ("Thus to LAUD and REVer teaches and vows/The voice itself").

In VI appears one of Petrarch's numerous puns of Laura's name, when he writes of Love as holding the bridle of his desire and thus being directed "Only to reach the laurel and its sour fruit" ("Sol per venir al lauro"). Again, in the following poem he speaks of the "love of laurel." It was in part because of such puns that Petrarch was accused of inventing the character "Laura."

These plays with words were the least of Petrarch's accomplishments in the sonnet form. He was so adept at using the fourteen lines to express a complete idea or image with its emotional correlate that poets have taken him as a model ever since. A full appreciation of the poet comes only from the reading of his poetry; only then does one understand what other poets have envied in Petrarch's work. Since he wrote in Italian, it follows that to know his poetry one must know Italian—or, at the very least, something of the flow and sound of the language. Then it is possible, by comparing an English translation to the original, to sense the beauty which results from sensitive use of the sound and sense of language within the sonnet form.

Attention to form alone will not yield full knowledge of Petrarch's power in poetry. Poets and artists generally like to think that form alone is what counts—and for an obvious reason: the poet gives the form to the material he finds, since he wants credit, he turns attention to form. But what the poet forgets, when he talks this way, is that he selects material, understands it from his perspective, and in using it for his purposes forces a recognition of its power as material. So it is with Petrarch. He writes in the tradition of love poetry, but he chose to do so, and the advantage he gained is that he writes of his beloved from a poignant distance. In making Laura unobtainable, he secured her forever in his poetry. Not that it is a simple matter to sing doleful songs of romantic longing, but there is an advantage, after all, in being able to give the imagination full rein while touching the sympathies of the reader who, even across centuries, regrets that Petrarch did not finally possess his Laura.

A rain of bitter tears falls from my face
And a tormenting wind blows with my sighs
Whenever toward you I turn my eyes,
Whose absence cuts me from the human race
(From XVII)

Much of Petrarch's poetry is concerned with the shortness of life, the inevitableness of death, the end of all that is fair and young on earth, and these matters are, of course, related to Laura. Thus the poetry before her death has a great deal in common with the poetry written afterward—the difference being that regret and speculation have now taken the place of fear for her loss. Before her death Petrarch amused himself with poetically metaphysical imagery by which he claimed that Laura would outshine stars and draw the angels to her, but after her death the poetic amusement is either absent or tempered by a sober recognition of the fact of death, and if Laura is the favorite of anyone in heaven, it is because of her spirit for which he shows reverent respect. We are reminded of Donne by the following image:

To count the constellations one by one
And to pour in a goblet all the seas
Was perhaps my intention when I took
This small sheet to relate such mysteries
(From CXXVII)

Not all the poems are about Laura. Petrarch writes of Italy at war, of nature, of God and the love of God, of life and death and other matters of universal concern. But even these poems have a human dimension which would be lost were they not fixed within the context of the Laura poetry. Perhaps it is because Petrarch had the heart and wit to be a love poet that we can attend with respect to his thoughts about matters that concern us all.

After Laura's death Petrarch wrote a sonnet of lament, CCLXVII, which begins, 'Alas! the lovely face, the eyes that save/Alas! the charming countenance and proud!' and in the following poem he asks, 'What shall I do? What do you counsel, Love?/It is now time to die / And I have waited longer that I would / My lady died and did my heart remove " The long song ends

Flee the clearness the green,
Do not go near where there is song and laughter
Canzone follow after Weeping you are not fit for merry folk
A widow, without comfort, in black cloak

Petrarch's lamentations gradually change character as one reads toward the end of the collection. Grief gives way to reflection, and reflection turns his thoughts to spiritual love—thus to the love of God. Laura becomes the symbol of what man should strive for, even though in life she was desirable as woman. Because "Death quelled the sun wanted to overwhelm" him, and "Dust is the one who was my chill and spark," he is able to write, "From this I see my good," and "I find freedom at last, bitter and sweet/And to the Lord whom I adore and greet,/Who with his nod governs the holy things,/I return, tired of life, and with life sated" (From CCCLXIII).

Although translation does not always succeed in reproducing the finely wrought rhythms of Petrarch's verse, the best has the great virtue of coming as close to the form, sound, and even syntax of the original as one could hope for On that account, an appreciation of the original becomes possible, even for those who do not understand Italian

RING ROUND THE MOON

Type of work Drama

Author Jean Anouilh (1910-)

Time 1912

Locale The Auvergne, France

First presented 1947

Principal characters

HUGO, a young man about town

FREDERIC his twin brother

MADAME DESMERMORTES, their aunt

DIANA MESSERSCHMANN, engaged to Frederic

MESSERSCHMANN her millionaire father

LADY DOROTHY INDIA, Madame Desmermortes' niece and Messerschmann's mistress

ISABELLE, a ballet dancer

HER MOTHER, a teacher of the pianoforte

ROMAINVILLE Isabelle's patron

PATRICE BOMBELLES Messerschmann's traveling secretary, secretly in love with Lady India

CAPULAT, Madame Desmermortes' faded companion

Jean Anouilh likes to divide his plays into three categories of material and treatment, and to date he has maintained a fairly even balance of productivity among the classifications he has designated. Included in his pieces noires, as he calls his more somber dramas, are those based on themes taken from classic Greek sources or from history. Legend of Lovers, the retelling in a modern setting of the Orpheus and Eurydice story, Antigone, a thinly veiled allegory of France during the German occupation, Medea, and The Lark, which deals with the martyrdom of Joan of Arc. On the evidence of these plays it would be possible to make out a good case proving that Anouilh is the leading tragic dramatist of his generation in France, however, he is better known in this country and in England for his pieces roses and pieces brillantes, his lighter works of tender feeling, artifice, and wit which do not fall into any of the conventional classifications of drama. Neither comedy, farce, fantasy, nor romance, they contain elements of all four. Ring Round the Moon, listed among the pieces brillantes is a typical example.

Ring Round the Moon is the title given by Christopher Fry to his adaptation of Anouilh's L'Invitation au Château. Although this version in English has considerable merit and unmistakable charm in its own right—a Cinderella theme treated in the manner of Oscar Wilde—Fry has caught little more than the mannered grace and brittle style of the original. His treatment, aptly described as "A Charade with Music," is a work of surface brilliance, poetic overtones, and sly wit, and as an engaging divertissement it provides an entertaining evening in the theater. Anouilh's play, on the other hand, is more serious in its ironic implications, depth of feeling, and insight into the muddled human situation, matters presented against a background that seems always on the point of dissolving into the make-believe atmosphere of a fairy tale.

This effect is characteristic of Anouilh's art, for he holds that the primary business of the theater is to create an illusion and a mood. The world of his plays is a moon-struck region of imagination and invention in which the logic of things as they happen is seldom the daylight logic of the actual or the commonplace. In spite of the fact that this world is as circumscribed and meticulously detailed as Proust's, it lends itself to effects of unabashed theatricality appropriate to a Cloud Cuckoo Land in which the fantastic becomes the real, art is also artifice, and no clear line divides the rueful from the comic. Since Giraudoux no writer has been more successful in combining the irresponsible with the serious, the improbable with the real. Such stock situations as the confusion of identical twins, contrived or ridiculous misunderstandings between lovers, affections abruptly transferred, and the play within a play abound in Anouilh's dramas because he dares to be original in an old-fashioned way. He works within a stage tradition that goes back through the comedy of manners and the commedia dell'arte to Plautus, Terence, and Menander.

A twofold theme of deception and self-deception provides the dramatic motivation in Ring Round the Moon. The setting is the fifteenth-century chateau of Madame Desmormortes, the time those almost forgotten days before World War I when everyone had plenty of money—except the poor—and there was an international society, when aristocratic elderly ladies had genteel companions and wealthy elderly men had traveling secretaries, and when fabulous balls were common. An assemblage of guests has gathered at the chateau for such a gala occasion. They include Madame Desmormortes' nephews, Hugo and Frederic, Messerschmann, a millionaire industrialist of obscure origins, Diana, his daughter, Romainville, a patron of the arts, Lady Dorothy India, Madame Desmormortes' niece and Messerschmann's mistress, and Patrice Bombelles, the millionaire's secretary, with whom Lady India is involved in a secret love affair.

Hugo and Frederic are identical twins, alike in every respect except that Frederic has a heart and Hugo does not. Frederic is engaged to Diana, who is as heartless as Hugo and obviously the wrong person for Frederic to marry. Unable to see reason, he has followed a blind path wherever love has led; his latest folly is sleeping in the rhododendron bushes under Diana's window. Not realizing that he himself is in love with Diana, Hugo is determined to end his guileless brother's romance. To this end he hires Isabelle, a dancer in the corps de ballet at the Paris Opera, politely blackmails Romainville into passing her off as his niece, and introduces her as a guest invited to the ball. For a fee and the dress he has provided, Isabelle is to make herself the center of attention, so much so, in fact, that Hugo will appear to be in love with her. At the same time she is supposed to make Frederic think that she is in love with him in order to draw that young man to her and away from Diana.

Even before the ball matters begin to go awry. To the consternation of Madame Desmormortes' proper butler, Isabelle's vulgar mother also arrives and is recognized by Capulat, Madame Desmormortes' companion, as an old school friend. To explain her presence, the mother tells Capulat that Hugo and Isabelle are really in love and that the young man has brought the girl to the ball under the pretense that she is Romainville's niece in order to conceal her true identity. Informed of this circumstance by her companion, Madame Desmormortes decides to take a hand in the masquerade; she dresses Isabelle's mother in finery and introduces her as prominent in society.

From these materials Anouilh has constructed a plot in which irony and non-sense are only a part of the thematic design, not the ultimate effect of the play. With compassion and insight he shows in brief glimpses the reverse side of the illusions by which humanity lives, for his real theme is the isolation of the lonely and the loving and the attempts of men and women to find understanding among themselves, happiness in money or in love. Messerschmann and Isabelle stand on a common footing when the millionaire, urged on by his jealous daughter, offers Isabelle money to leave the ball, and the dancer refuses. They end by tearing up the money in an angry, despairing rejection of material values. Then Messerschmann, remembering his peace and contentment in the days when he was a tailor in Cracow, goes off to break the Bourse and so lose his great fortune. His failure—for his flurry on the exchange more than doubles his wealth—is as ironic in its consequences as Isabelle's pretended suicide when, according to Hugo's plan, she throws herself in the lake on the chateau grounds, it is Hugo, not Frederic, who pulls her out, and it is to heartless Hugo that she turns in the misery of not being loved.

In the end worldly, shrewd old Madame Desmormort sets these confused matters straight. Frederic discovers the true nature of Diana and finds in Isabelle an innocence and gentleness of heart to match his own. Hugo realizes that he has secretly wanted Diana all the while, after Madame Desmormort makes him see that they were really made for each other. Even Messerschmann's future holds a promise of happiness. Believing that he has lost all his money, Lady India forgets Bombelles and swears that she will follow Messerschmann to Siberia if need be.

As stylized as a quadrille, touching even in its absurdity, Anouilh's play reveals not only the human capacity for error, self-deception, cruelty, and guilt but also man's striving toward goodness and love, within the confines of a limited but imaginatively conceived world in which illusion and reality stand back to back to shape a metaphor of life.

THE RIVET IN GRANDFATHER'S NECK

Type of work Novel

Author James Branch Cabell (1879-1958)

Type of plot Social satire

Time of plot 1896-1927

Locale Litchfield, not to be found on the map of Virginia

First published 1915

Principal characters

COLONEL RUDOLPH MUSGRAVE a Southern gentleman

MISS AGATHA MUSGRAVE, his sister

PATRICIA STAPYLTON MUSGRAVE his wife

JOHN CHARTERIS, a novelist

ANNE CHARTERIS, his wife

MRS. CLARICE PENDOMER, Charteris' former mistress

Critique

The Rivet in Grandfather's Neck, James Branch Cabell's third novel and the fourteenth volume in the Storisende Edition of his works, deals with the American descendants of Count Manuel of Poictesme. Subtitled "A Comedy of Limitations," the book satirizes the American South and its adherence to the code of chivalry. The title is taken from Hans Christian Andersen's fairy tale of "The Shepherdess and the Chimney Sweep," in which two porcelain figures who are in love attempt to escape after the shepherdess' grandfather, a porcelain Chinese figure with a nodding head, promises her to a wooden satyr. The shepherdess is frightened by the outside world, and they return. The grandfather had been broken while pursuing them, and his neck was riveted so that he could no longer nod agreement to the satyr's proposal. In the novel Musgrave interprets this tale as an allegory about human limitations every-one has a figurative rivet in his neck, and this signifies the action one cannot perform. Although the outmoded code by which Musgrave lives is satirized, the author also perceived that this code was not without grace and charm. The manner matches the matter. Cabell was an urbane stylist who seems closer to the English wits than to any American writer.

THE RIVET IN GRANDFATHER'S NECK by James Branch Cabell. By permission of Margaret Freeman Cabell. Published by Robert M. McBride & Co. Copyright 1921 by James Branch Cabell. Renewed. All rights reserved.

The Story

Colonel Rudolph Musgrave, family head of the Musgraves of Matocton in Litchfield, was forty years old in 1896. He was a consummate Southern gentleman, an aristocrat, a scholar, a lover, and an indifferent businessman. A bachelor, he lived with his sister Miss Agatha, who let nothing interfere with his comfort. His small income from his position as librarian of the Litchfield Historical Society was augmented by his genealogical research for people who were trying to establish a pedigree, and the brother and sister lived quite comfortably on his earnings.

Both, however, had inherited Musgrave weaknesses. She tumbled, and he fell in love with many women. The colonel had a streak of chivalry in his nature which prompted him to make gallant gestures of renunciation for the sake of the lady in question. His most recent act of chivalry, which had provided Litchfield with amusing gossip, occurred when he had been overheard by Anne Charteris—whom he had loved and lost to the selfish novelist, John Charteris—while he was reprimanding her husband for siring a child by Mrs. Pendomer Anne, who blindly worshiped her husband, had misunderstood the situation, and she had supposed that Musgrave was the guilty party. Musgrave had accepted the blame in order to save Anne from learning that her husband was a philanderer. Privately, Musgrave delighted in the episode.

The Musgraves were visited by Patricia Stapylton, the twenty-one-year-old daughter of a second cousin once removed who had eloped with an overseer. Roger Stapylton, the overseer, had become wealthy in the North, and Patricia was engaged to marry Lord Pevensy. Although Musgrave tried to impress Patricia with his most formal manner, she was not at all awed by him and immediately punctured his reserve. He spent a good deal of time with her, however, and once he read to her "The Shepherdess and the Chimney Sweep."

Musgrave, acting according to his code of honor, fell in love with Patricia and tried to renounce her, but she saw through his performance and jilted the Englishman. During the dinner at which their engagement was to be announced, Musgrave discovered that Patricia had fallen in love with Joe Parkinson. Musgrave made his grand gesture by announcing her engagement to the younger man. But Patricia jilted Parkinson and Musgrave married her.

At first their marriage was very happy, even though Patricia was troubled by her husband's reserve. Stapylton offered Musgrave a remunerative position in his business, but Musgrave refused it. Then Musgrave tried to make some quick money in the stock market but promptly lost all his savings. After that they lived on Patricia's allowance, which was rather small because Stapylton was displeased by their refusal to leave Litchfield.

Patricia had inherited a deformed pelvis from her mother, who died in child birth. When Patricia became pregnant the doctors gave her the choice between losing the child or her life. Without telling her husband anything about the matter, she decided to have the child because she knew how much Musgrave wanted a son. Though she survived the birth of her son, she was never completely well afterward and had to have a series of operations. The son was named Roger after her father, and Stapylton settled almost all his money on the child.

Tensions began to develop between the Musgraves. Miss Agatha and Patricia had never got along well together because the spinster resented Patricia's role in Musgrave's life. Patricia, still young and lively, found her husband's formality in creasingly annoying. Also, she was annoyed by his ineptness with money.

The crisis in their relationship came with the death of Miss Agatha. During one of her drinking spells Miss Agatha had wandered out into a storm and caught pneumonia. When she died she was attended only by the colored maid, Virginia, and Musgrave rebuked his wife for leaving the sick woman alone. Patricia said some bitter things about Miss Agatha and insisted that Virginia hated all the Musgraves because Musgrave's uncle had fathered her son, who had been lynched by a mob for becoming involved with a white woman. Patricia declared that Virginia frequently was the only one present when a Musgrave died. Musgrave insisted that this claim was nonsense. The quarrel ended bitterly and their relationship was never quite the same afterward.

When their son was five, the Musgraves gave a house party at Matoc-ton, the Musgrave ancestral estate. Among the guests were Anne and John Charteris. Patricia, finding Charteris a pleasing contrast to her husband, let him persuade her to run off with him. On his part, Charteris enjoyed the adoration of women and had been involved in many affairs. Though a successful novelist, he was not independently wealthy, and so he had always remained with Anne because she had a great deal of money. Now he was prepared to leave his wife because he thought he had found a richer woman.

Musgrave, discovering the plan, informed Charteris that Patricia had very little money of her own. Charteris then told Patricia that he could not take her away, giving her many hypocritical reasons for his change of heart.

Patricia was told by her doctor that her heart was weak and that she would not live long. Although she kept her own counsel, she was now determined to seek happiness with Charteris, and so she persuaded him to go through with their original plan. Charteris borrowed money from his wife to finance his desertion.

Musgrave, learning that Charteris and Patricia were going through with the elopement, attempted to dissuade Charteris by telling him that they were actually half brothers. According to Musgrave's code of honor, no gentleman would steal his brother's wife. Charteris was unmoved by the news. The next morning Musgrave met the lovers as they were departing and struck Charteris. Patricia, realizing that Charteris was a coward, broke with him.

A few days later Charteris was murdered by a jealous husband. On this occasion, for once, he was innocent. The newspaper with the story was brought to Patricia by Virginia, and Patricia died of a heart attack.

Anne Charteris, who had never seen through her husband, continued to adore him. Some five years after his death she met Musgrave in the cemetery where both Patricia and Charteris were buried. Musgrave had Mrs. Pendomer's son with him. At first Anne was outraged by Musgrave's lack of taste in being seen in the company of his illegitimate child, but as she looked at the boy she realized that Charteris was the boy's real father. Although Musgrave tried to maintain the deception, Anne finally realized that her husband had been a scoundrel. There was now nothing to stand between Anne and Musgrave; they recognized, however, that their loyalties to their dead mates were too strong to let them marry.

In 1927, Colonel Rudolph Musgrave died dreaming of his first meeting with Patricia.

THE ROMAN ACTOR

Type of work Drama

Author Philip Massinger (1583 1640)

Type of plot Tragedy of intrigue

Time of plot First century

Locale Rome

First presented 1626

Principal characters

PARIS, the Roman actor

DOMITIAN, Emperor of Rome

DOMITIA, his wife

ARETINUS, Domitian's spy

PARTHENIUS, Domitian's freedman

Critique

The Roman Actor depicts the degeneracy of imperial Rome under the tyrant Domitian. In contrast to the general corruption stand Paris, the actor, and two senators of Stoic persuasion. The most original and impressive element of the play is the character of Paris. Unfortunately, the plot revolves around Domitian, a much less interesting character, while Paris is forced awkwardly into the central action. Paris, in defending the theater of Rome, is Massinger's spokesman for the Stuart theater.

The Story

During the reign of Domitian, there was little public support for the theater. The people, accustomed to circuses and involved in their own licentious practices, found the drama tame by comparison, thus most actors made a bare livelihood. One troupe of actors, however, prospered, because of the special affection Domitian had for its leading member, Paris. But Paris also had his enemies in the inner circles around the emperor, the most notable being Aretinus, Domitian's spy, who believed he and other leaders had been satirized in a production by the players. While Domitian was involved in a military campaign, Aretinus took the opportunity to have Paris and his fellow actors arrested.

At a session of the Senate they were charged with treason. Paris' defense was in the form of a general vindication of the theater, in which he eloquently testified to the uplifting effect of drama through its revelation of evil and its attempt to inspire honorable action. As he finished his speech, news was brought of Domitian's return from his conquest of the Chatti and the Daci, thus the release of the actors was assured.

The people's praise of Domitian for his victory was exceeded only by his self-praise. In a characteristic gesture, he celebrated his return by having his captives tortured and slain. Although his despotism and his brutality were causing unrest among the people, few dared speak against him.

Among those who welcomed the emperor were several women who vied for his favor. All were greeted with contempt, except the beautiful Domitia. She had been the wife of a senator, Lamia, until one of Domitian's men had forced her husband, under threat of death, to sign a bill of divorce. She, ambitious for position, had been agreeable to the change as long as she could be Domitian's wife, not his strumpet. Now he bestowed on her the title of Augusta.

Aretinus had kept a watchful eye on signs of discontent during his ruler's absence. Now he informed Domitian of opposition to his poisoning of Agricola, his execution of Paetus Thrasea, his incest with his niece Julia, and his intended marriage to Domitia. Prominent among the malcontents were three senators—

Rusticus, Sura, and Lamia Domitian resolved to have revenge first on Lamia

After Domitia had been established in the imperial palace as his wife, the emperor ordered Lamia brought to him. Domitian gave lavish thanks to the senator for the gift of his wife, declaimed the joys of living with Domitia, and at an appropriate moment had Domitia sing a song from the window above them. After Lamia had time to experience fully his mental anguish, Domitian ordered his execution.

In compliance with one of the emperor's first orders on arriving in Rome, the actors presented a play. The Cure of Avarice was chosen at the request of Parthenius, Domitian's freedman, who hoped that the dramatization would help turn his father from his miserly habits. But the obdurate old man was unimpressed. Domitian then tried to convince him of the foolishness of his practices, but to no avail. Finally, piqued, Domitian ordered the old man's death. Despite the long and faithful service of Parthenius, the emperor refused to hear his plea for his father's life.

The next to satisfy Domitian's lust for blood were the senators Rusticus and Sura, who had criticized the emperor for his execution of the Stoic philosopher, Paetus Thrasea. In hopes of hearing their cries for mercy, Domitian had them tortured. Sustained by their Stoic principles, however, the two men refused to show any sign of pain and mocked him for his impotence against them. Even after he had ordered them killed, the experience unsettled him and gave him his first doubts of his omnipotence.

Domitia, to cheer up her husband after this ordeal, had a play presented in which Paris acted the part of a rejected lover. As the drama progressed, she became increasingly agitated, until at the point of Paris' threatened suicide she jumped from her seat to stop him.

This unusual behavior immediately aroused the suspicions of the women of the court. Having been replaced by Domitia in the emperor's favor, and having been treated like servants by Domitia, these women had been awaiting a chance to discredit her. Their suspicions were confirmed when they discovered that she had sent a letter to Paris requesting that he meet her. Aretinus, the ubiquitous spy, was also aware of this situation. He saw in it a chance not only to gain further power but to triumph over Paris. In a petition signed by him and the women, Domitian was notified of his wife's behavior. Although refusing at first to believe the accusation, he agreed to observe the meeting between his wife and Paris.

At this meeting, Domitia, after finding that hints of her feelings failed to elicit the desired response in Paris, openly stated her love for him. Loyalty to Domitian kept Paris from succumbing to her enticements, however, and her threats and her bribes left him unmoved. Finally, after she begged for a brotherly kiss, he weakened. At that moment Domitian arrived on the scene. Enraged by her infidelity, but still too much ruled by the power of her beauty to kill her immediately, Domitian had his wife placed under guard in her chamber. Aretinus, expectant of reward for informing on the pair, was put to death instead. The palace women, for their efforts, were cast into a dungeon.

Left alone with Paris, Domitian protested his aversion to killing him. At Domitian's request, they acted out a play called The False Servant, with Paris playing the part of the servant, Domitian acting as the wronged husband. In the scene in which the husband discovers the treachery of his servant, Domitian drew his sword and killed Paris. The emperor, feeling in honor bound to kill a man he much admired, believed he, at least, had provided a fitting end.

Domitia's hold on her husband was so great that she was soon restored to grace. Far from being remorseful, however, she openly mocked Domitian for his weakness in loving her and refused ever again to respond to his love. Finally, after an especially vicious taunting, he gained courage to place her name in his book of condemned people.

A further source of irritation to him was an astrologer's prediction of his imminent death. According to the prophecy, the astrologer himself would be eaten by dogs before Domitian would die. In order to shift the course of events, the emperor gave orders that the astrologer be burned. As the soldiers prepared to burn him, a heavy rain put out the fire, and dogs burst upon them and devoured the body.

Filled with fear by this happening, Domitian surrounded himself by tribunes and awaited the hour of five, at which time his death had been predicted.

Meanwhile, Domitian's book having been stolen by Domitia, she, Parthenius, and the women of the court found their names on the condemned list. With others, they decided on immediate action. By falsely telling Domitian that the hour of five was passed, Parthenius drew him away from his guard, and all the conspirators fell upon him and ended the life of a tyrant.

ROMANCE OF THE THREE KINGDOMS

Type of work Novel

Author Lo Kuan chung (c. 1320 c. 1380)

Type of plot Historical romance

Time of plot Third century

Locale China

First transcribed Fourteenth century

Principal characters

LIU PEI, a distant descendant of the royal family of the Han dynasty and the founder of the Shu Han Kingdom

KUAN YU, Liu Pei's sworn brother, later apotheosized by Chinese as the God of War

CHANG FEI, the sworn brother of Liu and Kuan, a blunt soldier of great prowess

CHU KO LIANG, prime minister to Liu Pei and to his weakling successor Ts'ao Ts'ao, founder of the Wei Kingdom, noted for his unscrupulous resourcefulness

SUN CHUAN, founder of the Wu Kingdom

CHOU YU, Sun Ch'uan's brilliant military commander, perpetually piqued by Chu ko Liang's superior intelligence

CHAO YUN, a brave general of the Shu Han Kingdom

LU PO, an unprincipled and matchless warrior famous for his romantic involvement with the beauty Tiao Shan

SSU MA I, founder of the all-powerful Ssu ma family in the Wei Kingdom

CHIANG WEI, Chu ko Liang's successor

Critique

The colorful events of the period of the Three Kingdoms, beginning with the rise of the Yellow Turban rebels under the last emperors of the Eastern Han dynasty and ending with the unification of China under the first Chin Emperor, have always fascinated the Chinese. Lo Kuan chung, who made use of official history as well as oral traditions in the composition of this great dynastic romance, permanently fixed the popular image of the period. In this respect he is not unlike Homer, who rendered a similar service for the Greeks. It is not too much to say that the Romance of the Three Kingdoms (San kuo chih yen i) has been for centuries the most popular book in China, beloved alike by literati and populace. Lo Kuan chung wrote from the point of view which believes Liu Pei to be the rightful successor to the Han throne, but while his treatment of the major personages of Shu Han is always sympathetic, he seldom stoops to vilify the equally colorful heroes of Wei and Wu. Even Ts'ao Ts'ao, always the caricature of a villain on the Chinese stage, is a more complex and subtle character in the book than most careless readers would allow. In making Chu ko Liang his hero, a man of unexcelled intelligence who nevertheless attempts the impossible out of his devotion to Liu Pei and his cause, Lo Kuan chung has given his history a tragic meaning of the most disturbing kind.

ROMANCE OF THE THREE KINGDOMS by Lo Kuan chung. Translated by C. H. Brewitt Taylor. By permission of the publishers Charles E. Tuttle Co., Rutland, Vt. Copyright 1925 by Kelly & Walsh Ltd. Renewed. All rights reserved. Copyright 1959 by Charles E. Tuttle Co.

The Story

When the Yellow Turban rebellion was finally quashed, the many soldiers of fortune who took part in its suppression seized power for themselves, thus precipitating the downfall of the Eastern Han dynasty. Among these the most shrewd and successful politician was Ts'ao Ts'ao, who had already attracted a large following of able counselors and warriors. After the systematic elimination of his many rivals, such as Tung Cho, Lu Po, Yuan Shao, and Yuan Shu, he ruled over North China as the King of Wei, subjecting the Han Emperor and his court to great indignity.

Liu Pei, who also rose to fame during the Yellow Turban rebellion, was for a long time doing very poorly, in spite of the legendary prowess of his sworn brothers, Kuan Yu and Chang Fei. It was not until he sought out Chu ko Liang and made him his prime minister that his fortunes began to improve. In time he ruled over Szechwan as the King of Shu Han.

While Liu Pei was beginning to mend his fortunes, the only man who blocked

Ts'ao Ts'ao's territorial ambitions was Sun Ch'uan, who had inherited from his father and older brother the rich kingdom of Wu, south of the Yangtze. When Ts'ao Ts'ao finally decided to cross the Yangtze and subdue Wu, Sun Ch'uan and Liu Pei formed an alliance, and the combined strategy of their respective military commanders, Chou Yu and Chu ko Liang, subjected Ts'ao Ts'ao's forces to a crushing defeat. After this victory, Liu Pei went to Szechwan and the precarious power balance of the Three Kingdoms was established.

The friendly relationship between Shu and Wu did not last long. Kuan Yu, entrusted with the vital task of governing the province of Hupeh, adjacent to the Wu territory, had antagonized Sun Ch'uan, and in the subsequent military struggle he was killed. Liu Pei now vowed to conquer Wu, against the sage advice of Chu ko Liang, who wanted to conciliate Wu so as to counter their more dangerous common enemy, Wei. He led a personal expedition against Wu and suffered a disastrous defeat. Liu Pei died soon afterward.

Liu Pei's son and successor was a moronic weakling. Out of loyalty to his late master, however, Chu ko Liang was determined to serve him and improve the fortunes of Shu. He made peace with Wu and led several expeditions against Wei. These campaigns ended in a stalemate. Overburdened with work and handicapped by the lack of able generals (of the "Five Tiger Warriors" of Liu Pei's day, only Chao Yun had remained, an old fighter as intrepid as ever), Chu ko Liang could no longer direct his campaigns with his usual brilliance. Moreover, the Wei commander, Ssu ma I, whose family had become increasingly powerful in the Wei court following the death of Ts'ao Ts'ao, was in many ways his shrewd match. Finally Chu ko Liang died of physical exhaustion.

By that time the Ssu mas had usurped the power of Wei and had subjected Ts'ao Ts'ao's descendants to as much cruelty and torture as Ts'ao Ts'ao and his immediate successor had subjected the Han emperors Wu and Shu had both weakened Even though Chiang Wei, the Shu general, tried bravely to stem the tide, he was overwhelmed by the numerical strength of the invading

Wei forces, under the command of T'eng Ai and Chung Hui Soon after the death of Chiang Wei, the kings of Shu and Wu surrendered Ssu ma Yen, Ssu ma I's grandson, now ruled China as the first Emperor of Chin

A ROOM WITH A VIEW

Type of work Novel

Author E M Forster (1879)

Type of plot Social comedy

Time of plot Early 1900's

Locale Florence, Italy, and Surrey, England

First published 1908

Principal characters

MISS LUCY HONEYCHURCH, a young Englishwoman

MISS CHARLOTTE BARTLETT, her cousin and chaperon

MR EMERSON, an Englishman

GEORGE EMERSON his son

THE REVEREND ARTHUR BEEBE

MRS HONEYCHURCH, Lucy's mother

FREDDY HONEYCHURCH, Lucy's brother

CECIL VYSE, Lucy's fiance

MISS CATHERINE ALAN, a guest at the Pension Bertolini

MISS TERESA ALAN, her sister

MISS ELEANOR LAVISH, a novelist

Critique

This novel, E M Forster's third, was probably conceived in Italy To Mr Forster, Italy represents the force of true passion, and the recognition of this passion by his heroine in his theme here He is singularly aware of the nonexistence of absolutes, his kindest characters have their moments of cruelty and areas of incomprehension Similarly, those least sympathetic have moments of glory and of true feeling and understanding Forster is also intensely aware of the structure of society and of the imperfections and merits of each of its spheres Although smaller in scope than Howard's End and A Passage to India, his two later novels, A Room with a View is equally perceptive and shows a highly developed moral sensibility

The Story

Lucy Honeychurch and Charlotte Bartlett were disappointed by the Pension Bertolini and by the fact that their rooms had no view They were embarrassed at dinner when Mr Emerson offered to exchange his and his son's rooms, which had views, with theirs Their unhappiness decreased when the Reverend Arthur Beebe, whom they had known previously, and who had been appointed rector of Lucy's home parish, joined them at dinner After dinner he managed to convince Charlotte that the exchange of rooms would not put them under any obligation to the Emersons The change, although effected, merely confirmed Charlotte's opinion that the Emersons were ill bred

At Santa Croce Church Lucy met the Emersons, who guided her to the Giotto

frescoes that she had come to see. She found that she was more at ease with Mr. Emerson than she had expected, even though his rejection of artistic and religious cant and his concern about his son confused her.

Late one afternoon Lucy declared that she would go for a walk alone. She bought some photographs of paintings she had seen and then walked through the Piazza Signoria. As she did so, she passed two men arguing over a debt. One stabbed the other and the stricken man, bleeding from the mouth, died at her feet. At the same moment she saw George Emerson watching from across the square. As he reached her side, she fainted. After she had recovered, she sent him to get her photographs. Disturbed because they were covered with blood, he tossed them into the Arno on the way home. When Lucy asked why he had thrown the pictures away, he was forced to tell her. He felt that something very significant had happened to him in the piazza. Lucy stopped with him near the pension and, leaning beside him over the parapet, asked him to tell no one that he had been there. Perturbed by their enforced intimacy, she was puzzled and amazed when George said that the murder would make him want to live.

In a large party the visitors at the pension, together with a resident English chaplain, drove toward Fiesole. Lucy, excluded from Miss Lavish's conversation with Charlotte, asked one of their drivers to direct her to the clergyman. Instead, he led her to George. Lucy found at the end of the path a terrace covered with violets. While she stood there, radiant at the beauty of the place, George stepped forward and kissed her. Charlotte, whom neither had seen at first, called her cousin back.

merely brutal. In the morning the women took the train for Rome.

Back at her home in Surrey, Lucy became engaged to Cecil Vyse, whom she had visited in Rome. Mr. Beebe, coming to the house for tea, was perturbed by the engagement. Returning from a party with Lucy and Mrs. Honeychurch, Cecil saw a pair of ugly villas that had been put up by a local builder. When the village residents became alarmed as they considered the type of person who might rent them, they were assured that a certain Sir Harry Otway had bought the houses and intended to lease them only to suitable tenants. Lucy suggested the Misses Alan, whom she had met in Florence. After seeing the villas, Cecil and Lucy walked on through the woods. By a pond where Lucy had bathed as a child, Cecil, for the first time, asked if he might kiss her. Their embrace, not successful, only reminded Lucy of the Emersons, whom she then mentioned to Cecil.

Shortly before the Alans' occupancy had been arranged, Cecil met the Emersons in London and suggested that they take one of the villas. Not connecting them with Lucy, he hoped thereby to disrupt the local social order. After the Emersons had moved into their house, Mr. Beebe took Freddy Honeychurch to meet them. The boy immediately asked George to go swimming with him. Together with Mr. Beebe they swam and raced gaily at the pond in the woods. There Lucy came upon George again. Although he greeted her joyously, she bowed stiffly and moved on with her mother and Cecil.

One Sunday, while George was visiting the house, Cecil loftily refused to play tennis. Lucy, George, Freddy, and a friend of his played while Cecil read. After the game Cecil read aloud from his was staying in the house at that time and Lucy was furious that she had thus betrayed her to Miss Lavish. Together they went to George and Lucy asked him to leave. Before he obeyed, he told Lucy that he loved her and that it would be disastrous for her to marry Cecil, who was incapable of intimacy with anyone.

That evening, although she denied to herself that she was attracted to George, Lucy broke her engagement to Cecil. In the meantime Mr Beebe received a letter from the Misses Alan, who were planning to visit Athens. To escape her confusion, Lucy decided that she must go with them, and Charlotte joined Mr Beebe in persuading Mrs Honeychurch to let Lucy go. Lucy, afraid that George would hear of her rejection of Cecil and return to see her, hoped in this manner to avoid another meeting with him.

As Lucy was returning from a day in London with her mother, Charlotte came out of Mr Beebe's house and asked them to go with her to church. Lucy, declining, went into the house to await their return. There she found Mr Emerson in the library. George, feeling utterly lost, had gone to London. Lucy finally admitted that she was not to marry Cecil, but when Mr Emerson revealed his intuitive knowledge that she loved George, she became angry and wept. Although she gradually perceived that all he said was true, she was upset at the prospect of distressing everyone afresh if she acted on her new knowledge. Strengthened by Mr Emerson's passion, sincerity, and confidence, however, she promised to attempt to live the truth she had learned.

Her family opposing but not defeating her, Lucy married George. They spent their honeymoon in the Pension Bertolini, where they wonderingly realized that subconsciously Charlotte had been on their side. She had known that Mr Emerson was in Mr Beebe's house, and she must have realized, too, how he would speak to Lucy when they met there.

THE RUBÁIYÁT OF OMAR KHAYYÁM

Type of work Philosophical poem

Translator Edward FitzGerald (1809-1883)

First published 1859

Awake! for Morning in the Bowl of Night
Has flung the Stone that puts the Stars to Flight
And Lo! the Hunter of the East has caught
The Sultan's Turret in a Noose of Light

Thus did Edward FitzGerald, a shy dilettante living in the Victorian Age, open the first edition of what he called his "transmutation" of the quatrains of Omar Khayyám, a Persian mathematician and poet of the eleventh century. So striking are these opening lines, which flash like the rays of the morning sun, it seems almost incredible that anyone could read them and not wish to continue, but FitzGerald's poem, unsigned and privately printed, mouldered in bookshops for years, even though the price dropped to a penny a copy. Not until Dante Gabriel Rossetti stumbled on the poem, realized its worth, and began quoting from it in the proper literary circles did The Rubaiyat start its upward climb to great popularity. Fearful that its epicurean flavor would prove too spicy for prudish Victorians, FitzGerald did not allow his name to be associated with the poem during his lifetime. Only the fifth edition, published six years after his death in 1883, gives him credit for taking Omar's random verses and turning them into a poem that has shape, vitality, and a lyrical frivolity. Even after the poem had become famous, a theory was seriously advanced that it was all symbolical, that when Omar mentioned

"Wine" he really meant "the Divinity" Such a theory seems as hard to swallow as the one which makes a religious allegory out of the "Song of Solomon" FitzGerald finally won out over the Victorians, by 1900 admirers of The Rubaiyat had become a cult Not so lucky was Omar himself, for he too tried to run counter to a trend the ancient Persians believed that poetry must have mysticism to be of value, The Rubaiyat was so worldly it told them bluntly to eat, drink, and be just as merry as possible Thus Omar died unpraised and not until more than seven centuries later, when he was "reincarnated" in FitzGerald, did the world hail his philosophy

Following the opening quatrain, The Rubaiyat quickly establishes that philosophy, for as soon as the cock crows some people standing in front of a tavern demand that the door be opened so that they may drink their wine immediately Such is the theme of the poem life is short therefore, you must put no dependence in Tomorrow or the Hereafter, but must seize on Today with all its sensory pleasures FitzGerald plays variations on this theme for more than a hundred quatrains and among these are some of the most quoted stanzas in English literature, for instance, those concerned with "the Bird of Time," with the celebrated "Book of Verses underneath the Bough," with the "batter'd Caravanserai," with "so red the Rose," and with the "Moving Finger" But The Rubaiyat is not haphazardly thrown together It flows smoothly from the praising of wine to the disparagement of logic and wisdom, then from the spoofing of the ordinary conception of Divinity to the finality of death, that simple end to revelry

One of the most interesting sections, though not the most lyrical, is the group of related stanzas dealing with the Potter and the Pots Some of the Pots are "loquacious Vessels" and what they say reveals a thought provoking if somewhat skeptical attitude toward life, the Creator, and death The first vessel complains that

surely the earth will not be molded into a figure and then broken or trampled back to earth again A second says that since a "peevish Boy" would not break a bowl from which he had drunk with pleasure, the Potter will certainly not in wrath destroy what He created Then follow these stanzas

After a momentary silence spake
Some Vessel of a more ungainly Make
'They sneer at me for leaning all awry
'What! did the Hand then of the Pot ter shake?'

Whereat some one of the loquacious
Lot—
I think a Sufi pipkin—waxing hot—
'All this of Pot and Potter—Tell me, then
Who is the Potter, pray, and who the Pot?'

"Why said another, "Some there are who tell
'Of one who threatens he will toss to Hell
'The luckless Pots he marr'd in making—Pish!
'He's a Good Fellow, and 't will all be well"

FitzGerald (or Omar) cannot be taken seriously as a destroyer of faith or as a radical philosopher He is too light hearted to be accused of inducing corruption And when The Rubaiyat is looked at closely, one becomes aware that there are really no new ideas here, it has all been said before Certainly this poem and Gray's "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard" are highly dissimilar, but in one respect they are alike both FitzGerald and Gray have taken a series of platitudes, strung them together, and created tremendously effective poems because the words and music blend together so appropriately Gray's music is slow and stately, a funeral march, FitzGerald sings like a skylark that has become tipsy from eating fermented cherries

You know, my Friends, with what a brave Carouse

I made a Second Marriage in my house
 Divorced old barren Reason from my Bed
 And took the Daughter of the Vine to Spouse

The meter of these lines is plain iambic pentameter, but somehow the unrhymed third line makes each stanza spill into the next, as one might pour wine rapidly from one cup to another. The alliteration and the adroit use of internal part rhyme (such as 'barren Reason') increase the musical effect. And FitzGerald's diction is so fresh, so pert, that The Rubaiyat may never become dated, may always sound as if it were written yesterday or (more in the FitzGerald spirit) Today.

In any long poem there are bound to be passages that come as a letdown, The Rubaiyat is no exception. A goodly number of its stanzas can be passed over without loss to the reader and even some of the better and best ones are repetitive. In spite of these minor objections The Rubaiyat glitters with joy, especially so when one considers it as a product of the Victorian Age, which took itself so seriously. Two fine poets of that era have written poems in which they give their ideas on death. Tennyson's death poem is of course, the simple and moving "Crossing the Bar", in "Prospice" Browning envisions the end of life as a last battle to be won, a fighting through to heaven. Measured against these two great poems, the final stanza of The Rubaiyat may seem flippant, but its very flippancy makes it equally as memorable.

And when like her, oh Sáki, you shall pass
 Among the Guests Star scatter'd on the Grass,
 And in your joyous errand reach the spot
 Where I made One—turn down an empty Glass!

RULE A WIFE AND HAVE A WIFE

Type of work Drama

Author John Fletcher (1579-1625)

Type of plot Romantic comedy

Time of plot c. 1600

Locale Spain

First presented 1624

Principal characters

LEON, a young Spanish gentleman

DON JUAN DE CASTRO, a colonel

MICHAEL PEREZ, a captain

CACAFOGO, a fat usurer

THE DUKE OF MEDINA

MARGARITA, a rich and wanton lady

ALTEA, her companion

ESTIFANIA, her maid

Critique

From a strictly moral point of view, Rule a Wife and Have a Wife leaves a good deal to be desired. Leon wins the beautiful, rich, and wanton Margarita by deceit and transforms her into a dutiful and virtuous wife by bullying her unmercifully. But Fletcher is never much concerned with moral questions. Rather, he is interested in creating comic situations which will give rise to fast moving action and which will permit the introduction of interesting and humorous characters. These effects he achieves masterfully in Rule a Wife and Have a Wife, one of the most tightly knit of his comedies. The main plot, the taming of Margarita by Leon, is carefully balanced against the subplot, the gulling of Michael Perez by Estifania, and the two plots serve to reinforce each other admirably As a supposedly weak husband asserts and wins superiority over his wife, so a seemingly wealthy and virtuous wife reveals to her husband that she is no better than she should be and makes him like it The plots are united in their use of dramatic irony, and both are invigorated by a strong and direct language which is saved from vulgarity by its use in broadly comic, sometimes nearly farcical, situations

The Story

As they were discussing the gathering of their companies for the Dutch wars, Michael Perez and Don Juan de Castro were interrupted by two veiled ladies, one of whom desired Don Juan to carry a message to a kinsman serving in Flanders Perez was much attracted by her companion, and the lady seemed equally drawn to him In spite of his pleas, however, she would not open her veil, although she did instruct him to have his servant follow her to learn the location of her home and to call there later himself This was done, and Perez was overjoyed to find that the lady, Estifania, was not only lovely but also the owner of a magnificent town house beautifully adorned with hangings and plate Perez proposed on the spot and to his delight was accepted Don Juan, meanwhile, was interviewing Leon, a young man recommended to him as an officer Although he was strong and handsome and had seen previous service, Leon revealed himself to be the most incredible ass When he showed himself to be both cowardly and immeasurably stupid Don Juan dismissed him with little encouragement

In the country nearby, Margarita, a beautiful young heiress, was making preparations to return to town She had but one object in view—pleasure—and she declared herself not at all adverse to a bit of wantonness if it should come her way On the advice of Altea, her gentlewoman, she had decided that her reputation could be best protected if she married a foolish and complaisant man who would wink at her infidelities In fact, Altea had just the man in mind, a fellow who was presentable enough but who had no more brains than an oyster and no sense of honor whatever The man was Leon When Margarita interviewed him she found him perfect for the role he was supposed to play, and she decided to wed him at once She did not hear Leon whisper to Altea that he was a thousand crowns in her debt

Margarita's sudden appearance in the city was welcomed by all the gallants, but it interrupted the idyllic honeymoon of Perez and Estifania The soldier was reveling in the possession of his bride's mansion when Margarita and her entourage arrived at the door Estifania did not seem altogether surprised, she pacified Perez by telling him that Margarita was a poor cousin trying to make the gentleman who accompanied her believe that she was rich in order to have him propose The scheme made it necessary for Estifania and Perez to move into temporary quarters for a few days so that the ruse could be carried out After Perez had left, the relationship between Estifania and Margarita became clear Far from being a poor cousin, Margarita was the mistress and Estifania only the maid It was Perez who had been thoroughly gulled

Again in possession of her house, Margarita wasted no time New hangings were placed in the rooms, couches were arranged in strategic locations, a magnificent dinner was prepared and a company of gallants, including Don Juan and the Duke of Medina, in whom Margarita was especially interested, were invited to enjoy the feasting and entertainment

The party was just beginning when Leon appeared, his air of stupidity and fecklessness entirely gone Proudly he informed the guests that he was Margarita's husband and master and that he intended to protect his honor to the utmost Margarita was infuriated, but Leon quickly silenced her The Duke, too, was sorely displeased that his plans for Margarita had gone so suddenly awry, and he an gaily drew upon Leon. But the young man was quite ready to fight, and only Don Juan's intercession restored calm and won a grudging apology from the Duke. Don Juan, in fact, was enchanted to see Leon's sudden transformation.

The guests were going fairly amicably in to dinner when Perez burst in. From some women in his new lodging he had heard the truth about Estifania, and he had also learned that he was not the first husband she had cozened. Moreover, she had disappeared with all his possessions.

Having had the women's story confirmed by Margarita, Perez hurried away again, determined to find Estifania and punish her. But when he met her on the street, Estifania was as angry as he, she had attempted to pawn his treasures and had learned that they were all false. In the mutual tongue lashing that followed, Estifania emerged the winner. Having sent Perez back to Margarita's house again, convinced that it was really his, she began to improve their fortunes by selling Perez's worthless trinkets to Cacafofo for many times their value. She told him that they were Margarita's possessions which her mistress was sacrificing so that she could raise money to escape from Leon.

The Duke had ideas of his own about separating the husband and wife. He had Don Juan deliver to Leon a commission to command a troop of horse and orders to leave for Flanders immediately. When she heard of this plan, Margarita protested, tongue in cheek, that she hardly could bear to be left by her new husband whom she was just coming to love. If only she could accompany him, she sighed, but that, of course, was impossible. At the most ardent point of her discourse she heard the sound of hammers. Leon had checked the Duke's maneuver neatly. He intended to take with him to Flanders not only Margarita but also the complete furnishing of the house so that he could live like a gentleman in the garrison. As a last resort Margarita pleaded that she was pregnant, but Leon calmly reminded her that since they had been married only four days the news was somewhat too sudden to be credible. In spite of the protests of the gallants who were present, Leon remained firm, Margarita would accompany him. In a pique, Margarita gave the house and furnishings to Perez, who had by that time arrived to claim the possessions he believed his own, but Leon was so little troubled by this action that Margarita, almost in spite of herself, was compelled to express her admiration for him. Consequently, the gift was withdrawn, and Perez again was gulled.

Angered beyond measure, he once more sought out Estifania. This time he drew his sword to kill her, but she stopped him by covering him with a pistol. She then took the edge off his wrath by presenting him with the thousand ducats out of which she had gulled Cacafofo. Realizing that there were shortcomings on both sides of the match and that his wife was a great deal cleverer than he, Perez decided that he ought to make the best of his bargain.

Meanwhile, both the Duke and Cacafofo arrived independently to pay suit to Margarita. The usurer was diverted into the wine cellar, where he soon became drunk. The Duke, having gained entry to the house by pretending to be wounded in a duel, soon found a chance to be alone with her, but his passionate speeches were interrupted by Cacafofo's drunken roaring from the cellar, a noise which, at Margarita's suggestion, he took to be a devil haunting him because of his evil purpose. Half afraid and thoroughly ashamed by the lady's virtuous replies, he became utterly discomfited and renounced his suit for good. This development completely satisfied Leon, who had overheard everything that was said. All ended happily as the bride and groom, now completely in love with each other, invited Perez and Estifania to take service with them.

SAINT JOAN

Type of work Drama

Author Bernard Shaw (1856 1950)

Time 1428 1456

Locale France

First presented 1923

Principal characters

JOAN OF ARC, Maid of Orleans

CHARLES, Dauphin and later King of France *

PETER CAUGHON Bishop of Beauvais

THE EARL OF WARWICK, an English lord

'JACK' DUNOIS, a French commander

ROBERT DE BAUDRICOURT a French squire

THE ARCHBISHOP OF RHEIMS

DE STOGUMBER, an English chaplain

In 1920, almost five hundred years after she had been burned at the stake as a heretic, sorceress, and witch, Joan of Arc, Maid of Orleans, was canonized, three and one half years later, with the first performance of Saint Joan on December 28, 1923, at the Garrick Theatre in New York City, Joan was Shavianized. That is to say, George Bernard Shaw told the world the truth about Joan in terms of the Shavian dramatic dialectic.

Shaw felt that although Joan had been completely rehabilitated, both by the Church and by secular commentators, the true significance of her life and martyrdom was not yet understood, for in exonerating Joan of the crimes for which it had burned her, the Church had white washed Joan and condemned itself. Furthermore, the literary interpretations of Joan, ranging from Voltaire's ribald burlesque to Mark Twain's romantic adulation, were misleading and therefore worthless. Shaw believed that he could rectify all these erroneous interpretations. He proceeded to write Saint Joan, basing it on the extraordinary premises, first, that Joan was a harbinger of Protestantism and, secondly, that she was a fomenter of nationalism. Within the framework of the play he concludes that Joan had to die because as a Protestant she threatened the authority of the Church, and as a nationalist she imperiled the power of the feudal lords.

Whether or not these premises and conclusions are valid historically is, of course, conjectural. But such a question is irrelevant since they are valid dramatically. In this play more than in any other, Shaw succeeded in creating characters who lived the theme in addition to preaching it. Saint Joan is thus a genuine play, not just a Shavian dialogue.

Joan's Protestantism is rooted in her independence, her insistence on listening to the dictates of her heavenly voices, which she concedes may be figments of her imagination. Convinced that the advice given her by Saint Margaret and Saint Catherine is sensible and practical, she finds the courage to defy bishops, archbishops, and inquisitors. Her nationalism grows out of her almost fanatical zeal to save France from the English and to establish France as an autonomous state dedicated to glorifying God. This zeal, manifested as fervid sincerity and earnestness, enables her to command generals and to crown kings.

Independence, courage, and zeal—these characteristics make Joan a Shavian genius, a superwoman, and the female counterpart of Jack Tanner. Her ability to probe deep into the problems of life and to formulate independent ethical values causes her to be alienated from conventional society. Although Joan is a Shavian genius, she is not a typical one. As a proud, stubborn peasant girl, Joan is profoundly, pathetically human. She can stand as a character without reference to Shaw or his philosophy.

The characterization of Joan is by no means the only original one in the play; the treatment of the minor personages is even less conventional, most notably with the Earl of Warwick, and Cauchon, Bishop of Beauvais. Shaw objected to the traditional interpretation of Warwick and Cauchon as egregious blackguards and set out to rehabilitate them. Within the typically Shavian framework they represent the conservative and reactionary—the established—elements of society who resist and defeat the genius. Within the thematic framework of Saint Joan, they represent the power of the Church and of feudalism. Their opposition to Joan is not vindictive; Cauchon, in fact, strives to save her and insures a fair trial for her. Both are forced to resist her because as thinking men they recognize that she threatens their own self-interest within the existing social order. As a feudal lord, Warwick cannot brook Joan's nationalism, which, if unchecked, would diminish his power. As a ruler of the Church, Cauchon cannot tolerate Joan's Protestantism, which, if unchecked, would subvert his authority. Both are reasonable, even virtuous men, and by executing Joan they perform a service to the elements of society which they represent. Far from being villains, they were medieval heroes.

Most of the other characters also represent the conservative elements of society, but they see, for a while at least, the advantage in allying themselves with Joan. To the French, Joan is a new hope for France, a crazy hope, perhaps, but the last hope for driving out the English. Thus Captain Robert de Baudricourt, lord of the province where Joan was born, agrees to furnish her horse and armor as well as an escort to take her to the dauphin. The dauphin, timid and a little silly, a prisoner of his own court, makes

Joan his commander-in-chief and succumbs to her efforts to make a man and king of him. The Archbishop of Rheims gives to her enterprise the sanction of the Church. And Dunois, commander of the forces at Orleans, agrees to follow Joan's leadership in a desperate attack across the Loire. Yet all these desert Joan when she has served their purposes. When her plans to complete her mission by driving the English from Paris seem too impractical, too audacious to execute, they withdraw their support, charging her with impudence and pride. By the time Joan has crowned the dauphin at Rheims, they have recovered their conventionality and are embarrassed by their former enthusiasm in accepting a peasant girl's leadership. Therefore they do not move to save Joan when she is captured and sold to Warwick and Cauchon.

This theme of the rejection of the moral genius by the conservative elements of society is recapitulated and generalized in an epilogue. Twenty-five years after her death, on the occasion of her rehabilitation by the Church in 1456, Joan meets again the men who were involved in her career. When a messenger from the Pope appears to announce the canonization of Joan, all, from Cauchon to King Charles, fall to their knees in adoration of the new saint. Yet when Joan acknowledges their praise by asking if she should return from the dead, a living woman, each—except for a common soldier—again rejects her, humbly this time, and disappears. Shaw's message is clear: those who rule society are never ready to accept the moral genius who would change society, even though that genius be a saint.

Saint Joan is perhaps the only play in which Shaw succeeded in dramatizing this theme without reference to situations which now seem dated, and without reducing drama to didacticism. Because Saint Joan in part transcends Shaw, it must be listed among his masterpieces.

ST PETER'S UMBRELLA

Type of work Novel
Author Kalmán Mikszáth (1847-1910)
Type of plot Humorous romance
Time of plot Second half of nineteenth century
Locale Hungary
First published 1895

Principal characters

PAL GREGORICS a wealthy bachelor
ANNA WIBRA, his housekeeper and cook
GYURY (GYORGY) WIBRA the illegitimate son of Anna Wibra
JANOS BELYI, a priest in Glogova
VERONICA BELYI, his sister
WIDOW ADAMECZ, the priest's housekeeper
JANOS SZTOLARIK, a lawyer
JONAS MUNCZ, a Jewish merchant

Critique

Kalmán Mikszáth was a country squire lawyer, magistrate, journalist, member of parliament, and novelist, but his forte was undoubtedly the ability for superb storytelling, surpassed in Hungary only by Maurus Jokai. He draws his characters with the certainty of a man who knows and understands the people he writes about, mainly the Hungarian peasantry. The ease with which he transforms everyday life into unusual stories reminds one strongly of Maupassant, his sense of humor, as demonstrated in this novel, makes reading a pleasure. The author became a member of the Hungarian Academy and of the Hungarian Parliament, but his parliamentary speeches will be long forgotten when the hilarious episodes of St Peter's Umbrella will be still remembered.

The Story

When the new priest, young János Bélyi, arrived in Glogova, prospects for an enjoyable life were extremely dim. The little Hungarian town was a forlorn place where impoverished peasants lived out their lives trying to get as much as possible out of the poor soil. No provisions were made for the priest's subsistence and church property was almost nonexistent. While the priest was contemplating the fact that he would have to eat less and pray more, the situation became more critical with the arrival of his little baby sister. His parents had died and somebody had decided to send little Veronica to her next relative, the priest. Thus a little baby in a basket was suddenly put at the doorstep of his modest home. In order to find a solution to his problems he took a prayerful walk.

A heavy rain began to fall. Suddenly he remembered the baby, still lying in front of his house, and he was certain the child would be soaking wet before he could arrive. To his surprise he found her completely dry, protected by an old red umbrella. The priest could not imagine who had been so kind to his little sister, however, the townspeople soon found all sorts of explanations. Since the only stranger who had been seen lately was an old Jew, the peasants came to the conclusion that St Peter had come to show his mercy for the poor child.

At the next funeral on a rainy day the priest used the red umbrella. The men carrying the coffin stumbled and the supposedly dead man who was merely in a trance, became very much alive. To the villagers this incident was another sign of the supernatural character of the umbrella. On account of the umbrella the priest's conditions improved rapidly, and all kinds of gifts arrived at his house for the baby who had caused St Peter to come to Glogova. Even Widow Adamecz offered her services as housekeeper free of charge, additional proof of the miraculous power of the umbrella to all who knew the money conscious widow.

In the beginning the priest tried to resist continuous requests for the presence of the umbrella during church ceremonies, but his parishioners felt so offended when he refused that he finally gave in and used the umbrella on all occasions. Pilgrims came from far away to look at the umbrella and brides insisted on being married under it. Soon the town felt the need for building an inn which carried the name "Miraculous Umbrella." The priest wondered how the umbrella came to Glogova, he was to wait many years for an answer.

In the town of Besztercebánya lived a wealthy bachelor, Pal Gregonics. A spy during the war, he had been seen many times with a red umbrella. Pal Gregonics was in love with his housekeeper, Anna Wibra, who gave birth to an illegitimate son, Gyury Wibra. The townspeople observed how Pal Gregonics devoted all his time to the child. Pal's two brothers and his sister did not like the possibility that they might some day have to share Pál's estate with an illegitimate child. For this reason Pál, afraid that his relatives might try to harm young Gyury, decided to trick them by pretending he did not care for the boy, and he sent Gyury to a distant school. To deceive his brothers and sister, he acted as if he had invested all his money in several estates which required inspection from time to time, but in reality he visited his son.

In spite of great love for his father, Gyury reproached Pál for making himself a laughingstock by always carrying the old red umbrella. Pal disregarded the complaints and promised his son he would one day inherit the umbrella. When Pal felt he was going to die, he asked his lawyer János Sztolark to prepare his will. Mysteriously, he asked two masons, under strict order of secrecy, to break a wall in order to place a caldron into the wall and finish the masonry as it had been before. Although he had told his housekeeper to notify Gyury of his illness, she failed to do so, and Pal Gregonics died, without seeing his son, with the red umbrella in his hands.

When Sztolark read the will, Pál's brothers and sister were horrified to hear nothing about the rich estates which their brother supposedly owned. They spent much time and money to find out what Pal had done with the money. They suspected a secret bequest to Gyury, but investigators reported that the boy was studying and living on a meager income. Finally they discovered the two masons, who revealed for a large sum of money the secret of the caldron in the wall. Certain they had found the answer to their riddle, they bought the house, which had been willed to Gyury, for an extremely high price. When they broke the wall open, they found the caldron filled with rusty nails.

Soon afterward Gyury completed his education and became a lawyer in Besztercebánya. He had heard about the frantic search for his father's estate and he himself began to wonder where it could be. The first clue was given by the dying mayor, who told how Pal Gregonics had carried secret documents in the hollow handle of his umbrella during the war. Gyury's suspicion was confirmed when his mother told him how Pal, even in death, was still clutching the umbrella. The search for the umbrella then began. Gyury's investigations pointed to an old Jew, Jónás Muncz, who had bought for a few coins his father's odds and ends which the relatives did not want. Further inquiries established that the Jew had died, but that his wife owned a small store in Bábaszek. Gyury and his coachman hurried to that town. An interview with Frau Muncz revealed that her husband had been fond of the umbrella and had carried it around at all times. Gyury heard from Frau Muncz's son that the old Jew had been seen put ting the umbrella over a little baby in Glogova

As he was about to leave for Glogova, Gyury found a lost earring for which, according to the town crier, the mayor was searching. Returning the earring to the mayor, he was introduced to its owner, a young and extremely beautiful girl. Furthermore, he learned she was Veronica Bélyi, sister of the village priest in Glogova. She had been on her way home when an accident damaged her vehicle.

Gladly Gyury offered to conduct Veronica and her traveling companion in his carriage, but the two women decided that it was now too late for departure, and Gyury agreed to postpone his trip until morning. During a party in the mayor's house Gyury heard about the miraculous umbrella in Glogova and realized that the umbrella he was seeking was identical with the priest's umbrella. Throughout the night he could hardly sleep from thinking how near and yet how far away the umbrella was. During the night he dreamed that St Peter advised him to marry the priest's sister, thus he would have a beautiful wife and a legal claim on the umbrella.

On the trip to Glogova, Gyury considered the advantages of the suggestion offered to him in his dream, but he was afraid Veronica might not love him. Not far away from the town the carriage broke down. Searching for some wood needed for repair, he heard faint cries for help, a man had fallen into a deep hole. After several attempts he succeeded in lifting out the unfortunate man, who turned out to be the priest of Glogova, he had fallen into the hole while waiting for

Veronica on the previous night. Deeply grateful, the priest wanted to know whether there was anything he could do for his rescuer. Gyury told him he had something in his carriage belonging to the priest. The priest was surprised to find his sister in the vehicle, he informed Veronica of his promise and thus Veronica became engaged to Gyury.

In Glogova the young man had a conversation with the lawyer Sztolank, who had heard from Gyury about his successful search. The lawyer was concerned because he felt that Gyury could not be sure whether love for Veronica or for the umbrella was the primary motive for his marriage. Veronica, overhearing the conversation, ran away heartbroken.

Gyury was eager to see the umbrella, which the priest gladly showed him. But the old handle had been replaced by a new one of silver. Gyury's last hope for recovering the old handle was crushed when the priest's housekeeper informed him that she had burned it. Meanwhile the priest began to worry about the absence of his sister. Hearing of her disappearance, Gyury was also greatly upset. Suddenly he realized that he could overcome the loss of the umbrella, but not the loss of Veronica. Church bells gave the fire alarm signal and everybody in Glogova appeared for the search. When Gyury found Veronica and told her about the burned handle, she recognized his greater love for her, and she and Gyury were married in the grandest wedding Glogova had ever seen. Although Gyury never knew whether the handle contained the key to his inheritance, the umbrella remained a treasured relic in his family.

ST RONAN'S WELL

Type of work Novel

Author Sir Walter Scott (1771-1832)

Type of plot Social criticism

Time of plot Early nineteenth century

Locale Scotland

First published 1824

Principal characters

FRANCIS TYRREL, a young Englishman posing as an itinerant painter
THE EARL OF ETHERINGTON, an English nobleman
CLARA MOWBRAY, daughter of a Scottish laird
JOHN MOWBRAY her brother
MR TOUCHWOOD an elderly world traveler
MEG DODS, mistress of the inn at old St. Ronan's
LADY PENELOPE PENFEATHER a society leader at St. Ronan's Well
CAPTAIN HARRY JEKYL Etherington's friend

Critique

St. Ronan's Well is one of the most bitter and scathingly satirical of Scott's novels. Lockhart reports that the original version, in which Clara's forced marriage to Valentine Bulmer was consummated, was so unpleasant that the author's publishers forced him to alter his plot. It is in some ways unfortunate that he followed their advice, because the change weakened the motivation for Clara's later behavior. The members of the idle society at the watering place are easily recognizable individuals, probably modeled after superficial admirers of Scott's work. His own experiences may be reflected in Francis Tyrrel's lack of success in Lady Penelope's circle. The author does not give these characters the sympathy which he reserves for his kindhearted, eccentric figures like Meg Dods, the village parson, or Mr. Touchwood. What is unusual in this novel is the fact that the good intentions of these characters are partly responsible for the final tragedy.

The Story

Meg Dods, the proprietress, welcomed Francis Tyrrel, a young Englishman, to her inn at old St. Ronan's, after she had recognized him as a former visitor to the village and not a traveling salesman. She gladly answered his questions about the Mowbray family, telling him that John had inherited his father's title of laird of St. Ronan's and now spent much of his time gambling at the Well, the fashionable watering place whose growth had caused the old town to fall into ruins. Clara Mowbray, reported to be a little strange, lived with her brother.

Tyrrel saw these old acquaintances a few weeks later when he was invited to tea by Lady Penelope Penfeather, who was delighted to learn that an artist had come into the neighborhood. Her hope that he would be an asset to her social circle was thwarted, for she found him commonplace and was offended that he presumed to sit by her at dinner, far above what she considered his rightful position. Tyrrel was angered to discover that his activities had been the subject of a bet between Sir Bingo Binks and John Mowbray, and only a familiar voice in his ear stopped him from coming to blows with the boorish Sir Bingo.

Leaving the Well, Tyrrel waited in a nearby wood for Clara Mowbray, whose voice he had recognized. When they met they alluded to mysterious and dreadful past events which, the young man immediately realized, had unhinged the girl's mind. Clara, controlling her emotions enough to ask that they meet as friends, invited him to a party she and her brother were to give at Shaws Castle.

Smarting under Tyrrel's supposed insult, Sir Bingo, encouraged by his friend Captain MacTurk, sent a challenge to Tyrrel, who accepted it and agreed to a time for an encounter. However, when Sir Bingo and MacTurk appeared at the appointed place, they waited in vain. Although a public statement was issued at the Well to raise Sir Bingo's status and blacken Tyrrel's name, the young Englishman failed to come forward to defend his reputation.

Meg Dods, upset by her lodger's disappearance, and convinced that Tyrrel had been murdered by his dueling opponents, went to consult the sheriff at a nearby town Her attention was diverted from Tyrrel by the entrance into the sheriff's office of Mr Touchwood, who told her that he was thoroughly disgusted with the foolish society at the Well, where he had been staying When Mrs Dods promised him better service at her own inn, he agreed to move there

Once he had given detailed instructions about the angle of his bed and the cooking of his food, Mr Touchwood set out to make new acquaintances First he sought out the Rev Josiah Cargill, the most absent minded of scholars, but a kind and charitable man Mr Cargill, generally vague about the affairs of his parishioners, became unexpectedly agitated when, during a discussion of the Mowbrays' forthcoming fete, he heard the rumor that Clara was to wed a young nobleman He agreed to join his friend Mr Touchwood for the party and insisted that he must talk to the girl

The rumored bridegroom the Earl of Etherington, had been welcomed at St Ronan's Well with special cordiality because of the wounds he said he had received at the hands of a highwayman John Mowbray gambled with Etherington often during his convalescence and would have lost his own fortune and the money he had borrowed from his sister if the earl had not deliberately allowed his opponent to win He then asked John's permission to marry his sister, explaining that under the will of an eccentric relative a large fortune would be his if he wed a Mowbray John gave his consent with the provision that Clara must agree to the match

The mystery of Tyrrel's disappearance was partially explained in a letter which Etherington wrote to a friend, Captain Harry Jekyl The artist and the earl, bitter enemies who were obviously connected in some way, had met in a wood near St Ronan's and there fought a duel in which Tyrrel had been injured Etherington said that he knew nothing of Tyrrel's present whereabouts

Mr Touchwood and Mr Cargill went together to Shaws Castle where they were entertained with tableaux from A Midsummer Night's Dream Etherington had chosen the part of Bottom, played in an ass's head, it was later made obvious that his object was to prevent Clara from seeing his face After the play the earl was addressed by the minister as Valentine Bulmer, but the nobleman vigorously denied this name and left abruptly Mr Cargill, who had just spoken to Clara and urged her not to sin by considering marriage, was greatly puzzled however, knowing his own absent minded nature, he did not pursue the matter further

Etherington again postponed a meeting with Clara by leaving the banquet before she arrived, but he sent word to John the next morning that he wished to meet her that day When Clara told her brother that she would not see him or any other man who came proposing marriage, John left her alone to look for the bearer of an anonymous note which declared that Etherington had usurped his title Just then the earl entered Clara's room she screamed as she recognized him and asked why he had broken his promise never to see her again He answered that the fact that she had spoken to Tyrrel absolved him of his promise

Etherington's ensuing conversation with John and his second letter to Captain Jekyl explained the complicated relationship between himself, Clara, and Tyrrel The two young men were half brothers, both claiming to be their father's legitimate son At one time they had been sent to Scotland, where the future earl took the name of Valentine Bulmer When Tyrrel fell in love with Clara, the two planned a clandestine marriage with Bulmer's help Meanwhile, Bulmer had learned of the strange bequest hanging upon his marriage with a Mowbray, and he treacherously substituted himself for the bridegroom in the ceremony performed by Mr Cargill When Tyrrel stopped the newly wedded couple a short distance from the church and fought with his half brother, Bulmer fell under the wheels of his carriage and was seriously injured. Clara had returned home, horrified, and the two young men, both still in their teens, vowed never to see her again. The old earl died soon afterward and, having made no effort to acknowledge Francis Tyrrel's legitimacy, named Etherington as his heir.

Soon after Etherington's interview with Clara, Tyrrel returned to the inn, where he was befriended by Mr Touchwood. When Captain Jekyl came there to try to persuade him to soften his hatred for his brother, Tyrrel showed his visitor a list of documents which proved his legal title to the earldom; he offered to withhold this evidence, however, if Etherington would agree to leave Clara alone for the rest of her life. Captain Jekyl reported this interview to the earl, who denied that such proofs existed. As soon as his friend had gone, however, he plotted with his valet to steal the documents from the post office, thus substantiating Tyrrel's claim that his brother already knew about the papers.

By coincidence Lady Penelope led the earl to the deathbed of the one person who could prove his treachery conclusively. She was Hannah Irwin, Clara's former maid, who had helped him carry out his plot. Etherington kept Lady Penelope from hearing much of the dying woman's confession, but he was disturbed by the knowledge that his trickery could so easily be disclosed. His consternation increased when the stolen packet was found to contain only copies of the vital documents. In danger of losing his earldom, he was more anxious than ever to acquire the estate which would come with Clara. He gambled again with John Mowbray and won heavily enough to make the young man agree to persuade Clara to accept marriage to a husband she detested.

John first confronted Clara with the ugly rumors about her character, reports spread by Lady Penelope, who based her gossip on Hannah's half-heard confession.

Then he literally forced the poor girl to swear to submit to marriage with the earl. He left her, trembling, in her room and went to greet an unexpected visitor, Mr Touchwood, who identified himself as the son of the man who had left the estate coveted by Etherington and the senior partner in the law firm which held the documents proving Francis Tyrrel's legitimacy. Mr Touchwood, having pieced together the complicated affair between Clara and the two young men, told John the whole story, partly extracted from the earl's servant, Solmes.

Ironically, this revelation came too late. When John went to rouse his sister and tell her that he at last knew the truth, he found that she had fled. Her nightly wandering had led her first to Mr Cargill's house, where Hannah Irwin had been moved by Mr Touchwood. There she heard Hannah ask for forgiveness before she went on, distractedly, to Tyrrel's room at the inn. She collapsed after begging him to flee with her and died the next morning under the care of Meg Dods. Tyrrel rushed out to take vengeance on the man responsible for the tragedy, only to learn from Mr Touchwood that John Mowbray had preceded him and had already killed the earl.

John, in flight to England, sent back word that the whole town of St. Ronan's Well should be pulled down. He gradually developed habits of economy, and it was generally believed that he would eventually inherit Mr Touchwood's estate. That gentleman had tried to make a protégé of Francis Tyrrel, but the latter said that he had lived too much of his life too young and wanted only a quiet future. Refusing to claim his title, he went to the Continent, where he was reported to have joined a Moravian mission. Mr Touchwood, who might have forestalled the final tragedy if he had not been so anxious to work everything out himself, lived on, alone, making empty plans and increasing his fortune.

SAMSON AGONISTES

Type of work Drama
Author John Milton (1608 1674)
Type of plot Heroic tragedy
Time of plot c 1100 B C
Locale Palestine
First published 1671

Principal characters

SAMSON, Hebrew champion, one of the Judges
MANOA, his father
DALILA a Philistine woman, Samson's wife
HARAPHA, Philistine giant
CHORUS OF HEBREW ELDERS

Critique

Samson Agonistes is Milton's profound treatment of the Biblical story in the form of the classical Greek tragedy. Although the play, published with Paradise Regained in 1671, was not designed for the stage, the author modeled his work on Greek tragedy because he found it "the gravest, moralest, and most profitable of all other poems." The story of Samson is one of the most dramatic episodes in the Old Testament, the parallels between the life of the blind Hebrew hero and his own must have encouraged Milton to base his last work on the story, told in Judges, of the man singled out before his birth as a servant of God. Milton opens his play during Samson's imprisonment. He refers frequently to the Biblical accounts of the events of Samson's youth, but the episodes which make up most of the play are his own creation. Each affects Samson's character, renewing his faith in God and influencing his decision to go to the Philistine temple where he dies, according to the Biblical tradition, when he pulls down the roof upon himself and his enemies. Samson Agonistes is a powerful and moving drama. The poetry is both majestic and simple, different from the rich verse of Paradise Lost and Paradise Regained, but perfectly suited to the subject. The play is the masterpiece of an old man, one who has suffered like Samson and who has, in his own way, triumphed over suffering.

The Story

Samson, eyeless in Gaza, had been given a holiday from his labors during the season of a Philistine religious festival. He sat alone before the prison, lamenting his fallen state. His hair had grown long again and his physical strength had returned, but to him life seemed hopeless. Although he wondered why God had chosen him, who seemed destined to live out his days as a miserable, blinded wretch, he nevertheless blamed his misfortunes on himself. He should not have trusted in his strength without the wisdom to protect him from the wiles of Philistine women. He mourned also the blindness which made him live a life that was only half alive.

A chorus of Hebrew elders joined him. They recalled his past great deeds and spoke of the present state of Israel, subject to Philistine rule. Samson accused his people of loving bondage more than liberty because they had refused to take advantage of the victories he won for them in the days of his strength.

Manoa, Samson's aged father, also came to see his son, whose fate had given him great distress. He brought news which plunged Samson still deeper into his mood of depression, the Philistine feast was being given to thank the idol Dagon for delivering the mighty Hebrew into the hands of his enemies. Samson realized then the dishonor he had brought to God, yet he was able to find hope in the thought that the contest now was between Jehovah and Dagon. He foresaw no good for himself, cast off by God, and he prayed only for speedy death.

As the chorus mused over God's treatment of his chosen ones, Dalila approached. When she offered Samson help as recompense for her betrayal of him, he scorned her. She tried to excuse herself, pleading weakness and patriotism, but Samson refused to compound his sins by yielding to her again; he was regaining spiritual as well as physical might. He again accepted his position as God's champion when Harapha, a Philistine giant, came to gloat over his misfortune. It was too bad that Samson was now so weak, said Harapha, had he met him sooner he would have won great honor by defeating him. But he could not defile himself by combat with a slave. Samson, enraged, invited Harapha to come within his reach. The giant refused to accept the challenge, however, and left.

When a public officer came to summon Samson to the feast, the blind man refused to go. His presence there would violate Hebrew law, and he had no desire to have the Philistine mob make sport of his blindness. But as Samson told the chorus why he would not go, he felt a sudden inner compulsion to follow the messenger. He sensed that the day would mark some remarkable deed in his life. When the officer brought a second summons, and more imperative, Samson accompanied him.

Manoa, returning with the news that he had been able to persuade the Philistine lords to ransom his son, gladly planned to sacrifice his patrimony and spend his old age caring for Samson. Just as he was speaking of his hopes that Samson would recover his sight, horrible shouting broke out in the temple. A Hebrew messenger, fleeing the awful spectacle, told Manoa and the chorus that he had just seen Samson pull the temple down upon himself and thousands of Philistines. Manoa decided that Samson had conducted himself like Samson, and heroically ended a heroic life.

SANINE

Type of work Novel

Author Mikhail Artsybashev (1878-1927)

Type of plot Philosophical romance

Time of plot 1906

Locale Russia

First published 1907

Principal characters

VLADIMIR PETROVITCH SANINE, an individualistic young Russian

LIDIA (LIDA) PETROVNA, his sister

MARIA IVANOVNA, his mother

CAPTAIN SARUDINE, in love with Lida

DR. NOVIKOFF, also in love with Lida

SINA KARSAVINA, briefly the mistress of Sanine

YURI NIKOLAIJEVITCH SVAROGITSCH, in love with Sina Karsavina

Critique

Following the abortive revolution of 1905, many of the Russian intelligentsia made hedonism a popular cult, with pleasure and freedom from sexual morality the hallmarks of their changed attitudes. Artsybashev, in Sanine (the English variant of the Russian Sanin), took advantage of the prevalent climate of opinion and with this novel achieved great popularity—even notoriety—both in Russia and abroad. While critics of Russian literature have refused to grant greatness

SANINE by Mikhail Artsybashev. Translated by Percy Pinkerton. By permission of the publishers. The Viking Press, Inc. Copyright 1926 by The Viking Press, Inc. Renewed. All rights reserved.

to the book or its author, students of Russian history have felt that Sanine not only mirrored the lapse in morality in Russia at the time of its publication but that it actually contributed to that lapse. The novel can best be described by saying that it preaches a kind of nihilism as the only satisfactory answer to human life. It has been termed a sermon based on the text of being one's self and following one's inclinations. Sanine, the first novel written by Artsybashev, is typical of his plays, short stories, and novels in its treatment of brutality, death (especially suicide), and sexual irregularity.

The Story

During the formative years of his life Vladimir Petrovitch Sanine was away from the influence of his family and their home. When he returned a young man, to his mother's house in a provincial garrison town, he came as a person believing only in himself, his strength, and the desirability of following his inclinations wherever they might lead him. His mother, Maria Ivanovna, could not understand her son. His sister Lida, however, found him strangely attractive, even though she distrusted and feared his thinking and its influence.

Lida, having many admirers among young civilians and the junior army officers, was the belle of the little garrison town. Her two most serious admirers were Dr. Novikoff, who wished sincerely to marry her but was awkward as a suitor, and Captain Sarudine, a brutal and lascivious army officer who wished only to make a sexual conquest and was well on his way to success with the young woman. Sanine, giving the same freedoms to others as he believed in for himself, made no serious attempt to interfere in his sister's affairs.

Before long Sanine was caught up in the social life among the young intelligentsia of the town. Among those in the group were Sina Karsavina and Youri Svarogitsch. The former was a pretty young schoolteacher of strong emotions who found herself drawn strangely to Sanine, although she was very much in love with Youri, a young student who had been exiled to the provinces for his part in revolutionary activities. Although attracted to Sina, Youri felt that his political duties and ambitions would be hampered if he were married. Because of his beliefs in political duty, and because of bashfulness as well, he tried to avoid becoming emotionally involved with the young schoolteacher.

As the weeks passed Lida was drawn closer to Captain Sarudine. So strong was his physical attraction that she refused a proposal of marriage from Dr. Novikoff, whose jealousy almost became hate. Soon afterward Lida became Captain Sarudine's mistress. Discovering that she was pregnant, she turned for help to her lover, only to learn that he was now finished with her, having made his conquest. Lida, distraught, thought of drowning herself, but she was found by her brother in time. He convinced her that she needed to live and that she should become Dr. Novikoff's wife. Having his sister's agreement, Sanine went to Dr. Novikoff, who was about to leave the town. Little persuasion was needed, even with a knowledge of the facts, to get the doctor's agreement to marry Lida.

About this time Captain Sarudine had a visitor from St. Petersburg. When Captain Sarudine and his friend paid a visit to the Sanine home so that the officer might show off the beautiful woman he had seduced, Sanine ordered the captain to leave the house and suggested further that he leave town. Captain Sarudine, true to the code of his corps, challenged Sanine to a duel. Because he believed that dueling proved nothing, the young man refused the challenge. He learned that his sister, on the other hand, expected him to fight the duel. Realizing that his sister, like his mother, was a conformist to opinion and tradition, Sanine felt alienated from them because of their attitudes and their failure to understand his ideas.

Even more angered by the refusal of his challenge, Captain Sarudine feared that his failure to avenge his honor might put him in a disgraceful position with his brother officers. That he had disgraced himself in some people's eyes by his treatment of Lida did not enter his mind.

One evening, as Sanine and some friends were strolling along the boulevard, they unexpectedly met Captain Sarudine and several of his brother officers. Captain Sarudine spoke harshly to Sanine and threatened him with a riding crop. Sanine, in self defense, knocked down the officer with his fist. Captain Sarudine, not much hurt physically but humiliated by the indignity of the blow, almost went out of his mind. Taken back to his quarters, he refused to see even his friends or his orderly.

After the brief but violent encounter Sanine walked home with a Jewish friend, Solovitchik. The two sat for a long time discussing human life and its meaning. Sanine refused to accept any blame for his behavior, even though he might have ruined Captain Sarudine's career and life. The Jew asked Sanine if a man who worried and thought too much might not be better off dead. Sanine replied that a man or woman who could not enjoy life was already dead. Shortly afterward he left. On his way home he met Captain Sarudine's orderly, who informed him that the officer had committed suicide by shooting himself. The next morning word came, too, that Solovitchik had hanged himself. The two sudden deaths caused a great furor in the little town, but Sanine steadfastly refused to admit that he was in any way responsible.

One morning Youri received a letter from Sina asking him to meet her at a monastery near the town. He met her as requested, and a tender but awkward love scene ensued. Because Youri hated to admit he needed the girl, his conscience bothered him in strange ways. When Sina was suddenly called back to town that evening, Sanine, who was also visiting at the monastery, offered to escort her. On the way both Sanine and the girl were overcome by their emotions, and she surrendered to him. Though she was much upset afterward, she decided that the best thing for her to do was forget what had happened. In the meantime Youri's sister tried to persuade her brother to marry. The problems that marriage raised for him were so great that the young man could not face them, and he shot himself. At the funeral Sanine, asked to say a few words, declared that there was one fool less in the world. His response horrified everyone. Soon afterward Sanine left the town again by train. Early one morning, as the train was crossing the plains, he jumped off to glory in the beauty of an autumn sunrise.

SAPPHO

Type of work Drama

Author Franz Grillparzer (1791-1872)

Type of plot Romantic tragedy

Time of plot Sixth century B.C.

Locale The island of Lesbos

First presented 1818

Principal characters

SAPPHO, the renowned Greek poetess

PHAON, a young man loved by Sappho

MELITTA, Sappho's young and beautiful slave

REXAMNES, an elderly male slave owned by Sappho

Critique

The legend that Sappho hurled herself to her death from the Leucadian rock when her love was spurned by a young man named Phaon has persisted through-the centuries, although there seems to be no historical foundation for the legend. Using this tale as his starting point, Franz Grillparzer wrote a play that goes beyond a mere love story in several ways. Sappho is portrayed in the drama as the victim of love for a man, many years her junior, who turns to love a woman his own age. Sappho is also presented as a poetic genius who cannot meet the demands of ordinary mortal love and domestic relations. Finally, realizing that she cannot meet those demands, she foregoes love to hurl herself to her death, seeking not vengeance or escape, but rather trying to find her place among the immortals. The conflict within Sappho between the demands of love and genius probably reflects the fact that Grillparzer himself believed, as a result of personal experience, that the two conflicting forces were incompatible. The central aspect of the play is really to be found in Phaon's error in mistaking his love of her poetic genius for love of Sappho the woman.

The Story

Sappho, beloved by all and treated as the queen of her native island of Lesbos, went to Olympia to compete for the prize to be awarded for poetry and song. Because of her genius she won the laurel wreath accorded the victor and returned in triumph to her island home. To her countrymen's surprise she brought with her on her return a handsome, pleasant, but very young man named Phaon, with whom she had fallen deeply in love. Phaon, having heard the poems of Sappho read in his father's home, had great admiration for the poetess before he journeyed to Olympia to compete in the games as a charioteer. There he and Sappho had met and fallen in love.

Phaon, a young man simple in his tastes, was almost overwhelmed by Sappho's home, her way of life, and her place of importance on the island. Sappho, deeply in love with Phaon, tried to make him comfortable and at ease in his new environment by constantly expressing her love for him and telling him how much he meant to her happiness.

In Sappho's household was a very beautiful young female slave named Melitta, taken into Sappho's home when the slave was a small child. For some years the girl had been very close to her mistress. On Sappho's return from Olympia she suddenly realized that the child had become a woman. Realization of the change caused Sappho some pangs, for it brought home the fact that Sappho herself was no longer young. For the first time the poetess wished she were younger again, for the sake of Phaon.

One day Phaon, who still was uncomfortable in the luxurious household of his mistress, found refuge in a grotto from the noisy merrymaking of Sappho's guests. While he was enjoying the silence of the place, Melitta wandered nearby, having been sent to the gardens to pick some flowers. As she walked along she voiced her grief at being a slave in a foreign land, lonely for a home and family. Phaon, hearing the girl's lamentations, was greatly moved, for he too was lone some in a strange land. He went to the slave girl and tried to cheer her. The climax of their interview was a kiss, observed by Sappho as she came looking for Phaon. Upset, she left Phaon to himself for a time. Later she found him asleep in the grotto and awakened him with a kiss. As he awoke, Phaon murmured Melitta's name. Fully awake he told Sappho of a dream in which he saw himself in love with Melitta, who had usurped the place of Sappho. Sappho told him not to believe in lying dreams.

Although she concealed the fact from him, Sappho's pride was badly hurt by his account of the dream and by the kiss she had seen him bestow upon Melitta. Coming upon Melitta, Sappho accused the girl of maliciously trying to steal Phaon's love. After heated words had passed between the mistress and her slave, Sappho drew a dagger and threatened Melitta's life. Phaon's appearance probably saved the girl from injury at

Sappho's hands Phaon then announced his love for the slave girl and accused Sappho of trying to weave magic spells with her poetry to make him believe he loved her

Later that same day Sappho called her most trusted slave, Rhamnes, to her and commanded him to take Melitta away from Lesbos to Chios, across the sea, to be placed in the household of one of Sappho's friends That night Rhamnes tried to lure the girl from her quarters to a boat on the beach Melitta, suspecting a trap, protested

Phaon, fearful for Melitta's safety, had remained awake and had heard Rhamnes enter Melitta's quarters When he discovered Rhamnes' trickery, he made him relinquish the girl

Alarmed by what had happened, Phaon decided to flee Lesbos and Sappho's household Taking Melitta with him, he embarked in the boat Rhamnes had planned to use in spirited the girl away

As soon as he was free of the threat of Phaon's dagger, Rhamnes sounded the alarm and told of Phaon's flight with Melitta Planning revenge, Sappho called the people of the island to her and promised a handsome reward of gold for the return of the fugitives Spurred by the reward and their love for Sappho, the islanders hurried after Phaon and Melitta When they came up with the fugitives upon the sea, Melitta was struck on the head by an oar during the struggle Phaon then yielded to their captors

Back in the house of Sappho, Phaon demanded to know why she should be given the privilege of judging him, as if she were a queen The islanders told him that they regarded her as their queen Sappho demanded the return of Melitta, but Phaon said that in threatening the slave girl's life Sappho had relinquished all her rights to the girl Sappho then accused Phaon of being a deceiver in love Phaon defended himself by saying that he had been mistaken in his love, that the love he had felt for Sappho was love of her genius He added that he had really loved her as a goddess, not as a woman, not knowing the difference, he claimed, until after he had met and fallen in love with Melitta

Sappho was disturbed by what had happened and by what Phaon had said At first, thinking that she was being asked too great a price for having poetic gifts, she wished to disown her genius in order to live and love as an ordinary mortal woman She left the company to think in solitude As she looked out across the sea, her lyre suddenly clanged loudly, as if warning her, and she decided not to try to escape the genius given her by the gods She asked the gods only to keep her from being an object of men's derision Returning, she forgave the young lovers with a kiss and then walked to an altar of Aphrodite which stood on a cliff overlooking the sea Calling upon the gods to take her to them, Sappho hurled herself over the brink into the water below Phaon and Sappho's people ran to rescue her, but they were too late The ocean currents had dashed her to her death against the rocks

SARTOR RESARTUS

Type of work Philosophical satire

Author Thomas Carlyle (1795-1881)

First published 1835

This ecstatic, involved work—"The Life and Opinions of Herr Teufelsdröckh," to quote its subtitle—is in many ways one of the most characteristic works of Thomas Carlyle, the "sage of Chelsea" and a crusty censor of the optimistic Victorian era

Carlyle, a familiar gibe has it, preached the virtues of silence in a long series of volumes Sartor Resartus ("the tailor re clothed") is an early preachment on silence, work, duty, and the world as spirit. These were topics that Carlyle was never able to abstain from, whether he was writing about a medieval abbot (Past and Present), about heroes (On Heroes, Hero Worship, and the Heroic in History), or about fairly recent historical events (The French Revolution). Of Carlyle it is fair to paraphrase and say: Scratch the historian, and you will find the prophet. In Sartor Resartus, at any rate, Carlyle is nearly all prophet.

In a style that is crabbed, Germanic, allusive, ironic, hectoring, and paradoxical, Carlyle gave to the age of the Reform Bill (1832), John Stuart Mill, utilitarianism, and the Industrial Revolution the "gospel" he thought it needed. It was a message that, in Carlyle's opinion, the age was likely to overlook. Historically, this is one reason why Sartor Resartus and other of his works are worthy of attention today.

Sartor Resartus is a title pointing to the "clothes philosophy" at the center of the book. But no reader reaches the center of the book without penetrating the formidable framework and bastion of mystification both playful and perverse that Carlyle sets up in early chapters. Carlyle, already an admirer, translator, and popularizer of German literature when he began this work, writes much of the time as if in his own person. That is, he is supposedly the English editor who has been faced with the task of rearranging and commenting upon the mass contents of six paper sacks which have come to him from Germany. These sacks contain the disorderly, fervid lucubrations of a learned German philosopher named Teufelsdröckh (literally, "Devil's dung"). Out of these scrambled materials, the English "editor" and interpreter wishes to write a "life" of the German savant and also to effect a presentation of the key ideas of the great foreign thinker.

The "life" which does not come to much, is obviously a reflection of Carlyle's admiration for Goethe's The Sorrows of Young Werther and other Bildungsromane or tales of youthful growth. Teufelsdröckh has a mysterious birth and grows up lovingly cared for by foster parents. His mind soon shows its powers and feeds omnivorously on books. The future sage falls in love with a young woman named Blumine, is jilted by her, and goes on typical early nineteenth-century wanderings. Driven by Welt schmerz, he goes to the Alps and finally to Paris, for sufficient reason, he utters his Everlasting No, his sweeping and bitter rejection of the structure of society and its conventions. Shortly thereafter, Carlyle's hero goes to Northern Scandinavia, outfaces a murderous Russian, and utters his Everlasting Yea. This is his acceptance, in a deeper sense, of the same texture of life and convention that he had rejected in Paris. After this climactic experience, Teufelsdröckh returns to his native city of Weissnichtwo (Don't Know Where), puffs his pipe, drinks his beer, and now and then sits at his desk in a top-floor room and meditates upon his little town and the world beyond it.

This "life," however, takes second place to the long quotations of his opinions, also deposited in the paper bags for the benefit of his English editor and, of course, England. On many pages Teufelsdröckh is allowed to speak for himself. But in almost as many pages the editor speaks for him, extending the application of the supposedly Germanic ideas to the turmoils of contemporary England. By this transparent subterfuge, the life and opinions of the imaginary German philosopher become a tract for the time, in which Carlyle is able to utter his own Everlasting No to the anti-idealistic movements of the Victorian Age: the growth of democracy, the trust in utilitarian philosophy and its cold and (to Carlyle) petty calculation of pleasure and pain, profit and loss.

Carlyle is also able to utter his Everlasting Yea, which amounts to this clothes and human institutions and religions of the past and their empty rites must be regarded, when they are properly viewed, as the obscure and yet wonderful expression of the ongoing life of the soul. And the life of the soul must be regarded in two supplementary but noncontradicting ways. It is the destiny of each man to create or re create the "clothes" that he himself wears. It is a gift of world destiny that man over outnumbered generations may trace the biography of the human race itself by study of the institutions it sets up, the buildings it erects, and, most important of all, the thoughts that it thinks and, by religion and in books, transmits to future generations.

To do all this is to be a good Teufelsdröckh, but to practice an imitation of Richter and Goethe, if not Christ, each man must trace the arc of denial and affirmation in his own life. As Carlyle points out in Sartor Resartus, each man must deny "the dandiacal body"—life smart, modish, and empty—and he must sink into a condition of receptive silence. Out of this silence will come the true words, the words that emancipate man from illusions and which clear the way to work. This work can be humble and anonymous like the digging of a gardener, or it can be noble and widely known, like the notations of Teufelsdröckh at his desk.

Such are the main outlines of the "good news" of Carlyle's early book. Readers who are just will concede that Carlyle was a kind of pre-Existentialist like his contemporary Kierkegaard, though it is Kierkegaard who is accepted as a master by modern Existentialist thought.

SATANSTOE

Type of work Novel

Author James Fenimore Cooper (1789-1851)

Type of plot Historical romance

Time of plot 1751-1758

Locale New York State

First published 1845

Principal characters

CORNELIUS LITTLEPAGE called Corny, the narrator

HUGH ROGER LITTLEPAGE, Corny's grandfather

DIRCK VAN VALKENBURGH, called Dirck Follock, Corny's friend

ABRAHAM VAN VALKENBURGH called Brom Follock, his father

HERMAN MORDAUNT, a wealthy landowner

ANNEKE MORDAUNT, his daughter

MARY WALLACE, her friend

GUERT TEN EYCK, Corny's friend, in love with Mary

THE REVEREND THOMAS WORDEN, a clergyman

JASON NEWCOME, a schoolmaster from Connecticut

MOTHER DOORTJE, a fortune teller

MAJOR BULSTRODE, a British officer, in love with Anneke

JAAP, Corny's Negro slave

MR. TRAVERSE, a surveyor

SUSQUESUS, and

JUMPER, Indian guides and runners

Critique

Satanstoe, or, The Littlepage Manuscripts, combines the social criticism of Cooper's later life with his talents as a romanticist. Unlike his best work, however, this novel lacks the action and melodrama that brought him fame. The story, narrated by Corny Littlepage, son of a landed proprietor, takes place mainly in Albany, New York, with an adventurous climax in the forests of New York State. The value of the book as social criticism rests in its descriptions of life in Albany and New York City and in the author's comments on the Dutch characters of these cities. Cooper's intense romanticism led him to create idealized heroes who are unreal and often boring. Much of the book dwells on a poorly developed love affair between Corny and Anneke who, in the end, marry and live happily ever after. The novel seems to lack direction and the action barely gets off the ground before the novel ends.

The Story

As a lad, Cornelius Littlepage, usually called Corny, studied classics under the Rev. Thomas Worden at Satanstoe as a preparation for going to an American university. Satanstoe was owned by Corny's father and was so named because it was a peninsula shaped like an inverted toe. When Corny's father felt that he was prepared to attend a university, a discussion was held with Abraham Van Valkenburgh, or 'Brom Follock, as he was called, to decide on which university Corny was to attend. Follock also had a son, Dirck, the same age as Corny. After comparing the New England manners at Yale with the manners of Newark, later Princeton, it was decided to send Corny to Princeton.

Before settling at Newark, Corny went with his father to visit New York City. They arrived there during a holiday and toured the streets. Because the Patroon of Albany was visiting the city, a crowd had gathered. Corny noticed a beautiful girl named Anneke who had been insulted when a butcher's boy knocked an apple from her hand. Corny gave the boy a dig in the ribs and then exchanged blows with him. Turning to see the girl again, Corny found that she had disappeared.

In 1755, after completing the four year course at college, Corny returned to Satanstoe. There he renewed his boyhood friendship with Dirck Follock and met Jason Newcome, the new schoolmaster from Danbury. Newcome took strong exception to New York habits and manners, as exemplified by the Rev. Mr. Worden, who played whist with Corny's mother. Newcome, because of his Connecticut upbringing, was not as well educated as were the Littlepages and he could not understand their leisure. He felt that Corny should work for a living.

When Corny was twenty, he and Dirck traveled to New York City. On the journey, Corny learned that their fathers had jointly purchased some land from the Indians and that probably, next year, they were to be sent to look over the land, which was not far from Albany. While on the road, Dirck pointed out Lilacsbush, the summer home of Herman Mordaunt, his mother's cousin. Corny suggested that they stop there, but Dirck explained that Mordaunt and his motherless daughter Anneke remained in their winter home in New York City until after the Pinkster holidays, around Easter time. Dirck declared that Anneke was one of the prettiest girls in the colony. The pair stopped at Mrs. Light's inn where they heard some gossip about Anneke's many admirers.

In New York City, Corny visited his aunt, Mrs. Legge, while Dirck stayed with relatives in the town. Jason Newcome, being on a holiday, also made his appearance. Soon after their arrival, the three young men went to the town common to watch the Pinkster frolics, a Negro holiday. There they met Anneke Mordaunt, Dirck's cousin, who remembered that Corny had fought the butcher's boy for her sake. The group visited a lion's cage and Corny was able to save Anneke's life when the crowd pressed her close to the bars and the animal seized her with one paw. In addition to Anneke's gratitude, Corny also earned that of her father, who invited Corny and Dirck to dine with him. At the Mordaunt house, Corny met several British officers who were numbered among Anneke's admirers. One, Major Bulstrode, asked Corny why he had not enlisted to fight in the war against the French. Corny replied that his grandfather would not have allowed him to join the colors. Later he expressed his opinion that the war was not really the concern of the settlers but a quarrel between the English and the French.

During the stay in New York, Corny and Dirck frequently visited the Mordaunts. When the officers gave a dramatic performance to which the Mordaunts and their friends were invited, Bulstrode, the starring performer, was offensive to Anneke's sensitivities, theatrical performances not being highly considered in the colonies. Corny and Dirck then rode with the Mordaunts and Mary Wallace to Lilacsbush. In spite of Corny's efforts to prevent him, Jason Newcome managed to travel with them on the journey back to Satanstoe. On their return home, Corny related the events of his trip, including his meetings with Anneke, to his mother, who was greatly pleased.

In the following March, Dirck and Corny traveled to Albany in order to inspect the land their fathers had bought. With them they carried a quantity of merchandise to sell to the army, which was stationed in Albany. At the inn where they stopped they learned that the Mordaunts were also there as well as Bulstrode's regiment and that Herman Mordaunt wanted Anneke to marry. Bulstrode, Corny and Dirck had Mr. Worden and Jason as their companions, as well as Jaap, a faithful colored servant. In order to reach Albany they were forced to cross the Hudson on ice. Although many other wagons had made the crossing, Mr. Worden refused to ride in the sleigh and ran alongside, thus acquiring in Albany the title of the "loping Dominie." In Albany, Corny met Guert Ten Eyck, an irresponsible young man who took Corny sledding in the center of the town and humiliated him by guiding the sled to the feet of Anneke and her friend, Mary Wallace; sledding was considered a child's sport. Guert was in love with Mary, who admonished his action severely.

Guert, who helped Corny dispose of the goods he had brought from Satanstoe, invited his friends to dinner. Discovering that the army had stolen his dinner, he tricked Corny and Mr. Worden into helping to steal their dinner from the mayor. That official, learning of Guert's trick, invited them to a second dinner that night. Present at the mayor's house were the Mordaunts and Mary Wallace. That same night Corny told Anneke that Guert loved Mary and then admitted that he loved her. Anneke, hearing his declaration, turned pale.

When Corny met Bulstrode in Albany, the British officer spoke of his love for Anneke and of his hopes of obtaining his father's permission for their marriage. They discussed the war and the relationship between England and the colonies. Guert Ten Eyck, wishing to go riding with Mary, asked Corny to try to obtain Mr. Mordaunt's approval of a sleigh ride. He was planning

Mr. Mordaunt agreed to accompany Anneke and Mary on the sleigh ride with Guert, Corny, and Dirck on the following Monday. Then, over the weekend, the ice melted on all the roads because spring had arrived suddenly. Guert and Corny feared their trip would have to be postponed until the following year. The Hudson River was still frozen over, however, and Guert's suggestion that they go for a ride on the river itself proved a plan agreeable to the whole party.

The sleighs rode on the ice to Kinderhook without mishap. On the return trip people frequently called out from the land, but the sleighs were going too fast for the occupants to understand what was being told them. Suddenly, to their dismay, they realized that the warm weather had caused the river to flood, breaking the ice apart and separating the sleighs from dry land. Fearing for the safety of the women, Corny promised to care for Anneke's life and Guert promised to look after Mary. In their efforts to reach shore safely, the groups were separated, each attempting to save themselves by another route Through courage and effort, every body reached shore safely

Because of their heroism on the ice, Guert and Corny became well known in Albany Bulstrode, congratulating Corny, learned for the first time that the young man was in love with Anneke Although he received this news coolly, Bulstrode said that he saw no reason why he and Corny could not remain friends

Disappointed in his courtship of Mary, Guert proposed that Corny accompany him on a visit to Mother Doortje, a fortune teller Mr Worden, not a strictly moralistic man, went with them, as did Dirck Follock Although they disguised themselves, the seer recognized them and advised Guert to follow Corny into the woods during the summer She also identified Mr Worden as the loping Domine and advised Jason Newcome to buy land for making a mill seat When Guert was told he might never marry, the fortune teller's words caused him to give up almost all hope of winning Mary

After the arrival of Lord Howe, the British troops moved northward A short time later Mr Mordaunt announced that he was going to visit land of his own, a tract known as Ravensnest, which was very near the Littlepage and Follock property of Mooseridge The group traveled together to Ravensnest From there Corny, Dirck, Guert, the surveyor Mr Traverse, two axmen, two chainbearers, Jaap, and Guert's colored servant Pete set out to find Mooseridge On the way they met Jumper, an Indian whom they hired as a guide Later a second Indian, Susquesus, or Trackless, was added to the party Because of Susquesus' skill in woodcraft, they soon located the boundary marker and immediately began the work of surveying the tract For shelter they built a rude but comfortable log cabin

Learning from the woods runner that the English were about to begin operations against Ticonderoga, Corny, Dirck, Guert, and Jaap, guided by Susquesus, set out to join the expedition The British were badly defeated at the battle by a smaller force of French and Indians and Lord Howe was killed Under Guert's leadership the volunteers escaped after learning that Bulstrode had been seriously wounded and sent to Ravensnest Jaap had taken a Canadian Indian, Musquerusque, but he was forced to release his prisoner so that the group could make an escape Jaap thrashed the Indian before freeing him Susquesus warned that Jaap had done a very foolish deed Guided by Susquesus, the party returned to Mooseridge, where they found the surveying party gone

Susquesus, going to warn the surveyors of the danger of Indian raids found strange Indian tracks and followed them That night the men returned from Ticonderoga and all slept in the locked hut In the middle of the night Corny was awakened by Susquesus who led him in the direction of cries for help They found Guert's colored servant who had been with the surveyors, tortured and scalped Later they found the body of one of the hunters and axmen and, a little farther on, the surveyor, his two chainbearers, and the second axman, also scalped and dead Susquesus said that Musquerusque had taken his revenge for the beating

Returning to Mooseridge, they found Jumper, the Indian scout, with a letter from Mr Mordant inviting them to join him at Ravensnest On the way they came upon a party of Indians and dispersed them in a surprise attack

At Ravensnest, Corny took the opportunity to press his suit Anneke, in turn, confessed her love for him, adding that she had never loved Bulstrode Mary Wallace, however, refused to marry Guert During an Indian raid on the house Guert fought with reckless courage After he and Jaap had been captured, Mary realized that she loved him after all Guert was mortally wounded, however, while escaping with Jaap from the Indians, and he died in Mary's arms

Bulstrode, confined to his bed because of his wound, did not learn until much later Anneke's decision to marry Corny. When the two men met again at Lilacs bush, Bulstrode offered his rival his hand and best wishes.

Corny's mother was overjoyed to hear of her son's approaching marriage, and Mr Mordaunt, who had originally favored Bulstrode for his daughter's hand, decided to settle his property on Corny and his bride. After their marriage Anneke and Corny settled at Lilacs bush. On the death of his grandfather Corny acquired still more land. He and Anneke lived for many years in peace, and became the happy parents of a son whom they named Mordaunt.

Jason Newcome acquired a mill seat from Mr Mordaunt on a cheap lease. Mr Worden returned to Satanstoe. He had decided that missionary life was too difficult and that the only people who should be Christians were people who were already civilized.

SATIRES

Type of work Poetry

Author Juvenal (Decimus Junius Juvenalis, c. 55 c. 135)

First transcribed 112 128

Greatest of the Latin satirists, Juvenal was born in Aquinum, southeast of Rome, also the birthplace of St. Thomas Aquinas. Few facts about him have come down outside his own writing, though a biography written in the fourth century said that he was the son of a freedman and practiced rhetoric until middle age for his own amusement — perhaps until he took up poetry. As a satirist, the vices of his age gave him material.

Born during the reign of Nero, he lived under nine other emperors, including Otho, of whom he was especially critical, and tyrannical Domitian. Juvenal's pictures of life in Rome are gloomy and bitter. He feared the growing power of the moneyed classes, the traders, and the freedman. He disapproved of the softening influences of Greek and Eastern cultures and the vices they introduced. Some scholars have accused him of dwelling on vice for the pleasures he took in writing about immorality, his own claim was that he wrote to exalt virtue and encourage men to seek it.

He explained his choice of medium in his first satire. Having no desire to rewrite old plays or endless epics, and having seen a barber become wealthier than a patrician and an idiotic Egyptian advance himself at the expense of the Romans, he declared that "it is difficult not to write satires." His writing was little appreciated during his lifetime. Indeed, his satires disappeared for several centuries. Rediscovered, Juvenal was esteemed as an epigrammatist and social historian because of his vivid pictures of Latin life.

Sixteen satires, totaling 3,775 lines, made up the total preserved work of Juvenal. The poems vary in length from the little more than sixty lines of the unfinished XVI, which deals with the prerogatives of a soldier, to the 661 lines of VI, directed against women, which is long enough to fill a papyrus roll by itself. His first book, containing 690 lines in all, includes his first five satires of which Satire I, appropriately, explains why he turned to this form of literary activity. He declared that he began writing to pay back the many poets who had been boring him, from crude Cordus with his lengthy epics to the writers of comedies and elegies. Since depravities on every side "rate the midnight oil of Horace," he bade the writer of satires to "set sail." Pondering, however, the advice of those who had warned him against the wrath of rulers, he declared his intention to dedicate his attention to the dead those whose ashes lie along the roads outside Rome

Satire II, directed against effeminate men, put into circulation the familiar proverb that "one rotten apple spoils a whole barrel." This work describes the pretty boys with their long hair and their togas of pastel colors

The whole of Rome was his target in Satire III. Hearing that his friend Umbritius was moving to Cumae to escape the vices of the capital, Juvenal commended his decision

After all it is something even in a lonely corner
To make yourself the landlord of a single lizard

In Satire IV he considered those able to escape the consequences of any crime because they were wealthy or highborn. In Number V, he inveighed against stingy patrons and clients who had no sense of shame. He described the tasteless food provided for clients who came to the rich man's table, contrasting this fare with the delicious banquets served when only a few friends were invited in to dine

The approaching marriage of Postumus gave the poet a motive for a coarse diatribe against the women of Rome in Satire VI. Back in primitive times, he asserted, chastity existed on earth, but not among the Roman matrons of his time. He described their beauty aids, their aimless lives, their extravagances, and their pretense to culture. Some even went as far as to forget their sex in their desire to be gladiators. And the remedy? End the evils of an extended peace and the luxury that had taken the place of frugality and self sacrifice

Satire VII laments the evil plight of men of culture when poets and historians cannot make a living and teachers, after years of preparation, get less money in a year than a successful jockey after one race

Blood is no reason for expecting re spect, said Juvenal in Satire VIII. He traced a few generations, even the noblest blood is mixed with the common. Deeds are more important. The brief Satire IX is a poem on pimps and informers. It is followed by the famous Number X, adapted by Johnson to the English scene under the title "On the Vanity of Human Wishes." This poem states that few human beings know what is good or bad for them. Most people wish for health or honor. Students of rhetoric crave eloquence, the ruin of Demosthenes and Cicero. The ambitions of Alexander and Xerxes were their undoing. People desire long life, which brings ills, or beauty which causes unhappiness. If we were wise, we would let the gods make the decision for us. As Johnson translated it:

So raise for good the supplicating voice,
But leave to Heaven the measure and the choice

If we must pray, ask for a healthy mind in a healthy body and a spirit reconciled to trouble or death

Extravagance is the theme of Satire XI, sent to Persicus along with an invitation to dinner. Many in Rome beggar themselves for pleasure, said Juvenal, but at my table, friend, you will eat what I can afford, simply served, and without lavish entertainment

In a more mellow vein, Juvenal devoted Number XII to his joy that his friend Catullus had been rescued after a shipwreck. His ceremonies of thanksgiving, however, were to be simple. He would not offer rich treasures to the gods as some legacy hunters had done. Then, not able to remain benevolent long, he ended with a jibe at Pacuvius who profited from the misfortunes of others

Calvinus, who complained loudly at being defrauded, was satirized in Number XIII, and the avaricious Fuscinus in Number XIV was urged to provide a better example to his children. Satire XV differs from the preceding, being in effect a parable about the rivalry of neighboring towns Once man was kind to man, now

vipers are less cruel to their fellows Pythagoras, should he return, would be certain the beasts of the fields are superior to humans

The final, unfinished Satire XVI represents a new departure for the poet Here
he lists the special advantages that soldiers have over everyone else The work breaks off with an unfinished sentence,

in the middle of a line, without leaving the reader sure whether Juvenal really intended to praise the soldiers, or whether he was preparing to deflate the military caste There is no explanation of why Juvenal failed to finish the poem Perhaps there is some truth in the tradition that he was either summarily banished or sent on a mission from which he never returned

SATIROMASTIX

Type of work Drama

Author Thomas Dekker (c. 1572-1632?)

Type of plot Satirical romance

Time of plot c. 1100

Locale England

First presented 1601

Principal characters

WILLIAM RUFUS, King of England

SIR WALTER TERRILL, his noble follower

CAELESTINE, Sir Walter's bride

SIR QUINTILIAN SHORTHORSE, the bride's father

MISTRESS MINIVER, a wealthy widow

SIR VAUGHAN AP REES, a Welshman, suitor of the widow

SIR ADAM PRICKSHAFT, another suitor of the widow

CRISPINUS, a poet

DEMETRIUS, another poet

HORACE, the humorous poet

ASINUS BUBO, Horace's admiring follower

CAPTAIN TUCCA, a roaring roisterer

Critique

Thomas Dekker's Satiromastix owes its present interest almost solely to the plot dealing with "The Untrusting of the Humorous Poet," the poet being Ben Jonson under the thin disguise of the name
Horace Apparently the play was patched up in some haste after the production of Jonson's Poetaster, which caricatured Dekker and John Marston The three plots are not well joined Perhaps the triangle containing Sir Walter Terrill, his beautiful bride Caelestine, and King William Rufus, was the plot of an original play on which Dekker was working when the controversy between Jonson and the "poetasters" broke out It remains the central plot
The second, which has little bearing on the first, is concerned with the wooing
of Mistress Miniver by Sir Quintilian, Sir

Vaughan, and Sir Adam Filled with a veritable glut of puns ranging from the risqué to the obscene, this farcical plot would doubtless have been a success on the Elizabethan stage as an independent work The third plot depends on its relation to Jonson's Poetaster, performed earlier in the year (1601) Poetaster
contains two plots, somewhat loosely connected the love story of Ovid and Julia, the daughter of Augustus Caesar, and the discomfiture of Horace's enemies, particularly Crispinus the poetaster and Demetrius the playdresser For a long time scholars of Jonson devoted themselves to identifying the characters of Poetaster with actual Elizabethans There is, however, no reason to doubt that Poetaster
contains attacks on Marston and Dekker, and possibly other contemporaries And there is no ambiguity about Dekker's Horace he is England's Ben Jonson, brilliantly caricatured

The Story

While Sir Quintilian Shorthose supervised the preparations for the marriage of his daughter Caelestine, Sir Adam Prickshaft, Sir Vaughan ap Rees, and Mistress Miniver came to share in the festivities All three knights were enamored of the widow When the bridal party entered, Sir Walter Ternill, the groom-to-be, announced that King William Rufus would grace the wedding with his presence The groom had sent to the poet Horace for a wedding song

Horace was laboring by candlelight, surrounded by books, when his admiring friend Asinius Bubo visited him Bubo warned that Crispinus and Demetrius planned to put Horace in a play as a bricklayer To the great embarrassment of Horace, Crispinus and Demetrius entered and accused him of unfair attacks on them

Soon Blunt, accompanied by Captain Tucca, came to get the wedding verses, but Horace confessed he had not been able to finish them in the three days allotted him Captain Tucca blasted Horace with a stream of Rabelaisian abuse for writing satires about him Quivering with fear, Horace apologized and promised future good behavior The captain tipped him generously, and the visitors left

The three knights urged Mistress Miniver to choose one of them for her second husband, but their talk was interrupted by the arrival of King William Rufus and his train The king greeted the bride with a kiss, obviously taken with her beauty and charm During the dance he managed to single her out frequently, engaging in risqué banter When the ladies withdrew, the king dared Sir Walter to postpone the wedding night and to trust his bride at court alone with the king Goaded with lack of faith in her,

Sir Walter unwisely promised to send her

In spite of Horace's love letters purchased by Sir Vaughan, the widow refused him, favoring Sir Adam Enraged, Sir Vaughan asked Horace to write a satire on baldness, since Sir Adam was bald Sir Quintilian, needing a messenger to speak for him, turned to raucous, foul mouthed Captain Tucca The captain also agreed to carry rich gifts to the widow from Sir Adam However, Captain Tucca wooed for himself Later, the captain was shown a new series of satirical epigrams by Horace on him

Sir Vaughan entertained the widow at a banquet, at which Horace read his satire on baldness Mistress Miniver announced she could never be "enameled" of a baldheaded man again Captain Tucca burst in and threatened Horace, Sir Vaughan drove him out, but Mistress Miniver called after the captain demanding that he return the money she had lent him Sir Vaughan rushed after the captain to punish him Bubo showed Horace a challenge left by the fire eating Captain Tucca

Captain Tucca promised Sir Adam he would have Crispinus and Demetrius praise baldness in verse Bubo and Horace came to the captain for a parley, and the three made peace again Captain Tucca convinced Sir Vaughan that borrowing the money had been part of his plan to help the knight win the widow At the next gathering of the widow's friends, Crispinus read his praise of baldness, then Captain Tucca aroused the whole group to take Horace to court and punish him for his sharp satires

Sir Walter, Sir Quintilian, and Caelestine lamented her danger, and Sir Quintilian proposed that she drink poison Grief-stricken, Sir Walter consented to the loss of his wife in order to save her honor When revelers came to escort the couple to court, Sir Walter announced his wife's death and requested that they go with him in procession to the king

King William Rufus, laughing at the

gullibility of Sir Walter, waited eagerly for the coming of the bride Sir Walter, dressed in black, escorted the body into the king's presence. Seeing Caelestine lifeless, the king cried out in horror. Sir Walter accused the king of tyranny and explained that Caelestine had chosen to die rather than to lose her honor. Sir Walter's oath was kept by his bringing her body to the king. Shame overcame the repentant monarch. Caelestine revived, and Sir Quintilian told how he had given her a potion which gave the appearance of death, though both Sir Walter and she had believed it poison. The king restored the wife unharmed to her husband.

Crispinus offered an interlude for comic relief after the seriousness of the situation. Captain Tucca led Horace and Bubo, both wearing horns, into the royal presence. Bubo was made to swear he would abandon Horace and his poetry, upon swearing this, he was released. Horace, crowned with nettles instead of laurels, promised at great length to amend as a writer and to give up sour criticisms and complaints. Captain Tucca announced that he and Mistress Miniver were to be married. The disgruntled knights accepted defeat, and Captain Tucca promised to repay them what they had given him for their wooing of the widow. A dance followed, and all ended happily.

Captain Tucca delivered an epilogue promising future theatrical battles between Horace and the poetasters.

SCEPTICISM AND ANIMAL FAITH

Type of work Philosophy

Author George Santayana (1863-1952)

First published 1923

Scepticism and Animal Faith was written as an introduction to a system of philosophy, a system later made explicit in Santayana's four-volume The Realms of Being. The Realm of Essence (1927), The Realm of Matter (1930), The Realm of Truth (1938), The Realm of Spirit (1940). Despite the fact that the author believed that his ideas needed the extended treatment he gave them in these volumes, the introductory work remains the clearest, most concise, and most representative of Santayana's works. Almost every important contribution which the author made to philosophy can be found here, and the advantage of this single work is that the reader can gain a synoptic vision of the relations of the ideas to each other, something he might fail to achieve if he centered his attention initially upon one of the volumes of The Realms of Being or The Life of Reason (1905-1906).

Santayana's principal thesis is that knowledge is faith "mediated by symbols." The symbols of human discourse, when man is talking to himself about the world of facts, are the elements in his experience: sensations, images, feelings, and the like. "The images in sense are parts of discourse, not parts of nature; they are the babble of our innocent organs under the stimulus of things," writes Santayana. Since we cannot be certain that the given elements, the essences, are signs of physical objects affecting us as physical organisms, there is a sense in which we cannot be said to be free of the possibility of error. Nevertheless, as animals as active beings, we find ourselves compelled to take our experiences as the experiences of a living organism in the process of being shocked and stimulated by the world. Our belief in a nature of change is made possible by our interpretation of the given—the data, the essences—but it cannot be justified by the given; hence, it is animal faith.

To prepare himself for the statement that all knowledge is the faith that certain given elements are signs of things and events, Santayana develops a thorough skepticism which ends with the cryptic statement that "Nothing given exists." To understand the meaning and ground of this claim it is necessary to understand Santayana's conception of the given—his theory of essences.

It is difficult to make all the proper qualifications in a brief description, but if one begins by supposing that essences are characteristics of actual and possible things, whether physical, psychical, mathematical or whatever, a beginning has been made. If a person were to have two or three sense experiences of precisely the same sort—three sense images of a certain shade of yellow for example—that shade of yellow would be an essence that had been given to him in sense experience. Even if he had not had the experience, he could have had it: the essence is a character his experience might come to have. Essences, then, are universals, not particulars, they are characteristics which may or may not be the characteristics of existing things.

It makes sense to say of a particular thing that it is, or was, or shall be, but we cannot sensibly talk that way about the characteristics of things. Considered in themselves, as they must be, essences are immutable, eternal, never vague, and neither good nor bad. In Santayana's terms, the realm of essence 'is simply the unwritten catalogue, prosaic and infinite, of all the characters possessed by such things as happen to exist, together with the characters which all different things would possess if they existed.'

If this definition of essence is kept clearly in mind, if an essence is simply a character but not necessarily the character of anything, then it becomes clear that if essences are given—and they are—then nothing given exists. If we are correct in our suppositions, then, whenever an essence is given, it is given to a self, i.e., someone has an experience, and the experience has a certain character, an essence. The self that has experiences exists the "intuition," i.e., the apprehension of the character of the experience, exists and, if the self is not mistaken in its interpretation of the given, of the "datum," a physical event or object exists as signified by the datum. In conventional language, there are persons, sense experiences, and the objects which give rise to the experiences. But it is improper now, and false, to say that the essence of the experience exists. To say this would violate Santayana's definition of essence and, accordingly, lead to a paradox. For example, if an essence is a character, and if on three occasions the same character were given, then the consequence of saying that on each occasion the essence existed is that the essence will have gone in and out of existence three times. If two persons have the same kind of experience—i.e., intuit the same essence—then we would have to say that the essence is in two places at the same time. As long as one remembers that, by definition, an essence is a character considered as a character, it is clearly nonsense to think of essences as existing.

The discovery of essence is the reward of a relentless skepticism. In Santayana's view, we have no final justification for our claims about the existence of external objects, and all of our beliefs about selves and change and memory are open to critical challenge. "Skepticism may be carried to the point of denying change and memory, and the reality of all facts," he writes.

But Santayana had no great affection for this ultimate skepticism. In his terms he was a "wayward sceptic," entertaining the notion of an ultimate skepticism only to show that critical challenge of our customary beliefs is possible. It is customary and unavoidable for a human being to suppose that he himself lives and thinks, and Santayana's rejoinder is, "That he does so is true, but to establish that truth he must appeal to animal faith."

In order to discuss the human being in his response to the data of experience

Santayana introduces his special senses of the terms "spirit," "psyche," and "intuition." Intuition is the apprehension of essence, the spirit is the cool contemplator, that which intuit and psyche is the self that acts. Has preferences takes data as signs. Of course, when we begin to use these terms as descriptive of facts, we are expressing our own animal faith, when we say that the spirit confronts essences and that the psyche acts accordingly, taking the essences as signs of a physical world, we are saying what the ultimate skeptic cannot allow—but we are animals, and the psyche has other business than philosophy.

There is something appealing and liberating in Santayana's conception of animal faith. No one could be more careful than he in examining and challenging the pretensions of the pretenders to knowledge and wisdom. The paradox that knowledge is animal faith reveals that what we call "knowledge" is merely unwarranted, but stubborn, animal conviction. That same paradox brings out the positive side of Santayana's philosophy as animals taking data as signs we make sense out of what would otherwise be a static complex of essences and give order both to our world and ourselves.

In the description of the consequences of animal faith in action, Santayana considered first the belief in discourse which arises once one has given up "passive intuition." From the belief in discourse one passes to belief "in experience in substance, in truth, and in spirit." This progression of beliefs is a natural one, and the description of the life of reason in various areas was undertaken by Santayana in his earlier five volume work The Life of Reason: The Realms of Being naturally followed Scepticism and Animal Faith as a careful elaboration of the terms "essence," "matter," "truth," and "spirit."

Unlike many philosophers, Santayana had self confidence enough to know the limits of his inquiry. He did not pretend to be able to discover what the physicist, for example, can discover by acting on his scientific animal faith. Once we pass from the intuitive contemplation of essences to the recognition of the human use of data as signs, we soon come to the discovery of our assumptions of an experiencing self coming up against substance—the presumed cause of the data. The philosopher can clarify the idea of substance, explaining that it is extended, in space and time, with a structure, and so forth and he can go on to identify substance with such homely examples as "the wood of this tree" the wind the flesh and the bones of the man.

"But he need not, and Santayana does not, try to do what the physicist and the chemist do in their specialized ways.

By this practice, then, Santayana fulfilled the promise of his introduction to Scepticism and Animal Faith in which he said "Here is one more system of philosophy. If the reader is tempted to smile, I can assure him that I smile with him. I am merely trying to express for the reader the principles to which he appeals when he smiles."

In this book as in all his others, Santayana presents his ideas by means of a beautifully articulated, poetic style. Even if his vision of knowledge as animal faith had no value, this work would endure as the most fascinating portrayal of the realm of essence which has yet appeared in literature. That this moving survey of the timeless, changeless realm of essence should have come from a naturalistic philosopher is one of those pleasant paradoxes to which we turn with classic delight after coming from Scepticism and Animal Faith.

THE SCHOOL FOR HUSBANDS

Type of work Drama

Author Molière (Jean Baptiste Poquelin 1622 1673)

Type of plot Social satire

Time of plot Seventeenth century

Locale Paris

First presented 1661

Principal characters

SGANARELLE a gentleman of means

ARISTE his brother

ISABELLE, Sganarelle's ward

LEONOR, her sister and Ariste's ward

VALERE, Isabelle's lover

Critique

Molière has been called the first great modern in the sense that he portrayed the actual in life, the true manners of his times. In The School for Husbands he lives up to his reputation as a satirical critic and comic dramatist. The outspoken frankness and amusing anecdote of the play delighted the theatergoers of Paris, and it met with striking popularity which it has retained to this day.

The Story

Leonor and Isabelle, orphaned on the death of their father, were committed by his deathbed wish to the guardianship of his friends, Sganarelle and Ariste, with the additional charge that if they themselves did not marry the young women they were to provide suitable husbands for their wards. The two brothers had different ideas about the upbringing of the orphans. The elder, Ariste, chose to conform to the fashions of the day but without going to extremes. He gave his ward Leonor the opportunity to attend balls and dances and meet the gallants of the city. Although he himself wished to marry her, he loved Léonor sufficiently to leave the choice to her. Sganarelle, however, thought all this was foolish. Where Ariste hoped to govern only by affection, Sganarelle believed in the effectiveness of severity. He confined Isabelle strictly to her quarters and to household duties, thus keeping her from meeting any eligible young men. Determined to marry her himself, he hoped to discipline her to that end. When Sganarelle scoffed at his brother's leniency and predicted that he would in the end be tricked by so young a wife, Léonor declared that if she married her guardian she would be faithful to him, but that if she were to be Sganarelle's wife she would not be answerable for any of her actions.

Meanwhile, Valère, Sganarelle's new neighbor, had fallen in love with Isabelle, whom he had seen at a distance, and Isabelle reciprocated his love, but with no means of communication neither knew the true feelings of the other. Isabelle finally worked out a plan to test Valère. She told Sganarelle about Valère's attentions and, knowing her guardian would then angrily accost Valère, declared that they were distasteful to her. Sganarelle asked Valère to cease molesting his ward and told him that, even though Isabelle knew of Valère's hopes, his was an unrequited passion, that her only wish was to find happiness in marrying her guardian. Valère sensed in this message something more that Isabelle hoped to convey to him.

Sganarelle told Isabelle that Valère had been crushed by her harsh message. Isabelle, under the pretense of returning a letter which, according to her story, an accomplice of Valère's had thrown into her chamber, persuaded her guardian to deliver the note. Actually, it was a love letter that she had written to Valère.

Sganarelle, taking her request as a touching example of model womanly behavior, delivered the letter, which told of Isabelle's resolve to get free of her prison at any cost during the six days remaining before her enforced marriage to her guardian Valère, making use of Sganarelle to take back to Isabelle words showing the sincerity of his attachment, declared that his only hope had been to make her his wife and that, although he now realized the hopelessness of his suit he would always love her. First he flattered Sganarelle as an opponent no one could possibly displace, and showed himself so completely crestfallen and hopeless in surrendering all thought of winning his fair prize that Sganarelle even came to feel a little sorry for his rival.

Isabelle, trying to trick her guardian into appearing despicable in the eyes of her lover, pretended to fear an attempt by Valère to force her from her chamber and carry her off before her marriage to Sganarelle. Bursting with pride at what he considered the womanly discretion of his ward, discretion obviously reflecting his own wisdom in her upbringing, Sganarelle offered to return to Valère and berate him for his bold and mischievous scheme. All turned out as Isabelle hoped. In reply, Valère declared that if what Sganarelle reported were possibly true, then his passion was indeed hopeless. Sganarelle, to make matters perfectly clear, took Valère directly to Isabelle to hear the cruel decision from her own lips. By words that could be understood two ways, Isabelle and Valère declared their love for each other under the nose of their dupe. Then on Isabelle's order Valère departed, promising that in three days he would find a way to free her from her jailer. But Sganarelle could not wait three days. Overjoyed at the exhibitions of what he took to be his ward's fond regard for him, he was eager to consummate the marriage. He told Isabelle the ceremony would be performed the next day.

Isabelle realized that her last resource was to commit herself unreservedly to her lover at once, but as she prepared for flight Sganarelle saw her and informed her that all preparations had been made for their union. Isabelle trumped up a story that she was about to leave the house to spend the night with a worthy friend, Lucrece, because Leonor, in desperation, had asked for the use of Isabelle's room that night. Against her better judgment, she declared, she had consented and had just locked her sister in. Isabelle pretended that Valère had really been Léonor's lover for more than a year, but had abandoned her when he became infatuated with Isabelle. She said that Leonor, hoping to win back his love, planned to meet him in the lane near the house. Sganarelle, declaring this plan immodest, wanted to drive Leonor out of the house at once. Isabelle restrained him, however, and persuaded him to let her take the message to Leonor, after insisting that Sganarelle must hide himself and promise to let her sister leave without his speaking to her. Sganarelle agreed, secretly pleased at the thought of his brother's discomfiture over the wanton doings of his ward.

Isabelle, pretending to be Leonor, left the house. Curious, Sganarelle followed. He saw Valère and Isabelle meet and, after declaring their love, enter Valère's house. Thinking that Léonor was with Valère and wishing to keep scandal from touching Isabelle through her sister, he hurriedly called a magistrate and urged him to marry the pair. The magistrate was to wait, however, until Sganarelle could return with the bride's guardian to witness the ceremony.

Ariste, although he could not believe his ears when Sganarelle gloatingly insisted that Leonor was with Valère, was induced nevertheless to accompany his brother Valère, who had hidden Isabelle in a separate room, had the magistrate prepare a formal contract, to be signed by all parties present, indicating their consent to the marriage. Still under the delusion that the bride to be was his brother's ward Léonor, Sganarelle agreed to the wedding and Anste, placing the desires of his supposed ward above his own dreams, assented also

Meanwhile, Leonor returned early from the ball she had attended Ariste gently chided her for not confiding in him her love for Valère, but Leonor, amazed, protested that she loved only Anste, her beloved guardian, whom she was ready to marry immediately. Angered, Sganarelle realized too late the trick played on him by Isabelle. All women, he declared, were to be disbelieved and shunned. In the schooling of husbands it was he and not his brother Anste who had failed.

THE SCORNFUL LADY

Type of work Drama

Authors Francis Beaumont (1585? 1616) and John Fletcher (1579 1625)

Type of plot Comedy of manners

Time of plot Early seventeenth century

Locale London

First presented 1613 1617

Principal characters

ELDER LOVELESS, a suitor to the Lady

YOUNG LOVELESS a prodigal man about town

SAVIL, Elder Loveless' steward

WELFORD, another suitor to the Lady

MORECRAFT a money lender

THE LADY, Elder Loveless' beloved

MARTHA her sister

ABIGAIL (Mrs. YOUNGLOVE), the Lady's waiting woman

THE WIDOW, Morecraft's beloved

Critique

Of all of Beaumont and Fletcher's comedies, The Scornful Lady was the most popular during the Restoration period, undoubtedly because it contains just those characters and situations which were most palatable to late seventeenth century audiences. The play skillfully combines a number of favorite theatrical ingredients. The main plot, the pursuit of the sophisticated and independent Lady by Elder Loveless, has strong overtones of the eternal battle of the sexes, the subplot, the gulling of a usurer by a young prodigal who repairs his ruined fortunes by marriage to a rich and beautiful widow, was later to become one of the heartiest commonplaces of the English comedy of manners. As in other Beaumont and Fletcher plays, there is a fairly careful balancing of characters in the two plots. Elder Loveless is contrasted with his profigate younger brother (these two are, in fact, only different stages in the development of a Jacobean gallant) and Elder Loveless' mistress, the unreceptive Lady, is contrasted not only with the overamorous and aging Abigail but also with the complaisant widow who married Young Loveless. The dialogue is racy and suggestive, and the plot complicated enough to provide the intricate exchanges so dear to the heart of the Jacobean theatergoer. Extremely noticeable is a strong vein of sexuality, but the matter is too artificial to be obscene. On the whole, The Scornful Lady is a good play of its kind, particularly interesting because of the preview it offers of the tinsel world of Restoration comedy.

The Story

Elder Loveless, who had fallen out of favor with his mistress because he forced her to kiss him in public, humbly begged her pardon and urged her for the hundredth time to marry him. She was adamant, however, for penance he must travel for a year abroad. Dejectedly Elder Loveless prepared for his journey, leaving his house and income to the none too tender mercies of his dissolute younger brother, who had already squandered his own lands and rents. Immediately after the door closed on his elder brother, Young Loveless and his four cronies—a Captain, a Traveler, a Poet, and a Tobacco-man—began their carousing. Over the protests of his brother's faithful steward, Savil, Young Loveless surveyed his good fortune and delightedly anticipated the unlimited supply of drink and doxies his brother's estate would buy.

At the same time, a new suitor for the Lady's hand, Welford, arrived at her house. Because of his generosity and good looks, he was warmly received by Sir Roger, the Lady's curate, and Abigail, her aging and lecherous gentlewoman; however, he got but cold favor from the Lady herself, for in spite of her harsh treatment of Elder Loveless, she had actually given him her heart.

His vows to his mistress notwithstanding, Elder Loveless did not take ship. Instead, he disguised himself and returned in order to test his brother and his sweetheart by reporting his own death. He arrived at his house to find his brother in the midst of another round of debauchery. Young Loveless took the sad news with amazing calmness; he commended his brother's soul to God, filled a bumper, and drank with the company to his elder brother's demise. And as soon as the disguised brother left, Young Loveless rejoiced at the prospect of running through the estate he had just inherited.

Elder Loveless then delivered the news of his death to the Lady. The reception was at first all that he could wish. The Lady burst into tears, but as Elder Loveless continued to berate her for her cruelty to her lover, she penetrated his disguise and retaliated by pretending affection for Welford, who was considerably startled but pleased by the Lady's sudden change in attitude toward him. Exasperated, Elder Loveless threw off his disguise, whereupon the Lady, revealing that she had known him all along, bade him fulfill the task she had set him if he ever expected to enjoy her favor. Elder Loveless retired in confusion. Welford then attempted to press the advantage he believed now offered him, but the Lady, once again drastically altering her tone, ordered him to be on his way. When Abigail offered herself as second choice, Welford, thoroughly disgusted, insulted her and called for his horses.

Meanwhile, Young Loveless had been hard at work disposing of his brother's estate. From Morecraft, the usurer who had bilked him of his own fortune, he obtained £6,000 after promising to consummate the sale later. Morecraft was delighted with the bargain, from its profits he expected to obtain a knighthood and the hand of a wealthy and beautiful widow.

When Morecraft and the Widow met Young Loveless to take possession of Elder Loveless' house, Young Loveless and the Widow were immediately attracted to each other. Before the keys could be delivered to Morecraft, however, Elder Loveless reappeared in his own person. Young Loveless, who was equal to any shift in fortune, greeted his supposedly dead brother with his usual equanimity. Although the usurer declared the sale void, Young Loveless, refusing to return the money, told Morecraft to regard his hard luck as a fair requital for the cozening he had been responsible for in the past. The Widow applauded Young Loveless' shrewdness, whereupon she rejected Morecraft and struck up a match with the clever young wastrel.

Elder Loveless, equally determined not to travel and to win his lady, tried another gambit. Visiting her once more, he adopted a scoffing tone, made light of her former domination of him, and declared that he loved her no longer. The Lady, not so easily tricked, countered with that feminine ruse, a feigned swoon. As the remorseful Elder Loveless rushed to comfort her, she burst into laughter and ridiculed him for attempting such a transparent deception. But she earned her ridicule too far. Elder Loveless, now really angry, left, ignoring her earnest pleas that he return to her.

His love, however, was stronger than his anger. Together with Welford, who was quite as willing to have Martha, the Lady's lovely younger sister, as the Lady herself, Elder Loveless planned a last desperate ruse to win his mistress. Welford was disguised as a woman, and Elder Loveless presented him to the Lady as his future bride. This time the Lady was thoroughly taken in. When Elder Loveless compared her treatment of him with the homely virtues of his new sweetheart, the Lady, believing that she had lost her faithful lover, attempted to save the situation by offering to marry him immediately. Elder Loveless accepted her proposal, and Martha, pitying Elder Loveless' supposedly abandoned sweetheart, took the still disguised Welford to bed with her.

The next morning the men had the last laugh as Elder Loveless revealed the plot to the Lady. Welford and the embarrassed Martha hurried off to church. Young Loveless and his new bride appeared on the scene. Sir Roger and Abigail were united, and Morecraft, transformed from usurer to rake, drank to the general happiness of all and distributed money among the servants.

THE SEA AND THE JUNGLE

Type of work Travel sketches and impressions

Author H. M. Tomlinson (1873-1958)

Time 1912

Locale England, at sea, South America

First published 1912

Principal personages

THE AUTHOR

THE SKIPPER captain of the ship

THE SHIP'S DOCTOR

Although the world has changed a great deal since this book was written, The Sea and the Jungle is still a classic of its kind, not only because it tells an interesting story of a journey away from the humdrum existence of everyday living, but also because it is an example of travel writing at its best. Tomlinson was working on a newspaper when the opportunity arose for him to make the long journey to South America aboard the Capella, a tramp steamer which was to deliver industrial supplies and coal deep in the jungles of Brazil. He made his decision quickly and was signed on the ship as purser.

Tomlinson's narrative is unassuming and straightforward. It tells of the voyage of the Capella from Swansea to Para, on the Brazilian coast, and then some two thousand miles up the Amazon River and its tributaries to the small settlement of Porto Velho, thence to the Barbados, and on to Tampa, Florida, where Tomlinson left the ship to take a train to New York and make a fast passage home to England. Despite the simplicity of his method, however, the author is not a simple man, and his perceptions and writing style make this a revealing and exciting book.

As in many travel books, The Sea and the Jungle contains four kinds of material: the narrative of the events of the trip, lengthy and detailed descriptions of the things which caught the author's interest, stories that were told to the author by seamen and various unusual men he encountered in South America, and the reflections on life, nature, and mankind that the circumstances of the journey provoked in the author's mind. These elements, skillfully blended, give the book its structure, vividness of detail, and stylistic excellence.

Aside from the bare outline of the major events of the trip—the embarkation, the arrival, the delivery of the cargo—the narrative is filled with the little daily occurrences that give such a book its real life. It is in this part of the writing that Tomlinson best fulfills the purpose implied by his statement: "This is a travel book for honest men." In his full attention to the hardships and discomforts of the trip, Tomlinson makes evident his conviction that escape from dullness may be exciting but seldom comfortable. The insects, the danger, and, perhaps most of all, the incredible heat are the enemies of comfort, and Tomlinson makes the reader acutely, even painfully, aware of them constantly.

The author was, however, gifted with a great interest in practically every aspect of travel without the bent for making didactic judgments of other people and other lands that often irritate readers of travel books. Occasionally, as in his admiration for the rebellion of a black heifer that was being transported upstream to one of the railroad camps, he is moved to comment upon the human qualities of nonhuman things such as animals, insects, and the jungle itself, which Tomlinson saw as a brooding, mysterious giant which silently tolerated the invasion of men but which held a secret that no man could wring from it.

Along with the less inviting aspects of the journey, Tomlinson presents whatever he found beautiful or interesting, matters which he describes with great sensitivity and a fine technique. Of course, the first step in good description is accurate and imaginative observation, after this comes the expression of this perception so that the reader may share it. In this book the author combines careful observation with artfully expressed, often nearly impressionistic, description. The two main subjects for the description are, naturally, the sea and the jungle. The voyage to Para which takes up roughly the first third of the book, takes the writer and his ship mates from a cold, wet England to the warmth and brilliant color of equatorial waters.

The main feature of the voyage, from a descriptive standpoint, is the storm which struck the ship shortly after its departure. Tomlinson's description of this event ranks with the best such passages in Conrad. Perhaps the most striking quality is the originality of the comparisons, always an important device of the describer. A wave, for example, seems to Tomlinson's eye "as a heaped mass of polished obsidian, having minor hollows and ridges on its slopes, conchoidal fractures in its glass."

Once arrived at Para, Tomlinson devotes his descriptive attention to the jungle and its inhabitants in an equally detailed but more personal way. Here he had more time to observe and reflect the wider variety of items that engaged his attention. Pages are given over to the mass of green foliage that lines the river's edge. Paragraphs are devoted to one insect. Through it all, without an excess of direct comment but more by the nature of his descriptions, Tomlinson's intense interest in the whole panorama is shown. He is overcome with delight at sighting a morpho butterfly and compares it to a little piece of blue sky flitting about the forest.

Tomlinson's reputation as a stylist is high, and descriptive passages in this book show his writing at a high level. His mixture of long and short sentences and clauses, each compact and full of concrete details and carefully chosen adjectives, is a lesson in writing vivid but highly detailed description without becoming dull and seeming long-winded.

No doubt much easier to write—because their very material is sure to be interesting to the reader—are the several stories that Tomlinson includes at well-spaced intervals. These tales range from the fantastic seamen's yarn about Bill Moffat's encounter with Davy Jones to the chilling story of how Captain Davis' interest in shrunken heads led him to an unfortunate first hand experience of the phenomenon. Once more, Tomlinson refrains from comment, simply allowing the narrative itself to impress the reader with the strange nature of the teller and the peculiar facets of life to be found in these remote places.

The foregoing kinds of material will delight most readers but many may be repelled by Tomlinson's too-frequent statements of his view of things that are not really connected with the essence of The Sea and the Jungle. Certainly the main idea, and the one which impelled him to leave London and go with the Skipper on the trip, is bound to appeal to many people. The thought of escape to another world, preferably an exotic one, occupies everyone's mind at some time or another, but the reader may well lose sympathy with Tomlinson's repeated statement that the reader has not really eaten, or slept, or appreciated human companionship until he has done so under circumstances similar to those enjoyed by the author. Here Tomlinson comes close to preaching, and it mars the effect of his work.

Several outright homilies castigate the spirit of commercialism that was ruining the beauties of nature along the Amazon and was sending to death or misery brave men who often had no real idea of why they were being so sacrificed. In 1912, Tomlinson's audience had not had so much time as the current reader to be come weary of declarations like this one: "I begin to think the usual commercial mind is the most dull, wasteful, and ignorant of all the sad wonders in the pageant of humanity." His admiration for the men who are the victims of this kind of mind is a less disturbing feature of the book, and his statements about the beauty and mystery of the jungle and the life that is lived there are quite fitting. It is really the condemnation of things apart from his direct experience on the trip, but things which this experience causes him to ponder on that seems out of place or obtrusive, breaking the mood and tonal quality of the whole. Tomlinson's sarcasm on the Poor Law, for instance, weakens the effect of his writing.

These passages—all toward the end of the book—are, however, insignificant in comparison to the rest of The Sea and the Jungle, and Tomlinson's achievement is great in spite of them. Few writers, in either travel books or fiction, have been able more skillfully to capture the spirit of a place, its human implications, and to express them in such a well controlled writing style and with such finely balanced sensitivity.

A SEASON IN HELL

Type of work Prose poem

Author Arthur Rimbaud (1854-1891)

First published 1873

Still a matter of controversy and interpretation, A Season in Hell (Une Saison en Enfer) is perhaps best described by the critic Wallace Fowlie as "the poem of a confession." Historically, Rimbaud's central work is somewhat in the spirit of Saint Augustine's Confes- sions or Dante's Vita Nuova, but more in the form of Baudelaire's Flowers of Evil. This poet, who wrote no more after composing this work in his nineteenth year, was in certain respects a literary precursor of Hart Crane and Henry Miller in America, T. S. Eliot and W. H.

A SEASON IN HELL by Arthur Rimbaud. Translated by Louise Varèse. Excerpts reprinted by permission of the publishers. New Directions Copyright, 1945-1947 by New Directions.

Auden in England, Rainer Maria Rilke in Germany, and the Existentialists in France, especially so in that he wrote not only brilliantly of himself but also prophetically of the modern world. He has been called the Villon of his day, an enfant terrible who like Lucifer, plunged into the depths and like Faust was at last redeemed.

This strange and compelling poem begins with an unmarked introduction of the images and symbols used so brilliantly later, a preview of his odyssey downward which includes moments from innocence to depravity in his short life. He tells of the childhood of himself and the race, "a feast where all hearts opened and all wines flowed," from which he and we have departed. Once he took Beauty on his knee—perhaps normal love which he never knew but fleetingly—and found her anathema, a figure offering a possible explanation of his own homosexuality. From that time on he was pursued by the Furies of poetry, exile, and hate in his search of a lost innocence. "Misfortune was my God," he declared as he invited all suffering, and he found the "key to the ancient feast" was charity. The devil, who welcomed this inverted Dante without a Vergil, called him a hyena, that horribly laughing outcast or satirist of society, and told him, "Attain death with all your appetites, your selfishness and all the capital sins!" For him, then, the poet tore "these few, hideous pages from my notebook of one of the damned."

"Bad Blood," the longest of the several books of the seasons (from the springtime youth of mankind until the dread present winter of civilization) describes ancestral recollections, the Gallic days, pagan rites, magnificent lusts, and especially ineptness in the sheer mechanics of living. This blood wars with that of Christianity, which has acted as a weakening rather than a strengthening transmutation. The poet sees himself as a visionary who remains pagan. "I cannot see myself at the councils of Christ, nor at the councils of Nobles—representatives of Christ." The inferior race has overrun everything in these last centuries of reason, nationalism, and especially our age of science, "the viaticum" which he so despises, verbal, analytic and statistical. He frighteningly foretells of his own destruction through perversion, his erotic flights into Africa, and finally his miserable death preceded by a leg amputation to stave off a cancer.

The poet is an outcast who cannot be judged as other men, this is the theme which inspired him originally to call his long poem Livre nègre, for his skin is deeper and he is more primitive. He sees all saints as outcasts, even convicts, who destroy only to save, but he learns that in persecution the strong do not cry out against their fate. Yet he, the poet, is no different from others, the ones in power, who "have drunk of the untaxed liquor of Satan's still," and in this realization he finds comfort or even escape. He will live, bless life, love his brothers, find God. From depravity to hope he goes in search of his lost innocence, but like the fierce Saints, "anchorites, artists such as are not wanted anymore."

"Night of Hell" describes the eternal punishment as the fires of desire for salvation. This is not the inferno the poet's catechism taught him, the errors of his elders transplanted to the innocents. Here his symbolism moves toward surrealism.

Satan, Old Nick, runs with the wild gram. Jesus walks on the purple briers and they do not bend.
Jesus walked on the troubled waters.
The lantern showed him to us, erect white, with long brown hair, on the flank of an emerald wave.

He then goes on to ask for separate hells of pride, anger, laziness—a whole symphony. But this exquisite suffering is not to be, he knows only a slow deterioration during which the sinner is intact, observing himself unhidden and alone.

In the next two parts, "Delirium I" and "Delirium II," the poet goes on a pilgrimage to view his own carnal love and visionary love. The first part describes with uncomfortable intimacy the older Verlaine and the insatiable Rimbaud, the former the foolish virgin and the latter the demonic bridegroom: the meetings, the raptures, the quarrels, the youth's sadistic torturing of the older man, the latter's rejection of marital relations, the drunkenness and disorder, the final disruption through violence. Symbolically, this unholy alliance is almost a literal hell on earth in response to the uncontrollable. Escape is not possible, though the relationship is sterile, and yet there is a sense of rapture which is spoiled only by the lack of perfection, the absence of a higher, more intellectual realization which both sought. "Hunger," a poem within "Delirium II," suggests that through love we may get a brief glimpse of truth, of eternity, the poet sees himself as part of a "fabulous opera" containing all these contradictions. Carnal man creates life; visionary man creates art—or, rather, both re-create from the substance of God. Profundity can now be expressed only as a comic opera by that buffoon, the poet.

In "The Impossible," the attempt to bend time backward, the poet is seen running on a treadmill. In the "Occidental swamps" we are mired down and catch only a glimpse of the old Orient, "the first and eternal wisdom." Instead, we cling to the pompous platitudes of M. Prudhomme, the self-righteous man whom Rimbaud thought was born of Christianity. But we can move in our theology to the vigor of Eden where "Through the spirit we go to God!" "Lightning Flash" is a brief section on the false hopes of human toil, busy work, a pretended life which must be denied. Modern man is made of such disguises as "mountebank, beggar, artist, scoundrel, priest!" But he will strike out against poses; otherwise eternity would be lost to us all.

Having now worked himself through the many snares of hell, the poet gets a glimpse of "Morning." He returns to his opening theme before he was cast out in the desert (like the hyena), before his pagan voice was lost in Christian dogma. Yet he sees hope in an attainable "Christmas on the earth" where we must be the Magi, the "Kings of life" singing the songs of heaven without cursing life. Hell has no meaning unless salvation is present, unless the "doors were opened by the son of man."

The last section, "Farewell" begins "Autumn already!—But why regret an eternal sun if we are embarked on the discovery of divine light?" This completes the cycle, if Christmas is really the festival of lights, our last hope in an old world which was begun in the childhood of pagan spring or Oriental wisdom. The poet's autumn vision, after the hot season of summer hell and memories of the cool spring of creation, is apocalyptic.

Sometimes in the sky I see endless beaches, covered with white nations full of joy. Above me a great golden ship waves its multi-colored pennants in the breezes of the morning. I created all fetes, all triumphs, all dramas. I tried to invent new flowers, new stars, new flesh, new tongues.

But yet Rimbaud could not be an angel or seer, "exempt from all morality." He found himself both man and artist, peasant and angel, for there can be no separation of body and soul in this new Jerusalem. We must enter the city in "vigor and real tenderness," where all "shall be free to possess truth in one soul and one body."

THE SECOND WORLD WAR

Type of work History

Author Winston S Churchill (1874-)

Time 1919 1945

Locale Europe North Africa, the Pacific Area

First published 1948 1954

Principal personages

SIR WINSTON CHURCHILL

FRANKLIN D ROOSEVELT

JOSEPH STALIN

ADOLF HITLER

NEVILLE CHAMBERLAIN

ANTHONY EDEN

GENERAL GEORGE C MARSHALL

GENERAL DWIGHT D EISENHOWER

FIELD-MARSHAL ERWIN ROMMEL

Contemporary accounts by actual participants in great, climactic, or catastrophic events in world history often achieve tremendous popularity for a brief period. They are widely discussed in the light of other circumstances, but are then permitted to fall into the anomalous category of "source books" for infrequent reference on obscure detail. Because of the circumstances of authorship, the insights given, and the dramatic drive of the narrative itself, it is safe to say, however, that Sir Winston Churchill's history of World War II will not soon fall into the category of forgotten books by the participant in the making of history.

Churchill brought to his monumental undertaking not only his intimate knowledge of military affairs and strategy dating back to the beginning of the present century, but also half a century of activity in parliamentary and international affairs. To these qualifications he added also the skill of a seasoned lecturer on world problems and the invaluable experience of an accomplished author of more than a dozen significant books. Moreover, as Churchill notes in the preface to the first volume, this history is intended as a continuation of the three books he wrote on World War I: The World Crisis, The Eastern Front, and The Aftermath. Together, the early three books and the six on World War II comprise an account of what might be called another Thirty Years' War.

Within no more than six or seven years, Sir Winston Churchill produced the historical work which he calls simply The Second World War. The scope of the enterprise is suggested by the fact that it extends through a half dozen volumes averaging well over eight hundred pages each, and that it encompasses most of the significant occurrences from the close of World War I in 1919 until July 26, 1945—approximately a quarter of a century. Geographically, this history is global, since it concerns the far reaching exploits of armed forces whenever there was conflict in both hemispheres.

Following the method employed in his history of the first world war, Churchill takes the personal experience approach that Defoe used in his Memoirs of a Cavalier. Concerning the second global war, Churchill writes with greater authority, since he was chief of His Majesty's Government for more than five years. Despite the complexity of action and counteraction, the multitude of events and personages and decisions to be carried out, Churchill's main purpose in his history is simply to show that the inevitability of war stemmed from the lack of a consistent and resolute policy among the democracies.

The first volume, titled The Gathering

Storm, begins with a swift appraisal of the twenty year period from 1919 to 1939, termed in retrospect, "From War to War" In this account Churchill decides that the principal folly of the victors in World War I was their failure to keep Germany disarmed The victors pursued their universal hope that peace would reign, and their designation of the first conflict as 'the war to end wars' reveals their ideal But the scheme of reparations did not work, the League of Nations was rendered impotent and world wide economic dislocation followed the collapse of the American stock market in 1929 Meanwhile, General von Seeckt was secretly rebuilding the armed might of Germany and almost unnoticed by war weary European nations, Adolf Hitler was emerging with his grandiose notions of German superiority and destiny Soon Austria was taken, the Saar united with the Fatherland, then the fateful Munich conference provided Hitler with a year of breathing space to ready his forces Next, Churchill recounts how war was declared on September 3, 1939 Poland was taken, Norway was occupied, and Belgium and Holland were invaded When the Chamberlain government fell, Churchill took over as Prime Minister

In this volume, as in the five succeeding parts, Churchill deals not only with events political, strategic, diplomatic, and military, he also sketches in significant background fact, characterizes major personages in the struggles that take place, and pauses to assess the importance of civilian activities For this is the whole story as Churchill sees it He views it not dispassionately but with all the understanding and insight of one who was forced to weigh conditions, to bully and build and negotiate, to cope with crisis, catastrophe, and, ultimately, a bewildering array of problems of allied joint action

Volume II, Their Finest Hour, covers the grim days from May, 1940, until early January, 1941 During those momentous months, the battle of France was joined and lost, Dunkirk was evacuated and home defense of Britain became a shocking necessity Next, the German air assault attempted to paralyze London and the entire island President Roosevelt worked to provide the means of assistance through the Lend Lease Bill, passed by Congress in March, 1941 In the meantime Hitler turned his thoughts to the subjugation of Russia London and England were saved for the time being, but the conflict grew more and more extensive as German might exerted itself in several directions

In the third volume, The Grand Alliance, the horror that Churchill once decried as "the unnecessary war" became truly world wide The year 1941 presented shocking and tragic events which culminated in the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor As the toll of merchant shipping continued to rise in the Atlantic, war grew in intensity on land Rommel began his counterattack in the desert Hitler planned to bomb and starve the English and to invade Russia Meanwhile, the Germans turned their attention to the Balkans, and Yugoslavia, Greece, and Albania fell However, not all the news was completely disheartening German sea power was drastically limited by the destruction of the Bismarck, Hitler's attack on Russia brought the Soviets into the war, and the Japanese bombing of Pearl Harbor forced American participation in the struggle

Volume IV, The Hinge of Fate covers the next year and a half, from January, 1942, to the end of May, 1943 During this period material losses continued mountainous and casualty lists were long, but the 'hinge of fate' had turned in favor of the Allies, as Churchill sees it With the defeat of Rommel and the American landings in Morocco, threats in the Mediterranean abated Japanese forces swept southward, but United States victories in the Coral Sea and at Midway Island foretold the turning point of war in the Pacific Moreover, Operation Torch put the Allied forces in position to achieve the fall of Italy. As German and Japanese power was committed to a last effort, the Allied potential continued to grow.

Volumes V, Closing the Ring, (June 1943-June, 1944), and VI, Triumph and Tragedy (June, 1944-July 26, 1945), deal with the final twenty-six months of the struggle. During a single year following June, 1943, Japan was put on the defensive, the invasion of Italy moved as far as Rome, the Germans were in retreat before Russian power, and preparations for a cross Channel landing were complete. In spite of postponement and the danger of bad weather, D day became a reality on June 6, 1944. With relentless force, during the succeeding fourteen months victory followed victory in France and Italy, the Pacific, Germany, and finally Japan itself.

These are the broad outlines of his story's greatest military undertaking. But

Churchill concerns himself also with high level conferences, hard won decisions on strategy, agonizing losses, and finally the terms of surrender in Europe. He refers to this account as his "personal narrative" of the war period. So it is, but it is, in addition, a magnificent retelling of the events of consequence during eight of the most tempestuous years of modern time.

To some academic historians or partisans with a reluctance to accept Churchill's point of view and judgments, he may appear to slight or neglect particular causes, conditions, and effects which were perhaps of considerable importance at the time. None the less, in the appropriateness of style to circumstance and subject matter, in the selection and interweaving of significant detail with major occurrence, in scope and sweep and conception, Churchill's The Second World War is a truly memorable piece of writing.

THE SECRET AGENT

Type of work Novel

Author Joseph Conrad (Teodor Józef Konrad Korzeniowski 1857-1924)

Type of plot Psychological realism

Time of plot 1880's

Locale London

First published 1907

Principal characters

MR. VERLOC, a foreign secret agent

WINNIE, his English wife

STEVIE, her weak minded brother

THE ASSISTANT COMMISSIONER, a London police official

CHIEF INSPECTOR HEAT

MR. VLADIMIR, First Secretary of an unnamed embassy

MICHAELIS and

OSSIPON, anarchists

Critique

Produced about the middle of his writing career, The Secret Agent is one of Joseph Conrad's acknowledged masterpieces, and it yields to none in the effectiveness of its characterization and in the authenticity of its atmosphere. In this novel, in a side street of Soho, Conrad has gathered some of his most interesting and unusual figures. Realistically presented, these figures are surveyed through a veil of irony which enhances rather than mars the total effect, here Conrad displays his ironical touch at its surest, delicate but probing, and quite imper-

THE SECRET AGENT by Joseph Conrad. By permission of the Trustees of the Estate of Joseph Conrad of J. M. Dent & Sons Ltd. and of the publishers Doubleday & Co. Inc. Copyright 1907-1921 by Doubleday & Co. Inc. Renewed. All rights reserved.

sonal In addition, the novel is notable for the character of Winnie Verloc, one of the best presented of Conrad's women victimized by circumstance and fate

The Story

Mr Verloc was on his way to a certain foreign embassy, summoned there, to his astonishment and unease, at the unseemly hour of eleven in the morning. Ambling down the street, bulky and stolid, Mr Verloc did not look very much like the agent provocateur that he was supposed to be. He kept a little shop, obscure and ill patronized, behind which were quarters for his family. There he often entertained a group of London anarchists from whom he had carefully kept the secret that he was an embassy agent. Thinking how awkward it would be if any of his anarchist friends were to detect him in the act of entering such a place, he grumbled inwardly as he approached the embassy.

His appointment with Mr Vladimir did nothing to improve his mood. In fact, his discontent had deepened almost to a state of terror by the time of his departure. Mr Verloc, who had let himself get comfortable, if not lazy, in the years since he had settled in England as the agent of a foreign power, had never contemplated the possibility that he might lose his job. Now he found himself being roundly abused and insulted for what First Secretary Vladimir was pleased to call his fatness, his slothfulness, his general inefficiency. He had even been threatened with dismissal if he did not promptly promote some incident to upset English complacency. In short, Mr Vladimir demanded a dynamite outrage within a month. Furthermore, it must be directed against some monument of learning and science—preferably the Greenwich Observatory.

Badly shaken, Mr Verloc made his way back to his shop in Soho. Rejoining his household in the rooms behind it, he managed to reassume his usual demeanor of stolid reserve. When, soon after, his anarchist friends paid one of their calls, he betrayed nothing to them of the frustration and fear that lurked behind his impassivity. He was not so successful with his wife. She was able to keep her own counsel, but she missed very little of what went on about her.

Younger than her husband, Winnie Verloc had married him for security rather than for love. Nor was it even her own security that she was concerned about, but that of her unfortunate brother, whose passionate protector she had been ever since the days of their childhood. Stevie, now physically mature, had remained childlike in other ways, he was easily excited and inarticulate, though generally soft hearted and trusting. One of the people he trusted most was Mr Verloc. His sister had done a great deal to bring this state of affairs about, and his mother, who was also being supported by Mr Verloc, had assisted Winnie in impressing upon Stevie the idea that Mr Verloc was good, that his wishes must be instantly carried out, and that he must be spared the slightest annoyance. Mr Verloc, meanwhile, serenely went his own way, insensitive to this anxious maneuvering to keep Stevie in his good graces, he largely ignored his brother-in-law even while tolerating his presence in the Verloc household.

To consolidate her son's position still further, the mother of Stevie and Winnie decided that before Mr Verloc could tire of supporting both of his wife's relatives, she would move to an almshouse. Stevie missed her and fell to moping. Winnie, seeking a remedy for her brother's moodiness, seized upon what seemed to her a happy expedient. The long walks of her husband, mysterious of purpose and destination, gave Winnie an idea. Finding the right moment to make her request, she persuaded her husband to take Stevie with him. Soon, to Winnie's gratification, this experiment became an established practice. With things apparently going so well, she saw no reason to object when Mr Verloc made a rather unexpected proposal regarding Stevie. Since Stevie was fond of Michaelis, an elderly anarchist who frequently visited the house, why not let the brother spend a few days with Michaelis at his retreat in the country?

Apparently pleased with this development, Stevie left to visit Michaelis and the next few days passed without incident in the Verloc household. Late one afternoon, however, Mr Verloc came home from one of his walks more upset than Winnie had ever seen him. He had withdrawn all of their money from the bank, and he mumbled vaguely about the necessity of leaving the country. Winnie tossed her head at this—he would go without her, she declared tartly. Mr Verloc morosely ignored her wifely urgings that he eat his supper and change his slippers. He did not ignore, however, a distinguished looking stranger who turned up presently and took Mr Verloc away. Winnie failed to recognize this caller as the Assistant Commissioner of London Police.

During their absence, a second stranger arrived. Winnie became more and more apprehensive upon learning that he was Chief Inspector Heat. Heat, on learning that he had been forestalled by his superior, showed Winnie a cloth label bearing Stevie's name and address. Recognizing it as an identification tag placed in her brother's coat, she asked wildly where Heat had found it. The return of Mr Verloc, alone, interrupted their conversation. After Heat had taken Mr Verloc into another room, Winnie tried to overhear what they were saying. Al most mad with grief, she heard her husband tell how he had trained Stevie to take part in a bombing attempt upon the Greenwich Observatory. But Stevie had stumbled in the fog, exploding the bomb prematurely and blowing himself to bits.

After Heat left, Winnie faced her husband. White faced and rigid, she hardly listened to his faltering explanation or his plan to turn state's evidence on the promise of a lighter penalty. When, exhausted, he finally dropped on the couch, she seized the carving knife and stabbed him in the heart.

Running aimlessly out into the dark, Winnie stumbled upon Comrade Ossipon, one of her husband's anarchist associates who had eyed her from time to time with admiration. After promising to help her, he discovered, with consternation, what had occurred and that he might be implicated in the affair. Coaxing her onto a boat train, Ossipon waited until it started to move, then he leaped off. With him he took the money which Winnie had entrusted to his care.

A week passed. Ossipon did not enjoy his possession of Winnie's money, he felt heavily burdened by gloom and guilt. The feeling deepened as he read a newspaper report of the suicide of a female passenger from a cross channel boat. He was convinced that the last words of the dispatch would always haunt him since he alone knew the truth about Winnie Verloc's death, a deed which the newspaper called a mystery of madness or despair.

SEJANUS

Type of work Drama

Author Ben Jonson (1573? 1637)

Type of plot Political tragedy

Time of plot First century

Locale Ancient Rome

First presented 1603

Principal characters

EMPEROR TIBERIUS

SEJANUS, his corrupt favorite

EUEMUS, a physician and beautician

LIVIA, Tiberius' daughter in law
 ARRUNTIVS, a righteous and indignant Roman citizen
 SILIVS, SABINVS,
 CORDVS, and
 LEPIDVS noble Romans hostile to Tiberius' corrupt government
 MACRO a fiendish tool of the emperor

Critique

Ben Jonson's Sejanus and Catiline are not among his popular plays, nor have they received profuse praise from literary critics. Yet Catiline was Jonson's expressed favorite among his plays, and, according to the Oxford editors of Jonson, Sejanus marks the turning point of his work, leading to his mature masterpieces. Both Roman tragedies display Jonson's ability to create an illusion of living history, both are well constructed, both have strong characterization, both are written in firm, powerful verse. Where they fall short of Shakespeare's and many lesser dramatists' work is in the fact that they have a certain hardness and lack of warmth. Horror is sometimes stirred, pity perhaps, but love and gentleness are missing. Although these tragedies are often treated together, they are independent creations. Sejanus is perhaps more consistent in tone. The world of Sejanus is evil and terrifying although good men open and close the play, wickedness is in power from beginning to end. In Jonson, as in Shakespeare, the alchemy of dramatic art has wrought something new and original out of historical source material.

The Story

Silius and Sabinus, respectable Roman citizens of the old stamp, met and discussed the corruption of Tiberius' court. Both admired Agrippina, the widow of Germanicus. Though conscious of the prevalence of spies controlled by the emperor's loathsome favorite Sejanus, they showed no personal fear. Arruntius and the historian Cordus, men of their kind, joined them. Two of Sejanus' spies watched and planned to entrap these men devoted to freedom. Sejanus entered with a group of hangers on and suitors. Arruntius and his friends observed the favorite with scorn. One of Sejanus' followers presented a suit from Eudemus, the physician of Livia, wife of the emperor's son Drusus. Sejanus sent for Eudemus privately, and laid plans with him for the seduction of Livia.

When Tiberius, followed by Drusus, made a public appearance, Sejanus bathed him in fulsome flattery, to the disgust of Arruntius and his friends. The emperor answered with a devious hypocritical speech. After his departure, Drusus and Sejanus clashed, and Drusus struck him. Sejanus remained alone, promising himself to add revenge to his ambitious motives for the destruction of Drusus. Having found Livia a willing victim of corruption, Sejanus plotted with her and Eudemus to poison Drusus. Sejanus worked on the fears of Tiberius to persuade him to destroy Agrippina and the sons of Germanicus, who after Drusus were heirs to the Empire; he also warned the emperor of the danger of Silius, Sabinus, and others. Tiberius consented to call the Senate and to allow Sejanus to handle the destruction of Silius, his wife Sosia, and Cordus, leaving Sabinus and Arruntius for the future.

Arruntius and his friends, hearing that Drusus was dying, recalled the public blow given to Sejanus. Later, the Senate convened, with Drusus' death on all lips. Tiberius entered, to the amazement of the senators, who had assumed grief would keep him from a political function. Tiberius delivered one of his hypocritical orations, punctuated by low voiced comments from the undecieved Arruntius and his friends. Suddenly, without preliminary warning, Sejanus' puppets accused Silius of treason. Recognizing the tyrant's trap and his own hopeless situation, Silius recalled his important services to Rome in peace and war, formally accused Tiberius of fraudulent conduct, and, mocking the tyrant's power, stabbed himself. Tiberius hypocritically expressed regret that he was thus deprived of an opportunity to show mercy to an erring subject. Cordus was next accused and sentenced to prison. His books, histories of the Roman Republic, were sentenced to be burned. Arruntius growled at the Senate's "brainless diligence" in attempting to destroy truth by book burning.

At the conclusion of the Senate meeting, Tiberius and Sejanus planned future moves to strengthen their hands, but, flushed with power and triumph, Sejanus made a major mistake by asking to be allowed to marry Livia. Startled into suspicion, the emperor grunted ominously, then launched into a devious speech pointing out the dangers of such a match. Sejanus hastily withdrew his request but, still blinded by overconfidence, he urged Tiberius' retirement to Capri. Alone, he gloated over past successes and looked toward future triumphs, including the overthrow of the emperor himself. But Tiberius, thoroughly aroused, began to work with a new tool, the villainous Macro, to undermine Sejanus. While the emperor retired to Capri, Macro began his work by advising Caligula, one of the sons of Germanicus, to go and surrender himself to Tiberius, saying that he feared the plots of the powerful Sejanus.

The next victim of Sejanus was Sabinus. Arruntius was moved to wonder why Jove did not strike down the impious and ruthless favorite. Sejanus, having reached a dangerous state of intoxication with his own greatness, thought himself superior not only to men but also to gods. Ominous events occurred, but Sejanus scorned superstition and remained confident of success in his march to absolute power. Macro, with authority from Tiberius, caused the Senate to convene again, apparently to confer new honors on Sejanus. Macro himself remained in the background, but assumed control of the guards. As the senators gathered for the session, Arruntius and Lepidus, a good old Roman unspotted by corruption, stood aside to observe the flatterers eager to get close enough to Sejanus to fly blow his ears with confidential whispers. Great rivalry followed to see who could sit close to him during the proceedings. When the senators were seated, a letter from the emperor was read aloud to them. Bit by bit this masterpiece of political deviousness shifted the majority of the hearers from fulsome support of Sejanus to suspicion, fear, and hostility. Flatterers who had clamored to get near the favorite hastily shifted their seats, all but a gouty one who struggled in vain to rise, much to the delight of Arruntius at seeing gout keep the flatterer "miserably constant." Macro entered, supported by the guards, and dragged Sejanus from his seat, heaping violent personal indignities on him. Sejanus was hurried away to execution. Later reports told of his body's being torn to pieces by the mob. Most horrible of all, the children of Sejanus were torn from his divorced wife Apicata and were killed. In agony and fury, Apicata accused Livia and Eudemus of poisoning Drusus. Their death sentences were foretold.

Arruntius and Lepidus knew that Rome had but exchanged one instrument of evil for another, as Macro was no improvement on Sejanus, and the venomous, reptilian emperor remained untouched. Arruntius, however, delivered a valedictory prophecy to all tyrants and, using the fall of Sejanus as example, warned of the inevitability and terror of their destruction.

SELECTED POEMS

Type of work Poetry
 Author John Crowe Ransom (1888)
 First published 1945

John Crowe Ransom, recognized as poet, social critic, and literary critic, has in this book published forty of his best poems. The slender volume has been culled principally from two earlier volumes Chills and Fever (1924) and Two Gentlemen in Bonds (1927), with the last five poems having appeared previously only in periodicals. No poems have been included from his earliest volume, Poems About God (1919). The arrangement is chronological.

Though neither a prolific nor a popular poet, Ransom, through his variety, freshness, and elegance, has won a distinguished place in American poetry. In the few poems of this volume there is ample evidence of distinction in his sensitive lyricism, his adept narratives and character portraits, and his skillful use of wit and irony.

Ransom the scholar is apparent in nearly all of the poems. The polysyllabic vocabulary and occasional use of archaisms such as 'thole,' the remote allusions, and the use of ellipses and slant rhyme are characteristic of a poet writing for mature readers, unwilling to condescend to popular taste. At times the stumbling blocks seem unwarranted, like playful, mocking jokes on the reader, and the charge of obscurity, particularly in some of the later poems, is justified. However, in the majority of the poems the obstacles are not insurmountable and the reader's effort is well rewarded.

Conclusions are never explicitly stated by Ransom, morals are never obvious. He states his theory of modern poetry and the moral, so well exemplified in his own poetry, in the essay "Poets Without Laurels."

Pure or obscure the modern poet manages not to slip into the old fash ioned moral beautiful compound he may take the subject nearest his own humanity, a subject perhaps of terrifying import but in treating it will stop short of all moral or theoretical conclusions and confuse his detail to the point where it leaves no positive implications

Ransom's is a poetry of understatement, in which irony is an important means of showing the implications of a situation, implications which may vary with interpretation. In "Here Lies a Lady," for example, the surface situation is made to seem ludicrous with the picture of husband, aunt, infant of three, and medicos hovering over the lady who burned, then froze, and finally died, "After six little spaces of chill, and six of burning." But the irony is forceful, for this is a "lady of beauty and high degree," like the "sweet ladies" whom the poet addresses in the last stanza, and her life appears pitifully ignominious at the end. Though her fingers fly and her eyes are confident, she makes nothing out of the maze of old lace scraps about her. Even her death lacks dignity, despite the "flowers and lace and mourning." It is the old theme of the transience of beauty, but here presented freshly, more forceful because it is under cover.

The same theme appears in several of the other poems, most notably in the sonnet, "Piazza Piece," in which Death, an old gentleman in a dustcoat, comes to claim the beautiful lady, and in "Blue Girls," a carpe diem piece which combines the same gentle mocking and underlying seriousness found in "Here Lies a Lady."

The theme of death is not always interwoven with that of transient beauty. Two of the poems, for example, deal with the death of children "Dead Boy" does not spare satire in contrasting the glorified feeling for the dead boy with the realities of his character in life, "A pig with a pasty face, so I had said" but the hurt is apparent, too, and even the poet recognizes in the now dead lad the nobility of his forebears. More pathetic is "Bells for John Whiteside's Daughter." Here the contrast is between the very active life of the little girl as she played in the orchard and chased the lazy geese ("Who cried in goose, 'Alas'") to the pond, and the complete stillness of her body in death. The emotion is perfectly controlled—yet evident—as the poet states the effect of the quiet little body

SELECTED POEMS by John Crowe Ransom. Excerpts reprinted by permission of the publishers Alfred A. Knopf, Inc. Copyright 1924, 1927, 1945 by Alfred A. Knopf, Inc.

But now go the bells, and we are ready,
In one house we are sternly stopped
To say we are vexed at her brown study
Lying so primly propped

Another of the poems about death, "Janet Waking," deals with a child's first knowledge of death, the death of old Chucky, a hen. Again, the balance between humor and pathos is perfectly achieved. Through the use of exaggeration the poem even touches on the mock heroic. The agent of death is a "transmogrifying bee" which Came droning down on Chucky's old bald head

And sat and put the poison. It scarcely bled,
But how exceedingly

And purple did the knot
Swell with the venom and communicate
Its rigor! Now the poor comb stood up straight
But Chucky did not

The exaggeration here is not merely for humorous effect, however. To young Janet this is an event of tremendous seriousness, and the contrast between the cause and the effect serves to point up, not play down, the pathos of the situation.

This characteristic mingling of humor and emotion may be traced through a great number of the poems. Even in the love poem, "Winter Remembered," some of the imagery is humorous. The lonely man's fingers, away from his love's touch, are like "Ten frozen parsnips hanging in the weather." Then, the humor may at times become biting, satiric, as in "Parting, Without a Sequel," serving to make even stronger the underlying emotion.

Ransom's fine character portraits and short narratives at times suggest Edwin Arlington Robinson and one of Ransom's chief influences, Thomas Hardy. In "Tom, Tom, the Piper's Son" we have a dreamer related to Miniver Cheevy. "Captain Carpenter" is a forcefully satiric piece about an unteachable idealist who suffers one reverse after another and yet never gives up. "Miriam Tazewell," whose world was her flowers, went about sullen for weeks after they were destroyed in a storm.

The tragedy of many of Ransom's characters is that they are not able to communicate. One major reason for this inability is that they live in a world of convention, which only the very young and the very old can break through. The grandfather in "Old Man Playing with Children" speaks thus to the middle-aged who make fun of him for playing Indian with the boys:

"It is you the elder to these and younger
to me
Who are penned as slaves by properties and causes
And never walk from your shaped in supportable houses
And shamefully, when boys shout, go in and flee

"May God forgive me, I know your middling ways,
Having taken care and performed ig-
nomines unreckoned
Between the first brief childhood and
the brief second,
But I will be the more honourable in these days"

In "Eclogue," innocent, carefree youth is contrasted with selfish adulthood, when love is no longer freely given. Fear, also, is given here as a reason for the lack of love. The dream of Death comes suddenly, "Then metamorphosis" "Spectral Lovers" and "The Equilibrists" describe lovers who fear showing their passion because of conventional feelings about honor

Predicament indeed, which thus discovers
Honor among thieves, Honor between lovers
O such a little word is Honor, they feel!
But the grey word is between them cold
as steel

In "Two in August," the poet, characteristically understating, tells how a husband and wife one night "did something strange" and suddenly attacked each other "with silences and words." Similarly, though less clearly stated, the troubled tension of a domestic situation appears in "Prelude to an Evening."

These are problems posed, not solved. "The Equilibrists," for example, questions, half whimsically, whether it would be better to go bodiless to Heaven or to go honorless to Hell, where there is no end to kissing. And with the half hope of Hardy in "The Darkling Thrush" or "The Oxen," the poet says in "Some where is Such a Kingdom" that when even the birds start quarreling and croaking—

My dull heart I must take elsewhere
For I will see if God has made
Otherwhere another shade
Where the men or beasts or birds
Exchange few words and pleasant
words
And dare I think it is absurd
If no such beast were, no such bird?

It is impossible to deal adequately with the variety of Ransom's poetry ranging from allusion packed poems such as "Philomela" to light, whimsical verse such as "Dog" and "Survey of Literature." Though his poetic output has been relatively small, this poet has well proved his versatility and his particular talent of combining wit and irony, sometimes gentle, sometimes biting, with emotion and serious meanings.

THE SELF-TORMENTOR

Type of work Drama

Author Terence (Publius Terentius Afer, c. 190-159 B.C.)

Type of plot Social comedy

Time of plot Fourteenth century B.C.

Locale The countryside near Athens

First presented 163 B.C.

Principal characters

CHREMES, an old man

SOSTRATA, his wife

ANTIPHILA, his daughter

CLITIPHO, his son

CLINIA, a youth

MENEDEMUS, his father

SYRUS, Clitipho's servant

BACCHEIS, a courtesan, Clitipho's mistress

Critique

Although The Self-Tormentor (Heautimorumenos), based on an earlier play by Menander, takes its primary force from its intricate plot, it is, like several of Terence's comedies, in some sense a problem play. The issues are not as clearly presented here as in The Brothers, for example, but the conflict is much the same. The problem is whether undeviating strictness or affectionate tolerance is the best mode of rearing children. Menedemus begins by finding the apparent excesses of his son intolerable. Since his uncompromisingly uprighteous reaction results in the loss of his son, his is clearly not the way Terence would recommend. Neither, however, is the old man's swing to the opposite extreme after his son leaves home. Chremes' advice to the contrite Menedemus when the latter is contemplating putting his son in complete control of the entire estate is too full of common sense to be ignored, and the same thing is to be said of the reform imposed on Chremes' own son. Terence seems to imply here some sort of mean between the two extremes: strictness without severity, tolerance without anarchy.

The Story

While Chremes' wife Sostrata was pregnant, Chremes had told her that if the child should be a girl she was to destroy it. Sostrata agreed, but when the baby did turn out to be a daughter the poor woman did not have the heart to carry out her husband's command by herself. Instead, she gave the child to a poverty-stricken Corinthian woman then living in Athens to be exposed. Out of superstition, she also gave the woman a ring for her finger to accompany the child when it was left out to die.

The old Corinthian woman failed to carry out her instructions. Naming the child Antiphila, she reared the girl as her own. Antiphila grew up, well mannered and comely, and she was believed by everyone to be the old woman's own daughter.

Clinia, the son of Menedemus, saw Antiphila and fell desperately in love with her. Fearing the disapproval of his strict father, Clinia began living with her in secret as though she were his wife. But Menedemus at last discovered the affair, and by constantly chiding his son and accusing him of unmanly indolence, he finally caused the young man to go to Asia and serve in the wars under the Persian king.

Shortly after Clinia had left Athens, Menedemus came to realize that he had been unjust and cruel in his severity. To punish himself he sold all his possessions in Athens, purchased a farm in the country, and began working both himself and his servants almost beyond endurance.

Three months after his departure, Clinia returned, no longer able to tolerate his separation from Antiphila. Unaware of his father's change of heart, he kept his return secret from Menedemus and was entertained by Clitpho, a boyhood friend and the son of Chremes. As soon as Clinia had arrived, Clitpho sent his two slaves, Dromo and Syrus, into Athens to bring Antiphila to her lover. On the same day Chremes had learned from Menedemus how much he wanted his son to return and how generous he was determined to be to the young man when the opportunity did finally present itself. In fear of making Clinia audacious in his demands on Menedemus, however, Chremes refrained from telling the young man about his father's change of feeling.

That evening Syrus returned, bringing both Antiphila and a high-priced courtesan, Bacchis, as well. Clitpho, unknown to his father, had previously become deeply infatuated with Bacchis, and the cunning and bold Syrus had decided that the youth's desire to see his mistress could be satisfied if Bacchis were introduced to Chremes as Clinia's mistress and Antiphila were to pretend to be a member of the courtesan's retinue.

Early the next day, Chremes went to Menedemus and told him of Clinia's arrival. The old man, overjoyed at the news, wanted immediately to give his son full control over all his possessions. Chremes, however, counseled against such a move on the same grounds that he had refrained from telling Clinia of his father's change of heart. Moreover, Chremes believed Bacchis to be Clinia's mistress, and he knew that her extravagant mode of living would quickly drain any admirer of all his possessions. The festivities of the night before alone had cost Chremes dearly. What he did advise was that Menedemus should receive Clinia warmly, pretend to be ignorant of his affair with Bacchis, and allow himself to be tricked out of relatively small sums from time to time. This procedure, Chremes thought, would both keep Clinia at home and forestall the ruin of Menedemus.

Meanwhile, Syrus was hatching a plot to trick Chremes out of the ten minae that Bacchis had demanded as the price of her sojourn with Clitupho. The servant was gratified and amused when Chremes gave him apparent sanction for his deception by asking Syrus to contrive a way to deceive Menedemus into believing that Bacchis was not Clinia's mistress. Syrus, agreeing, cunningly proceeded with his own plot by telling Chremes that Antiphila's mother had borrowed ten minae from Bacchis, leaving Antiphila as a pledge for the money. The old woman, having presumably died, Antiphila needed the money to purchase her freedom.

At that moment, however, Sostrata, Chremes' wife, was discovering by means of the ring that Antiphila was her abandoned daughter. When this fact was revealed to Chremes, his first reaction was to chide his wife, but he was really pleased to recover his daughter now that his condition had improved financially.

At last Syrus hit upon a plan for deceiving both fathers by telling them the truth. He proposed that Bacchis and her retinue should be moved to Menedemus' house on the pretext that she was Clitupho's mistress and that her affair with Clitupho must be concealed from Chremes. In addition, Antiphila was to be passed off as Clinia's mistress, and Clinia was to ask his father for ten minae to provide for the wedding. Chremes refused to allow another to ransom his daughter for him, however, and gave Clitupho the ten minae. The rest of the plot proved acceptable as well, and Bacchis and her servants were moved to Menedemus' house.

Menedemus assumed that what he was told regarding Bacchis and Clitupho was designed to deceive him, but when he saw the two entering a bedchamber together without a word of protest from the observing Clinia, he grew troubled and told Chremes what he had seen. He also pointed out that Clinia had made no effort to get money out of his father and had seemed highly pleased when Menedemus agreed to his marriage with Antiphila. Thus, the whole truth came out. Chremes, infuriated at first, threatened to settle the whole of his property on Antiphila. The sudden prospect of being left penniless led Clitupho to reflect seriously on his mode of life, and he promised to abandon all courtesans and marry a virtuous woman. Under the gentle persuasion of Menedemus and Sostrata, Chremes finally agreed to let Antiphila marry Clinia, and in the end he promised to forgive even Syrus.

SEVEN GOTHIC TALES

Type of work Short stories

Author Isak Dinesen (Baroness Karen Blixen Finecke, 1885)

Time Nineteenth century

Locale Mostly northern Europe

First published 1934

Principal characters

MISS MALIN NAT OG DAG, an old anistocrat

COUNTRESS CALYPSO VON PLATEN HALLERMUND, her godchild

CARDINAL HAMILCAR VON SEHESTEDT

KASPARSON, his servant

JONATHAN MAERSK a young noble
 BARON VON BRACKEL, an old gallant
 THE PRIORESS OF CLOSTER SEVEN
 BORIS, her nephew
 ATHENA, the girl Boris loved
 COUNT AUGUSTUS VON SCHIMMELMANN, a young Danish nobleman
 DONNA ROSINA DI GAMPOCORTA a Pisan lady
 MORTEN DE CONINCK, a sailor
 ELIZA and
 FANNY, his sisters
 LINCOLN FORSNER, an English adventurer
 MATHIESEN a town councilor
 ANDERS KUBE a clerk and poet
 MME FRANSINE LERCHE, a beauty

When Isak Dinesen's Seven Gothic Tales first appeared in 1934, their old world atmosphere, their romantic style of writing, and their aura of mystery made them highly popular. Particularly in America, these tales of the supernatural and of nineteenth century aristocratic life found a wide audience of people tired of the vast amount of realistic and naturalistic fiction of the age. At that time few Americans knew Isak Dinesen's real identity (she is a Danish Baroness, Karen Blixen Finecke). In fact, Dorothy Canfield, who wrote the introduction to the first American edition of Seven Gothic Tales, did not know whether the author was a man or a woman and only ventured the guess that the author was a northern European of aristocratic background. These tales, and Isak Dinesen's subsequent work, have held a loyal audience ever since, although for many readers the enthusiasm that originally greeted the Seven Gothic Tales has been tempered by an awareness of the overwriting and the tricks frequently used to bring the plots together.

Many of the plots involved in the Seven Gothic Tales deal with a vanishing aristocracy in Europe in the early or middle years of the nineteenth century. The aristocracy, concerned with passing its blood down from generation to generation, finds the lines of breeding corrupted by illegitimacy. The uncovering of illegitimacy, or sometimes of legitimacy, is one of the major plot devices in Isak Dinesen's work. In "The Deluge at Norderney," for example, Jonathan Maersk is trying to escape the knowledge that he is really a baron's son instead of the son of a simple seaman. The knowledge that he is the baron's son makes Miss Malin Nat og Dag arrange a marriage between him and her godchild while they are all waiting in a hayloft for a rescue boat during a flood. The plot hinges on Jonathan's disclosure of his origin, no matter how melancholy this revelation makes him for melancholy is fashionable among the aristocracy of the time. The question of legitimacy also plays a strong part in the working out of several of the other tales.

Most of the stories also contain a strong element of the supernatural. People assume the identities of others, as the servant Kasparson assumes the identity of Cardinal Hamilcar von Sehestedt, after he has killed the cardinal, in "The Deluge at Norderney", or people's lives strangely follow the pattern of long dead historical figures as in "The Poet," in which the situation repeats the pattern of a royal triangle that had led to tragedy in the same town half a century before. It is as if men are not the agents that control their destinies, rather, they are pushed by powers greater than they, powers that are never explained or described in any rationally comprehensible manner. Mysterious transformations also take place in this northern and super-natural world, as the prioress is transformed inexplicably in "The Monkey" Along this gloomy northern shore, men are haunted by ghosts of history and their own past actions The supernatural is not always inexplicable, it is some times, in Isak Dinesen's work used as the symbol for the past of the character influencing his present Morten De Coninck's return to the sea, in "The Supper at Elsinore," is at least as much a reaction against his sisters and his boyhood memories as it is a mysterious 'call' from powers stronger than he In other stories, like "The Monkey," both Athena's and the prioress' actions seem attributable only to supernatural causes

These stories are full of heroic and aristocratic action For example, in "The Roads Round Pisa," a young Danish nobleman who helps an old lady after a road accident finds himself led into a complex of events that eventually causes him to become involved in a duel The stories have floods and storms, long voyages and tragic deaths, a constant kind of romantic derring do If the characters are expected to maintain strength and heroism in the face of adversity, if they do avoid self pity (although not melancholy), they still become involved in incidents like duels for love or honor, in raging storms or floods, that recall the romantic tradition The only element in Miss Dinesen's work that distinguishes it from the supernatural, romantic tale is the need of the characters to meet their fate without wailing, with bravery and often stoicism, as an aristocratic old woman faces the decay of her class and her own possible death during a furious storm in "The Deluge at Norderney" At its best, Isak Dinesen's work shows the courage involved in facing the unpredictable, the romantic defeat, the powerful supernatural force

Some of the tales, like "The Poet" and "The Supper at Elsinore," have more simple and domestic settings Instead of dealing with bizarre aristocrats considering blood lines and legitimacy, these stories deal with simple townspeople or

seafaring families But these people also become involved in strange events that they cannot control, and they find the romantic promptings of their souls unfulfilled in the quiet ways of life they are expected to lead "The Poet" deals with the love triangle of the town councilor, the poet, and the beautiful lady who has just come to town Their romantic urges their characters, and their fates make a conflict inevitable, despite their awareness of a historical warning concerning the same kind of triangle Two sisters, who have unwillingly become old maids because their brother ran away from his intended bride at the altar, wait faithfully for the brother in "The Supper at Elsinore" He returns, but again runs away for the pathetic and romantic sisters have come to represent exactly what he fled in the first place Isak Dinesen is able to look at her characters clearly in these stories, analyze the motives that impel them sympathize with their romantic dreams, and yet treat their defeats without falling into mawkish excess

One of Isak Dinesen's stories is more glibly ironic than are the rest In "The Old Chevalier" an old baron who has been successful with the ladies for many years is approached by a lovely young girl in Paris He takes her to his room, invests her with all the characteristics of the enigmatic and romantic waif, makes love to her, and feels he has found something pure, ideal, and beautiful Then, as she is leaving, she asks him for her standard fee Like Isak Dinesen's other aristocratic heroes, he takes his defeat with good grace but with knowledge of the ironic situation in which he finds himself Although obvious similar devices of plot are frequent in Seven Gothic Tales, the bizarre details and the supernatural aura of stories such as "The Monkey" and "The Deluge at Norderney" make them far more interesting for most readers than is "The Old Chevalier"

The frequent use of both the bizarre and the supernatural is paralleled by Isak Dinesen's rich and provocative style Al though often repetitious, the prose is full of gloomy images of the northern seas, a full use of comparisons, and great ease of manner. Isak Dinesen is a true storyteller, able to evoke a mood with richness, ease and power. Her prose is also distinguished by touches of humor which, without disrupting the thread of the narrative, are apparent in all her work. These frequent injections of humor do much to relieve the fullness and the supernatural aura of the ornate prose.

Despite the humor and despite an awareness of psychological motive, Isak Dinesen is not essentially a twentieth century writer. Her adroit, easy style, her fondness for the bizarre and the supernatural, her construction of elaborate plots based on a trick, a mistaken identity, a sudden inexplicable transformation—all these make her tales far more characteristic of nineteenth century rather than twentieth century writing. Because she writes out of allegiance to the earlier Gothic tradition and with consciously contrived artistry, it does not seem likely that she will be celebrated as one of our greatest, most profound, or most interesting writers. At the same time her deliberate adherence to a past literary tradition and an earlier style and point of view makes her work an interesting example of the diversity of contemporary literature and provides her with a loyal and enthusiastic group of readers.

SEVEN PILLARS OF WISDOM

Type of work History

Author T. E. Lawrence (1888-1935)

Time 1916-1918

Locale The Middle East

First published 1926

Principal personages

T. E. LAWRENCE the author

SHERIF FEISAL IBN HUSSEIN

FIELD MARSHAL EDMUND H. H. ALLENBY

SIR HENRY McMAHON, High Commissioner in Egypt

JEMAL PASHA of Syria

SHERIF HUSSEIN, Emir of Mecca

Unless the forces and countercurrents of world history change abruptly or virtually reverse themselves, it is unlikely that an Englishman will ever again have the opportunity to approximate the exploits and terrors, the sense of achievement and frustration which T. E. Lawrence experienced and described in his Seven Pillars of Wisdom. This work is, in a very real sense, autobiographical history, lived by a most extraordinary and strangely gifted man.

The unusual qualities manifest in the author of Seven Pillars of Wisdom developed early. His boyhood interest in archaeology and adventure resulted in one book, Crusader Castles, written while he was still an undergraduate. His field of special study at Oxford brought about his travels as a professional archaeologist in exploratory rambles through Syria, Egypt, and Northern Mesopotamia. When war broke out in 1914, it was only to be expected that Lawrence would serve in British Intelligence in Egypt. But in 1916, Captain Lawrence sought leave from these duties to try to bring about unity among the Arab chieftains in order to counteract the military and political activities of Turkey. With these extraordinary years Seven Pillars of Wisdom is concerned.

SEVEN PILLARS OF WISDOM by T. E. Lawrence. By permission of the publishers, Doubleday & Co. Inc. Copyright 1926-1935 by Doubleday & Co. Inc.

Following World War I, Lawrence's life fell into unusual patterns. Granted many military distinctions and special recognition for his achievements during the war years, he refused nearly every honor. For a time he served as Arab consultant at peace conferences and as a political adviser to the Colonial office of his government. By 1921, however, his secretive nature had asserted itself. He enlisted as an aircraftman under the name of Ross, he saw duty as Private T. E. Shaw in the Tank Corps and he enlisted again as T. E. Shaw in the Air Force. Upon completion of this last tour of duty, he returned to England, only to lose his life in a motorcycle crash. His was a strange and unusual life, filled with adventure, heroic achievement, planned self-effacement, and accidental conclusion.

Just as extraordinary were the events culminating in the final publication of Seven Pillars of Wisdom. Working from his own detailed notes, which he destroyed as he completed each major section of the book, Lawrence lost almost the entire first draft. Again he set about his task, this time writing from memory alone. The work appeared first in the limited edition of 1926. In the following year he issued an abridgement, Revolt in the Desert, for the general public. Following his death in 1935, the full text of Seven Pillars of Wisdom was released. Comparison of the complete work with Revolt in the Desert affords no good explanation for the author's insistence upon the delay in releasing of the full text.

Strange, even quixotic, as some of the incidents of Lawrence's life and the fortunes of his principal publication may seem, the book itself is far more extraordinary and revealing—a detailed and absorbing recital of two years of striving, of attack and maneuver, of persuasion and rebuff, of privation and intense strain, which culminated in a large measure of success with partial victory of Arab forces over the common enemy, Turkey.

The title of this account is to some extent indicative of the complex mind of the author. Some years before he had selected the phrase from the first verse of the ninth chapter of the Book of Proverbs: "Wisdom hath builded a house, she hath hewn out her seven pillars." At the time he planned to use the title for a projected book about seven cities, later he transferred the title to the present work "as a memento" of his early literary enterprise, finally he added the subtitle, The Seven Pillars of Wisdom: A Triumph. In essence, the full title suggests the transition from Lawrence the youthful archaeologist to Lawrence the expert in Arab affairs and in military plans and strategy.

This record of a two year campaign is long, compact, and explicit, though set down from memory. It consists of 122 closely written chapters, comprising an introduction, ten books, and an epilogue, totaling more than six hundred pages.

In the first seven chapters Lawrence sketched what he termed "The Foundation of Revolt." He described the Arab lands and their troubled peoples, the animosity between Turks and the other loosely knit groups, the lack of trust among various Arab clans, and the absence of fundamental understanding of all these conflicting circumstances on the part of the British Foreign Office and key military leaders. Lawrence was convinced that the Arab Revolt could succeed if the Arab leaders were properly advised.

After securing detachment from his Foreign Office assignment, he took off to interview Arab chieftains and leaders. He traveled far, on camelback and in Arab dress, to confer with Feisal and other prominent Arab chiefs in an effort to gather first hand impressions of physical conditions, supplies, and military strength. With this information, Lawrence returned to his superior officers and reported that a tribal war would be feasible if adequately supplied logistically. His estimate of the situation was accepted, somewhat surprisingly, and preparations began for an attack on the Turks. A frontal assault soon proved foolhardy, however, because of the preponderant forces of the enemy. Thereafter, the Arabs under Feisal served often as an integral part of the British force and were successful in taking Medina, Akaba, in harassing the enemy by cutting railway communications and finally in aiding in the capture of Damascus. By this time the Turkish armies were scattered and the Eastern war drew to its end. Lawrence's efforts were expended. He departed as soon as possible in order not to become involved in the stalemate of establishing authority.

As an account by one intimately acquainted with a successful military endeavor of great significance, Seven Pillars of Wisdom merits recognition and thorough study, for it is an excellent treatise of war conducted under extremely difficult conditions. But Lawrence's book offers much more than mere history, in reality, the military story is little more than the framework upon which the author built a deeply absorbing analysis of this part of the Arab world, its people and leaders, its weaknesses, and its hopes for the future. As a professional student of the past history of those areas, Lawrence had chosen to live among the people to learn their ways, and to share their hardships. With this profoundly sympathetic background, Lawrence was singularly equipped to understand, to reconcile Arab psychology with Allied purpose, to gain the confidence of justifiably suspicious Arab leaders. In the course of his account, Lawrence constantly describes, explains, and interprets. His style, though at times archaic or difficult, enables him to picture desert scenes, oases, and the teeming Arab cities with consummate skill. His portraits of his associates, his junior colleagues and senior officers among the Allies, and his valued and capable friends among the Arabs are vivid word pictures. Lawrence had an eye for human qualities and human character, and he could record them memorably. As few Europeans have ever been able to do, Lawrence became one of the people he was working with, and the most understanding and intelligent of them realized this phenomenon and valued his efforts.

Perhaps the most puzzling and stimulating feature of this extraordinary book is almost coincidental: the picture of Lawrence himself which gradually emerges. T. E. Lawrence was indeed an amazing person. He was capable of intense absorption in the task at hand, that of mounting a successful military operation to conquer the Turks. But at the same time he was appreciating the stark beauties of barren lands and ancient cities, he was evaluating human beings and their ways, judging, adapting their strength to the immediate purpose, and enjoying their companionship. He was also subjecting his own way of life and his own people to a very critical appraisal. In the end, he evidently found his own institutions strangely lacking and disappointing. Hence, Lawrence apparently decided to refuse the honors heaped upon him, to cut himself off from the leaders of his own kind, and to submerge himself in obscurity. His was a lofty, powerful mind, honest but stern and implacable. When that mind could not reconcile itself to the English present he simply chose anonymity. Like Gulliver his travels among strange peoples and regions left Lawrence far from satisfied with the ideals and practices in his homeland.

SEVEN SHORT PLAYS

Type of work Drama

Author Lady Gregory (Isabella Augusta Persse Gregory, 1852-1932)

Time The nineteenth and early twentieth centuries

Locale Ireland

First published 1909

These fine plays, the best and most popular short plays by the influential writer-director of the Abbey Theatre in Dublin, were dedicated to the moving spirit of the group William Butler Yeats.

The plays, produced in the years 1903 to 1909, are capsule representatives of the entire theater movement during the Irish Renaissance. They contain something of Yeats' own poetic imagery, Synge's mystical lyricism, and O'Casey's critical though often comic realism.

In this collection Lady Gregory, careful scholar and folklorist, included notes and music, production dates, and names of actors which also serve to document her literary career and her activities in the theater. The notes explain the source of inspiration, name those who gave information, and define Irish terms and expressions. The music is folk in origin, though carefully transcribed and adapted, perhaps, to the demands of the theater. The production dates and casts are, of course, history.

The first short play, "Spreading the News," began as a tragedy of the unhappy results of rumor. In 1903 what was needed, Lady Gregory says, was comedy to offset heavier pieces, and so she designed a farce of errors, the errors of false reports which involved the whole henny-penny Irish countryside. A new magistrate, very zealous to uncover law violations, followed a report of violence from the time an unexplained act of friendship—returning a pitchfork—became the ditching of an instrument used to kill the husband of a faithless spouse. The entire population of a country fair becomes radically partisan, to the extreme discomfiture of the unlucky "murderer," who swears he will commit the rumored murder should his "victim" be put in jail with him.

"Hyacinth Halvey," the title name of the hero, now stands as a byword for the unlucky man about whom nothing evil can be said. This play, often anthologized since its first production and printing in 1906, contrasts Halvey with Fardy Farrell, the good-natured lout about whom nothing good is said. Lady Gregory suggests that respectability can be a great burden, for young Hyacinth arrives in a small, gossipy village, where he is preceded by fulsome "characters," recommendations from his relatives and friends. The satire is resolved when Halvey's honest attempts to be wicked become in one instance the saving of a butcher who deals in spoiled meat and in another a covering up of the alleged crime of poor Farrell. Hyacinth Halvey finally goes off to the courthouse to deliver a temperance lecture—sent there by the absentee speaker—on the shoulders of the townspeople, who proclaim him a kind of messiah.

Also produced in 1906, "The Gaol Gate" holds something of quiet tragedy, a keening of the wife and the mother of a man who died for a crime he did not commit, without informing on those who did. This misfortune becomes a solace to the two women who had traveled to the jail thinking the man an informer—again, village rumor. Though the symbolism is not insisted upon, the two women are both named Mary. And they leave in exaltation, knowing that Denis died for his neighbor.

In 1907 two other plays were produced. "The Jackdaw" shows the Irish temperament to be at once quixotic and rigidly practical. An improvident shopkeeper has been haled into court for non-payment of debt, but her brother wants to get her off and yet remain anonymous, not for reasons of modesty but to prevent her from bleeding him. A friend invents the fiction of the jackdaw which sells for ten pounds, the amount of the fine. Everyone in town then goes on a jackdaw hunt, not excluding the benefactor.

"The Rising of the Moon" is a melodrama which on production aroused some controversy among extreme Nationalists and Unionists alike. The story tells of a ragged young ballad singer, a political refugee, who makes his escape with the help of a magical song, a folksong from his native county, which proves to be the birthplace of the policeman who allows him, even helps him, to escape

"It is better to be quarreling than alone" is the proverb upon which "The Workhouse Ward" is based. First written as the scenario of a play to further the national theater movement, this work was in 1908 expanded into a lively farce in which opposition attracts. Into a scene of violent argument between two old men in a poorhouse comes the sister of one, offering to take him to her home. The other man, a childhood friend to them both, begs to be taken too. The sister feels that his request is unreasonable, especially when her brother refuses to go without his favorite enemy, and she leaves them. The play closes on a scene of violence more devastating than that with which it opens.

The final play, for which no production date is given, is based on an international folk tale type known as "The Greedy Peasant Woman." "The Travel ling Man" of the title is Christ, who many years ago led a homeless young girl to the lonely house of a widower, asking only that she not shut her heart upon him when he returns. Each year, the woman explains to her young daughter, she and her husband make a special cake commemorating the day (the feast day) when they were brought together. While the mother is out, the young girl invites in a tramp who plays with her and asks only a bit of food from the mother upon her return. She refuses him and reviles him, only to discover a flowering branch left behind as a sign that he was the "King of the World."

Such versatility as Lady Gregory displayed in her long association with the Abbey Theatre is very well presented in this volume, the plays ranging as they do from farce to fantasy. She was one of the great Irish writers of one act plays who, along with Dunsany, Synge, and Yeats, made the one act play an art form. They have had many imitators, but no peers.

THE SHIH CHING

Type of work Poetry

Compiler Confucius (c. 551-479 B.C.) by traditional ascription

First transcribed Twelfth century B.C.

The earliest repository of Chinese verse, the Shih Ching or Book of Poetry contains 305 poems of both folk and court origins. The court poems are more or less ceremonial in character, designed to be sung at sacrifices, to accompany the dances and feasts in honor of dynastic ancestors, or to adorn such formal occasions as receptions, banquets, chases, and archery contests. The folk songs comprise love lyrics of various kinds, epithalamiums, complaints, satires, elegies, and georgics.

Almost all the poems in the Shih Ching were composed in the pre-Confucian period of the Chou dynasty (c. 1122-222 B.C.). In the ceremonial odes the wisdom and prowess of its founders—the kings Wen and Wu and the Duke of Chou—are frequently recalled, though a few pieces, hardly of greater antiquity, celebrate the splendid achievements of even earlier dynasties, the Hsia and the Shang. According to a now discredited tradition, Confucius was the compiler of this anthology after rejecting nine tenths of the 3,000 poems then extant, but the canon must have been well fixed by his time and diplomats and scholars even then knew the poems by heart, quoting them on every conceivable occasion to display their literary attainment or political sagacity. It is easy to see why the court poetry—so vital to the discharge of religious and state functions—should have been saved, but the early preservation of so much folk poetry is a more curious matter. In the absence of better explanation, one must accept the tradition that the Chou kings made a point of collecting the popular ballads of their many vassal states and using them as a political barometer to gauge the happiness or discontent of the populace. Needless to say, all the poems in the Shih Ching were meant to be sung, but the tunes were already lost by time of the Han dynasty (206 B C A D 220)

The anthology, as it exists today, is divided into four sections: kuo feng the smaller and greater ya, and sung. While kuo feng are the folk songs of the vassal states and both ya and sung may be indifferently translated as odes, the divisions are hardly clean cut. Many of the poems in the category of the smaller ya are apparently folk songs, and some of the greater ya poems are little differentiated from the religious and dynastic odes of the sung section. But as documents of ancient China, both the folk songs and courtly odes are of great historical and anthropological interest. To these we owe the first mention of the sage kings and mythical heroes, the coherent presentation of the animistic beliefs of the early Chinese regarding ancestor worship and the adaptation of human labor to the cyclic changes in nature, the precise details of many a religious and state ritual, the intimate evocation of the life of a simple people of great emotional integrity: their courtships and marriages, their work on the farm and their much detested military service. On the strength of the love poems alone, the French Sinologist Marcel Granet has reconstructed a fascinating picture of mating customs and fertility rites in the dawn of Chinese history.

But the Shih Ching is primarily poetry and should be read as such. Confucius once told his disciples, "My children, why do you not study the Poetry? Poetry will stimulate your emotions, help you to be more observant, enlarge your sympathies, and moderate your resentment of injustice. It is useful at home in the service of one's father, abroad in the service of one's prince. Furthermore, it will widen your acquaintance with the names of birds, beasts, plants, and trees." One is hardly surprised that Confucius attached great importance to the Shih Ching as a guide to good conduct and a manual of useful information. In ancient Greece, the study of Homer was urged on similar grounds. And the Poetry, aside from its great social and ceremonial utility, does mention by name about seventy kinds of plants, thirty kinds each of trees, beasts, and birds, not to say ten kinds of fish and twenty kinds of insects—a virtual catalogue of the more common flora and fauna of the then Middle Kingdom. There were not many other sources in ancient China where such a variety of information was so readily available.

If one reads Confucius correctly, the key message in his little speech attests to his awareness of the humanizing influence of poetry, its power to regulate and refine emotions, to enlarge sympathy. To Confucius, li (ritual, etiquette), music, and poetry constitute an inseparable triad. While li is designed to bring out the best qualities of man in his everyday social intercourse as well as on the formal occasions of rejoicing and mourning, Confucius is also aware that there is an excess of emotion in man which cannot be rendered in terms of ritual or etiquette. To him, therefore, li is the approximation of the ideal and poetry, the expression of the actual, although, as in much of the Shih Ching, poetry can be an integral part of a ritualistic occasion. Music is closely allied to ritual and poetry because it serves the dual function of supporting courteous behavior and facilitating the expression of one's true feelings.

To the modern reader, the more vital portion of the Shih Ching is surely the folk songs—160 kuo feng poems plus many others—because they speak the universal language of man's actual feelings. These songs are quite simple in structure, a series of short rhymed stanzas. The basic unit is the four word line, and the closing line of each stanza is usually a refrain Within the simple structure of each poem however, a little drama unfolds itself As in all ballad poetry the poet seldom speaks in his own person he is some girl awaiting her lover by a ford (according to Granet, the wading of a creek or shallow river by a couple signifies marital engagement) or detaining her lover in bed while the dawn is breaking, or telling her story of woe after her husband has been pressed into military service or has deserted her Or the speaker may be the lover himself, who tosses and turns all night in bed thinking of his girl, who takes a walk by the eastern gate and sees girls shining like clouds but still prefers his own choice, a modest girl of "plain cloth and gray kerchief" In other poems the speaker is the soldier who climbs a barren hill and acutely misses his kinsfolk the exile who seeing the yellow birds pecking in the fields, is seized with the sudden impulse to return home, the farmer who thinks of migrating to another state because the large rats in his fields remind him of the greater rapacity of the officials This dramatic quality is one reason why the folk songs have a universal appeal and a perennial charm about them

Another source of poetic appeal is the language When we come across such phrases as "cork heild schoone" and "gold kems" in an old Scottish ballad like "Sir Patrick Spens," we feel that the words themselves enhance the sensuous and musical qualities of the images The diction of the Shih Ching renders a similar service, for its archaic flavor adds immeasurably to the meaning of the poems The folk songs, especially, have retained a pristine quality because the simple emotions which they embody are clothed in a language beyond the contamination of modern ideas, beyond the corrosion of time But the language has another strength which is characteristic of Chinese poetry in general its elliptical density In a four word line there is absolutely no room for mere decoration, for logical connectives, each word must have a maximal poetic weight and suggestiveness to merit inclusion

To a student of English poetry long accustomed to its roses and nightingales, the Shih Ching with its duckweed and dolichos, mulberry and date trees, magpies and orioles, cicadas and locusts presents a distinctively new landscape In almost every folk song, nature is an integral part of the human situation the mulberry tree is shedding its leaves upon the ground and the girl thinks of her state of desertion ripe plums are dropping from the tree and presently there will be only three left on the boughs, and the girl wonders if she will ever have a lover because she, too, is ripe for love Because the lovers, farmers and soldiers in the folk songs are so physically close to nature, there is seldom any need to resort to simile and metaphor The strategy of correspondence, for example, employed by Tennyson in his song "Now Sleeps the Crimson Petal, Now the White" (The firefly wakens waken thou with me") is characteristic of the Shih Ching

In view of the later development of Chinese poetry, the love songs and complaints appear especially important Such conventional themes as the separation of husband and wife, the poverty of peasants, the evils of officialdom and war, the appropriate moods induced by seasonal changes were all first embodied in the Shih Ching The work has remained unsurpassed in its depiction of love Where as the later poets, with the exception of a few exquisite poetesses, adopt the mask of the forsaken or forlorn woman more or less as a literary convention, the Chinese women in the Shih Ching speak out unafraid in the spontaneity of the natural, unashamed womanhood By contrast Chinese women of subsequent history, confined in the home and disallowed the privilege of free social intercourse with their menfolk, appear sad and dull in deed

SHIRLEY

Type of work Novel

Author Charlotte Bronte (1816 1855)

Type of plot Psychological romance

Time of plot Nineteenth century

Locale Yorkshire, England

First published 1849

Principal characters

SHIRLEY KEELDAR, the young mistress of Fieldhead estate

CAROLINE HELSTONE, niece of the rector of Briarfield

ROBERT MOORE manager of a textile mill

LOUIS MOORE a tutor, Robert's brother

MRS PRYOR, Shirley's governess and companion

Critique

In this novel as in Jane Eyre, which it followed, Charlotte Bronte showed her keen interest in the inner selves of her characters. Here she has concerned herself principally with two contrasting characters, Shirley Keeldar and Caroline Helstone, one spirited and independent, the other shy and delicate. Her divided interest between these two characters, however, is the main cause of the novel's structural disunity. Shirley, whom the reader expects to be the protagonist, is not introduced until nearly one third of the book is completed, and thereafter the writer shuttles back and forth between the two characters, oblivious of integration. Concern with the labor problems of the early nineteenth century, obviously not the author's forte, also detracts from the structural unity. The plot is too contrived, leaning heavily on unrealistic turns, such as the revelation that Mrs Pryor is Caroline's mother and Robert's sudden declaration of love for Caroline. Emotion often degenerates into sentimentality, but there are moments, particularly in the description of the Yorkshire countryside, when the finer romantic qualities of Charlotte Bronte reach the peaks of Jane Eyre.

The Story

The introduction of machinery into Robert Moore's Yorkshire cotton mill had caused many mill workers to lose their jobs. A group of rebellious men, spurred on by hungry families and resentful leaders, one night stormed down on wagons bearing new machinery to the mill. The rioters destroyed every piece.

Caroline Helstone, quiet and delicately pretty, appeared the following morning in Robert Moore's cottage to take her French lesson with Hortense Moore, who with her brother had recently come to England from Brussels. As a young child Caroline had been deserted by her parents and left to the care of her stern and unsympathetic uncle, the rector of Briarfield. Robert and Hortense were Caroline's distant cousins, and her visits to their cottage were the brightest moments in her routine life. On this day her anxiety over Robert's mill trouble and her attempts to distract him by reading Shakespeare with him made it apparent that Robert himself was the main reason for the pleasure of her visits.

Robert, however, was too much concerned with his affairs to notice his cousin's growing ardor. In the days which followed, Caroline distractedly sewed for the charity basket, read, and had tea with her uncle and the three ludicrous curates, while secretly cherishing each word that Robert spoke to her and his few displays of cousinly affection. Then, to make her life more intolerable, Robert and her uncle quarreled over politics, and she was forbidden to visit the Moore cottage.

Into this barren world of Caroline's, a new and charming individual suddenly appeared Shirley Keeldar, the youthful heiress of Fieldhead, one of the largest estates in the countryside, came to occupy that long deserted mansion and to preside as its mistress. Vivacious and independent, she was soon a favorite of all her tenants and the village people. Caroline, her opposite in temperament, became Shirley's special friend and Robert, who rented his mill from Shirley, became a frequent visitor at Fieldhead, where Shirley cajoled him into talking with her about his political views and labor problems and readily gave her own ideas. When Caroline was present on these occasions, she withdrew shyly from the conversation and watched painfully the growing color in Shirley's cheeks as she talked and the amusement in Robert's eyes.

Despairing of gaining Robert's love and refusing to tell her feelings to anyone, Caroline attempted to forget herself by devoting long hours to charity work. In this work she followed the lead of a saintly old maid, Miss Ainley, and determined to prepare to be just such an old maid herself.

Meanwhile, Robert had set up new machinery in his mill, and the unrest in surrounding villages continued. Shirley generously poured out her money to the poor in an attempt to ease the results of unemployment. The tension mounted, however, and one summer night a band of men crashed through the mill gates and attempted to enter the mill itself. Robert, having received word of their plan, was ready with men inside to defend his mill. Gunfire followed, watched from a hilltop by Shirley and trembling Caroline, who had been aroused from bed by the commotion. Robert successfully turned back the rioters and for the remainder of the summer spent most of his time tracking down the mob leaders in the large towns of England.

Caroline's attempts to occupy herself with charity work failed. When her growing despair contributed to a physical breakdown, she could only lie in bed, feverish and unable to eat. Robert, away in London, knew nothing of her condition. Possibly she would have died if a singular revelation had not occurred. Mrs. Pryor, Shirley's governess, a retiring woman who had in her faltering way expressed much fondness for Caroline, nursed the invalid constantly during her illness. One night she confided that she was Caroline's own mother, having given her up as a child because Caroline's beauty had made her fear that she would grow up to be like her errant father. With someone to love her, Caroline slowly recovered.

During Caroline's illness, Shirley's aunt and uncle, the Sympons, arrived for a visit. Solicitous to find a distinguished and wealthy husband for their niece, they suggested and encouraged several likely candidates. One such eligible, Sir Philip Nunnely, seemed on the verge of success, but he was finally rejected by Shirley, who admired but did not love him. Robert Moore appeared one evening and proposed suddenly, only to have Shirley's frank and passionate outburst of rejection prove to him that he had only been fascinated by her and that she was keenly aware of the fact.

In the background of these attempts at matchmaking, a quiet, intelligent figure smoldered and outwardly behaved coolly to Shirley—Louis Moore, Shirley's former tutor, now the tutor to the Sympons' son. Gradually, apparently casual meetings in the schoolroom began to break through the barrier between Shirley and Louis. Shirley scorned his pride because of his low situation, he, in turn, showed that he could master her willful independence and yet not crush her spirit. At last the two, in spite of the Sympons' outrage, set a date for their wedding.

Robert, in the meantime, had been shot and badly wounded while pursuing the leaders of the rioters. During his slow recovery he was nursed in the home of a friend, and visitors were forbidden him. Through the scheming of one of the children in the household, however, Caroline managed to see him in secret several times, and at last Robert awakened to her love for him and discovered the strength of his own love for her. A double wedding was planned at Bnairfield church

SHORT STORIES OF KATHERINE MANSFIELD

Type of work Short stories

Author Katherine Mansfield (Kathleen Mansfield Beauchamp 1888-1923)

First published In a German Pension, 1911 Prelude 1918 Je ne parle pas français, 1920, Bliss and Other Stories, 1920, The Garden Party and Other Stories 1922, The Doves Nest and Other Stories, 1923 Something Childish and Other Stories, 1924, The Aloe, 1930

Katherine Mansfield, one of the great est of modern short story writers, began writing at an early age. Born in New Zealand, Miss Mansfield went to England in 1903 and in 1911, when she was twenty-three, published her first volume of stories, In a German Pension, a series of sketches based on her experiences in Germany. These stories, often sharply and crisply satirical, portray many of the Germans as a gross people, preoccupied with mountains of food and long detailed discussions of their digestive processes, but covering their grossness and vulgarity with a thick coating of sentimental allegiance to the spirit or the soul. With acid sharpness, Miss Mansfield's stories demonstrate this combination of vulgarity and sentimentality. They also deride the Germans for other qualities: the lechery of the old man after he has protected a young English girl, cringing respect for the silent man with a title, the modern woman with her talk of art who completely neglects her children.

Although these stories are sensitive and moving portraits of people and their society, they show that Miss Mansfield had not yet found her own style. Crisply and economically told, they are not always completely realized in their effects, however, and often without that sharply focused point of view that this writer later developed. Despite these early shortcomings her criticisms of Germany were so telling that when war broke out in 1914 she was urged to have the stories reprinted by another publisher, the first having gone bankrupt. But she refused to take advantage of the 1914 attitude toward Germans, and the volume remained out of print until after her death.

Katherine Mansfield's next published story, Prelude, is set in New Zealand, it centers around a family called "Burnell," a set of characters she also used in a number of later stories which, like Prelude, are undoubtedly autobiographical to some extent. The Burnell family consists of three young daughters (one of them, Kezia, withdrawn and sensitive, one prissy and domineering, one slow and clumsy), their sensitive mother who hated bearing children, their energetic and successful father, their competent grandmother, their pretty maiden aunt who is lonely and waiting for a man who never comes. Prelude is a series of scenes showing the interactions of these characters on one another against a domestic background. The scenes are given in turn from the point of view of Kezia, the mother, and Beryl, the lonely spinster aunt. Although the work is full of perceptive passages, sensitive descriptions of nature and of flowers, and a warm understanding of people, the device of the multiple point of view never really unifies the story. Prelude remains a series of brilliant but scattered perceptions.

Miss Mansfield's talent had genuinely developed by the time she published the volume called Bliss and Other Stories in 1920. Her range of subjects had become wider: marriage, people alone in London and trying to make their way in a difficult world, family relationships, little ironic episodes. And her technique had become much surer and more effective. The title story of the volume is an effective tale of a modern woman, sensitive and with drawn, married to a vital and energetic man. The woman finds herself attracted, as she has never been to her husband, to a mysterious and enigmatic Miss Fulton. While giving a dinner party, with Miss Fulton present, the woman suddenly realizes that this attraction, this happiness she feels is really sexual and really directed toward her husband. She is anxious for her guests to leave so that she may begin a new and deeper relationship with him. As the guests are leaving, she accidentally catches a glimpse of her husband in a situation of familiarity with Miss Fulton and the young wife's new found happiness is shattered.

Other stories, such as "The Dill Pickle," deal with shifting relationships among people—the realization that people change and cannot find in others, although they try to desperately, the happiness and comfort they once did. Little details and mannerisms, such as the calculated and merciless way in which the young man peels the orange in "The Dill Pickle," indicate a great deal about human character, indicate why, in this story, the young woman cannot return to him even though he is, in other ways, enormously attractive. Miss Mansfield, interested in shifting emotions, attempted to probe the truth of her characters' feelings. Yet this was not her sole concern. Many of her stories, such as "Pictures," exist in a wider social context. In "Pictures," an aging and bosomy singer is about to be evicted from her grimy Bloomsbury flat because she has not paid the rent. Miss Mansfield follows her through degrading attempts to find any sort of work—movies, stage, extra work. These futile attempts are balanced against her pathetic dreams of glory or of a handsome knight coming to save her. The story ends when she, with false hilarity, agrees to go home with a middle-aged businessman whom she meets in a restaurant. In these stories the writer probes the truths of experience on several different levels of life not limited by social class or interest in the arts or the life of leisure.

Her next volume, The Garden Party and Other Stories, contains a number of Katherine Mansfield's best known works. Stories such as "The Garden Party" and "Her First Ball" recapture a great deal of a young girl's experience on entering the social world. In "Her First Ball," Miss Mansfield shows that in the midst of wonder and pleasure comes an awareness of age and the realization that no human experience lasts, yet the feeling of excitement is genuine and beautifully conveyed. The writer was able, at her best, fully to use her style, her crisp language, as part of what she wanted to say. This volume also has a number of stories dealing with marriage and the difficulties of preserving a relationship between two individuals. These difficulties appear intensified in the rapidly changing social world just after World War I. For example, in "Marriage à la Mode," the wife has developed an interest in new forms of art, formed friendships with effeminate young poets, and cultivated a flippant attitude toward all the sanctities of pre-war life, while the husband has remained his old stolid, virtuous self. The marriage is doomed. Miss Mansfield, in this story, satirizes the wife's selfishness and her lack of concern for others.

The total body of Miss Mansfield's work does not place her, however, on the side of Victorian virtue. In other stories she satirizes the domestic tyrant who, representing old-fashioned virtues, preys on his daughters, or she ridicules the successful and virtuous prude who has neither time nor insight to observe what is going on around him. In other words, Miss Mansfield's stories attempt to describe the truth of the human experience and to praise honesty, directness, fidelity to that truth and to that concern. The person who, aware of his emotions, is faithful to them and concerned with the emotions of others, is the character who wins Miss Mansfield's sympathy. This concern, this sensitivity, may look ridiculous to the standards of the greater out side world, as the relationship in "Mr and Mrs Dove" appears ridiculous, but its depth and interior meaning are what matter. The people Miss Mansfield castigates are, like those in In a German Pension, the brutal, the callous, the pretentious, the falsely sentimental, the unconcerned.

In getting at her kind of emotional truth, Miss Mansfield became more and more proficient. In her later stories, such as "The Doll's House," which deals with the Burnell family in New Zealand, she learned to control material and insight for disciplined artistic effect. She also, in several of the unfinished stories published in The Doves' Nest and Other Stories, began to use the technique of the stream of consciousness as a means to probe more deeply into issues involved in the experiences of her characters. Yet she retained the ability to use the small, telling detail, the casual conversation, or the intimate mannerism, as a way of displaying more profound and important truths.

A meticulous craftsman and a writer committed to a deep sense of moral honesty, Miss Mansfield has been deservedly praised as one of the leading writers of short stories in this century. She has also, in both technique and theme, had an enormous influence on a generation of writers attempting to see things clearly and record them with fidelity, clarity, and insight.

SHORT STORIES OF O HENRY

Type of work Short stories

Author O Henry (William Sydney Porter, 1862-1910)

First published 1904-1917

The once inflated fame of O Henry is no more. Today he is not only belittled by most critics of the short story but also practically ignored by writers on American literature in general. The Literary History of the United States (1946) mentions him twice, once as a user of slang and once as a writer popular in the U.S.S.R. The Literature of the American People (1951) ignores him altogether. Even Jay B. Hubbell's The South in American Literature, 1607-1900 (1954) devotes less than two pages to him as a Southern writer and offers him only a sentence or two of subdued praise. Yet he continues to be widely read, as is clearly suggested by the inclusion of The Best Short Stories of O Henry (1945) in the Modern Library, the reissue of The Complete Works of O Henry in two volumes (1953), and the publication of The Pocket Book of O Henry Stories (1956). The last collection went into a second printing within a month.

The ingredients which appeal most in the typical O Henry short story are usually a blend of humor and sentiment or sentimentality. There is no depth of characterization; O Henry specializes in easily recognizable types. The story is neatly put together and it moves rapidly. The style is breezy and slangy. Though the vocabulary may include a number of words unfamiliar to the reader of news papers and pulp magazines (in which most of O Henry's stories first appeared), there is enough of the American vernacular to sustain the story on a colloquial level. The unwary reader, in fact, may overlook the many humorous paraphrases from Shakespeare and other famous authors. The story characters belong either to the great American middle class or to a less exalted level of society. The author is obviously the friend of the "little man" and the enemy of those who would exploit him. There is a plentiful display of "local color," especially in the many stories of New York life. And there is a trick or surprise ending, often totally unexpected and illogical, but usually light and amusing. Though the surprise ending may be sentimental or even pathetic, it is never really tragic.

O Henry has been compared to several of his predecessors and contemporaries from whom he may have learned something about story writing, among them Bret Harte, Maupassant, Mark Twain, and Frank Stockton. Many of the early stories are filled with the easy sentimentality of Bret Harte as well as Harte's "editorial" remarks about his characters. Maupassant's irony is often imitated, but the master's mordancy is missing, as well as his prevailingly serious view of life. O Henry uses slang even more than Twain did, but where Twain's is integral, O Henry's is gratuitous and frequently spoils what might have been some of his best effects. O Henry is often credited with having introduced the trick ending into the short story, but Frank Stockton had already gained popularity with this type of ending several years before O Henry's first story was published. Stockton's most famous story—"The Lady or the Tiger?"—had not even a trick ending, it had none at all, the reader being left to supply one for himself. The reader's choice ending of O Henry's "Thumble, Thumble" is reminiscent of Stockton, who is specifically named as a model at the beginning of the story.

These facts show that O Henry was, then, not so much an originator as a clever practitioner. Far more a craftsman than an artist, he was a close observer of the surfaces of life and character. In spite of his exaggerations and whimsicality, he remains an effective local colorist in his presentation of life in Bagdad on the Subway, as he called New York, in the first decade of the century. To read his stories of the metropolis is to enter in imagination a bygone era of gaslights, horse drawn hacks, and rococo decor that was the delight of the rich and the en-vicious dream of shopgirls and ill paid clerks or sweatshop workers.

Reading "The Furnished Room" in The Four Million (1906), one senses how it felt a half century ago to be lonely in a gaslit furnished room filled with battered furniture and the scattered, forgotten mementos of former lodgers. One hears the distant, disquieting noises from other rooms and breathes the familiar odors of the dilapidated lodging house. In O Henry's stories of the metropolis one joins the strollers in Central Park or on Fifth Avenue, listens to tales told by drinkers in unobtrusive bars, inhales the garlic rich atmosphere of a small Italian restaurant, or dines on lobster at fabulous Delmonico's.

Among the most famous of O Henry's New York stories are "The Gift of the Magi" which, though somewhat hackneyed by many reprintings and a filmed version, still has its sentimental appeal, "The Cop and the Anthem," in which Soapy, after vainly trying to get himself jailed for the cold winter, hears church music and vows to reform, only to end with a three month sentence for vagrancy, "The Romance of a Busy Broker," with the unbelievable revelation at the end that Harvey Maxwell has erred in proposing to his stenographer, because he has forgotten he married her the evening before, and "The Last Leaf," with its sentimental close that ironically counterbalances the saving of a young girl's life with the death of the kindly old artist who saved it.

Because O Henry attained his fame while living in New York and because it is the scene of many of his stories, modern readers may forget that the author, like so many of the city dwellers he wrote about, was not a native. Born in North Carolina, he grew to manhood there. He lived for several years in Texas, and he stayed in Honduras for some months after having fled the United States to escape arrest for misappropriating funds from an Austin, Texas, bank. His life in the South, the Southwest, and Central America provided the backgrounds for numerous stories

The more than twenty stories laid in the Southern states or employing distinctly Southern characters include several of his best "A Municipal Report" is an excellent story of Nashville, Tennessee, written to answer an offhand comment by the novelist Frank Norris that Nashville was not a 'story' city. The despicable Major Caswell of "A Municipal Report" is one of O Henry's most vividly drawn characters, but he is matched by the very different Major Talbot of "The Duplicity of Hargraves," who romantically personifies the ante bellum aristocrats of the columned mansions and great cotton plantations in the storied Old South. The faithfulness of ex-slaves to their former owners is shown in the devotion of Uncle Caesar to Mrs. Caswell in "A Municipal Report," the solicitude of Uncle Bushrod for the honor of the Weymouth family in "The Guardian of the Accolade." Other Southern stories are "The Whirligig of Life" (Tennessee), "The Rose of Dixie" (Georgia), "Cherchez la Femme" (New Orleans), "A Blackjack Bargainer" (North Carolina), and perhaps the funniest of O Henry's stories, "The Ransom of Red Chief" (Alabama).

O Henry's Texas years furnished him with both characters and atmosphere which he used for narrative purposes in Heart of the West (1907) and in scattered stories in other volumes. The lead ing character of "The Reformation of Calliope" delights in shooting rampages when drunk, like many a bad man in Western movies. The Cisco Kid of "The Caballero's Way" is said to have been modeled after the notorious Texas killer, John Wesley Hardin. "The Passing of Black Eagle" is the story of another Texas desperado. "The Pimiento Pancakes" and "The Hiding of Black Bill" utilize O Henry's knowledge of ranch life. It should be added, however, that the ludicrously polysyllabic language used by some of the characters in these Texas stories bears little relation to that ever used by any rancher or cowboy; O Henry included

For the loosely related series of stories in his first volume Cabbages and Kings (1904) and a few later stories, O Henry drew upon his stay in Honduras and possibly upon tales he heard from the train robber Al Jennings and other friends he met there. Though some of these stories have comic opera overtones, they probably reveal the same closely observed details of actual life that were later to appear in the New York stories.

O Henry's life was marked by many vicissitudes, but he retained almost to the end a zest for living and a genuine love of people. Because of this and because his writing so frequently shows a humorous virtuosity of language and a facile playing upon the emotions of his readers, he seems likely to survive, even without benefit of criticism, for many years to come.

A SHROPSHIRE LAD

Type of work Poems

Author A. E. Housman (1859-1936)

First published 1896

In 1896, the high point of what has been variously called "the yellow 'nineties" and "the Beardsley period," Victorian poetry was at a low ebb. Tennyson and Browning were both dead, Swinburne had long since retired to Putney. The Pre-Raphaelite movement had subsided. Hardy was still known only as a novelist. The minor poets seemed stereotyped into two groups: those who, like

A SHROPSHIRE LAD by A. E. Housman from COMPLETE POEMS. Excerpts reprinted by permission of the authorized publishers Henry Holt & Co. Inc. Copyright, 1940-1959 by Henry Holt & Co. Inc.

Wilde, produced "Swinburne and water" and those who wrote frail imitations of the French of Paul Verlaine. The only new and original talent was that of Kipling, who had already published his two most famous volumes. But in spite of Kipling's vigor, the spirit of the age was best represented by The Yellow Book and Beardsley's illustrations for The Rape of the Lock. It was in this atmosphere of "purple patches and fine phrases" that there appeared A Shropshire Lad, a slender volume containing sixty three short poems—some only eight lines long—written by the Professor of Latin at University College, London.

Twenty six years later, in a short preface to his second volume, Last Poems, Housman gave some hint of the circumstances attending the composition of A Shropshire Lad. He said that most of the poems had been written "in the early months of 1895" and under a "continuous excitement." Exactly what he meant by this last phrase has never been quite clear, indeed his biography, apparently so uneventful, presents some little mystery. Oddly enough for a man who was to become one of the greatest Latinists in the English speaking world, he did not take honors in his final examinations at Oxford, and as a result he apparently went through a period of depression. But the cause of the "continuous excitement" that resulted in A Shropshire Lad remains to be satisfactorily explained.

The reader coming upon the poetry of Housman for the first time will be immediately aware of its extremely narrow range. The poet limited himself to but one theme—the brevity and tragedy of life and the inevitability of death. Spring and youth are beautiful, but they pass quickly, just as the blossoms "stream from the hawthorn on the wind away." Further, a man must expect neither happiness nor justice during the brief span allotted to him, life is cruel and filled with injustice. But at least we know that our misfortunes are the common lot of mankind, for, as he wrote in Last Poems,

The troubles of our proud and angry dust
Are from eternity and shall not fail Bear them we can and if we can we must Shoulder the sky, my lad and drink
your ale

Man has no one but himself to depend on, his own strength must see him through his troubles. He does not have even the hope of immortality—as Horace said, in the ode that Housman translated, 'pulvis et umbra sumus—we are dust and dreams.' But the grave, when finally won to, brings peace. "Turn safe to rest, no dreams, no waking."

The influence of Housman's classical studies upon his own poetry is difficult to measure, and yet it is apparent. Years devoted to the careful editing of texts gave him, if nothing else, a feeling for precise workmanship, the terseness of the Latin language contributed to the characteristic brevity of his poems. Indeed, there is much that might be called "Roman" about his poetry—it could even be claimed that the familiar lines of Catullus

Soles occidere et redire possunt
Nobis cum semel occidit brevis lux,
Nox est perpetua una dormienda,

(Suns may rise and set again
For us when our short light
Has set, remains no more than sleep
Through one perpetual night.)

sum up most of what he had to say. Also, it has been observed that the aspect of Roman stoicism which has remained in the imagination of subsequent centuries is the "quality of emotional self restraint." It is this quality that is apparent in Housman's work and that marks it off sharply from the mass of Victorian poetry. There has been 'paganism' enough in some of the late nineteenth century poets, but it took the form either of the wild riot of Maenads, Bassarids, and other mythological fauna so dear to Swinburne or of the soft Epicureanism of FitzGerald's translation of Omar Khayyám. A paganism deriving from Roman stoicism and based on restraint, on acceptance of the inevitable tragedy of life, on the idea that "life is never worth preserving at the cost of dishonor," was something quite different. And it should be remembered that patriotism, expressed in some of these poems, was one of the pagan virtues.

Housman's tragic view of life, his preoccupation with death (particularly with death by hanging) have been criticized by some as artificial. It did not seem plausible that a man whose own existence was so secure could genuinely have viewed life in such grim fashion. But Housman tried to make his readers aware that the tragedies of which we wrote were "not mine, but man's." He was also criticized for cultivating certain mannerisms of language. It is, for example, true that the unfortunate lines describing the football game

The goal stands up, the keeper
Stands up to keep the goal, sound like an unconscious parody of his own style. But what great poet has not, at least once, unwittingly parodied himself?

Although Housman declared that "the most poetical of all poets is Blake," he elsewhere stated that the great influences on his own work had been Shakespeare's songs, the Border ballads, and the poems of Heine. Poem VIII in A Shropshire Lad shows how he used ballad material in Last Poems, the second stanza of "Sinners' Rue" is a translation of Heine's "Am Kreuzweg wird begraben." But the important effect of the three influences was that of compression. He himself felt that "poetry is not the thing said but a way of saying it," and that "to transfuse emotion is the peculiar function of poetry." His own taste was romantic; he derived his critical judgments from Arnold, whose dislike for eighteenth century poetry he shared. Yet the opinions he expressed in his lecture, "The Name and Nature of Poetry" (1933), are sometimes curiously at variance with his practice.

As late as 1922 it was still possible for Holbrook Jackson to list Housman among the minor poets of the 1890's. But today his reputation, resting chiefly on the one hundred and four short poems in his first two volumes, is higher than that of any English poet between the Victorians Tennyson and Browning and the moderns Yeats and Eliot.

THE SICKNESS UNTO DEATH

Type of work Philosophical treatise
Author Søren Kierkegaard (1813-1855)
First published 1849

Kierkegaard gave The Sickness Unto Death a subtitle, "A Christian Psychological Exposition for Edification and Awakening," and he used the pseudonym "Anti-Climacus" when it appeared. Walter Lowrie, in an introduction to his translation of this work, calls The Sickness Unto Death "one of the most important productions of that most productive period" of Kierkegaard's life. The subtitle and the pseudonym reflect not the wit and eccentricity of a pedant, but the conscience and intellect of a modest but nevertheless self-assured philosopher in the service of God. What is the "sickness unto death" which Kierkegaard reveals in his psychological exposition in so forceful a manner that the work has impressed the critics and affected the course of modern philosophical thought? It is the sickness of a self that wills to tear itself away from the Power which constituted it.

According to Kierkegaard, man is in despair, which he may not recognize, because he is always critically "sick unto death." For a spirit in such a condition, death is no escape; the sickness is "unto death" precisely because it is a despairful longing for death, not for extinction alone, but for the experience of not being the self that one is. It is as if man were longing for the experience of death—an impossible experience because death, considered as death, is the end of all experience. The self is not content to be itself, it is not content to relate itself to God, it cannot be satisfied with extinction—the result is, in Kierkegaard's view, "the sickness unto death."

Another way of understanding Kierkegaard's account of this dreadful malady of the spirit is through a consideration of what he means by health. Kierkegaard maintains that "to have a self, to be a self, is the greatest concession made to man, but at the same time it is eternity's demand upon him." Yet man's self is a relation between the infinite and the finite, the temporal and the eternal, freedom and necessity—and as a relation, a synthesis, the self cannot exist before the synthesis is achieved. For that reason, there is some sense in which, as Kierkegaard claims at the outset, "man is not yet a self." He has not achieved a synthesis with God, with the Power which constituted him. Sickness is this alienation, health is the elimination of despair, achieved when the self, recognizing its dependence on the Power which constituted it, wills to be itself.

To use language other than Kierkegaard's in the attempt to understand the central thesis upon which the value of the book depends, we can say that Kierkegaard is arguing that man, considered not as an animal but as a spirit, can realize himself only by being willing to admit that he becomes something worthy of the name "self" when he accepts the whole of his condition. This acceptance of limitations, of opposing powers, even of God's eminence, is not resignation, it is a willingness to live "no matter what," to be what one is in the world as it is.

It is tempting to make Kierkegaard's thesis broader than it is, to argue that the great Danish philosopher has more sense than to suppose that significant action is possible only by relating the self to God. But the term "God" is not a convenient symbol for power, for Kierkegaard God is the Power which relates itself to every spirit and makes possible, through the self's acknowledgment of that relation, the existence of every self.

Atheistic Existentialists have found much that is helpful to them in Kierkegaard, but only by eliminating all references to God. Philosophers like Jean Paul Sartre are interested in arguing that in man "existence precedes essence," that only through action can man "make himself" into some particular self. "Authentic" existence is not given to a man, but he can create himself by the life he chooses and lives. For Kierkegaard also, health of the spirit is possible whenever man chooses to be himself—but only because to be himself man must relate himself to God, while for Sartre health of the spirit consists not in relating oneself to God, but in recognizing one's freedom from all such dependent relations. Sartre writes of the nausea and anguish which grip a man when he realizes his creative responsibility, but for Kierkegaard anguish is not the result of realizing one's own creative responsibility—it is the condition of a self which is not yet a self, of a man who tries to escape from God and, consequently, from himself.

The despair which is the sickness unto death may take any one of three forms: it may be the despair of not being conscious of having a self, it may be the despair of not willing to be oneself, or it may be the despair of willing to be oneself.

If a man is in despair, how can he fail to be conscious of it? Kierkegaard asserts that a man who is primarily sensuous can be in despair without being conscious of his condition. Such a man "lives in the sensuous categories agreeable/disagreeable, and says goodbye to truth." A person who is sensuously happy will resist any attempt to take his happiness from him, he refuses to acknowledge the despair which is deep within him. This form of despair, unconscious despair, is the most common. Since the sickness of not being willing to be oneself before God is sinful, it is important that all who are in the anguish of dread come to be conscious of that dread as the first step toward creating a self which is a synthesis. Kierkegaard defines sin as follows: "Sin is this before God, or with the conception of God, to be in despair at not willing to be oneself, or in despair at willing to be oneself." Both kinds of despair are eliminated, of course, by being willing, before God, to be oneself.

The formula which enables a man to escape the sin, the offense, of dread is, at the same time, a definition of faith. "By relating itself to its own self and by willing to be itself, the self is grounded transparently in the Power which constituted it." The opposite of sin, according to Kierkegaard, is not virtue, but faith.

In order to emphasize his conviction that the opposition of faith to sin is a Christian concept which is fundamental to all ethical concepts, Kierkegaard stresses the importance of the qualifying phrase "before God." Man comes to have a reality, a self, "by existing directly in the sight of God," and because of this, man's sin—his not willing to be himself before God—concerns God. Kierkegaard admits that the notion of man's being invited to exist before God and of God's being concerned for man is unacceptable to many persons because it is both strange and demanding. Just as it would be puzzling and disturbing if an emperor were to invite a peasant to be his son-in-law, so it is puzzling and disturbing to suppose that God takes enough interest in each man to wish to have that man come to exist before him by willing to be himself before God. Yet this is the Christian idea, Kierkegaard insists, and it is an idea which illuminates the entire area of ethical being and action.

The despair at not willing to be oneself is called the despair of weakness, and the despair of willing to be oneself is called the despair of defiance. Such forms of despair result from a concern with self as if the self could exist by itself; this delusion is made possible by an absorption in matters that do not properly concern the spirit—matters of business or pleasure.

The sin of despair may give rise to new sins, to a continuation of sin. One may despair over one's sin, so concentrating attention upon it as to make impossible the emergence of faith, or one may despair of being forgiven. In the latter case, the sinner chooses, in weakness, to be a sinner, for he rejects the forgiveness which would enable him to be himself before God. Finally, one may commit the sin of abandoning Christianity, of declaring it to be false. This sin is "offensive warfare," according to Kierkegaard, and it is a sin against the Holy Ghost.

Kierkegaard's conception of God is often difficult to grasp because he explains the relations between God and man in a dialectical way, claiming that one understands either only by appreciating the subtle effects that the actions and attitude of either have on each other and on the emergence of man's spiritual self. An interesting feature of his account is his conception of God as a being who "can do no other" than make the possibility of man's offense a part of man's condition. Dread must be possible for man because God is concerned to allow man the possibility of faith.

The influence of Kierkegaard in modern philosophy can be explained, paradoxically, by reference to modern man's loss of faith. A dissatisfaction with unexamined creeds quickly leads to the rejection of the creeds. Man is then in anguish over the void which he finds before him, and the writers tell of "waste lands" and "lost generations." At such a time the Existentialists are able to catch men's interest by declaring that through action man creates his self; the Christian Existentialist turns his attention to God as the factor to which man must be related in order to be a self, while the atheistic Existentialist makes virtues out of lucidity, courage, and action. Of the Christian Existentialists, none has been more original and persuasive than Kierkegaard

THE SIEGE OF RHODES

Type of work Drama

Author Sir William Davenant (1606-1668)

Type of plot Historical romance

Time of plot 1522

Locale The fortress at Rhodes and the nearby coast of Caria

First presented 1656

Principal characters

SOLYMAN II, THE MAGNIFICENT, Sultan of the Ottoman Empire, 1520-1566

PYRRHUS the general in charge of the Persian army before the arrival of Solyman

VILLERIUS, PHILIP VILLIERS DE L'ISLE ADAM commander of the fortress at Rhodes

ALPHONSO, a Sicilian duke

IANTHE, Alphonso's wife

ROXOLANA Solyman's wife

Critique

William Davenant, not yet knighted at the time he wrote and produced this "entertainment" based on the historic siege of Rhodes, was named poet laureate of England in 1638. When he became "governor" of a group of actors, Cromwell allowed him certain theatrical liberties during the time the theaters were "closed." He is credited with adapting the French neoclassicists' favorite theme, love and honor, for the English stage. He was also the first to bring actresses to the stage in England. The play is in two parts, the first an elaborate musical spectacle, the second a more fully developed drama with five acts and many scenes. The historical basis for the plot concerns the attempt of the Ottoman Empire to control a passageway to Egypt by destroying the fortress at Rhodes. An unsuccessful assault on the part of Solyman led to his successful siege, which caused Philip Villiers de L'Isle Adam to surrender to the lenient terms of the admiring Turk. The other characters, the women in particular, are inventions, used to exploit the honor-in-love theme in contrast to that presenting love of battle.

The Story

In the fortress at Rhodes, seven bastions were maintained by eight Christian nations as united in opposition to the Turks as were the earlier Crusaders. Villierius, a Knight of St. John in supreme command of those forces, was successfully defending the fort from Solyman's assault. Alphonso, the most vigorous among those defending the Cross from the Crescent, considered this battle Christendom's last stand against the infidel. Ianthe, his bride of but a few months, first aided the war effort by sacrificing her jewels to buy arms, and then decided to become one of history's termagants, or Amazons, and fight by the side of her husband. In her attempt to join him, she was captured by the Turks. Two days later she was released by order of the sultan as a mark of respect to her courage and virtue.

In the battle that followed, Alphonso, mad with jealousy because he believed that his wife had been unfaithful to him with the Turkish ruler, fought with the fierceness of many men. Roxolana, Solyman's wife, also became jealous, so highly was Ianthe praised by her husband. The battle was fought so ferociously, especially by the English, that the infidels were repulsed, forcing the sultan to resort to siege tactics. Honor had been preserved in love and battle by participants on the two sides of the fort.

Famine soon became a real threat to the beleaguered garrison. While the leaders debated strategy, the populace demanded that Ianthe sue for peace. Alphonso, recovered from his jealousy, refused to allow Ianthe to be used as a hostage, but she decided otherwise in order to save her husband and the garrison from slow starvation, stole secretly away to the sultan's camp. Further misunderstanding ensued when Roxolana learned that Ianthe was in the sultan's tent. In her jealousy she sent a note to the aggrieved warrior husband, word which caused the entire garrison to deplore the sacrifice of virtuous Ianthe to the supposed lust of Solyman. Ianthe's display of virtue, however, won over the sultana, who was fearful only that her son would not succeed to the throne. Solyman declared that his intentions were always honorable, in love as well as war.

As the palace of Villenus was set on fire at the height of the siege, a last abortive attack was made by the Christians in order to rescue Ianthe. The two young lovers were secretly united by Roxolana. Her husband, moved as much by his wife's compassion for the young couple as by their own virtue and devotion, sent both back to Rhodes, leaving the terms of the surrender entirely to Ianthe's discretion. History has it that a general amnesty ensued and that all the Knights of St. John were allowed free egress from Rhodes.

THE SILENT WOMAN

Type of work Drama

Author Ben Jonson (1573? 1637)

Type of plot Satirical comedy

Time of plot Early seventeenth century

Locale London

First presented 1609

Principal characters

MOROSE, a gentleman who loves no noise

SIR DAUPHINE EUGENIE, his nephew

NED CLERIMONT, one of Sir Dauphine's friends

TRUEWITT, another friend

SIR JOHN DAW, a ridiculous knight

SIR AMOROUS LA FOOLE, another silly knight

CUTBEARD, a barber

CAPTAIN OTTER, a heavy drinker

MISTRESS OTTER, his wife

MISTRESS EPICENE, supposed the Silent Woman

Critique

On the original title page this work was called Epicene, or The Silent Woman, however, in Jonson's own time and since, it has been better known by its subtitle. The play is one of Jonson's superbly constructed masterpieces. John Dryden chose it as a perfect example of English drama and devoted a long passage of his Essay of Dramatic Poesy to a critical examination of its merits. Before

The Silent Woman, the settings of Jonson's plays were in Italy, in unspecified places, or in a mythical land of nowhere. With this play the dramatist settled on his native land as the setting for his comedies. It is, therefore, a forerunner of the great play, The Alchemist, of the second version of Every Man in His Humour, and of Bartholomew Fair, another magnificent prose comedy. The laughter in The Silent Woman is less savage than the laughter frequently characteristic of Jonsonian comedy

The Story

Clerimont and Truewit, young men about town, met and discussed various matters, including the relative merits of natural beauty and the use of cosmetics. Shifting the topic to their friend Sir Dauphine Eugenie, they wondered how he was able to put up with his uncle Morose, an eccentric character who could abide no noise except the sound of his own voice. Clerimont's page amused them with accounts of various noisy pranks played on the ridiculous old man. Sir Dauphine joined them and complained that his uncle blamed all the pranks on him and his friends and threatened to marry and leave his fortune to his new wife instead of to his nephew. Morose had heard of a soft voiced woman, extremely frugal of speech and had negotiated with his silent barber, Cutbeard, to arrange a meeting, possibly even a marriage.

Truewit, amazed at hearing of a silent barber and a silent woman, was struck with a sudden inspiration and excused himself. After Truewit's departure on his undisclosed mission, Sir Amorous La Foole arrived to invite the gentlemen to a feast at the home of his kinswoman, Mistress Otter. The guests were to include the silent Mistress Epicoene, three collegiate ladies, Lady Haughty, Lady Centaur, and Mistress Mavis, and Sir John Daw. Sir Dauphine and Clerimont bracketed Sir John and Sir Amorous as ridiculous targets for comedy.

Morose was instructing his servant Mute to use only sign language, or in extreme emergencies to speak through a tube, when they were interrupted by a loud blast from a post horn. Mute went to the door and returned, followed by Truewit, carrying a post horn and a halter. Morose and Mute were overwhelmed by a volley of words and intimidated by a dagger when they attempted to leave the room. Truewit suggested that Morose choose some way of self destruction other than marriage and offered him the halter to hang himself. After another voluble outpouring he left, but added the final torture of another blast from his horn. When Cutbeard arrived, he found Morose in such a state that he had to be put to bed.

In the company of Mistress Epicoene, Sir Dauphine and Clerimont encouraged the fantastic knight Sir John Daw to quote and explain his own poetry, to show off his copious but confused mass of knowledge, and to boast of his romantic prowess. They were interrupted by Truewit, returning with his horn. Sir Dauphine was greatly disturbed at the account of the prank, which Truewit assured him would break off the intended marriage, he told Truewit that the marriage was his own plot abetted by his confederates, Cutbeard and Mistress Epicoene. Cutbeard hastened in to announce that Morose, furious with Truewit and certain that Sir Dauphine had sent him to break off the match, had determined to marry immediately. Cutbeard conducted Mistress Epicoene away, and the young gentlemen commented on her apparent desertion of her gallant, Sir John. They encouraged him to indulge his melancholy.

Morose welcomed Cutbeard and Mistress Epicoene, who spoke so softly that she could hardly be heard. Cutbeard did all his speaking by signs only. Carried away with Mistress Epicoene's noiseless charm, Morose promised large rewards to the barber, reminding him to deliver his thanks silently, and sent him to find a soft voiced minister to perform the marriage ceremony. He gloated over his imminent marriage and his begetting of children to inherit his estate after he had cast out his impudent nephew.

When Cutbeard announced the results to Sir Dauphine and his friends, Truewit suggested that the whole of Sir Amorous' party be transported to Morose's house to celebrate the wedding with proper sound effects The young men left for the party The crowd gathered at the Otters' house for the party Clermont and Sir Dauphine stirred up trouble between Sir Amorous and Sir John Daw by making each believe that the other was putting a slight on him that Sir Amorous knew that Morose was taking Sir John's sweetheart from him, and that Sir John was taking Sir Amorous' guests to the wedding feast They suggested to Sir Amorous that he have his provisions carried to Morose's home, in the hope that the smell of the venison would attract some fiddlers and trumpeters on the way

Morose had the wedding ceremony performed by a parson who could hardly be heard because of a bad cold, he rewarded him handsomely, but a crashing cough angered him so that he demanded that part of the reward be returned Cutbeard suggested that making change would be difficult for the parson, but that he could cough out the rest, this suggestion silenced Morose, who dismissed the parson Immediately following the ceremony, Mistress Epicœne exhibited her voice in an outburst of shrewish scolding Reeling from this shock, Morose looked around to see Truewit entering with loud congratulations, shortly followed by the whole procession of noisy guests The collegiate ladies invited Mistress Epicœne to join their circle When they began to whisper confidentially, Morose had a gleam of hope which was immediately dashed by their loud criticisms of the lack of wedding festivities Clermont ushered in a host of musicians playing fortissimo, and Captain Otter followed with his drinking mugs and a group of drummers and trumpeters to sound for toasts Morose fled, groaning, to lock himself in the attic with a nest of nightcaps pulled over his ears The party continued noisily, enlivened by a quarrel between Captain Otter and his wife, she beat him until he howled repentance Morose returned with his sword to drive away the party, but, overcome by the clamor, he fled again, followed by Sir Dauphine, who endeavored to console him, and Truewit, who reminded him of his warning about the dangers of marriage Morose accepted Truewit's advice that he sue for a divorce

Continuing their pranks on Sir John and Sir Amorous, the young men reduced them into such a state of terror that they hid from each other At last each was persuaded to consent to be blindfolded and to accept indignities from his furious opponent Sir John was to receive five kicks from Sir Amorous and to surrender his sword, Sir Amorous was to surrender his sword, receive a blow on the mouth, and have his nose tweaked Sir Dauphine, impersonating each in turn, inflicted the indignities on the hoodwinked knights On Morose's return, Truewit showed him the swords and said that the quarrel had arisen over the bride's amorous favors Since Morose had not been able to face the noise in the law courts, Truewit promised to find legal help for the divorce proceedings Prodded by the young men, both Sir John and Sir Amorous boasted of successful love affairs with Mistress Epicœne

Truewit returned with Cutbeard disguised as a lawyer and Captain Otter disguised as a parson These engaged in a noisy dispute on secular and canon law concerning divorce proceedings

During the dispute, which was exquisite torture to Morose, Mistress Epicœne and the ladies entered screeching about her wrongs Every effort of Morose to free himself failed, even the accusation of adultery, for neither knight could claim intimacy after the marriage Sir Dauphine proposed to his uncle that if he could free him from his tormenting bride Morose would restore him as heir Morose eagerly accepted the terms and signed an agreement, at which Sir Dauphine pulled off Mistress Epicœne's wig to disclose that the supposed silent woman was a boy Sir John and Sir Amorous were discredited and discomfited, the collegiate ladies were covered with embarrassment at having exposed feminine mysteries to a mem ber of the opposite sex, and Morose retired to welcome silence

SIR CHARLES GRANDISON

Type of work Novel

Author Samuel Richardson (1689-1761)

Type of plot Epistolary novel of manners

Time of plot Eighteenth century

Locale England

First published 1753-1754

Principal characters

SIR CHARLES GRANDISON, an English baronet of great virtue

HARRIET BYRON, a virtuous English girl

LADY CLEMENTINA DELLA PORRETTA, a young Italian woman in love with Sir Charles

SIR HARGRAVE POLLEXFEN, a libertine in love with Harriet Byron

CHARLOTTE GRANDISON, Sir Charles' younger sister

LADY L., Sir Charles' older sister

EMILY JERVOIS, Sir Charles' ward

Critique

Like other English writers of fiction before him, Samuel Richardson felt it necessary to pretend that his novels were written to serve a didactic and moral purpose. In his three great novels—Pamela, Clarissa, and Sir Charles Grandison—virtue is rewarded and evil given its earned deserts. Richardson was fond of poetic justice. Because he had, in Pamela and Clarissa, written of men who were libertines, Richardson next attempted, he said, to adumbrate the character of a truly virtuous man. Sir Charles Grandison, like its predecessors, was written in the form of letters, for Richardson believed this the best method to use in presenting matters concerned with the emotions. Readers of the contemporary psychological novel will discern in Richardson's fiction an early ancestor of their favorite brand of fiction, the problems in a Richardson novel, including Sir Charles Grandison, are always psychological. Little happens, the important things being what the characters feel and think.

The Story

When Harriet Byron, a beautiful and virtuous English girl of modest expectations, left her aunt's home in rural North amptonshire to visit in eighteenth-century London, she left three men who loved her very much and various relatives who feared that the social life of the city might offer moral pitfalls unknown to a young and unsuspecting girl of virtue such as Harriet was. Having spent all her life in the country, living with an aunt after her parents' deaths, Harriet was excited at the prospect of the London visit. She went, too, with a happy heart, for she had no one, despite her many admirers, that she was interested in marrying; her suitors had not appealed strongly enough to her sentiments and mind in spite of their respectable, if ardent, attentions.

In London, where she had connections of a very respectable sort, Harriet was invited to many homes and social events, and she met many wealthy suitors. One of these was Sir Hargrave Pollexfen, who was determined not to accept a refusal. When told by Harriet that he did not suit her fancy, Sir Hargrave became enraged and vowed he would have both the girl and revenge. He laid a plot to abduct the girl from a masquerade ball and force her to marry him.

Sir Hargrave's plot almost succeeding, the experience was a horrible one for

Harriet Fortunately for the girl, however, Sir Charles Grandison heard her screams and rescued her from Sir Hargrave's clutches Sir Charles took Harriet to his country house, not far from London, where he and his sister invited Harriet to remain as a guest, almost a member of the family Sir Hargrave sent a challenge to Sir Charles, but the latter refused to fight a duel, insisting that no virtuous man, however brave and skilled, could become a duelist and retain his virtue

Harriet Byron soon fell in love with Sir Charles Grandison, who was, she realized, the very soul of honor and virtue, a man whose time was spent in carefully managing his own affairs and in doing good for others His father had died leaving his entire estate to Sir Charles, with no provision for the two daughters of the family When Sir Charles returned to England from the Continent to take over his estate, he treated his sisters with all consideration and devotion The oldest received his permission for her to marry Lord L., a suitor frowned upon by her father during his lifetime Sir Charles also began to improve his estates and their revenues so that he could set aside better marriage portions for both girls, something more than their father had been willing to do Sir Charles befriended everyone who would accept his kindnesses, and he behaved always wisely and with decorum Even those persons who were prepared to dislike him found themselves won over by his sympathetic, friendly, and yet dignified ways Even to his father's paramour, Mrs Oldham, he behaved magnanimously, persuading the rest of the family to view her as a misguided and miserable fellow human being

Many women were in love with Sir Charles, including Harriet Byron, but no one could ascertain whether he had any inclinations toward any particular woman But Harriet tried to hide her love for him and to subdue it, even though many of Sir Charles' friends and relatives, including his sisters, favored the match Sir Charles consistently referred to Harriet as a sister and behaved toward her with the same consideration he showed Charlotte Grandison and Lady L Finally it became known that two Italian women he had met in his travels had won some favor from him and had some claim to him and his affections One was Lady Olivia and the other was Lady Clementina della Porretta, whom he had met after saving her brother's life Lady Clementina's family did not favor a marriage between their daughter and a Protestant Englishman, but the young woman was so enamored of Sir Charles that his departure from Italy unhinged her reason Feeling a sense of responsibility to the lady and her family as the source of her misfortune, Sir Charles returned to Italy with English medical experts to try to effect a cure Harriet Byron, believing that he would prefer Lady Clementina to her, began to prepare herself for news of his marriage to the Italian woman

After she had recovered from her malady, however, Lady Clementina refused to marry Sir Charles, in spite of the fact that her family and he had been able to compromise over religious differences Lady Clementina, a devout Roman Catholic, feared that she would be tempted by her love for Sir Charles and his virtue to leave her faith to become a Protestant She asked to be free not to marry at all, since she could not marry him, her family hoped she would marry some other eligible man

While he was still in Italy, an attempt was made on Sir Charles' life, almost certainly at the instigation of Lady Olivia, who had previously struck at him with a poniard after he had repulsed her advances After this incident Sir Charles felt himself free to pay his court where he would He returned to England and immediately began his suit for Harriet Byron's hand, which he quickly won In the meantime his sister Charlotte had married Lord G., and Harriet helped that impetuous and willful young woman to learn to bear properly the dignity of matrimony Harriet's marriage to Sir Charles still faced some small obstacles She had to learn to accept her suitor in new ways, she was shocked, for example, when he kissed her on the mouth instead of on the cheek Harriet had to find a place in her heart, too, for Emily Jervois, Sir Charles' young ward The young girl loved her guardian, and Harriet, aware of the girl's feelings, had to help her accept Harriet's marriage to Sir Charles Another disturbance was caused by a former suitor of Harriet, Mr Greville, who tried, while emotionally deranged, to fight a duel with Sir Charles

Harriet Byron and Sir Charles were finally married A short time later they were visited by Lady Clementina, who had run away from her home in Italy because of her parents' insistence that she marry Through a compromise, Sir Charles managed to arrange a satisfactory agreement between the young woman and her family Word came, too, of Sir Hargrave Pollexfen's death Sir Hargrave, rescued in France by Sir Charles from the outraged relatives of a woman he had attempted to seduce, had discovered the evil of his ways Wishing to make amends for the abduction and the attempted forced marriage to Harriet, Sir Hargrave left his fortune to her and her husband Even the mother of Emily Jervois was influenced to become a respectable and virtuous woman Encouraged by Sir Charles' magnanimity and financial generosity, she interested herself in religion Although that unfortunate woman had once looked on Sir Charles as her enemy and she and Mr O'Hara, her one time paramour and second husband, had attempted to force Emily into a degrading marriage with a rascal who had promised to share with them the girl's fortune that Sir Charles held in trust, they mended their dissolute ways and became sober, worthy persons

SIR JOHN VAN OLDEN BARNAVELT

Type of work Drama

Authors John Fletcher (1579 1625) and Philip Massinger (1583 1640)

Type of plot Historical tragedy

Time of plot 1618 1619

Locale The Netherlands

First presented 1619

Principal characters

GRAVE MAURICE Prince of Orange

SIR JOHN VAN OLDEN BARNAVELT, Advocate of Holland and West Friesland

LEIDENBERGH, Secretary of the States of Utrecht

GROTIUS Pensionary of Rotterdam

HOGERBEETS, Pensionary of Leiden

MODESBARGEN,

BREDERO, and

VANDORT, Lords of the States

BARNAVELT'S WIFE

BARNAVELT'S DAUGHTER

FOUR DUTCH WOMEN

AN ENGLISH GENTLEWOMAN

Critique

In Sir John van Olden Barnavelt, Fletcher and Massinger apparently intended to present the character of a noble and virtuous man of high station who was brought to ruin by ambition This intention is never realized dramatically We are told of Barnavelt's service to the state, of the love the common people had for him, and of his many fine personal qualities, but we are never shown these things. Thus Barnavelt emerges from the play as a proud and crotchety old man whose unreasonable machinations lead eventually to a well deserved beheading. Hence he never achieves tragic dimensions. Any other positive effects the play might have achieved are inhibited by distinctly second-rate plotting and versification. But Jacobean audiences seem to have reacted to the play quite favorably. The historical Barnavelt had been executed in May, 1619, and to them the reenactment of the end of his career was an exciting contemporary chronicle, rendered all the more interesting because a number of dangerous political questions were raised. For this reason, perhaps, the play was not printed during the seventeenth century. It survived in the form of a heavily censored manuscript prompt book, which was not generally available until its publication in 1883.

The Story

Although hostilities with Spain had ended with the Twelve Year Truce in 1609, the infant Dutch states were still upset in 1618 by internal political and religious strife. To Modesbargen, Leidenberch, and Grotius, the silver haired patriot Barnavelt declared his dissatisfaction with the present state of affairs, for with the support of the army, the Prince of Orange was becoming known among the people as the father of his country and the chief champion of the new freedom. The contributions of the older patriots, particularly Barnavelt, were being forgotten, he hinted darkly that he, who had done so much to bring about the Spanish defeat, would see his country overthrown again before he would allow his honor to be so sullied.

Although Modesbargen reminded Barnavelt that his services had been well rewarded and that his present course of action could lead only to his ruin, Grotius and Leidenberch enthusiastically supported him, and Modesbargen agreed eventually to help Barnavelt in any way that would not prejudice the state.

The conference was interrupted by two captains, one of whom was to be judged by Barnavelt for having spoken scornfully of the Lords of the States. Coldly, Barnavelt relieved the captain of his command, telling him that he could look to the Prince of Orange for maintenance. Although Leidenberch privately promised the cashiered officer that he would intervene for him, the captain, who knew that Leidenberch's genial manner covered a cold and relentless nature, announced that he would seek to reestablish himself by bribing Barnavelt's wife or by furnishing a fresh wench for his son.

In a second conference with his friends, Barnavelt avowed himself, like them, an Arminian, and urged that they enroll companies of citizens in the provincial cities for the defense of the sect against its enemy, the Prince of Orange, whose regular troops were garrisoned at Utrecht. Modesbargen again protested, this time that religion should not be made a cloak for subversive political activity, but Barnavelt cynically replied that any weapon could be used that would serve their cause. He then persuaded Bredero and Vandort, two Lords of the States, to order the Prince of Orange locked out of a meeting of the Lords which was about to take place.

When the prince arrived and found the doors of the council chamber barred against him, he had difficulty in restraining his attendants, who realized the enormity of the insult, from forcing their way in. His humility and modesty prevailed, however, and he remained without until Barnavelt and the Lords appeared. He inquired why he had lost his seat. In reply, Barnavelt spoke harshly, charging him with haughtiness. Bredero and Vandort were shocked and offended not only by Barnavelt's outspokenness and offensive tone but also by his assumption of the right to speak for them. Instead of joining Leidenberch and Modesbargen in following Barnavelt to his home, they remained behind and assured the prince of their loyalty to him. With their assent the prince resolved to move against the towns in which Barnavelt's supporters had raised citizen companies.

Although Barnavelt knew that the Prince of Orange would attempt to disband the companies, he confidently believed that the prince would not risk civil war and that in any event his own reputation would protect himself and his followers from harm. In Utrecht the citizens attempted to persuade the regular garrison to desert the prince and serve Barnavelt's cause, but the soldiers, remembering their loyalty to the House of Orange, resisted the blandishments of the wily Leidenberch. When the soldiers remained firm against threats to oust them from the town, Barnavelt realized that a crisis was nearing. While his followers proceeded to muster the citizen companies, he returned to The Hague to begin a diverting action.

Meanwhile, four Dutch women, all ardent feminists, attempted to convince a visiting English gentlewoman of the advantages of living in a free society, where women could lord it over their husbands and inquire into the doings of their rulers. They were ridiculing the English mercenaries' fidelity to the Prince of Orange when news was brought that the prince had disarmed all of the other towns and was approaching Utrecht. The citizens began to arm themselves, but the gates were guarded by the English, who refused to give over their posts to citizen reliefs. Thus, when the prince arrived before the city, the English admitted him, and his army quickly disarmed the citizens. Leidenberch was taken prisoner and ordered to The Hague. Modesbargen made his escape to Germany.

At The Hague, Bredero, Vandort and other Lords of the States were rejoicing at the news of the prince's victories when they were joined by Barnavelt. The old man accused his colleagues of slighting him in favor of the prince; they replied that in spite of his former services he was now regarded as a suspect, and they advised his reformation. Barnavelt then unleashed all his pent up fury, reaffirming his undying hatred of the Prince of Orange. The others were retreating before his anger when Barnavelt's son arrived with a report of Utrecht's fall and Leidenberch's capture.

Knowing that their cause was lost, the son advised his father to capitulate to the prince. Once again Barnavelt swore that he would die first.

With the dispersal of the citizen armies, Barnavelt's power was lost, and when the Prince of Orange returned to The Hague his leadership of the state was assured. When the Lords of the States met again, it was Barnavelt who was excluded on the recommendation of Vandort and Bredero.

The subject of the meeting was the extent to which the Arminian heresy still threatened the state. The prince reported that the reduction of the armed towns had done much to stamp out the sect, but that powerful men who were yet untouched were its real source of strength. Pressed by the council to reveal their names, he accused Modesbargen, Grotius, Leidenberch, and finally Barnavelt. Although Leidenberch had been captured, it was felt that a case against the others would be difficult to make without the testimony of Modesbargen; therefore, a captain and a small band were dispatched to Germany to arrest him secretly. Leidenberch, accompanied by his young son, was then brought before the council. Convinced that a full confession was his best course of action, he vowed to reveal everything as he was led off again to his cell.

There he was met by Barnavelt. When Leidenberch admitted that he had told his captors the secrets that had been entrusted to him, the old man reviled him for his weakness and faithlessness. As Leidenberch quailed before him, Barnavelt urged with all of his considerable force that the turncoat's only honorable atonement would be suicide. So powerful were his arguments that Leidenberch that evening took his own life.

Meanwhile, Barnavelt's own position was growing increasingly tenuous, but he was still not without friends. Grotius and Hogerbeets let it be known that if he was arrested they would burn the statehouse about the prince's ears.

Barnavelt himself grew more despondent as he felt the prince's net tightening upon him. In spite of the efforts of his wife and daughter, he could not be cheered, however, when his son brought him the news of Leidenberch's suicide, he realized that any charge the prince might have had against him would collapse for lack of a witness. His mood immediately changed as he regained confidence in his own powers.

But he had underestimated the potency of his enemies. Just as he reached the height of his elation, he was arrested by the prince's men and brought before the council. Still thinking himself safe, he vigorously denied charges of treason. In the midst of his defense Modesbargen, who had been brought back from Germany, was introduced. Although Barnavelt's case collapsed, the old man's spirit was not broken. He continued to deny his guilt and refused to ask for mercy.

While Barnavelt was held in prison awaiting the passage of his sentence, the Lords of the States were subject to pressure from all sides to release him. Not only was he still beloved by the common people, but the heads of foreign states interceded for him. His treason was too blatant to be forgiven, however, and he was sentenced to be beheaded. To the end he maintained his innocence and repeatedly accused the state of ingratitude to one who had served her well. Even though thousands were wagered that the ax would never strike his neck, he was eventually led to the block and executed in full sight of the populace. The decaying body of Leidenberch was exhumed for the occasion and hung nearby. Thus, two of Holland's greatest men paid ambition's price.

THE SIR ROGER DE COVERLEY PAPERS

Type of work Periodical essays

Authors Joseph Addison (1672-1719) Sir Richard Steele (1672-1729), Eustace Budgell (1686-1737)

Time Early eighteenth century

Locale London and Worcestershire

First published 1711-1712

Principal characters

THE SPECTATOR

SIR ROGER DE COVERLEY, a Worcestershire knight

SIR ANDREW FREEPORT, a wealthy merchant

CAPTAIN SENTRY, a retired army officer

WILL HONEYCOMB, an aging dandy

WILL WIMBLE, a country gentleman

THE WIDOW, loved in vain by Sir Roger

In the second number of Addison and Steele's Spectator papers eighteenth century readers were introduced to the members of "The Club." Heading the list of those characters who, among them, were intended to represent the entire range of public opinion and enlightened bias for the London of 1711 was "a gentleman of Worcestershire, of ancient descent, a baronet, his name Sir Roger de Coverley."

Sir Roger was initially conceived of as an aging Restoration rake. In the old days he was what you call a fine gentleman, had often supped with my Lord Rochester and Sir George Etherege, fought a duel upon first coming to town, and kicked Bully Dawson in a public coffeehouse for calling him

"youngster"

By the time of The Spectator, however, he had been mellowed by years of unrequited love for a "perverse beautiful widow of the next county to him," and had become that quaint and lovable representative of the Tory landowning class, an amiable but rather ineffectual anachronism who was to stand as the most popular and the best remembered of the many characters that appeared in the 555 numbers of the original Spectator.

So popular did he become, in fact, that his name is known to many who have never heard of the Spectator himself, his lengthy and unconsummated love affair has been the subject of a full length play, and those numbers of The Spectator in which he figures prominently have been, in a variety of editions, collected and separately published, usually under the title of The Sir Roger de Coverley Papers.

There are in all some thirty five Spectators in which Sir Roger is prominent. As a member of "The Club" he, of course, appears in more, but the essays usually collected under his name are limited to the first number, which serves as an introduction, and to thirty four of the thirty five in which Sir Roger is the central (or, at least, an important) figure (The thirty fifth, possibly by Tickell, is rejected as being inconsistent with the character of the knight). Of these, twenty three (including the introductory first paper) are by Addison, nine are by Steele, and three are by Eustace Budgell, a junior associate. There were, we know, other infrequent contributors to The Spectator (Alexander Pope among them), but, with the exception of Budgell's three essays, Sir Roger remains the exclusive property of Addison and Steele.

Steele, apparently, was his creator. That he was Sir Richard's brain child may be inferred from the fact that in the nine contributions by Steele Sir Roger lives most independently as a character. Certainly the good knight's love affair was Steele's creation. The beautiful and perverse widow is introduced along with the knight himself, then, in papers 113 and 118, the full story of Sir Roger's forty years of frustration at her hands is unfolded.

Steele's interest in the affairs of Sir Roger's heart was in keeping with his general interests as a periodical writer. The age of sentiment was at hand, and Steele was among the first to sense the demand, and to provide the material, for the exercise of "fine feelings." Through his treatment, Sir Roger becomes not merely a character, but a sentimental one. His quaintness (he still dresses in the fashion of the Restoration), his lovable-ness (he has the heart of all his servants), his amusing foibles (he often loses track of his thoughts in mid sentence, an indication that a counter thought of the widow has crossed his mind)—these traits are all designed to endear him to the hearts of the readers, particularly to those of the feminine readers whom Steele had constantly in mind and with whose interests he was always concerned. Sentimentality, the rise of the middle class as the arbiter of manners and morals, and the accompanying rise of the importance of women as the designers of public conscience were all concepts that Steele was temperamentally equipped to make appealing. Much of the success of his periodical essays can be attributed to his ability to work this appeal into a popularly digestible literary form. In Sir Roger he offered his most attractive tidbit.

Though it was Steele who created the character of Sir Roger, it was Addison who made the most of him. For Addison, he was a vehicle, sometimes merely a convenience. Addison could also treat him as a character, and when he did, he treated him in a manner consistent with the pattern set by Steele. But for the most part Addison used Sir Roger as a means to some journalistic end. Some action of the knight sets off a train of thought that leads to a philosophical discussion, various types of characters meet the knight—in his home, on his way to the assizes, in town—and these characters are brought under the scrutiny of the Spectator, thereby furnishing material for social analysis, or the knight's reactions to various sophisticated elements of the town, reactions based on his stern and conservative notions of morality and on a sympathetic naivete, are used as foils to satirize urban folly

Addison is not to be criticized adversely for so employing his character. The purpose in creating "The Club" with its wide range of members was in the first place, to provide the Spectator with a means for examining and commenting on all types and all levels of English society in his day. Addison was merely carrying out the original intention of the series when he used Sir Roger as a magnet to attract various but interesting odds and ends of essay material.

Thus in Addison's hands (and in Budgell's, in the three contributions for which he is responsible) Sir Roger serves his original purpose. Through him London readers of The Spectator were able to gain some understanding of the life—of the ways, the beliefs, the basic values—of the people of the shires. In general, the understanding gained is extended to all things pertaining to the country except, perhaps, country politics (Addison and Steele, both Whigs, promised to keep politics out of The Spectator, and for the most part they lived up to this promise, though there are two or three papers in which Sir Roger's Toryism is satirized.) The nostalgic idea that God made the country and man made the town is but another manifestation of that rising middle class sentimentality that was so much a part of Steele. The philosophers of the age of sentiment argued the moral superiority of all things countrified, and in this moral notion the citified Addison went along with Steele. As a result, many of those twenty papers that were supposed to have been written by the Spectator while he was the guest of Sir Roger in Worcestershire are paeans to the physical, social, or moral superiority of country things.

In these papers the moral, didactic purpose of The Spectator was lived up to. For those to whom sentimentality and moralizing, hidden or overt, have little appeal, The Sir Roger de Coverley Papers, even those by Addison, often leave much to be desired. Still, these very qualities make them interesting examples of the sources of middle class mercantile mores. Moreover, they share with The Spectator as a whole the claim to presenting a vivid portrayal of the color and detail of English life in the early eighteenth century, and, in their own right, they offer a picture of English country ways which might profitably be compared with that drawn by such writers as Fielding and Sterne later in the century.

SISTER PHILOMÈNE

Type of work Novel

Authors Edmond (1822-1896) and Jules (1830-1870) de Goncourt

Type of plot Naturalism

Time of plot Nineteenth century

Locale Paris

First published 1861

Principal characters

MARIE GAUCHER, later Sister Philomène

CÉLINE, her friend

MME DE VIRY, employer of Philomène's aunt

HENRI DE VIRY, Mme de Viry's son

BARNIER, a young doctor

MALIVOIRE, his friend, also a doctor

ROMAINE, Barnier's former mistress

Critique

The Goncourt brothers were pioneers in the case history school of naturalism, but in certain respects their work is more important for its influence on other writers (notably Zola) than for its own literary merits. Characterization and plot suffer alike in the Goncourt novels: subtleties of motivation are lost in the inexorable grinding away of the chance events which cause or alleviate lower-class tragedy. Sister Philomène is happily preserved from the want and misery of many Goncourt characters by her religion and a profession which provides objects for solicitude and care, as well as the necessities of life.

The Story

In a hospital ward, two white-clad women, Sisters of St. Augustine, were making their rounds. One of them was a novice.

Sister Philomène's name was originally Marie Gaucher. Daughter of a tailoress and a locksmith, she was orphaned at the age of four and adopted by an aunt, a servant to the widowed Mme. de Viry. In that pleasant household the child began to thrive, and she soon assumed equal footing with Mme. de Viry's son Henri. Mme. de Viry felt the evil of this situation and the child was sent, screaming, to a convent orphanage. To avoid confusion with another child called Marie, the Sisters called her Philomène. Miserable at first, she gradually lost her resentment as she became adapted to convent routine, but she changed from a vivacious child to a quiet and whining one. Within she was restless, living only for her aunt's monthly visit. One Sister, ugly but good and kind Marguerite, paid special attention to Philomène.

At the age of ten, Philomène became the intimate friend of a newcomer, Céline, aged twelve. Much of Céline's childhood had been spent in reading the Lives of the Saints aloud to her infirm grandmother, and she had developed a mystic temperament. Denying herself pleasures, fasting, and inventing self-punishments, she converted Philomène to a course of personal sacrifices, and Philomène worked herself up to a state of religious agitation. She habitually spent all day Sunday in church, looking forward to that prospect as she once had to her aunt's visits. She became sickly and irritable, and her thoughts were always on death. When her eyes began to give her trouble, the Sisters sent her with her aunt to see an eye doctor. After the visit, she went to Mme. de Viry's house for the first time since she had entered the orphanage.

Back in the convent, Philomène felt miserable and forlorn. She strove to maintain a fever of piety, and succeeded for two years, but then her faith became automatic and unfelt. Céline left the orphanage to become a nun, Sister Marguerite left for her health.

The convent becoming unbearable to Philomène, she went into a decline and was so close to death that her aunt was permitted to take her home. Now acting as a servant to Monsieur Henri, his mother having died, Philomène longed to sacrifice herself for him. She rejected the advances made by a coarse groom who hoped eventually, by marrying her, to gain the management of Henri's house.

One night Philomène overheard Henri telling her aunt that he would have brought a woman home had it not been for the presence of an unmarried girl in the house. When he suggested that Philomène marry the groom, she fainted. Later, though assured she would not be sent away, she decided to begin her novitiate to the Sisters of St. Augustine. With seven months of her novitiate to complete before taking her vows, she was sent to a hospital to replace her friend Céline, who as Sister Lawrence had died of typhoid.

The doctors agreed that Philomène was pretty, but Barnier, under whom she worked, said that he preferred the old ones, tried and true Philomène's original horror of the hospital was relieved by its clean, peaceful atmosphere at first, but later the realization of death and disease tortured her. Mid morning breakfast was the happiest hour for her, then Philomène, useful and busy feeding and cheering her patients, gained strength for the rest of the day. By the time the disillusionment of knowing that she could only relieve suffering came, she was inured to the hospital. She was never hardened, however, and her patients loved her for her tenderness.

Philomène won doctors and students alike by her courage and compassion. Soon she was all powerful, softening hospital rules and lending courage to sufferers.

When one dying patient despaired for her little boy's future, Barnier generously proposed to send him to his mother in the country. Everyone admired his goodness, and he and Philomène became fast friends. Their chats were her one recreation, for Barnier told her about changes outside the hospital in Paris. She feared that she would be transferred, for the Sisters were not supposed to get attached to a ward, but she was pleased to learn that she was to remain. One day Barnier, an unbeliever who had often discussed religion with her, was silenced by her announcement that she had just taken her vows. Then Philomène became ill and had to leave the hospital for a month. When she returned she was very pale but seemed strong and active.

Malivoire told Barnier that he should have a more or less permanent mistress. Because a doctor's profession was so material, said Malivoire, the physician needed the illusions of love as well as the brutal fact of sex. Barnier was about to confess a love affair to Malivoire when they were interrupted.

Barnier gave Philomène laudanum to take for her neuralgic headaches. Her laudanum provoked dream included the illusion of the touch of a kiss.

A new patient arrived. Barnier recognized her as the specter of Romaine, the woman he loved. They had been happy lovers until she left him and began a life of dissipation which resulted in a breast injury. When Barnier asked Philomène to prepare Romaine for the operation, Philomène spoke to the woman with unusual harshness. After the operation Romaine, raging in fever, alternately cursed Barnier and begged him not to let her die. Leaving, Barnier overheard Philomène say that women like her should not be admitted to the hospital. Romaine died, after a scene in which Philomène's prayers were broken by the woman's curses and singing. Returning, Barnier saw the coffin that was to carry her away.

At a drinking party Barnier defended the Sisters against a cynic who said that they were tender only toward those who were religious and decent. A suggestion was made that Philomène loved Barnier. Drunk and aroused, he went to the ward and attempted to kiss her, she slapped him. Sobered, he returned to his friends to say that he would fight anyone who suggested her impunity.

Miserable in his memories of Romaine, Barnier took to drinking absinthe. Intoxication became his real life.

Learning that the house surgeon's coveted medal would not be his, Barnier struggled to resist drink, but when sober he was haunted by thoughts of Romaine. Philomène herself was ill. After her laudanum dream she searched her heart for symptoms of attachment for Barnier and remembered her jealous reaction to Romaine. Resolving on a course of expiation, she punished herself by remaining in the hospital and suffering the torments of love. One day Barnier asked her for givenness for the attempted kiss. Her heart too full to speak, she went silent to her closet.

Barnier's student period was soon to end. He told Malivoire that the subject of his thesis was to be Death, that modern existence—a suicide more or less slow—does not use up but breaks life. Having deliberately scratched his hand while dissecting a diseased body, Barnier went to bed to await death

Philomène went to a priest to have prayers said for Barnier by the Confraternity of Notre Dame des Victoires, devoted to those who do not believe Later

she knelt and prayed beside the dead Barnier After she had gone, Malivoire, searching on the bedside table for the lock of Barnier's hair which was to be sent to his mother, found it missing

SIX CHARACTERS IN SEARCH OF AN AUTHOR

Type of work Drama

Author Luigi Pirandello (1867-1936)

Type of plot Intellectual comedy

Time of plot Twentieth century

Locale The stage of a theater

First presented 1921

Principal characters

THE FATHER

THE MOTHER

THE STEPDAUGHTER

THE SON

THE BOY

THE CHILD

MADAME PACE

THE MANAGER

LEADING LADY

LEADING MAN

Critique

Six Characters in Search of an Author, Pirandello's best known play, contrasts illusion and reality, as do several of the author's other works. It may also be thought of as a dramatic criticism of the popular but very artificial "well made" play of the nineteenth century. Instead of starting with a cleverly constructed drama, Pirandello begins with a group of characters and experiments with letting them—with some professional direction—try to fashion their story into an actable drama. Inexperience, clashes of opinion, interruptions, and above all a lack of poetic understanding defeat their purpose. Yet the attempt itself has produced a drama of a sort, not the characters' but Pirandello's.

The Story

As a stage manager and a group of actors were preparing to rehearse a Pirandello play, they were interrupted by the appearance of six characters: a man of about fifty, a woman, a young woman, a young man of twenty-two, a boy of fourteen, and a little girl. The man and the young woman were searching for an author who would put all six of them into a drama. They insisted that they were already living characters but that they needed an author to put their drama into suitable form for the stage. The manager, at first annoyed at the interruption of his rehearsal, finally listened with some interest to the rather confused story that the man and the young woman, who, it turned out, was his stepdaughter, tried to tell him.

Years ago the father had got rid of his wife, whom he found both boring and pitiable, by providing her with a lover, his ex-secretary, to whom she might go when she was rejected by her husband.

SIX CHARACTERS IN SEARCH OF AN AUTHOR by Luigi Pirandello. Translated by Edward Storer. By permission of the publishers, E. P. Dutton & Co., Inc. Copyright 1922 by E. P. Dutton & Co., Inc. Copyright renewed 1950 by Stefano Fausto and Lietta Pirandello.

Long afterward, the father visited Madame Pace's dress shop, a legitimate business which she operated as a cover for her procuring, and was provided with a pretty young woman whom he did not recognize as his stepdaughter until they were separated by the sudden appearance of his wife. When he learned that his wife was destitute, her lover having died two months before, he permitted her to return to his home with her daughter and two younger children, all illegitimate.

To forestall a refusal by the manager to act as vicar author for the drama, the father assured him that he need not be bothered about the presence of the two children, for they would quickly disappear from the story. In fact, the daughter would also disappear, leaving only the three original members of the family. The manager dismissed his actors for a few minutes in order to hear more of the plot as it was outlined to him in his office.

Returning a few minutes later from the office conference, the manager set about putting together the play, asking his prompter to take down the most important points in shorthand so that his actors might properly learn their parts later. At this point the father interrupted, the manager, he said, simply did not understand. This was not a play for the manager's professional actors; it belonged to the characters themselves. There was no need for actors when the manager already had six living characters at hand.

After hearing similar objections from the stepdaughter, the manager consented to use the characters, as this was only a rehearsal. But he wondered who would play Madame Pace if they were going to do the dress shop scene. After borrowing hats and other clothes from several actresses to hang on clothes pegs, the father arranged the set.

Madame Pace suddenly appeared to play her part, but when she found that she was expected to play it in the presence of the mother, who would be watching the rehearsal from the side of the stage, she was scandalized at such impropriety and left in a rage.

The rehearsal continued, with the mother watching and listening intently, suffering all the while at the reenactment of the scene in which her husband with honeyed words and actions planned to purchase the favors of the pretty girl whom he did not recognize as his stepdaughter. The action was suddenly stopped and then repeated, this time with the parts of the father and the stepdaughter being taken by the leading man and the leading lady of the actors' company. The stepdaughter was unable to control her laughter at what seemed to her the ludicrous performance of the leading lady, and the father objected to the way the leading man was portraying him. Again the scene was played with the original characters, this time up to the point where, after the girl had reminded the father that she was wearing mourning, he had suggested that she remove her dress. At that point the action was abruptly stopped by the entrance of the mother, who in horror pulled her daughter away from the father. The manager was well pleased with this action, it would, he decided, make a fine first act ending for the drama.

Preparations were begun for working up a second act, using a garden scene. The father engaged in a lengthy discussion of the difference between reality and the mere illusion of reality to be found in conventional stage representations, or, for that matter, in life itself. The manager, the father said, must try to perceive what he had so far missed: ordinary people had illusions about themselves which they later discovered were not the realities they had thought them to be, but only illusions, the only reality the six characters had was that of a permanent, unchanging illusion, more real than any reality the manager himself might have.

The stepdaughter also entered the discussion, which was marked by the manager's increasing irritation and the father's persistence in following his argument through She, her father, and the other characters had been created by an author who had then decided that he did not want to use them in one of his plays Having been created however, they now had existence in drama which must be revealed But, insisted the manager, drama is action, not slow, dull philosophizing, let the talk stop and the action begin The manager placed the silent, fourteen year old boy behind a tree and some bushes in the garden and the little girl near a fountain Then he prepared for a conversation between the legitimate son and his mother But, said the son, there was no such scene in the garden, what happened was that his mother came into his room and he left, refusing to talk to her The manager asked what happened then The son replied that nothing happened, that he disliked scenes and simply went away He seemed very unwilling to discuss the matter or to have anything to do with acting in the drama which his father and his half sister were trying to have presented

When his father demanded that he play his part, the son turned violently upon him, asking what madness made him wish to expose the family shame before the world If the son himself was in the theater, he explained to the confused manager, it was only because his father had dragged him there But the manager insisted on knowing what happened after the son left his room Reluctantly, the son answered that he merely walked in the garden When the manager urged him to continue, he burst out that it was horrible

The manager, noting the mother's apprehensive look toward the fountain, partly comprehended, while the father explained that she had been following behind her son Then the son quickly told what he had found the body of the little girl in the fountain pool and the brother staring insanely at it At that moment a revolver shot sounded behind the stage bushes where the boy had been hidden Amid the resulting confusion the manager asked if the boy was wounded, and the actors disagreed as to whether he was dead or merely pretending to be The father cried that it was real The manager, losing his temper, consigned the whole play and the characters to hell He had lost a whole day over them

THE SKIN OF OUR TEETH

Type of work Drama

Author Thornton Wilder (1897)

Type of plot Fantastic parable

Time of plot All human history

Locale Excelsior, New Jersey, and the boardwalk at Atlantic City

First presented 1942

Principal characters

MR ANTROBUS, a citizen of the world

MRS ANTROBUS, his wife

GLADYS, their daughter

HENRY, their son

SABINA, their maid

Critique

The Skin of Our Teeth, which owes something of its conception and form to Bertolt Brecht but even more to James Joyce's Finnegans Wake, is a fantastic parable dealing with mankind's age-long struggle to achieve civilization The style is casually presentational in the manner of the newsreel Dinosaurs participate in

THE SKIN OF OUR TEETH by Thornton Wilder By permission of the publishers Harper & Brothers
Copyright 1942 by Thornton Wilder

the conversation and action, scenery is handled in a highly unconventional manner, Sabina talks directly to the audience much of the time and on occasion halts the story entirely to comment on the construction of the play itself. The action covers three periods: an Ice Age, a great flood, and a devastating war. In each case mankind manages to survive in the face of overwhelming odds. Through these scenes, Wilder expresses his underlying theme: faith in humanity and its ability to survive. The Skin of Our Teeth is a profound and vital drama, considered by many critics the best play of the period of World War II. More than that, it remains an influential and exciting contribution to the literature of the American stage, a panoramic view of all human history reduced to the experiences of a New Jersey suburban family.

The Story

A great wall of ice was moving southward over the land, bringing with it an unprecedented cold spell in August. In Hartford they were burning pianos and it was impossible to reach Boston by telegraph, yet the people did nothing but talk about the looming catastrophe. So far, only the extreme cold had reached Excelsior, New Jersey, where Mr. and Mrs. George Antrobus lived in an attractive suburban residence. Their rather commonplace lives were to be greatly changed by the extreme form which the weather had taken.

Mr. Antrobus was a fine man, a sterling example for his community. He had invented the wheel, the alphabet, and the multiplication table. Mrs. Antrobus was the picture of the middle-class mother, with the best interests of her children at heart. Their daughter Gladys was much like her mother, but their son was atypical. His name had been Cam until an unfortunate accident occurred in which he hit his brother with a stone and killed him. As the result of that thoughtless action, his name had been changed to Henry, and Mrs. Antrobus went to some pains to keep his past history a secret. Members of the Antrobus household also included Sabina, the maid, a baby dinosaur, and a mammoth.

On this particular day in August, everyone was freezing and even the dogs were sticking to the sidewalk because it was so cold. Sabina was in an agitated state because nothing seemed to be going properly. She had milked the mammoth, but she had let the only fire in the house go out. Her plight was doubly humiliating because her career in the Antrobus house had begun when Mr. Antrobus brought her back from the Sabine rape. He had given her a life of luxury until he tired of her, now she was relegated to the kitchen. She, however, was a canny and observant individual, a necessary apex to the age-old triangle.

She was waiting nervously for the return of Mr. Antrobus when a domestic altercation with Mrs. Antrobus prompted her to give a two-week notice. Later a telegram announcing the arrival of Mr. Antrobus and some salvation from the cold caused her to change her mind for the time being.

When he finally arrived, Mr. Antrobus brought news that most of the outside world was freezing and that there was probably nothing they could do to escape the same fate. When some tramps and refugees from the ice came to the house for warmth and food, Mrs. Antrobus was not in favor of admitting them, but Mr. Antrobus insisted. Mrs. Antrobus agreed, but only after the dinosaur and the mammoth had been evicted. The refugees included a Judge, named Moses, a blind beggar with a guitar, named Homer, and the Misses E., T., and M. Muse. The Antrobus family attempted to keep up some semblance of hope as they gathered around their small fire. When Henry, in another fit of hate, murdered a neighbor with a stone, Mr. Antrobus stamped out the fire. However, he was cajoled into having faith in mankind again, and all, including the audience, were asked to burn their chairs in order to keep the fire going and save the human race from extinction

That crisis over, Mr and Mrs Antrobus went to the Atlantic City convention of the Ancient and Honorable Order of Mammals, Subdivision Humans Mr Antrobus, just elected president of the society for the coming year, made a speech of acceptance, which was followed by a few words from Mrs Antrobus During an interview immediately afterward, it was learned that Mr and Mrs Antrobus would soon celebrate their five thousandth wedding anniversary Mr Antrobus had previously judged a beauty contest in which the winner had been the former maid Sabina, now Miss Lily Sabina Fairweather from the Boardwalk Bingo Parlor She had decided, as a result of her victory, to take Mr Antrobus away from his wife, and as soon as she could easily do so, she lured him into her beach cabana During her father's sojourn in the cabana, Gladys bought herself a pair of red stockings and Henry became involved in an altercation with a boy whom he hit with a stone When Mr Antrobus was finally located, he had decided to leave his wife Told of his intentions, she handled the situation very calmly and maneuvered him into staying with her She was aided somewhat by a coming storm which made it necessary for the family and a large collection of animals to retreat to a boat in order to survive Under the directions of a mysterious Fortune Teller, Mr Antrobus took them all, including Sabina, off to make a new world

When the great war came, much of the population of the world and most of Excelsior, New Jersey, were wiped out The Antrobus household, including Sabina, managed to survive, but not without considerable damage Mrs Antrobus and Gladys and Gladys' new baby had hidden out in the basement When the war ended, they came out into the world, which in a very short time began to function very much as it had before the war occurred

Sabina, dressed now as a Napoleonic camp follower, had enjoyed the war She felt that everyone was at his best in war time

Henry, following up his stone throwing activities, had progressed from a corporal's rating to the rank of a general he had become the picture of hate, the enemy of man Mr Antrobus ordered that he never come into the house again or he would kill him When Henry returned, he wanted to kill his father, whom he had hated all these years, and he had brought a gun with which to shoot Mr Antrobus When he finally fell asleep from exhaustion, Mrs Antrobus took the revolver from him Mr Antrobus and Henry had an argument during which all the evil in the young man was revealed Mr Antrobus, in a fit of self condemnation, admitted that he would rather fight Henry than try to build a peace with him in the midst of it His will to survive returned once again, however, and he asked Henry to try to live in peace Henry agreed, providing he be given a freedom of his own will

Mr Antrobus, striving to regain his confidence in mankind, recalled the three things which had always kept him going the people, his home, and his books In addition, he remembered the philosophies that he had known and through which he regained his hope for the future

THE SLIPKNOT

Type of work Drama

Author Titus Maccius Plautus (c 255 184 B C)

Type of plot New comedy

Time of plot Late third century B C

Locale Cyrene, in Libya

First presented Late third or early second century B C

Principal characters

DAEMONES, an aged Athenian

PALAESTRA, his daughter

AMPELISCA a slave girl

PLESIDIPPUS, a young man in love with Palaestra

LABRAX a procurer

CHARMIDES, an aged Sicilian, his guest

GRIPUS, a servant of Daemones

TRACHALIO a servant of Plesidippus

Critique

Although many critics feel that The Shipknot, or the Rudens, is one of Plautus' best plays, and although it reveals his characteristic ingenuity in plot construction, it contains loose ends that are more palpable than those found in most of his other comedies. In the fourth act, for example, an impending marriage is hinted at between two of the characters, but when the action is concluded, no step has been taken to affirm or reject this hint, and the audience is left wondering why the suggestion was made at all if nothing was to follow from it. Unlike some of Plautus' padding, this problem seems inexplicable in terms of the demands made by the playwright's rigorous concern for the unities of time and place. It seems rather to be a direction Plautus considered taking and then rejected, at the same time forgetting to erase his preliminary steps.

The Story

Daemones, an old Athenian exiled from Athens, had come to Cyrene to spend his waning years. He was a kindly man, and his exile had come about as a result of his excessive generosity to others and consequent indebtedness rather than from any sort of dishonorable activity on his part. Nor were his impoverishment and exile his only misfortunes. Some years before, his daughter Palaestra, then a small girl, had been stolen from him and sold by the thief to the procurer, Labrax, who brought her, unknown to her father, to Cyrene. There she was reared and educated by Labrax, and there, as she approached maturity, the young Plesidippus saw her and fell in love with her. Wanting to secure her freedom, he arranged to buy her from Labrax for thirty minae. He gave the procurer a retainer and bound him by oath to turn Palaestra over to him when he paid the full sum agreed upon.

Labrax was as unscrupulous as his profession would suggest. When the Sicilian, Charmides, suggested that the procurer could get a much better price out of his women by taking them to Sicily, Labrax decided to ignore his contract. He contrived to get Plesidippus out of the way by arranging to meet him before the Temple of Venus for a sacrificial breakfast. The night before, however, he moved Palaestra and her fellow slave, Ampelisca, together with all his belongings aboard ship. Then, accompanied by Charmides, he set sail. But a storm arose during the night, wrecking the ship, casting Labrax and his guest on the rocks, and permitting Palaestra and Ampelisca to escape in a small boat. The two girls landed near the Temple of Venus, not far from the house of Daemones. After asking sanctuary of the priestess, they went inside.

A short time later Ampelisca was sent to Daemones' house for water. On her way, she encountered Plesidippus' servant, Trachalio, who had come to the temple looking for his master. She sent him inside to see Palaestra. While she was waiting for the servant of Daemones to bring her the water, however, she spied Labrax and Charmides, whom she had believed dead, laboriously making their way to the temple from the place where the sea had washed them up on the rocks. Terrified, she hastened back to the temple to warn her friend.

When Labrax and Charmides arrived, wet and tattered, they devoted most of their remaining energy to mutual recriminations for their plight until the procurer learned from a servant that his two slaves were not drowned but were inside the temple. He rushed in, intent on saving at least that much of his property, and attempted to drag the girls away from the statue of Venus at whose feet they had sought sanctuary. Trachalio witnessed this violence and came out, calling for aid for the outraged suppliants. Daemones heard him and brought his servants to the girls' assistance. Labrax was soundly beaten, but without quelling his determination to get back his two slaves. Then, while Daemones' men held the struggling procurer, Trachalio went to find Plesidippus and bring him to the temple. On his arrival the young Athenian, angry at the outrageous trick Labrax had nearly succeeded in playing on him, dragged the scoundrel to justice.

Daemones took the two girls home with him, for on the previous night he had dreamed that he had prevented a slave from stealing the fledglings from a swallow's nest; he believed that the episode with Labrax was in some way a fulfillment of that dream and that the girls, therefore, were somehow important to him. But he had no more than got the girls inside the door than his wife, jealous of their youth and beauty, created an intolerable furor on the grounds that he had brought harlots into the house.

Meanwhile, Daemones' servant, Gripus, was making his way home from a morning's fishing, elated at having pulled up in his nets a large wallet which, unknown to him, had been lost by Labrax the night before and which contained, in addition to the procurer's own wealth, certain tokens which would help Palaestra to identify her parents if she should ever encounter them. Gripus intended to keep the contents of the wallet for himself, but on his way home Trachalio overtook him, recognized the wallet, and raised such a clamor that Daemones was finally brought out to arbitrate between them. Trachalio told the old man whose wallet it was and said that it contained, among other things, the identifying tokens of Palaestra. To test Trachalio's story, Daemones asked Palaestra to describe the trinkets. Her description both fitted the contents of the wallet and revealed that the slave girl was Daemones' long lost daughter. Father and daughter united in great joy, ignored Gripus' claims to ownership of the remainder of the wallet's contents and went into Daemones' house.

By that time the case of Labrax had been tried by the court, and it had been decided that the procurer had no legal title to Palaestra, for she had been born free. Ampelisca, however, was adjudged rightfully his, and he returned to the temple to look for her. Overhearing Gripus grumbling about the wallet, he questioned him and to his joy learned that it had been recovered. Promising Gripus a talent of silver for identifying the wallet's present possessor, he was directed to Daemones, who, scrupulously honest, returned it willingly. The procurer was about to go off when Gripus protested that the talent of silver had not yet been paid. Although Labrax had sworn on the altar of Venus to give the money to the servant, who wanted to buy his freedom, Gripus would have had nothing for his pains if Daemones had not intervened. The old man suggested that Labrax give Gripus only half a talent and give Ampelisca her freedom for the remainder. To this suggestion Labrax agreed. Even Gripus was content with it when he learned that Daemones was willing to give him his freedom for the half talent.

One of the first things that Daemones did in his newly recovered status as father was to betroth his daughter to Plesidippus. In addition, he agreed to encourage the young man to give Trachalio his freedom and permit him to marry Ampelisca if she were willing Then everyone, including Labrax, had a hearty dinner with Daemones

SMALL SOULS

Type of work Novel
Author Louis Couperus (1863-1923)
Type of plot Social criticism
Time of plot Nineteenth century
Locale The Hague
First published 1901

Principal characters

CONSTANCE VAN DER WELCKE, a daughter of the once prominent Van Lowe family
HENRI VAN DER WELCKE, her husband
ADDIE (ADRIAAN), their son
BERTHA, and
ADOLPHINE, her sisters
VAN NAGHEL VAN VOORDE, Bertha's husband

Critique

Small Souls, written by one of the foremost of modern Dutch novelists, is the first of a series of four novels known as The Books of the Small Souls. Constance, who divorced her prominent husband and married for love is unable, even after twenty years, to escape the condemnation of a society which is comprised of small souls who are very tender to criticism and are engaged in schemes of attaining status by the use of gossip, rumor, scandal, and fear. This theme is conveyed through a realistic interplay of characters. The deft presentation of the dark, chill, and damp Dutch climate also serves to further the theme.

The Story

Mrs. van Lowe was preparing for her usual Sunday family get-together. On this Sunday her daughter Constance was returning to Holland after a scandal that had kept her away for twenty years. After several respectable and loveless years with De Staffelaer, the Dutch envoy at Rome, Constance had had an affair with a young diplomat, Henri van der Welcke. When Constance divorced De Staffelaer and married Henri, the marriage proved the ruin of her new husband's political career, and they were now finally returning to their homeland. Everyone assured Constance that it was good to have her back, but she felt alien to her relatives. In the past twenty years her father had died and she had seen her mother only twice, briefly, at Brussels.

Some time later, Constance, Henri, and their son Adriaan, whom they called Addie, went to visit Henri's parents. This invitation was significant because it was the first time since the scandal that Henri's parents had paid any attention to Constance or even acknowledged Addie as their grandson. The interview was formal and oppressive. Constance was annoyed to see Henri's mother treating thirteen-year-old Addie as a child, he was, in fact, very mature and serious for his age, and he always managed to reconcile his parents when they had an argument.

For the most part, Constance felt happier all the time. She saw her mother daily, she had had an intimate talk with her sister Bertha, and she got along well with her brother Gerri. Also, Constance was determined to like her sister Adol-phine, despite her petty enviousness. But of all her brothers and sisters, she saw Paul most often because he got along well with Henri and Addie.

SMALL SOULS by Louis Couperus. Translated by Alexander Teixeira de Mattos. By permission of the publishers Dodd, Mead & Co., Inc. Copyright, 1914 by Dodd, Mead & Co., Inc. Renewed. All rights reserved.

One day the Van der Welckes gave a quiet but decorous dinner for Paul and Van Vreeswijk, a friend of Henri's who was a chamberlain extraordinary to the queen regent Adolphine, who knew that Constance was giving a dinner, pretended to be just dropping by, for she wanted to see what the dinner was like. When she saw the candles and flowers she became very envious. The next day Adolphine had a visit from Cateau, her brother Karel's wife, and she belittled Constance's dinner, saying that they had invited Van Vreeswijk in order to push themselves into higher social circles.

That summer Constance was happy because she thought that her family had forgiven her. One day, on Henri's thirteenth birthday, they had an unexpected visit from Henri's mother. When she arrived, she was surprised to meet Constance's mother, who also happened to be there. Without resorting to words, the two old women sought each other's forgiveness for the misdeeds of their children.

In The Hague, the gossip of the old scandal had been revived, although Constance never heard of it. One day, however, Addie had gone bicycling with Adolphine's children, one of whom, Jaap, called Addie an "Italian" and said that Addie was not Henri's son. When he got home, Addie told his father, who assured him that the rumors were false. Constance, hearing what had happened, wondered whether she had not made a mistake in returning to The Hague. Addie himself began to feel that there must be some reason why people always gossiped about his family. He became so gloomy that at last his father told him the story of the scandal in Rome. Once he knew the truth, Addie began to feel better. Constance and Henri began to see that their son was now no longer a child.

Having received an invitation, Henri and Addie went to visit Henri's parents for a week. When Henri confessed to his father that he had told Addie about the scandal in Rome, the old man was deeply shocked, for he felt that Henri had corrupted the child. Henri then realized that he and his father were strangers and could not communicate, he realized, too, what a great shock the scandal must have been to the old man and with what grief he must have ordered him, for the sake of propriety, to marry Constance, thus shattering Henri's promising diplomatic career.

While Henri and Addie were away, Constance had a visit from Adolphine, who proceeded to make slighting remarks about her. At last, Constance could tolerate no more. She told Adolphine just what she really thought of her and then dismissed her. After Adolphine left, Constance burst into tears because she had not been able, apparently, to return quietly to her homeland and live in peace.

One day Constance found in her mailbox a copy of the Inspector, a privately printed newspaper devoted to publishing scandal. She was startled to find a libelous article in it directed against Bertha's husband. The article also promised that the next issue of the paper would give the full details about an older scandal. When Henri heard about the article he grew furious, and a quarrel ensued in which Henri childishly claimed that Constance, by providing food for scandal, was ruining Addie's chances for a diplomatic career. Constance declared that she would at once try, for Addie's sake, to become accepted in higher circles, mainly through the influence of her sister Bertha, who was socially prominent.

To make good her resolve, Constance went to Bertha's at-home day, an important social function in which the Van Lowe family did not usually take part. Bertha's husband had been disturbed by the article in the Inspector and now Bertha herself was uncomfortable because the guests at her at-home day included friends and relatives of De Staffelaer, Constance's first husband

On the following Sunday, when Constance went to her mother's weekly family get-together, she at once noticed an air of tenseness everywhere. She then learned that the next edition of the Inspector had appeared. Henri, who was reading a copy of it, had already become furious. Then Adolphine came in and said that the revived scandal was all Henri's fault. A quarrel ensued in which Henri challenged Adolphine's husband to a duel. Everyone tried to hush up the whole disturbance, but just then Bertha and her husband, Van Naghel, arrived. Van Naghel, who had obviously seen the new article in the Inspector, greeted Constance coldly. Bertha told Constance that Van Naghel was very put out by her visit to Bertha's at home.

day Constance said that for Addie's sake she was determined to rehabilitate herself in society and that she wanted Bertha and Van Naghel to help her.

Constance then got Van Naghel and Henri together. She apologized to Van Naghel for going to Bertha's, but also asked him to help her in society and to invite her to their social functions. Van Naghel protested that he could not possibly invite her to their dinners, saying that she would be bored at them. Henri became furious at Van Naghel, who in turn said that he wanted nothing to do with the Van der Welckes. After exchanging insults with Henri, Van Naghel left. Constance fainted into Paul's arms. Addie, who witnessed the scene, scornfully said that all of this fuss was over nothing.

SOHRAB AND RUSTUM

Type of work Poem

Author Matthew Arnold (1822-1888)

Type of plot Heroic romance

Time of plot Remote antiquity

Locale Western Asia, on the banks of the Oxus River

First published 1853

Principal characters

RUSTUM a Persian chieftain

SOHRAB a youth in the Tartar army

PERAN WISA, leader of the Tartars

FEROOD, leader of the Persians

GUDURZ, another Persian chieftain

Critique

The cloak of melancholy which envelops much of the work of Matthew Arnold in both prose and poetry is well illustrated in the story of Sohrab and Rustum. This mournful verse tale fused somberness and sentiment in just the right proportions to appeal to the taste of Victorian readers. Not only in its "high seriousness" — to use Arnold's own phrase — does Sohrab and Rustum accord with popular taste of the author's own time. Ordinarily, the Victorian passion for ornamentation and embellishment might seem difficult for the intellectual

Arnold to satisfy in his poetry, but here the Oriental theme serves to justify, perhaps to demand, an unusual extravagance of language and emotion. Simile after simile decks the lines of iambic pentameter, flowing as smoothly and darkly as the fabled Oxus flows through the story's setting. Under Arnold's technical skill the implausibilities of the tale are generally covered up or shoved well into the background. The events of the poem were drawn from such accounts as Sir John Malcolm's History of Persia (1815). Arnold telescoped the chronicle in order to bring his protagonists together for one fateful, climactic meeting, but in the main he is faithful to the story as it is usually given

The Story

The two powerful armies of the Tartars and the Persians were encamped along the banks of the Oxus River. It was night and the soldiers were asleep, but daylight would bring a great conflict between mighty forces.

To one Tartar, however, rest refused to come. In the grayness of the early dawn he left his bed and, solitary, made his way through the black tents of the great encampment to the quarters of Peran Wisa, commander of the Tartar army. He was Sohrab, the youthful champion of the Tartars. Hardly more than a boy, he had developed into the mightiest fighter of the Tartar host. Young in years, famous in arms, he was nevertheless restless and discontented. Above everything else, he wanted to find the father he had never seen—the incomparable Rustum, invincible chieftain of the Persians.

Rustum, on his part, did not even know that he had a son. He had been told that a woman of Aderbajan, after his departure from that place, had borne him a child. But that was years before, and Rustum, believing his offspring to be a girl child, had given the matter little thought. After Sohrab was born, the fearful mother, thinking to avoid having her son wrested away and reared for war, had deceived Rustum with that report. Nevertheless, Sohrab had become a warrior, his mother's ruse had availed nothing except to keep her son from a knowledge of his father.

Peran Wisa, his slumber broken by Sohrab's entrance, listened to an unusual request. Sohrab wished to challenge a leader of the Persians to single combat, the duel to occur as soon as arrangements could be made. Thirsty for reputation, he hoped that in this manner his fame as a fighter would reach the ears of his father. Peran Wisa, urging patience, questioned his wisdom in thus tempting fate, but at last he agreed unwillingly to Sohrab's plea.

Thus challenged by their Tartar foe, the Persians were barely able to conceal their alarm. They had no champion to pit against the redoubtable young Sohrab except Rustum, and Rustum, estranged by slights from the young Persian ruler, had drawn apart, aloof and sullen. When the Persians appealed to him, cleverly implying that Rustum was hoarding his fame and reluctant to risk it with younger men, Rustum, roused to wrath, grudgingly consented to meet the Tartar champion, although he stipulated that he would fight unknown to the enemy and in plain armor. Otherwise, as had happened before, his great name might daunt the brash young challenger at the outset. Rustum was in no mood to forego the combat, now that his temper had been aroused.

Halfway between the waiting armies, Sohrab and Rustum came face to face. Before they fought words passed between them, and a strange disquiet settled over their spirits. But the moment passed and the conflict began. Sohrab's misgivings returned, when his numbness gave him the initial advantage, he forbore to follow it up. Stung with anger and shame, Rustum gave him no second chance. With a shout of "Rustum" he renewed his attack upon Sohrab who, thunderstruck at the sound, momentarily lowered his shield. Instantly he was transfixed by Rustum's spear and fell to the ground, mortally wounded.

As his life ebbed away, the unfortunate youth revealed to his adversary the secret of his birth. Rustum, at first incredulous, was finally convinced when Sohrab bared his arm to reveal the sign of Rustum's own seal, pricked there soon after his birth. Then the unhappy Rustum, beset by extremes of agony and remorse, could barely be restrained from taking his own life and dying with his son. Broken by grief, he promised to bear the body of Sohrab far away, so that it might be in death where it had never been in life, near the palace of snow-headed Zal, the boy's grandfather. There it would receive burial worthy of a son of Rustum.

So the quest of Sohrab for his father ended. Life passed from him, the day waned, night came on. The majestic river flowed on into the frosty starlight, and campfires began to twinkle through the fog, but grieving Rustum remained on the river sands, alone with his son.

THE SOLDIER'S FORTUNE

Type of work Drama

Author Thomas Otway (1652-1685)

Type of plot Comedy of intrigue

Time of plot c. 1680

Locale London

First presented 1681

Principal characters

CAPTAIN BEAUGARD, a military officer out of service

LADY DUNCE, in love with Beaugard

SIR DAVY DUNCE, her elderly husband

COURTINE, Beaugard's friend and companion

SYLVIA, Sir Davy Dunce's niece

SIR JOLLY JUMBLE, an old rake turned pimp, a neighbor of the Dunces

Critique

Restoration comedy, clearly and openly written to entertain and to create laughter, was intended chiefly for the corrupt courtiers of the time who patronized the London stage. As a result the comedy was witty, cynical, often crude, and by most standards immoral. Thomas Otway's The Soldier's Fortune is more or less a typical example. While some of the comic effect is that of the comedy of manners, much of the comedy depends on grossness, sex, and even the absurd for its humor. The characters are stock figures found again and again in Restoration drama: the elderly cuckold, the young wife, the disbanding officer, the loyal and shrewd servant, the male bawd, the young female who despises both men and marriage for a time. It should be noted, however, that the vague military background of Beaugard and Courtine is usually credited to Thomas Otway's own military service on the Continent during the 1670's.

The Story

Captain Beaugard and Courtine, his companion in arms, returned to England from Flanders after a military campaign in the Low Countries. On their arrival they found themselves short of funds, for they had been paid in debentures which they had cashed at a discount. While they were bewailing their low state of affairs, Beaugard received a handful of gold pieces in exchange for his picture. Sir Jolly Jumble, an aged rake turned bawd, had brought him the money, saying that a fine and beautiful woman had arranged with him to get the picture for her because she was highly enamored of Beaugard. The woman was Lady Dunce, whose name at the time meant nothing to Beaugard. She had been in love with him a long time, however, when he went off to the wars; she despaired of ever marrying him and finally accepted the suit of Sir Davy Dunce, a tobacco-chewing, onion-eating man of about sixty-five, not at all to the taste of a young and beautiful woman in spite of the size of his fortune.

Like most marriages so arranged, this one had proved a poor match. Sir Davy Dunce was an exceedingly jealous husband and fearful that he should be made a cuckold. His wife, still in love with Beaugard, disliked her husband and welcomed a chance to have an affair with the military gallant. With Sir Davy and Lady Duncce lived their niece Sylvia, who disliked the idea of marriage because of her observations of her aunt's plight. Next door to the Duncces lived Sir Jolly Jumble, an elderly rake who was only too glad to assist Lady Duncce in her amorous adventure, for Sir Jolly still enjoyed vicariously what he could not enjoy at first hand.

Lady Duncce, deciding to use her rather thick-witted husband to further her own designs, gave him Beaugard's picture and told him the gallant had been paying her unwelcome attentions. By sending her husband to return the picture and give Beaugard a message, she hoped he would further her designs and at the same time be convinced of her virtuous intentions. Sir Davy Duncce did exactly as his wife directed, but at first Beaugard did not comprehend the double meaning in the message that Sir Davy Duncce delivered. Misunderstanding, Beaugard thought he had been jilted by a woman who had made overtures of her own to him. In hope of revenge, Beaugard dispatched his servant to play some rascally trick upon Sir Davy. Meanwhile, Courtine had met Sylvia, but when he began to court her the young woman rejected his advances and treated him scornfully.

While Beaugard and Courtine were commiserating each other over their trials and misfortunes, Lady Duncce appeared. Seeing her, Beaugard realized that she was Clarinda, the girl whom he had loved and who had returned his affections before he went to the wars. Beaugard, hurt because he still supposed himself jilted and refusing to believe that she still loved him or wished to engage in an affair, doubted that she had sent him a ring as a token. He also tried to return the gold pieces she had sent him by Sir Jolly.

Shortly after she had gone, Sir Davy Duncce reappeared, he had forgotten to deliver the ring, which he believed a gift that Beaugard had sent to Lady Duncce. Beaugard, realizing the sincerity of Lady Duncce's affections for him, played up to Sir Davy Duncce by pretending that he had experienced a change of heart and was now heartily sorry for his attempt to steal the affections of such a virtuous wife. Simple-minded Sir Davy fell into the trap as quickly as he had fallen a victim to his wife's machinations. While Beaugard talked to Sir Davy, Courtine talked to Sylvia, who promised him a rendezvous on her balcony that night, at Sir Davy's house near Covent Garden.

Beaugard's servant went to Sir Davy and pretended that he was a messenger from the Lord Mayor, sent to invite Sir Davy to a dinner and a conference. Sir Davy fell for the ruse and rushed away, only to return unexpectedly and find Lady Duncce and Beaugard in each other's arms. After Beaugard had fled, Lady Duncce persuaded her husband that Beaugard had forced his attention upon her after breaking into the house. Sir Davy Duncce vowed revenge. He found Beaugard's servant, whose identity he did not know, and through him hired an assassin to kill Beaugard. Sir Davy hated to part with his money, but finally he himself became so frightened by the assassin that he paid one hundred pounds for the deed. Beaugard's servant went immediately to his master to report what had happened. Beaugard, the servant, and Sir Jolly Jumble planned to turn the situation to their own account.

Beaugard went to Sir Davy Duncce's home, where Lady Duncce and Sir Jolly Jumble arranged him to look like a corpse. When Sir Davy Duncce returned, he saw the supposed body and became fearful that he might be implicated in the crime and be hanged as an accomplice. In his fright he was easily persuaded by his wife and Sir Jolly to go off to another part of the house to pray while Lady Duncce tried to resuscitate the corpse in her room. After Sir Davy had gone, his wife and her lover had a long interval to themselves in her apartment. In the meantime Sir Davy prayed and imagined he saw ghosts, devils, and all kinds of evil spirits. Toward morning Sir Jolly Jumble proposed that he and Lady Duncie take the supposed corpse to Jumble's house next door for further treatment, a plan to which Sir Davy Duncie eagerly agreed.

During the same night Courtine had kept his rendezvous, albeit somewhat drunk, with Sylvia at her balcony. Sylvia tricked him twice. First she left him dangling for a time in a loop of rope midway between the ground and the balcony. Then she had her servants tie him up after he had collapsed from too much drink. When he awakened from his stupor, she chided him unmercifully, but before long they were confessing their love for each other. Sylvia promised to marry Courtine if he would be a faithful, active, and devoted husband to her. He was only too willing to agree.

Once Beaugard's "body" had been removed to Sir Jolly Jumble's house, Sir Davy felt more secure. Calling the watch, he told them that a murder had been committed. Then he led them next door, where he expected to find a corpse whose death he could lay to Sir Jolly. When they entered the house, however, they found no dead man. Instead they discovered an angry Beaugard with his sword in his hand. Beaugard told Sir Davy that the conspiracy to kill him meant that Sir Davy would have to acknowledge his wife as Beaugard's mistress, an admission the knight was only too glad to make, since conspiring to murder was a capital offense at the time. Courtine and Sylvia arrived to announce their plans to marry. Thus the four young people found happiness in love—Courtine and Sylvia through marriage, Lady Duncie and Beaugard in an acknowledged arrangement that left her free from Sir Davy's unwanted attentions.

SONEZAKI SHINJŪ

Type of work Drama

Author Chikamatsu Monzaemon (1653-1725)

Type of plot Domestic romance

Time of plot Eighteenth century

Locale Osaka, Japan

First presented 1703

Principal characters

O HATSU, a popular geisha

TOKUBEI, her lover, an apprentice

KYUEMON, Tokubei's uncle and employer

KUNHEIJI, Tokubei's friend, also in love with O Hatsu

GIHEI, a wealthy countryman

Critique

Of the three literary giants who appeared simultaneously on the Japanese literary scene during the early half of the Tokugawa Period (1600-1868), Chikamatsu Monzaemon was the playwright. He wrote the books (called jōruri) for the puppet theater which came into its own in Osaka because of the happy appearance of both Chikamatsu, and a great chanter (Takemoto Gidayū), a talented samisen accompanist (Takezawa Gon'emon) who put Chikamatsu's words to music, and a superb puppeteer (Tatsumatsu Hachirōbei) who boldly appeared on the stage with his puppets and yet, through sheer artistry, made the audience forget his physical presence in the movements of the puppets he manipulated. Chikamatsu also wrote for the live Kabuki theater then centered in Kyoto and Edo (now Tokyo). Chikamatsu's dramatic works fall into two classes according to the subject matter treated: the historical and the domestic, the latter dealing with contemporary events and with people chiefly of the merchant, or common, class. The Sonezaki Shinju, translated as The Love Suicides at Sonezaki, was the first of the domestic plays written by Chikamatsu. He was fifty years old at the time. First staged in Osaka in 1703, it is a dramatization, with additions, of an actual occurrence in Osaka earlier that same year. Originally written for the puppet theater, it was soon presented also on the Kabuki stage as well. The play has lost none of its original popularity in the modern Japanese theater.

The Story

Gihei, a rich man from the country, was trying to decide how to spend the evening in Osaka. Two friends urged him to hire O Hatsu, the famous geisha or courtesan for the evening. She begged off, however, and remained with her maids, meanwhile thinking about her lover Tokubei, a clerk, who had been neglecting her.

To her great joy, he arrived a short time later, but with word that Kyuemon, his uncle and employer, had arranged for his marriage to an heiress and that his aunt had already received and spent the dowry. When Tokubei refused to marry the girl, the dowry had to be returned. Tokubei had managed to collect the money but later lent it to his friend Kuheiji. Now Kyuemon wanted Tokubei to leave Osaka.

O Hatsu, in spite of this disturbing news, was happy once more, she had feared Tokubei no longer loved her. While the lovers were talking, Kuheiji and a group of his friends appeared. When Tokubei asked for the money owed him, Kuheiji pretended to know nothing about the loan. Desperately, Tokubei attacked Kuheiji, whose friends joined the fight and overwhelmed Tokubei. During the uproar Gihei returned and compelled O Hatsu to go off with him.

Not knowing what had happened to Tokubei, O Hatsu was afraid that he had been killed in the quarrel. When Kyuemon arrived, she went outside to speak to him. Saying that she was a bad influence on the young man and that she was not truly in love with him, Kyuemon begged her to give up Tokubei. He also asked where Tokubei could be found. O Hatsu insisted that her love was real, and that she was ignorant of her lover's whereabouts. Kyuemon went inside but O Hatsu, still fearful, remained in the street.

She was still standing there when a shabby Tokubei appeared. As she told him of Kyuemon's visit, Kuheiji and his gang reappeared and insisted that O Hatsu join them. She was able to hide Tokubei under the porch while she sat above him on a step, and from his hiding place he was able to communicate his understanding by fondling her foot tenderly. It developed that Kuheiji had come to ransom O Hatsu, using Tokubei's money. O Hatsu, seeing no solution but suicide, managed to convey her resolve to Tokubei through her conversation with Kuheiji. Kuheiji, the braggart, went away to close the deal, and O Hatsu was forced to withdraw without talking to Tokubei again.

That night O Hatsu stole away secretly to meet Tokubei, and the lovers fled to the woods of Sonezaki. Meanwhile, Kuheiji and his servant, while discussing the plan to gain O Hatsu and malign Tokubei, had been overheard by Kyuemon. After confronting the evil Kuheiji, Kyuemon went in haste to find the lovers. He was too late. They had already committed suicide together.

SONNETS FROM THE PORTUGUESE

Type of work Poetry

Author Elizabeth Barrett Browning (1806-1861)

First published 1850

Elizabeth Barrett Browning's Sonnets from the Portuguese are among the most famous and most frequently read of all English love poems. Their popularity, originally heightened, perhaps, because they were the first products from Mrs. Browning's pen after her romantic marriage and flight to Italy with Robert Browning, has been great ever since they first appeared to the public in 1850.

The poems themselves have come, in the popular mind, to stand for the sincere love for and faith in her husband held by the woman who had previously believed herself a hopeless spinster in valid. Her devotion to her husband, her genuine and articulate thanks to him for having made her a vital woman shine through the poems and give them a simple autobiographical value not often found in poetry. Mrs. Browning, in these poems, has no poses, no artifice, little facility for exploring technique; she is simply a woman grateful for her husband's love.

Sonnets from the Portuguese consists of forty-four sonnets that Mrs. Browning wrote to her husband during the first few years of their relationship. Many of the sonnets indicate her feelings of humility, her doubts that she deserved the love and attention of such a great and strong man. Other sonnets simply tell of her gratitude, describe her deep appreciation of the fact that Browning saved her from the life of the sheltered invalid. Still other sonnets, pursuing the theme of gratitude, tell of her pleasure in living in terms of this world rather than, as she formerly did, in terms of the next. In one way, these sonnets tell the story of Mrs. Browning's growing interest in earth and its life, her growing abandonment of her former concentration on Heaven and the spiritual life. In Sonnet XXIII, after talking of her love for her husband, she concludes

Then my soul, instead
Of dreams of death, resumes life's lower range

Then love me, Love! look on me
breathe on me!
As brighter ladies do not count it
strange,
For love to give up acres and degree,
I yield the grave for thy sake, and exchange
My near sweet view of Heaven, for earth with thee!

In spite of this movement toward earth and life, Mrs. Browning retained a good deal of her religious interest and religious conviction. The sonnets are full of her devotion to God and her assurance that she shall be with her husband after death as well.

Although many modern readers find these sonnets banal and undistinguished, they have always had great appeal for the popular audience, less for serious critics or practitioners of poetry. The poems are not distinguished by either sharpness or intricacy of diction to cloak unashamed expression of a woman's simple love and devotion. When the simple emotion is decorated, it is likely to be given a decoration, an applauding angel or a direct emotional address, that was a Victorian commonplace.

The limitations of the sonnet form keep these poems more technically accurate and meaningful than many of Mrs. Browning's other poems, but the form is not enough to give them any technical distinction. Mrs. Browning neglects the dramatic possibilities of the sonnet as well as the technical intricacy possible within the scope of fourteen rhyming, iambic pentameter lines. Occasionally, however, she uses some striking poetic images. Sonnet XXIV, for example, opens with the following image:

Let the world's sharpness, like a clasp-
ing knife,
Shut in upon itself and do no harm
In this close hand of Love, now soft and warm,
And let us hear no sound of human strife
After the click of the shutting

The "sound of human strife" may be an easy cliché, and the "soft and warm" hand of Love may sound banal to the contemporary reader, but the whole image of the claspings knife and the sense of warmth in a closed, sheltering hand of love provides an image of some power and unusual quality for the poem. Similarly, Mrs Browning also uses floral images effectively in order to express the flowering of her love. In addition to these occasional images, Mrs Browning's sonnets sometimes have a sense of rhetorical movement that distinguishes them from the merely pedestrian. Although she does not use the form dramatically, she often uses it with a sense of musical and emphatic movement. The emotion is still essentially simple and the clichés are still present, but the poem itself is sometimes a rhetorically emphatic statement that carries strong feeling with ease, simplicity, and grace. Such an effect is found in Sonnet XLI.

I thank all who have loved me in their hearts,
With thanks and love from mine. Deep thanks to all
Who paused a little near the prison
wall,
To hear my music in its louder parts,
Ere they went onward, each one to the mart's

Or temple's occupation, beyond call
But thou, who, in my voice's sink and
fall,
When the sob took it thy divinest Art's Own instrument didst drop down at thy foot
To hearken what I said between my tears,
Instruct me how to thank thee!—Oh, to shoot
My soul's full meaning into future years,
That they should lend it utterance, and salute
Love that endures, from Life that dis appears!

Although the opening lines are clotted with thanks, the poem does move with grace and power, and, in the last few lines, carries its romantic theme with compression and strength.

Critics have long pointed to the fact that such distinction is rare in Mrs Browning's work, that much in Sonnets from the Portuguese is sentimental, hastily written, undistinguished in diction or pace. Yet these considerations have not diminished her appeal for her many faithful followers, an appeal based on the simple and genuine emotion and devotion given to her knight by a distinguished romantic heroine who had long been imprisoned in her father's dingy castle.

THE SPANISH FRIAR

Type of work Drama

Author John Dryden (1631-1700)

Type of plot Tragic comedy

Time of plot Fifteenth century

Locale Aragon, Spain

First presented 1681

Principal characters

TORRISMOND, son of Sancho the deposed king, defender of Aragon against the Moors

LEONORA, Queen of Aragon, the daughter of the usurper engaged to Bertran

BERTRAN, made a duke by Leonora's father, now in military disgrace

RAYMOND, foster father of Torrismond

DOMINIC, a licentious friar

LORENZO, a young gallant and soldier

GOMEZ, an elderly usurper

ELVIRA, his young wife

Critique

The Spanish Friar, or, The Double Discovery is of more interest to historians of the theater than to critics. Its popularity in Dryden's day was perhaps attributable to its anti-Catholic sentiments, but the poet-laureate's later conversion made him sympathetic to the action of James II in banning the play. Many Dryden scholars consider this work his most successful fusion of the love-honor theme and ribald comedy. The modern reader's delight in the Falstaffian priest-pump should not obscure the fact that the language, style, and structure of the drama are of a high order.

The Story

Aragon was in a state of siege because the usurper king, lately dead, had refused to acknowledge and reward the services of the Moors in gaining the kingdom for him. Queen Leonora, promised on her father's deathbed to Duke Bertran, regretted this alliance as well as the fact she held in a dungeon. Deposed King Sancho, a righteous and beloved ruler, Bertran's forces had been routed three times by the Moors before Torrismond, supposed son of one of the leading nobles, rallied the scattered Christians and saved the kingdom from the infidels.

Young Lorenzo, a valiant colonel in Torrismond's army, brought news of the victory and confided to his friends his desire to celebrate with the first prostitute available. He boasted that he had robbed his Moorish victims of gold and jewels. Elvira, the young wife of a jealous old money-lender named Gomez, made welcome advances to the handsome soldier. Her husband, however, immediately thwarted plans for the assignment, plans put in motion by Friar Dominic.

Torrismond, on his triumphal return, offended Bertran by open ridicule of the latter's ineptness and by his own naive declaration of love for the queen. Leonora, in turn, was smitten with love for the young hero, thereby creating a strange problem. Bertran, betrothed to the queen, vowed vengeance and responded to her suggestion that by killing King Sancho, he would hasten the marriage. Leonora really intended by this deceit to make Torrismond her king husband, he, in turn, was filled with anxiety because he remained loyal to the old king and his supposed father, Raymond.

Clandestine love, in spite of all, prevailed in the palace though not in Gomez' mansion. Friar Dominic, ghostly father to Elvira, had made a series of arrangements for the young wife and her hopeful gallant to meet, but each meeting, unfortunately for the three, was discovered by the near-cuckolded husband. Bertran, too, did his best to keep the other lovers apart by testing the reaction of the populace to the supposed murder of King Sancho.

Raymond, incensed by such intrigues, finally confessed that in the troublesome days of the Moorish invasion King Sancho had entrusted to him his son Torrismond. Raymond urged Torrismond to take over the kingdom, to depose or kill the usurpers and so avenge the old king's death. Torn between love and duty (love for Leonora but filial duty to his foster father to avenge his real father's death), Torrismond could not commit so bloody a deed. He declared his belief that Leonora's repentance and his own attempt to thwart the regicide settled that score. After learning Torrismond's decision, Raymond departed to rouse the citizens. At the same time he was moved to compassion over his adopted son's predicament.

Meanwhile, the intrigue involving Elvira and Lorenzo had come to nothing, no amount of bribing, blackmailing, or disguising could bring the two together, in spite of the fact that Friar Dominic was a master of all possible trickery and knavery. Finally, the friar was disgraced when Lorenzo's father revealed that Elvira was his daughter, married to Gomez.

the usurer in order to prevent her suffering a worse fate in those troubled times. Thus it was revealed that the affection Elvira and Lorenzo had felt for each other was based on the family relationship of brother and sister.

To this double discovery—the true parentage of Torrismond and Elvira—was added a third. King Sancho was not dead. Bertran, suspicious of the queen's motives and aware of the people's loyalty to the old king, had merely spread the rumor of King Sancho's death. Knowing also that the queen was devoted to Torrismond rather than to himself, Bertran begged forgiveness for his part in the many sad events that had occurred in the kingdom. Leonora, much relieved, wished only for King Sancho's permission for her marriage to his son Torrismond, assuring her that the good king, quick to forgive, would grant such a boon.

THE SPANISH GIPSY

Type of work Drama

Authors Thomas Middleton (1580-1627) with William Rowley (1585?-1642?) and possibly John Ford (1586 c. 1640?)

Type of plot Tragic comedy

Time of plot Early years of the seventeenth century

Locale Madrid

First presented 1623

Principal characters

FERNANDO DE AZEVEDA, the corregidor of Madrid

RODERIGO, his son

LOUIS DE CASTRO and

DIEGO, Roderigo's friends

ALVAREZ DE CASTILLA, an exiled lord disguised as the father of the gypsies

CONSTANZA, Fernando's daughter, disguised as a gypsy

JOHN, a young nobleman in love with Constanza

PEDRO DE CORTES, an elderly Spanish don

CLARA, his daughter

Critique

A graceful tragic comedy with an extremely complicated story, The Spanish Gypsy apparently derives most of its action and background from portions of two novels by Cervantes. There are two plots which develop side by side and are occasionally interwoven. One of them, which furnishes the play with its title, concerns a Spanish nobleman who has been exiled from his country; he returns secretly to Spain as leader of a band of gypsies who, under his influence, eschew stealing or cheating to lead a utopian, idyllic existence as popular singers and entertainers. A charming pastoral mood pervades this portion of the drama. The major plot, however, is tinged with violence and tragedy, involving Roderigo and Clara as protagonists. The opening situation is so striking as to be almost unique, and it is no small feat that after a very melodramatic first act the interest of the play can be maintained at such a high level. Some scholars contend that Middleton and Rowley had some assistance from John Ford on this play.

The Story

Roderigo, son of the corregidor of Madrid, was a pleasure bent, reckless youth. One night, while roaming about the outskirts of the city with two young noble men, he acted on a rash and outrageous impulse. When a pretty girl came along, accompanied by her elderly parents, Roderigo decided to have some fun, on the spur of the moment he determined to kidnap her. After a bit of urging he won the somewhat reluctant cooperation of Louis de Castro and Diego, who restrained the distraught mother and father while Rodengo carried off the protesting maiden. Taking her to his apartment in the corregidor's palace, Roderigo yielded to his lust and raped her. Meanwhile, back on the road, Louis learned to his dismay that the mistreated family was that of Pedro de Cortés, an influential Spanish don. Worse still, the girl stolen by Roderigo under the cloak of night was Clara, the object of Louis' own affections.

Clara, overcome by shame, asked Rodengo to kill her, whereupon he sullenly strode from the apartment. While he was gone, Clara examined the room for any clues to the identity of her attacker. From the window she saw below a starlit garden containing a curious alabaster fountain. In the chamber itself she discovered a precious crucifix, which she quickly concealed in her bosom as she heard Rodengo's footsteps approaching once more.

Beginning to feel repentant for his deed, Rodengo readily agreed when Clara asked him never to speak of her ravishment and to take her back to the road where he met her. Afterward, meeting the anxious Louis, Roderigo denied harming the girl. Nevertheless, he found himself falling in love with her. To avoid seeking her out again, he planned to leave Madrid for studies in Salamanca.

At an inn of Madrid, the gypsies danced and sported for their admiring following. Disguised as their leader was Alvarez de Castilla, banished from Spain in previous years for the death of Louis de Castro's father. With Alvarez was his wife Guamara and her niece Constanza, both supposed to have been lost earlier in a shipwreck. Constanza, called Pretiosa among the gypsies, was the great attraction to their audiences. Young and very beautiful, she was a magnet for the young gentlemen of the city. Deeply in love with her was John, son of a Spanish nobleman. Constanza, half in play, told him that if he would turn gypsy for two years she would requite his love, and he immediately took steps to comply with her conditions.

When Louis tried to tell Clara of his love, she skillfully managed to parry his proposal of marriage. To her father, Louis revealed that Fernando, the corregidor, wished to pardon and recall Alvarez from banishment. To this proposal he had sought the agreement of Louis, and Louis now requested the counsel of Pedro on the matter. Secretly, Louis thirsted for revenge on Alvarez and hoped the return of the latter would bring him within reach of Louis' sword.

Roderigo found his thoughts directed more and more to the unknown girl whom he had wronged. He decided to deceive his father and friends into thinking that he had gone to Salamanca, though he would actually remain near Madrid. Meeting the gypsies, he posed as an Italian poet and joined them as a helper with their plays and entertainments. Soon afterward, when the gypsies performed for the corregidor's court, Fernando quickly detected his son among the supposed gypsies but held his peace. The gypsies presently began to engage in fortune telling, whereupon Louis asked that Clara be sent for so that she might be diverted by the general festivity.

On her way to the palace, Clara found herself in a mob of people attracted to the scene of a street accident. In the crowding and confusion, she fainted and was carried into a chamber of the nearby palace. When she revived, she was amazed and frightened to find herself in the same room where she had previously been taken by her kidnapper. Learning that it was Rodengo's room, she decided that it was time to reveal her secret. To Fernando, who had hastened to her side with her father and mother, she told the story of her treatment by Rodengo. Fernando was shocked and dismayed by Clara's story, but convinced of its truth when she produced the crucifix that she had previously taken from the room. When the corregidor declared that his son's life should be forfeited for the deed he had committed, Clara convinced him that a live Rodengo, rather than a dead one, could much more effectively clear her name

The gipsies ceremoniously inducted John into their tribe, and Constanza renewed her vow to marry him if he lived the vagabond life for two years. But from the first John encountered difficulties in his new existence. The trouble started when he fell under the eye of Cardochia, a rich heiress who had been acting as the sponsor and hostess of the gipsies. Infatuated with John, she offered him herself and her possessions. When he rebuffed her attentions, she vowed revenge. To Diego, an old suitor, she falsely accused John of improper and obscene behavior toward her.

When the gipsies performed a play for Fernando's court, the corregidor insisted that Rodengo, still in his ineffectual disguise, take the role of a debased libertine. The play was interrupted by a tumult caused by a fight between John and Diego. Diego was wounded and, after Cardochia had aggravated John's plight by charging him with theft, Fernando angrily ordered him to prison, to be held for trial. Next, in pretended anger at finding his son among the gipsies, Fernando confronted Rodengo. When he threatened Rodengo with marriage to an atrociously ugly heiress, the young man pleaded to be allowed the alternative of paying court to a beauty whom he had glimpsed in the palace audience of the gipsies. Fernando slyly assented, knowing the lady in question to be Clara herself.

Rodengo, still unaware of Clara's real identity, courted and married her. After the ceremony Fernando told Rodengo the truth, and the young couple promised to turn their backs on the past and be true to each other. For John and Constanza, however, the path to a happy ending proved less easy. Alvarez, hearing that John was condemned to die, offered Louis an opportunity to face his father's killer in return for Louis' help in saving John. Louis eagerly accepted, but when Alvarez unmasked himself as the man sought by Louis, the latter decided that revenge was no longer important to him. John's true identity was made known, Cardochia was revealed as a liar, and gipsies and court celebrated these happy results with a lively dance.

THE SPOILS OF POYNTON

Type of work Novel

Author Henry James (1843-1916)

Type of plot Social morality

Time of plot Late nineteenth century

Locale England

First published 1897

Principal characters

MRS. GERETH, mistress of Poynton

FLEDA VETCH, her companion

OWEN GERETH, her son

MONA BRIGSTOCK, Owen's fiancée

Critique

This novel, written in the middle period of Henry James's career, shows the detailed character analysis, careful development, and acute insight into human affairs for which he has become famous. Here we have a kind of tragedy, but not one in the classical sense. This novel is tragic first because many beautiful things are unavoidably given up to one who has no appreciation of them, and secondly because these same objects are completely destroyed in a freak accident. The human emotions involved are seen to be somewhat mean in spite of the grandeur of the objects with which they are connected, and throughout the novel we have James's astute comments on, and impressions of, the society in which the action takes place

The Story

While visiting one weekend at Waterbath, the country house of the Brngstock family, Mrs Gereth met and was immediately drawn to a young woman named Fleda Vetch. The basis of the attraction was a mutual sensitiveness to beautiful things, each guessed that the other possessed such a feeling when they met one morning while obviously trying to escape the house and the rest of the party. Their aversion was caused not by the fact that Waterbath was exceptionally ugly, but rather because it was so very ordinary while pretending to be lovely. The house and the garden might have been quite attractive, and should have been so, but the Brngstocks, people without even a hint of feeling or taste, had had every thing done over to fit the very latest fashion. It was this air of fashionable conformity that Fleda and Mrs Gereth objected to. They recognized what the estate would have been naturally, and they could only be repulsed by what it had become.

Mrs Gereth's horror of Waterbath was particularly acute because of the comparison she inevitably made between it and her own home at Poynton. Everything at Poynton was exquisite. She and her late husband had gradually furnished it after years of scraping and saving so that they might have the best. Every article in the house had been carefully chosen during their travels in various parts of the world, and she rightly considered it the most beautiful place in England. Unfortunately, the estate had been left to her son Owen, and she knew that she would have to give it up, along with her beloved treasures, when he married. Her secret dread was that he would marry a woman with as little a sense of the beautiful as he himself had. She therefore spent much of her time at Waterbath trying to turn his attention from Mona Brngstock, who personified everything she dreaded, to Fleda Vetch, the one person of her acquaintance who would appreciate and preserve Poynton as it was.

When Mrs Gereth, with somewhat ulterior motives, invited Fleda to come to Poynton as a friend and permanent companion, Fleda, who had no real home of her own, readily accepted. To the chagrin of both women, Owen soon wrote that he was planning to marry Mona and that he was bringing her down within a week to see the estate. Mona, of course, approved. Although she failed to appreciate its beauty and immediately began planning certain changes, she did realize that every article in the house had some value, and she insisted that Mrs Gereth leave all but her personal belongings as they were. Mrs Gereth was to be given the smaller, but still charming, estate called Ricks.

At first Mrs Gereth refused to be moved, but she finally agreed to make the change when it was decided that she could take a few of her prized objects with her. Owen, who was very much disturbed at being pushed by Mona to the point of having a serious conflict with his mother, had solicited Fleda's aid in getting his mother to make the move quickly. This request only complicated matters, however, for Fleda soon fell in love with Owen and could not really be effective as an agent for both parties in the controversy. She encouraged Mrs Gereth to move quickly and quietly, leaving Poynton essentially as it was, but, because of her feelings toward both her friend and the estate, she also encouraged Owen to give his mother more time.

During these negotiations it became necessary for Fleda to go to London to see her father. While she was gone Mrs Gereth left Poynton. Her moving was quick and quiet. When Fleda rejoined her at Ricks, she found that the woman had moved virtually all of the furnishings from Poynton. Needless to say, Owen and Mona were less than pleased. In fact, Mona postponed the wedding; she refused to marry Owen until Poynton again held its rightful belongings. Again Mrs Gereth was stubborn, and more negotiations ensued, with both sides once more depending on Fleda for aid.

This time it was Owen's turn to fall in love. His strained relations with Mona, which caused a rather close relationship with Fleda, left him emotionally unstable. He had also lately come to realize how much Poynton, as he had always known it, meant to him and to appreciate anyone who understood its beauty and value as Fleda did. He knew that his life would have been much more satisfactory at this time if he were about to marry Fleda instead of Mona. Mrs Gereth, who had always been willing to give up Poynton to anyone who could love it as she did, would gladly send back everything for Fleda. A realization of this fact finally caused Owen to declare his love for Fleda and to ask her to marry him.

Fleda, although she acknowledged her own feelings, would make no move until Owen had completely broken with Mona Brigstock, and it was to this end that she sent him away. When Mrs Gereth heard of these developments she thought that the situation had finally worked out to her liking, and she immediately sent everything back to Poynton. This act proved a mistake, however, for as soon as Mona heard that the furnishings had been returned she immediately became her former charming self and again captivated Owen. Unfortunately, because of his honor as a gentleman, Owen could not break the engagement unless the lady demonstrated that she wished to do so. Mona Brigstock now made it clear that she did not wish to end the engagement. She quickly married him and moved at once to Poynton in order to acknowledge and secure her possession of the house and its contents. Soon the couple began an extended tour of the Continent.

Fleda and Mrs Gereth again took up residence at Ricks and succeeded in making quite a charming place out of it, in spite of having little to work with and of having to do it with broken hearts. Sometime later Fleda received a letter from Owen asking her to go to Poynton and take whatever object she most prized, and because of her love both for Owen and the estate, she resolved to do so. When she arrived at the station, still more than a mile from Poynton, she saw great billows of smoke rising from that direction. It was a porter who told her that everything was lost. In a fire which was probably caused by a faulty lamp and aided tremendously by a strong wind, Poynton and all its beautiful furnishings were destroyed.

SPOON RIVER ANTHOLOGY

Type of work Poetry

Author Edgar Lee Masters (1869-1950)

First published 1915

Like Edward Fitzgerald and a few other poets, Edgar Lee Masters is that rarity among men of letters: he established his reputation on the basis of one work, Spoon River Anthology. Masters was a prolific writer, producing many volumes of verse, several plays, an autobiography, several biographies, essays, novels, and an attempt to recapture his great success in a sequel, The New Spoon River, but except for a handful of individual poems from the other volumes, he will be remembered as the re-creator of a small Middle Western town which

SPOON RIVER ANTHOLOGY by Edgar Lee Masters. Excerpts reprinted by permission of Ellen C. Masters. Published by The Macmillan Co. Copyright 1914-1915 by William Marion Reedy. Copyright 1915 by The Macmillan Co. Renewed. All rights reserved.

he calls Spoon River, but which was probably Lewiston, Illinois, where he studied law in his father's office and practiced for a year before moving on to Chicago

In form and style Spoon River Anthology is not a work that sprang wholly out of Masters' imagination it is modeled on The Greek Anthology and the style of the character sketches owes a considerable debt to Browning. But Masters has written his book with such an effortless brilliance and freshness that some forty five years after its first publication it still retains a kind of startling inevitability, as if this were the best and only way to present people in poetry. From their graveyard on the hill Masters lets more than two hundred of the dead citizens of Spoon River tell the truth about themselves, each person writing what might be his or her own epitaph. The secrets they reveal are shocking—stories of intrigue, corruption, frustration, adultery. Because of its unrelenting frankness, Spoon River Anthology provoked howls of protest from disturbed readers who felt that it presented too sordid a picture of American small town life. Distorted or not, Masters' approach to his subject undoubtedly helped open the way for dozens of novels whose authors seem to use grappling hooks to break that placid surface of life and dredge up secrets from the murk below.

Masters' book, however, is not a novel in verse, and while many of the poems are interrelated and a certain amount of suspense is created by having one character mention a person or incident to be further developed in a later epitaph, the anthology is not centered around a unifying theme. About the closest approach to such a theme is the tragic failure of the town's bank, chiefly attributed to Thomas Rhodes, its president, and his son Ralph, who confesses from the grave

All they said was true
I wrecked my father's bank with my loans
To dabble in wheat but this was true—
I was buying wheat for him as well,

Who couldn't margin the deal in his name

Because of his church relationship

Many people suffered from the bank's collapse, including the cashier, George Reece, who had the blame placed on him and served a term in prison, but a far more corroding effect was the cynicism generated in the citizens when they found that their leaders, the "stalwarts," were weak and culpable.

Masters has pictured many vivid characters in Spoon River Anthology. They range all the way from Daisy Fraser, the town harlot who

Never was taken before Justice Arnett Without contributing ten dollars and costs

To the school fund of Spoon River!

to Lucinda Matlock, who Rambled over the fields where sang the larks

And by Spoon River gathering many a shell,

And many a flower and medicinal weed—

Shouting to the wooded hills singing to the green valleys

At ninety six I had lived enough, that is all,

And passed to a sweet repose

Others are the town physicians, Doc Hill and Doc Myers, both of whose lives are scarred. Petit, the Poet, whose "faint iambs" rattled on "while Homer and Whitman roared in the pines", Ann Rutledge from whose dead bosom the Republic blooms forever, Russian Sonia, a dancer who met old Patrick Hummer, of Spoon River, and went back with him to the town, where the couple lived twenty years in unmarried content, and Chase Henry, the town drunkard, a Catholic who was denied burial in consecrated ground but who won some measure of honor when the Protestants acquired the land where he was buried and interred banker Nicholas and wife beside the old reprobate.

Spoon River Anthology is weighted so heavily on the sordid side—abortions, suicides, adulteries—that the more cheerful and “normal” epitaphs come almost as a relief. Lucinda Matlock and Ann Rutledge fit this category, others are Hare Drummer, who delights in the memory of a happy childhood, Conrad Siever, content in his grave under an apple tree he planted, pruned, and tended, and Fiddler Jones, who never could stick to farming and who ended up with “a broken laugh, and a thousand memories,/And not a single regret.”

One especially effective device that Masters makes use of in his collection is the pairing of poems so that the reader gets a startling jolt of irony. Thus when Elsa Wertman, a peasant girl from Germany, confesses that her employer, Thomas Greene, fathered her child and then raised it as his and Mrs. Greene's, we find in the next poem that Hamilton, the son, attributes his great success as a politician to the “honorable blood” he inherited from Mr. and Mrs. Greene. There is also Roscoe Purkapile, who ran away from his wife for a year, telling her when he came back that he had been captured by pirates while he was rowing a boat on Lake Michigan. After he told her the story

She cried and kissed me, and said it was cruel,
Outrageous, inhuman!

However, when Mrs. Purkapile has her say in the next poem, she makes it known that she was not taken in by his cock and bull story, that she knew he was trysting in the city with Mrs. Williams, the milliner, and that she refused to be drawn into a divorce by a husband “who had merely grown tired of his marital vow and duty.”

Masters displays an amazing variety of effects in these short poems. His use of free verse undoubtedly helps to achieve this variety, for a stricter form or forms might make the poems seem too pat, too artificial. Sometimes Masters lets his character's only remembrance of life be a simple, vivid description, as when Bert Kessler tells how he met his death. Out hunting one day, Bert killed a quail and when he reached down by a stump to pick it up he felt something sting his hand, like the prick of a briar.

And then, in a second I spied the rattler—
The shutters wide in his yellow eyes,
The head of him arched, sunk back in the rings of him,
A circle of filth the color of ashes,
Or oak leaves bleached under layers of leaves
I stood like a stone as he shrank and uncoiled
And started to crawl beneath the stump,
When I fell limp in the grass

Bert tells of his death without comment, but when Harry Williams describes how he was deluded into joining the army to fight in the Spanish-American War, in which he was killed, the poem is full of bitterness, horror, and brutal irony.

To say that every poem in this volume is successful would be as foolish as to contend that each entry in Shakespeare's sonnet sequence is a masterpiece. Masters frequently strains for an effect, for instance, “Sexsmith the Dentist” seems to have been created so that Sexsmith may remark, at the end, that what we consider truth may be a hollow tooth “which must be propped with gold” and Mrs. Kessler, a washerwoman, was probably included so that she might observe that the face of a dead person always looked to her “like something washed and ironed.” And there are other poems in which the characters just do not come alive. One suspects that the poet wrote a number of philosophical lyrics, some of them marred by clichés and cloying rhetoric, and then titled them with names selected at random.

In the main, however, Masters has done a remarkable job in Spoon River Anthology. Anyone living in a small town will recognize in these poems the people he sees every day and, though he may not like to admit it, when these people die they may carry to the grave secrets as startling and embarrassing as those revealed by the dead of Spoon River

THE STAR OF SEVILLE

Type of work Drama

Author Unknown but sometimes attributed to Lope de Vega (1562 1635)

Type of plot Cape and sword tragedy

Time of plot Thirteenth century

Locale Seville

First presented c 1617

Principal characters

KING SANCHO THE BRAVE

ESTRELLA TABERA The Star of Seville

DON BUSTOS TABERA her brother

DON ARIAS the king's confidant

DON PEDRO DE GUZMAN, and

DON FARFAN DE RIVIERA alcaldes of Seville

DON SANCHO ORTIZ a nobleman of Seville

CLARINDO, Don Sancho's servant

Critique

With the reasoning that The Star of Seville is an excellent play and that Lope de Vega was an excellent playwright, people have believed for centuries that he wrote it, but scholars have recently taken a closer look at the two extant versions and have begun to doubt his authorship. Needing clarification is the fact that the author's name, in the final quatrain of one version, is given as "Cardenio," an emendation that corrected a line imperfect when "Lope" was put there. Technically, too, the play is unlike dramas that Lope is known to have written. It is noticeably lacking in humor, and the lagging of interest in the last act is unworthy of a master of plot construction. Experts, on the lookout for another possible author, have suggested that the drama represents the reworking of a play, possibly by Lope, by a less skilled hand. One nomination is the obscure Córdoba dramatist, Pedro de Cárdenas y Angulo, who is known to have used "Cardenio" as his pen name, but no play by him exists for comparison. Another candidate is the actor-manager, Andrés de Clara monte, known to have been in Seville in 1622, who may have rewritten an earlier play. A number of his plays exist, signed "Clarindo" and containing some excellent scenes but careless poetry. In The Star of Seville a character named Clarindo recites the final appeal to the audience. But whoever the author may have been, he produced, in spite of certain shortcomings, a masterpiece of the Golden Age.

The Story

Sancho IV, King of Castile, was delighted with his welcome to Seville, and he was especially charmed by a black-haired beauty seen on a balcony. The alcaldes of the city identified her as Estrella Tabera, the Star of Seville. King Sancho whispered orders to his confidant, Arias, telling him to arrange for the monarch to visit her the next evening. He also sent for her brother, Don Bustos Tabera, in the hope of winning his agreement to the royal suit.

When he offered Don Bustos Tabera the command of the military post at Archidona, already sought by two veteran soldiers, the nobleman amazed the king by refusing the honor and by accepting with obvious reluctance. Other friendly gestures, his excuse was that he did not deserve them.

At home, Don Bustos found his sister and Don Sancho Ortiz planning their marriage Before long the disguised king appeared, but Don Bustos, pleading a house in disorder and foreseeing the possibility of a scandal, did not invite him in. However, Arias did succeed in entering the house. When he revealed his errand, Estrella indignantly refused his request that she be kind to the king. He had better luck when he tried to bribe Matilde, the maid, who promised to admit the king to the house after dark.

That night, after the king had been admitted, Don Bustos returned home unexpectedly and found the monarch there. Pretending not to believe that the intruder was the king, since a noble and just ruler would not stoop to dishonor, Don Bustos insulted him as a masquerader. The angry king, with no legal way to get his revenge for the insults he had endured, sent for Don Sancho Ortiz and offered to arrange the young nobleman's marriage to anyone he should choose, in return for ridding the king of an enemy. Don Sancho was given a paper on which was written the name of the man he was supposed to kill.

In the meantime Don Bustos, having forced Matilde to confess her treachery, hanged her from the king's balcony. Then he instructed Estrella to arrange for her marriage to Don Sancho at once, and the girl sent her lover a message informing him of the plan and asking him to come to her. The two notes posed for Don Sancho a conflict between duty and inclination. He loved Estrella, but he had sworn to serve the king faithfully, and so, when he met Don Bustos, he picked a quarrel with his sweetheart's brother and killed him in a duel. Afterward he stubbornly refused to give any explanation of his deed and was taken, under arrest, to the Triana prison.

Estrella, awaiting the arrival of Don Sancho, received instead the body of her dead brother. When she learned the name of his murderer, she decided to go at once to the king to demand vengeance. Before her arrival at the palace, the king had already been assured that Don Sancho was loyally keeping silent about the king's part in the death of the don. Since justice would be expected, however, the king was forced to order the beheading of Don Sancho. To Arias he marveled at the honor and dignity of the citizens of Seville.

When Estrella appeared, the king delegated to her the power to pass sentence on the murderer of her brother and sent her, with his ring, to the Triana prison. Alone, he soliloquized on the tragic results of his unbridled passion. Meanwhile, in the prison, loyal Clamndo was trying to amuse Don Sancho, who seemed to be out of his mind. The alcaides could not understand his ravings or his refusal to explain his crime. He kept telling them that he had acted as a king, and that it was the duty of someone else to confess. As they were about to order his execution, Estrella appeared, veiled. By now her love had conquered her anger, and she ordered the release of the prisoner.

At the palace, Arias kept insisting that Don Sancho deserved to be saved. On the other hand, if the king were to confess, his action might cost him his throne. At last he sent Arias to smooth things over, and in private he urged each alcalde to spare Don Sancho's life. But they considered a pardon incompatible with their concepts of honor and royal dignity, and in spite of both Estrella and the king they ordered Don Sancho's execution.

With such examples of honor confronting him, the king was moved by his own conscience to confess that he had instigated the assassination. Since a king could do no wrong, he was unpunished, and Don Sancho was set free. However, both he and Estrella refused to obey the king's order that they marry. The blood of Estrella's slain brother separated them forever.

THE STOIC

Type of work Novel

Author Theodore Dreiser (1871-1945)

Type of plot Naturalism

Time of plot Early twentieth century

Locale Chicago, New York London Paris

First published 1947

Principal characters

FRANK A COWPERWOOD, a financier

AILEEN COWPERWOOD, his second wife

BERENICE FLEMING, his mistress

PHILIP HENSHAW, and

MONTAGUE GREAVES, English engineers

BRUCE TOLLIFER, a Southern artist

LORD STANE, an English financier

LORNA MARIS a dancer in Baltimore

MARIGOLD BRAINERD, Tollifer's friend

DR JEFFERSON JAMES, Cowperwood's friend and doctor

Critique

The Stoic, the third novel of the trilogy that includes The Financier and The Titan completes the story of Frank Algernon Cowperwood. As in the other two novels, Cowperwood, a man of great force and vitality, is interested only in material things—making money, having attractive mistresses, and building monuments to perpetuate his name. Dreiser does not condemn this attitude morally, but he does point out that none of Cowperwood's relationships is lasting, none of his projects achieves permanence. For all his power and strength, he is simply another man whose best efforts are cut down by time and the forces around him. Ironically, his cherished dream of founding a hospital is realized through Berenice, his former mistress turned Eastern philosopher, after his death, but the money Cowperwood left for the project is dissipated in endless lawsuits as shady as the deals by which Cowperwood got the money in the first place. Man, even the ruthless man of business, cannot, in Dreiser's world, impose his will on events for very long, and Cowperwood's ultimate ineffectuality, the difference between his desires and his real accomplishments, gives him a certain amount of sympathy. Dreiser never quite finished The Stoic, his wife wrote the final chapter, from his notes, before the novel was published posthumously in 1947. As a novel, it is not generally regarded as Dreiser's best, for the details of finance overwhelm the concept of Cowperwood's character and the writing becomes more repetitious and uneven as it moves along. The nature of Dreiser's concept of human experience also made the struggles of his characters more interesting to most readers than the inevitable long conclusions concerning the worthlessness of the struggle.

The Story

Frank Cowperwood, nearing sixty, had just lost his long struggle to gain a fifty year franchise to control the transportation system in Chicago. In addition, he and Aileen, his second wife, had failed to achieve the social prominence to which they felt their wealth entitled them. At the time of Cowperwood's defeat, Berenice Fleming, an attractive young woman whom he had loved for eight years, quite unexpectedly agreed to become his mistress. Berenice knew that Cowperwood intended to stay married to Aileen, Cow

THE STOIC by Theodore Dreiser By permission of the publishers Doubleday & Co. Inc. Copyright, 1947 by Helen Dreiser

perwood agreed to continue to support Berenice and her mother

Cowperwood, a vital man impatient for something to do, was interested in the proposition of two English engineers, Philip Henshaw and Montague Greaves, that he help in financing the construction of the London underground. Henshaw and Greaves were interested in the line that ran from Charing Cross to Hampstead (each of the lines was originally planned by different organizations) Cowperwood hoping to coordinate the separate lines, planned to go to England, with Berenice, to organize the financing and attempt to gain the controlling interest in the project

On his way to England Cowperwood stopped in New York to see Aileen in the palatial mansion he had built for her. First he invited her to go to Europe, then he decided that he needed to keep her occupied socially so that he would have time for Berenice and so he found an improvident artist, Bruce Tollifer, whom he hired to pursue and amuse his wife. Tollifer was to receive two hundred dollars a week plus expenses and was to meet Aileen in London. Not knowing of the arrangement and thinking of Tollifer as a friend, Aileen felt that, by asking her to come to Europe, her husband was finally settling down to one woman. The party left for Europe.

In London, Cowperwood discovered that he also needed control of the Central Loop line in order to solidify his interests. He met Lord Stane, a British financier, who helped him in both his business dealings and personal arrangements. Berenice rented a country house from Lord Stane. In the meantime Tollifer persuaded Aileen to take a trip to Paris with him. He tried to make her more attractive (once pretty, Aileen had become middle aged and overweight) by renewing her interest in clothes and exercise.

While Tollifer and Aileen were in Paris, Cowperwood and Berenice were free to live at Berenice's country house and tour the cathedral and university towns of England.

As Cowperwood's business interests expanded he found it necessary to return to the United States to find more capital. He took Aileen and left her in New York while he toured the country raising money. In Baltimore, a beautiful young dancer named Lorna Maris came to his hotel room claiming that she was a distant Cowperwood relation. Lorna and Cowperwood began an affair, and he stayed in the United States longer than he had planned. Aileen, hearing of the affair through a newspaper item, sent the clipping on to Berenice; she had discovered the affair between Berenice and her husband before leaving Europe. Berenice was furious when she heard that Cowperwood and Lorna were having an open affair. Although she and Lord Stane, beginning to spend a great deal of time together, were finding that they had much in common, Berenice decided to remain faithful to Cowperwood; she found his vitality irresistible. Cowperwood broke off the affair with Lorna, returned to England, and was reunited with Berenice.

Cowperwood's trip was financially successful. Along with Lord Stane and several others, he now controlled the underground and the connected construction company. He had bought out Henshaw and Greaves. Aileen returned to Tollifer in Paris. However, while she had been in the United States, the artist had become friendly with Marigold Bramer. At a party Marigold, partly to protect her interest in Tollifer and partly because she was drunk, told Aileen that her husband had simply hired Tollifer to keep her occupied. Hurt and angry, Aileen returned to New York. Cowperwood, following her, announced that he planned to enlarge the New York house, fill it with more art treasures, and have it converted into a museum after they died. He wanted Aileen to supervise the new construction and to do it immediately, for after his death much of his money was to go toward founding a hospital. He left Aileen in New York after promising to return as soon as he had completed his business in London.

Back in London, and ill, Cowperwood decided to hire a yacht and sail on a holiday to Norway with Berenice. Soon after he returned to work, constantly driving himself, he became ill once again and the doctors told him he had Bright's disease. He decided to erect a tomb for himself and to wind up his business affairs as quickly as possible. During a weekend at Lord Stane's house he suffered another attack and sent for his American physician and friend, Dr. Jefferson James. Dr. James took him on a boat trip to the Riviera, but once again the effect of the vacation was only temporary. Back at work in London, five months later, Cowperwood suffered another attack and decided to return to New York to see Aileen once more. Berenice was also to return to the United States and stay at the Waldorf Astoria in order to be near him.

On the boat Cowperwood suffered an even more serious attack and had to be carried off the boat on a stretcher. Because Aileen's house, in the midst of renovation, had no room for him, he was taken to the Waldorf Astoria. Aileen came to the hotel to find Berenice caring for him in his room; her bitterness had scarcely abated by the time of Cowperwood's death a short time later. He was buried in the tomb he had built.

Although his financial position had seemed secure at his death, various lawsuits, deriving from some of his unsavory deals, plagued the estate. The lawsuits continued for five years, and Aileen, seeing Cowperwood's money vanish, was forced to sell her mansion and abandon all her plans for the museum and the hospital. A year after the mansion was sold, Aileen died and was buried in the tomb beside her husband.

After Cowperwood died, Berenice, at loose ends, traveled around the world. In India she became fascinated with Hindu philosophy and stayed there for five years, regretting her past and developing a greater sense of humanity. She had her own income that Cowperwood had left her. When she returned to America, she heard that the rest of his money had been lost. She then decided to use her income to found a hospital, and she hired Dr. Jefferson James as the director.

Berenice herself began to work at the hospital, where she found enormous satisfaction in dealing with handicapped children. Recognizing her very limited function in human affairs, she realized that the power Cowperwood had sought had not brought him happiness, peace, fame, or enduring power. A person could, she now knew, express himself effectively only in limited ways, such as helping a few handicapped children in a small hospital.

STORY OF THE GUITAR

Type of work Drama

Author Kao Tse-ch'eng (Kao Ming, c. 1305 c. 1368)

Type of plot Tragic comedy

Time of plot c. 200

Locale Honan Province, China

First presented Fourteenth century

Principal characters

TS'AI JUNG, a young scholar

CHAO WU-NIANG, his wife

CHANG, a neighbor

THE HONORABLE MR. NIU, the prime minister

Miss Niu, his daughter

Critique

Although the hero of this play, Ts'ai Jung, was a historical figure, the plot has no historical basis. Its central interest is in the character of Chao Wu niang, whose endurance, sacrifice, and devotion to her husband and parents in law represent the height of Chinese feminine virtues. Her legend, popular even before the play was written, has touched the hearts of Chinese women for countless generations. Sometimes staged under the title Lute Song, the original Chinese title is Pi P'a Chi.

The Story

Ts'ai Jung had been married for only two months when the local government recommended him as a candidate for the Imperial Examination. His father insisted on his making the trip to the capital, for the examination gave the young scholar an opportunity to distinguish himself and bring honor to his family. Ts'ai himself would rather have stayed home and fulfilled his duties as a son. However, fearing that his unwillingness to leave his parents, who were infirm with age, would be interpreted as selfish love for his wife, Ts'ai reluctantly took his departure, after entrusting his neighbor Chang, an old man, with the care of his family.

Ts'ai easily won the first place in the examination. The emperor took such a fancy to the young scholar that he ordered him to be married to the daughter of Mr. Niu, the prime minister. The imperial order came as a happy solution to the prime minister, who had a problem in his daughter, who had sworn never to marry unless the man was a genius who passed first in the Imperial Examination. Here, at last, was a young man who met the requirement, consequently, no one paid attention to Ts'ai's protestations that he already had a wife and that his only ambition was to serve his parents. He was married a second time, much against his wishes. Further restrictions were imposed on his freedom when he was ordered to live in the prime minister's house.

Ts'ai's second wife was as intelligent and sympathetic as she was beautiful and she could see that her husband was unhappy in his new surroundings. He loved her, but he was also homesick.

He had no knowledge that Ch'en Iu, his home district, had been stricken with famine. Nor did he know what a strain was placed on his first wife, Chao Wu niang, to support his parents during that terrible time. She sold her clothes and jewels to save the aged couple from starvation, while she herself lived on chaff. Their neighbor Chang also shared with them whatever rice he had.

No word came from Ts'ai. When the mother succumbed to sorrow, hunger, and disease, Chang lent the money to buy a coffin. When the father died a short time later, Chao Wu niang did not like to trouble the kind neighbor for another loan. She cut her hair and tried to get a little money from its sale. Before any buyer turned up, however, she was discovered in the street by Chang, who bought another coffin for her. Because she could not hire a grave digger, she tried to raise a tumulus with her own hands. At last she fell asleep from fatigue, her fingers bleeding from her hard labor. While she slept, spirits came to finish the grave for her.

Carrying a pipa, an instrument like a guitar, and portraits of the deceased parents, done by herself, which she would exhibit while begging for alms, she set out for the capital in search of her husband.

Ts'ai had not for a moment forgotten his parents and first wife, he was merely duped when a swindler arrived with false news from his family. Relieved to hear that they were all well and safe, Ts'ai asked the same man to deliver a letter together with gold and pearls, to his parents. The villain simply disappeared.

After a long period of anxious waiting, Ts'ai decided to go and see for himself how his family fared. He had whole hearted support from his second wife, who intended to go with him in order to perform daughterly duties for his parents. The prime minister refused to grant permission, however, he wanted to keep his daughter and son-in-law always close to him. When his daughter kept pestering him with supplications, he finally agreed to send a servant to Ch'en liu to bring Ts'ai's parents and first wife to the capital, where they would live in his house as guests.

One day Chao Wu niang came to a temple where a special mass was being celebrated. She had arrived in the capital, but she was not willing to see her husband until she was sure that he had not hardened his heart against her. She sang to the pipa a song on the virtue of filial piety, but the pilgrims and worshippers were not as generous in giving alms as she had expected. After she had hung up the portraits and begun to say prayers for the deceased parents, Ts'ai appeared to pray for his parents, whom he believed to be on their way to the capital. Chao Wu niang immediately left the temple. Ts'ai failed to see her, but he found the picture and took it home with him.

The prime minister's daughter, in anticipation of the arrival of her parents-in-law, was looking for an intelligent woman to serve as a maid for the old couple. Chao Wu niang, applying for the position, won the sympathy of the young mistress with her story of long suffering and the purpose of her journey to the capital. Though Chao Wu niang used an anagram for her husband's name, the other could not fail to see who the unfortunate woman really was. She immediately addressed her as sister and together the two devised a stratagem to test Ts'ai's heart.

The picture Chao Wu niang had left in the temple was now hanging up in Ts'ai's study. She wrote a poem on its back, criticizing in a loving tone her husband's conduct.

Ts'ai had not looked carefully at the picture nor did he know that a man-servant had hung it up. Now, returning from his office, he saw it again. The two faces bore a strange resemblance to his parents, but he was puzzled by their emaciated and ragged looks. Then he discovered the poem, apparently a satire at his expense. His first reaction was anger. He asked his wife whether she had any knowledge of the person who ventured into his study and scribbled an unjust attack on him. Chao Wu niang was summoned, and the whole story was told.

The prime minister finally won over, Ts'ai took his two wives to Ch'en liu to worship at his parents' graves. All three were honored by the emperor as examples of virtuous conduct. The happiest man on the scene was the neighbor Chang, who derived more satisfaction from the reunion of Ts'ai's family than he did from the material rewards he now received.

STRANGE STORIES FROM A CHINESE STUDIO

Type of work Tales and legends
Author P'u Sung ling (1640-1715)
First published 1766

In spite of the rationalist tradition of Confucianism, the Chinese people before the republican era were no less superstitious and credulous than Europeans during the Middle Ages. Supernatural tales are a literary genre still cultivated today in Taiwan, though less extensively or seriously than they were under the Manchu dynasty (1644-1911), when a great number of such collections were published and enjoyed by a wide audience. Of these, Strange Stories from a Chinese Studio (Liao ch'ai Chih-i) is the recognized classic, superior to the rest for its style, learned allusions, wonderful mixture of humanity with the preposterous, and inventiveness. Though the author claimed in his preface that he did nothing more than copy down what he had heard and edit contributions from his friends, quite a number of the stories were his creations, judging from the sophistication of sentiment and the neatness of plot. These stories, mostly supernatural in theme, rich in poetic symbolism, and deep in psychological insight, are a unique achievement in Chinese literature as studies of the feminine mind clothed in vivid imagination.

The preponderant supernatural element in these stories is far from naive, human nature as revealed here is what is known to a wise scholar or a passionate lover rather than to an innocent blessed with great sense of wonder but little experience. But like the fairy tales of the Western world, the stories are governed by a logic of their own. Supernatural intervention is common, and men associate freely with spirits. Causes are followed by effects, but not in the same manner as in the natural or every day human world. Spirits, demons, and human beings are all under the control of the law of causation, or just retribution, good deeds or evil bring forth rewards or punishments. Therefore, the author believed that his stories had a moral purpose in spite of their weirdness, absurdity, or even, in certain cases, obscenity.

Of the 431 pieces collected, some are short bits of curious information. For instance, the account of a chorus composed of frogs does not run to more than two lines in the original. Another account, in three lines, concerns a show with a cast of mice which performed, under masks, a puppet-like drama. Some longer ones, about a page in length, have greater human interest. An old man, revived after he had been thought dead, had his old spouse lie down by his side, and they died together ("Mr. Chu, the Considerate Husband"). A tiger, after killing a man, allowed himself to be arrested, confessed his crime to the court, and agreed to serve as a son to the destitute and lonesome old mother. He constantly brought dead animals and other valuables to her door, and he would sometimes come to her house to keep her company. After her death, he was present at the funeral. When the human mourners were all frightened off, he roared terribly to give vent to his grief ("The Tiger of Chao ch'eng").

Short and comparatively artless pieces like these can be found in other collections of a similar nature. The fame of this book rests on the longer tales which the author narrates with an admirable delicacy and poignancy. None is truly tragic, for one essential condition of tragedy is missing here, as in many other Chinese stories. The author, and apparently his readers too, did not believe that death was final and irrevocable. He did not even take death seriously, since a dead woman (most of the stories are remembered for their heroines rather than their heroes), can always in one way or another recover life or assume an animate shape. A man will feel little scruple about making love to a female ghost, especially when she is young and beautiful. Moreover, she is often learned, and her occupation in her ghostly loneliness is the composition of poetry, works of great self-pity and chilliness. She prefers a poetical, handsome young man for her lover. The poetical qualities seem to be important, for in one story the ghost spurns a very good looking young man only because he is too stupid to learn ("The Young Gentleman Who Couldn't Spell"). It may be supposed that a man can love a ghost only spiritually, without bodily contact, but not so in this book where love means sexual love. When a man and a ghost sleep in the same bed, he may suffer from exposure to the ghostly air, but he can be cured with proper medical treatment. In one story the ghost absorbs so much vitality from her lover that she feels life has come back to her, and she bids him reopen her grave. The coffin is decayed but the corpse looks lifelike and feels warm After he takes her body home, the first words she utters after her resuscitation are "Aren't they like a dream—these ten odd years burned there!"

A great number of stories are about spirits—the spirits of rocks, trees, flowers, frogs, snakes, fish, birds, and various mammals The most notable is the fox A fox spirit can be vicious in the popular legends, but here he, or she, is almost invariably witty, charming, highly sophisticated, and possessed of all too human qualities in addition to magical powers A female fox in human shape may be only plain, as in the case of The Dowdy Fox, but that was because the man she chose was a simple peasant who, according to her, deserved neither wealth nor a beautiful mistress ("The Marriage Lottery") Or she may be middle aged and "modestly good looking," like the celebrated Heng niang, who lectures on the art of feminine charm and helps a disfavored wife to win back her husband's love But most foxes are young girls of unearthly beauty who may have the power to cast spells but who are also capable of wifely virtues and undying love In one story ("Miss Lien hsiang"), the fox saves her human lover from the deadly influence of a female ghost Then the rivals, both exceedingly beautiful, are reconciled and each, in a reincarnated form, marries the lucky man

Few Chinese writers indeed understood the woman's heart so fully and profoundly as P'u Sung ling who, no less than the storytellers of the Western world, was fascinated by the mystery of woman Instead of being stiff and pale paragons of virtue or negative examples of harlots, the women in this book shine with rare brilliance and charm Freely they choose their lovers go to bed with them, and leave them when they see that they must part Since liberty such as they took was morally censurable and hardly conceivable as a theme of literature, P'u solved his problem of creation by adopting the form of the supernatural tale and thus won praise for his fancy and style The modern reader, however, will recognize his ghosts and his spirits of foxes or other animals as realistic portraits of the eternal woman

There are about twenty female characters in this book who will long be remembered as among the best creations of Chinese literature Altogether, these tales present a full gallery of portraits of women, whether they are human, superhuman, or subhuman, women in various moods and situations women as lovers and wives, women with all their passion, tenderness, flirtation, perseverance, and devotion The popularity of the tales in Strange Stories from a Chinese Studio has been due as much to their strangeness as to their appeal to common humanity The author, as a product of his age, may have intended to be simply entertaining or didactic, or both, but his genius allowed him to probe psychological depths that were often beyond the imagination of other storytellers

STREET SCENE

Type of work Drama

Author Elmer Rice (1892)

Type of plot Social realism

Time of plot 1929

Locale New York

First presented 1929

STREET SCENE by Elmer Rice By permission of the author and the publisher Samuel French Inc Copyright, 1928 1929 by Elmer L Rice Copyright 1955 1956 (in renewal) by Elmer L Rice Application for the right to present this play should be made to Samuel French Inc, of 25 West 45th Street New York 36 N Y or 7623 Sunset Blvd Hollywood 46, Calif or if in Canada to Samuel French (Canada) Ltd 27 Grenville St Toronto Ont

Principal characters

ROSE MAURRANT, a young girl of twenty

ANNA, her mother

FRANK, her father

SAM KAPLAN, a frustrated young intellectual

ABE, his father

SHIRLEY, his sister

HARRY EASTER, a fairly prosperous real estate man

Critique

In Street Scene we have the forerunner of the social drama of the 1930's. Before this time, what social drama America had produced criticized only indirectly. Rice presents us with a tragic situation growing out of a specific environment: the teeming tenements of New York, and he makes his presentation effectively, most of his many characters would undoubtedly be found around just such a neighborhood. Thus this play, which culminates in a lurid murder, does not fall into the category of melodrama, as its people and their environment create the main interest.

The Story

It was a hot June evening in New York, and in front of an ancient brown stone walk up apartment in a mean quarter of the city, residents were variously disposed, discussing the weather and the affairs of the day. Anna Maurrant and her lover, Sankey, a collector for the milk company, were the subjects of the gossip of a small group of the residents. They were shocked at Anna's behavior—after all, she had a grown up daughter. One neighbor reported that Sankey had already been there twice this week while Anna's husband and daughter Rose were away.

The gossip ceased with the appearance of Anna and the arrival of her husband. Frank Maurrant was irritated that his daughter Rose was not yet at home and that her whereabouts was a mystery. He told Anna that he would have to be out of town the next day, as a stagehand, he was working on a show which was opening outside of New York. After the Maurrants had left, the janitor of the building quietly predicted that Frank would someday kill Sankey.

A short time later Sam Kaplan appeared. The arguments and trivial talk which passed between the occupants of the tenement bored him. Twenty, and a student in college, he was depressed over his current situation. He felt trapped by his environment, although old Abe, his father, seemed content with life in the tenement, reading his newspapers, criticizing the government, longing for a social revolution, and arguing politics with anyone interested. Sam would have been more than happy to get out of the tenement atmosphere at the first opportunity.

After the street cleared, Rose Maurrant finally arrived, escorted by Harry Easter, manager of the real estate office where she worked. Easter wanted to set Rose up in an apartment and take her away from her twenty five dollar a week salary, but Rose refused his offer. Easter was married, in the first place, and she was not really very fond of him. Besides, she realized that there would be strings attached to his proposal. Easter left with the approach of Frank Maurrant, who lectured his daughter on her late hours. Maurrant, ironically enough, spoke up for family happiness, security, and proper behavior. Sam came out and sympathized with Rose, who knew of her mother's situation. Sam felt that neither of them belonged in this sordid atmosphere. He was even more crushed when he tried unsuccessfully to defend Rose from an amorous taxi driver who passed by, the incident added to his bitterness, which Rose tried in vain to allay. Rose left Sam sitting despondently on the curb.

Bustling tenement life went on as usual.

the next morning In the middle of the hubbub, Sam's sister Shirley warned him to spend more time on his studies and less with Rose Later she asked Rose to avoid Sam Since he was going to be a lawyer, Shirley felt he should not be distracted from his studies Rose pleaded innocence to the charge of taking Sam's mind from his work They possibly seemed slightly drawn to each other, Rose did admit

Sam's appearance led to another conversation with Rose concerning life and death Though Rose, unlike Sam, admitted there was joy to be found in life, certainly it was not to be found in their environment They talked of running away, it was clear that Sam was interested in Rose romantically Rose, however was simply interested in getting away from her surroundings

Although Frank Maurrant had left his wife with a less than subtle hint that he knew what was going on in his absence, soon after his departure Anna informed Sankey that no one was at home, Rose having left for a funeral For a few minutes life monotonously continued in the neighborhood, then Frank reappeared dashed inside, and killed both his wife and her lover He emerged, torn and bloody, and escaped Rose arrived in time to see her mother being carried through the crowd on a stretcher

Later that afternoon the tabloids contained full accounts of the bloody murders Everyone in the neighborhood was talking about the killings and speculating on the whereabouts of Frank Maurrant, who was still at large Rose, returning from a grim shopping trip declined sincere offers of help from Easter and others She simply did not wish to feel obligated to anyone she and her twelve-year old brother would soon be leaving New York For the present, they were moving away from the tenement immediately

An excited crowd surged down the street, heralding the appearance of two policemen and a battered Frank Maurrant Frank tearfully cried that he was out of his head when he committed murder He had tried to be a good father but this was just the way things turned out

Rose and Sam Kaplan eventually found themselves alone in the street Sam, renewing his plea that he and Rose go away together, spoke of their belonging to each other Rose, however, felt that people should never belong to any one If her mother had not depended on someone else for what she should have had inside her, Rose said, the tragedy might have been averted

She tenderly explained that loving and belonging were different emotions, a person should believe in himself, but she told Sam that perhaps something would work out for them when they were older and wiser After Sam had gone into the house, a now sympathetic Shirley appeared to say goodbye before Rose left for what she hoped would be a new and better life As she was leaving, a shabby looking couple had spotted the vacancy notice on the building and were ringing for the janitor From the wreath on the door, they decided that someone had died it was probably the reason why the apartment was being vacated

STUDS LONIGAN A TRILOGY

Type of work Novel

Author James T Farrell (1904)

Time 1916 1931

Locale Chicago

First published Studs Lonigan A Trilogy, 1935 (Young Lonigan, 1932, The Young Manhood of Studs Lonigan, 1934 Judgment Day, 1935)

Principal characters

WILLIAM "STUDS" LONIGAN, a lower middle class Irish American OLD LONIGAN, his father

MRS LONIGAN, his mother
FRANCES LONIGAN, his sister
LUCY SCANLON, loved by Studs Lonigan
CATHERINE BANAHAN, Stud Lonigan's mistress and fiancée PAULIE HAGGERTY and WEARY REILLEY friends of Studs Lonigan

Studs Lonigan A Trilogy, first published in separate volumes from 1932 to 1935, still appears to be James T. Farrell's major work, despite the long list of books—novels, collections of short stories, essays, and literary criticism—which have followed. Every significant critical work on the American novel published since 1935 has mentioned the trilogy. While critics have not always agreed on the merit of Farrell's work, the purposes behind it, or even the nature of the author's craft, they have all admitted that Farrell has contributed something of apparent but still unproved value to American fiction written in this century.

The three volumes about Studs Lonigan portray the disintegration, physical and moral, of a young Chicago Irishman during the period from 1916 to 1931, beginning with the protagonist's graduation from a parochial school on Chicago's South Side and ending with his death. Farrell himself has been explicit in pointing out that Studs Lonigan is not a story of the slums, that the tragedy of Studs Lonigan is not rooted in the economics of the community or nation. The trilogy was not intended to illustrate an economic thesis, nor does it. The downfall of Studs Lonigan is portrayed as the result of spiritual poverty in an Irish American, lower middle class neighborhood of Chicago. The elder Lonigan was a painting contractor who was successful enough that his family was not in want. The failure in the world of the Lonigans is a failure of moral sanctions. As Farrell himself has stated of that social milieu, there were important institutions which should have played a part in the education of Studs Lonigan and his friends, those institutions were the home, the family, the church, the school, the playground. When they failed, the streets and the poolroom took their place. Under these influences young Lonigan, not an evil young man or a moral cripple, drifted into grim and dismal circumstances. To such an extent is the character of Studs Lonigan a social manifestation, as well as a fictional character.

The story of the growth of the trilogy has been told by its creator. While a student at the University of Chicago, Farrell took a course in advanced composition, apparently the only college course which he liked and in which he worked. In that course he wrote a story entitled "Studs," which, shown to Professors James Weber Linn and Robert Morss Lovett, won encouragement for its author. Farrell then proceeded to construct a novel, which grew into a trilogy about the character of Studs, who came to be a symbol of the spiritual poverty of his neighborhood, his class, and his times. In a wider social sense the tragedy of Studs may be also the tragedy of countless young Americans whose drifting, shattered lives have been, and still are, centered about too much sex, too much alcohol, too many automobiles, too many empty platitudes, too many empty social dogmas, and too little faith in themselves and human nature, lives ending in increasing numbers in alcoholism, drug addiction, delinquency, and crime. Farrell's portrayal of Studs Lonigan, ugly as it is in some respects, may have hit closer to artistic and social truth than the author dreamed of at the time.

Farrell's technique in the Studs Lonigan trilogy has been termed both realistic and naturalistic. Neither term, as it is traditionally used, fits Farrell's work for he has gone beyond conventional categories. The primary reason for not regarding the Studs Lonigan trilogy as naturalistic or realistic is that Farrell has used determinism in a different fashion from that of earlier authors like Norris and Dreiser. Thus, the character of Studs Lonigan is not molded entirely by his environment, he knows, at least at times, where he is drifting. Farrell intimates in the novel that it was in his character's power not to have failed so entirely. Certainly Danny O'Neill, the hero of a later series of Farrell novels, and Farrell himself in real life, did not drift into the tragedy which becomes Studs Lonigan's lot. Unlike the earlier naturalistic novelists, Farrell did not hold himself aloof, hold himself to an amoral view of his creations. To some extent he asked for reform and improvement, as the traditional naturalistic writer does not.

Another aspect of Farrell's work that has drawn comment, perhaps too much, is the selection of details and language in Studs Lonigan. The story is told in an idiom close enough to the original to be embarrassingly accurate for a person familiar with it, and yet the language is changed sufficiently to admit the expression of wider and deeper concepts than its culturally starved users normally can express or wish to express. Readers who have never experienced this strata of society, however, may honestly feel shocked. Farrell has called his overall technique "social realism", and certainly his language is part of that technique. Part of the objectivity, the realistic portrayal of both character and setting in the trilogy, would have been lost if the writer had employed any other style or selected his details differently. Farrell has chosen not to sentimentalize the world, not to romanticize it, nor to hide its real character in any other way. It should be noted, too, that from early in his career, which he has taken as seriously as his fictional Danny O'Neill takes his, James T. Farrell has had confidence in his materials and in his methods. Many another writer of the same period became the victim of adherence to left wing brands of determinism in his art. Those who did either changed or failed. Farrell did not fail, nor did he have to change, having evaded the trap from the beginning.

To sum up the total significance of the trilogy is not yet possible. Many readers still misunderstand the purposes and the techniques, preferring comfort of illusion to pain of truth. Farrell himself has recognized this tendency. In A Note on Literary Criticism (1936), he said that art must flow from the reality of the writer's experience and that it can not be better than life. The story of Studs Lonigan shows Farrell practicing what he expressed as his theory. Some critics and others who have admired Farrell's writings have defended the volumes by calling them sociological documents and making of Farrell a student of sociology rather than an artist in fiction. Farrell himself has not stooped to such subterfuge, deeming any such defense unwarranted and unnecessary.

A STUDY OF HISTORY

Type of work Philosophy of history
 Author Arnold Toynbee (1889)
 First published 1934-1954

Not every monumental work, monumental because of its size, is monumental in character. But Arnold J. Toynbee's A Study of History, a ten volume work, compels the continuing critical attention of historians, philosophers, and other students of civilizations rising and falling in the long course of time. Despite its scope, this book is not superficial, and despite its author's ambition—to account for the death of civilizations—it shows no sign of a confusion between modesty and unoriginality. Considered as a theory, it is daring and illuminating.

But is it true? Most readers hesitate to enter upon a ten volume pilgrimage if the only reward is acquaintance with a scholar's laborious fancies. In the sense in which Toynbee is a philosopher of history, a philosopher of history is a man, generally a historian, who tries to make sense out of the mass of events presumed to have occurred. He proceeds from records and signs, or what he supposes are records and signs, and constructs a story of the presumed past that is history. He then surveys the story he has written, or which other men have written, in the attempt to find the theme of that story, the moral of the tale. His account of his reflections is his study of history. Since the task is so complicated, since history itself is tentative, dependent on the evidence, how can a study of history hope to show the patterns hidden within the histories of civilizations? How can a study of history be true?

Of course, such a study could be true, a historian who was at the same time a genius and something of a seer might discover or create an explanation of history that would show that the fortunes and accidents of history are fortunes and accidents only relative to men's ignorance, considered in the new light, history is inevitable.

But although a study of history could be true, it is more likely that, strictly speaking, it is false—that at best it approximates the truth and makes some sense to men with something of the author's intelligence and perspective.

In any case, the truth of such a study is unimportant. A theory with the pretensions of Toynbee's can never be verified because more would be demanded in the way of evidence than scholars could ever give. Not the truth of the theory but its plausibility is what counts, not its conformity to undiscoverable facts, but its organizing power in the face of evidence. Finally, even if a reader rejects a study of history because of its failure to make sense out of the evidence, it is still possible that the work will have had the value of showing a creative mind in its response to the greatest of historical problems.

That Toynbee's study has this latter value is beyond question. To some his theory is plausible, to others it is as clearly false, but to all it is exciting and worthy of respect.

Toynbee's study of history has led him to present and defend the thesis that "societies," not nations, are the proper concern of the historian, and that civilized societies—civilizations—arise in response to difficult conditions which present a challenge, grow in response to further challenges, break down, i.e., cease to respond creatively, because of some idolization of a past self, institution, or technique and disintegrate into a dominant minority, an internal proletariat (in the society, but not of it), and an external proletariat (formerly, but no longer, of the society) as a result of the failure to respond in such a way as to meet a challenge repeatedly presented.

The answer to the central question, "Why do civilizations die?" is that they die as a result of an inability to determine themselves creatively. The failure of self-determination results, if petrification does not set in instead, in a schism of the society which is paralleled by a schism in the soul of civilized man.

The thesis, and each point in its defense, is illustrated historically in Toynbee's work. Indeed, one of the values of the work comes from its ability to charm the reader into a reexamination and re-appraisal of the content of history and, of course, from its introducing the reader to many historical findings with which he was not previously acquainted.

Dispassionately considered at some distance from the wealth of historical material which gives the thesis great persuasive force, Toynbee's central claim is perhaps not as remarkable as in the reading of A Study of History it seems to be. It may be that in his use of the term "civilization" Toynbee has employed a criterion by reference to which he dismisses certain societies as primitive. The analysis, then, reveals what his use of the term "civilization" indicates: societies which grew not from favorable but from unfavorable and challenging conditions.

Similarly, it might be argued that his account of disintegration is a truism hand somely and historically disguised. Of course, civilizations decline before they fall, they fall because they fall apart, and they fall apart because they can no longer hang together creatively.

Even if Toynbee's claim is not as remarkable as in the reading it seems to be, the value of the study is not a function of the remarkableness of the claim. Perhaps for the first time a historian has made the reader see civilizations as, to a considerable extent, they are—not as living organisms, not as accidents, not as the fruits of fortune—but as societies of men, achieving their characters as civilizations from the mode and quality of their responses to challenges, and falling apart when either because of the absence of challenge or because of the presence of challenges too strong to be met, the society and the individuals composing it divide into irreconcilable parts. This, then, is another case of coming to realize what, in a sense, we knew all along—but not in this way. If what Toynbee presents is a truism, at least he has had the wit to see it as a truth and the historical knowledge to make it respectable. Furthermore, he has imagination and spiritual courage.

It takes spiritual courage to argue, as Toynbee does, that history is "a vision of God's creation on the move," and that the historian finds six dimensions—the three of space, then time, life, and the Spirit. He also appraises the chances that man has in Western civilization to pursue his "true" end: glorifying God. And he argues that the laws of nature do not control all of man's action, but that, within limits, man is free. Perfect Freedom, he adds, is to be under the law of God. Finally, he conducts a "survey of saviours," with the result that Jesus alone is considered to have made good his claim to be the son of God.

These beliefs are not unpopular, indeed, they are shared by millions. But what is odd and therefore demanding of courage is the expression of these beliefs in a study of history, not merely as token reminders of Western man's faith, but as necessary to both the understanding and the existence of Western civilization.

Even though it may seem strange and unhistorical to explain history by a declaration of religious faith, it is possible, even for the unbeliever, to appreciate the historical point of Toynbee's declaration of religious faith. In the first place, as Toynbee clearly shows, Western civilization is for the most part a Christian civilization. Secondly, if Toynbee is right in arguing that civilizations rise and grow as they make creative responses, break down and disintegrate as they fail to determine themselves, then to be born and to grow through an exercise of the proper spirit is the special business of any individual or civilization that values life and the special quality of life which creative activity provides. It is certainly excusable for a Christian scholar to make these points in Christian terms.

A particular benefit of Toynbee's spiritual approach to historical problems is his analysis of "schism in the soul" in a disintegrating society. In a growing society men are creative or mimetic, i.e., they are leaders or imitators. But in a disintegrating society there is an increasing tendency to substitute for creativity and mimesis. There are passive and active substitutions. For example, instead of being creative, an individual might be inclined either to live with abandon, to follow his impulses (the passive substitute) or to live with self control, keeping his passions in check (the active substitute). Truancy (desertion) and martyrdom (action above and beyond the call of duty) are considered as the passive and active substitutes, respectively, for mimesis. Toynbee also considers "the sense of drift" and the "sense of sin" as alternative substitutes for the feeling of creative advance which accompanies the growth of a civilization His discussion of other spiritual attitudes and characteristics is intelligent and illuminating

Toynbee refuses to be either pessimistic or optimistic about the possibility of the survival of Western civilization Of the twenty eight civilizations which Toynbee finds in history, only the Western civilization is not clearly disintegrating or already dead Nine of the remaining ten civilizations have already broken down There are some signs of breakdown in the West, but they are not conclusive Toynbee considers that the extreme destructiveness of the atomic bomb together with the continued effort of the Christian spirit might finally bring about a world order that will allow Western civilization to continue to grow But he likens our present situation to that of the crew of the Kon Tiki approaching a reef which might, or might not, destroy them

A Study of History is a ten volume work, and for a full appreciation of the author's style and his depth of historical reference one should go to the work in that form But a splendid abridgment is available written by D C Somervell and worked over by Toynbee in collaboration with Mr Somervell The abridgment itself is two volumes in length, but it contains a helpful thirty eight page outline of the argument Toynbee presents in his major study

SUMMA THEOLOGICA

Type of work Theological treatise

Author Thomas Aquinas (c 1225 1274)

First transcribed c 1265 1274

This towering edifice of thought, often called simply the Summa, stands as a bulwark against the forces of doubt and skepticism which invaded the Western world during the late Middle Ages, to ward the close of which St Thomas created this great summation of philosophical and theological knowledge In it two of the mightiest forces in the realm of human thought met Hellenism and Christianity It was their first real encounter

Simply stated, what St Thomas did was to collect and synthesize the philosophical knowledge and thinking of previous eras and apply them to the Christian theology This was, of course, an immensely ambitious task, and the wonder is that St Thomas did so well with it Though unfinished because of the divine doctor's sudden death from illness, the Summa unites, or at least joins elements of thought from the Greek, Arabian, and Oriental traditions in a highly detailed fashion St Thomas thus became a historian of philosophy, but he was a critical historian, carefully weighing and evaluating each premise and conclusion

The largest part of this previous thought is, as might be expected, that of the Greeks St Thomas is usually given the credit for having reinterpreted the philosophy of Aristotle on a Christian basis This statement is, however, something of an oversimplification, for the reading of Aristotle and other great Greek thinkers, including Plato, was a very special one St Thomas was himself a magnificent philosopher, and the Summa is unquestionably his book What he did, in essence, was to organize the thought of Aristotle along Christian lines, to apply it to the problems and principles of religion For example, some philosophers had interpreted Aristotle's Physics as a denial of Creation, St Thomas saw it as merely falling short of this fundamental concept

The Summa is an exceedingly long work, running into several volumes, a necessary length in order to approach the achievement of applying Scholasticism, certainly the prevailing philosophical influence in the thirteenth century, to religion. In doing so, St. Thomas gave credit for ideas and lines of thought to many earlier thinkers, and he found the seeds of much thirteenth century belief in the works of previous philosophers. His work, then, is in the nature of a summary of past thinking on the highest subjects and a setting forth of the essential principles of Christian theology as he was able to formulate them from this past material and from his own conviction and thinking.

There are three main divisions of the Summa: the first dealing with God and the divine nature of the creation of man and the universe; the second, often called the Moral Philosophy of St. Thomas, treating man and the goal of his life and the ways of reaching that goal; the third devoted to Christ and His role as Saviour. Within this general framework virtually every possible subject pertaining to theology is discussed: good and evil, pleasure, knowledge, duty, property. The list is almost endless.

The method of attacking these questions is the Socratic one. A basic question is asked and the negative side of it is enforced by a fictitious opponent; then St. Thomas undertakes to resolve the problem and explain the positive side of the contrived argument. This method, besides making for more interesting reading, tends to create an atmosphere giving fairer treatment to opposing beliefs.

The opening of the Summa presents a good example. Here St. Thomas poses the question of "Whether Besides the Philosophical Sciences Any Further Doctrine Is Required?" How fundamental is the divine doctor's approach can easily be seen: even before beginning his book, he wishes first to convince the reader of the necessity for any sacred doctrine at all. Following the question there are listed two chief objections to the writing of sacred doctrine; then St. Thomas explains the need for it and refutes each objection in turn. This tightly organized discussion is maintained throughout, in a book that is so closely reasoned it is essential.

Part of the reason for this clear organization was the fact that the Summa was not primarily intended for learned divines. Instead it was written for people whom St. Thomas called beginners, the common man in search of the truth. Also, such an intention probably had much to do with the style of the writing. Although the Summa is extremely long it is praised for its economy of language, with no wasted words, no useless introduction of extraneous points of logic, and no pursuit of attenuated lines of reasoning past the point of common sense.

Although much of what St. Thomas has written in the Summa has long been accepted doctrine in the Roman Catholic Church, there is for the average current reader considerable material that may strike him as remarkably up to date; for, theology aside, this book is pivotal in the history of Western philosophy.

Possibly most interesting to the modern reader will be, not the ethical elements which are fairly familiar and do not seem to mark such a sharp break with earlier Greek views, but the metaphysical and epistemological aspects of the treatise. Two particularly important issues are raised by St. Thomas in these areas, and both are in opposition to Greek thought, especially that of Plato.

The first of these concerns the very nature of reality, which is the main point of inquiry in metaphysics. While Plato saw reality as made up of essences, largely perceived as abstractions in the mind (here the "way of knowing," the central question of epistemology, enters in), St. Thomas maintained that the basic statement was that something had being; that is, it had existence. This is, of course, the basis for an argument that has raged ever since among philosophers: Which is the supreme reality, essence or existence? Which is the more fundamental statement, what it is or that it is?

In his defense of the latter statement

St Thomas propounded principles that might be called Thomistic Existentialism, an expression that may well arouse a reader's interest in view of the present vogue of Existentialist belief and practice. Certainly the conflict created in the Summa over this question in the thirteenth century was of vital importance. Equally so was St Thomas' disagreement with the Platonic belief that man is really two separate things, a soul and a body. To St Thomas man was a composite, a unity composed of soul and body both essential to his nature as man.

This conflict connects with St Thomas' convictions about the "way of knowing" that is basic to his epistemology. Since reality is fundamentally existence rather than essence, in order to know this reality man must have a body—he must be able to perceive reality through the senses. Certainly St Thomas' statements in this area would meet with much warmer approval by most readers today than would the Greek notions concerning reality as essences, known only by abstractions in the mind. The practicality of the Thomistic viewpoint makes it appeal to scientifically minded thinkers of today.

In building this great philosophical and theological structure, St Thomas dealt with three of the most pressing problems in the thinking of the thirteenth century—the nature of being, of man, and of knowledge—and these three subjects parallel the divisions of philosophy as it is generally studied today: metaphysics, ethics, and epistemology. In approaching this skillful and subtle blending of theology and philosophy, the reader must be willing to do what nearly every philosophical writer demands: he must be agreeable to accepting certain general premises or principles. Without these, few philosophers can operate, and St Thomas is no exception. He assumes certain beliefs in his reader (the prevailing beliefs toward the close of the Middle Ages) concerning theology and religion. Granting these convictions, the reader will find in the Summa well documented (quotations are frequent) and carefully reasoned statements on both sides of every issue involved in the Christian doctrine.

This work, which death ended as St Thomas was working on the article about the sacrament of Penance, has been widely translated into most modern languages and continues to be assiduously studied by all who wish to grasp the moment when, in the opinion of many, modern Christian theology began.

THE SUNKEN BELL

Type of work Drama

Author Gerhart Hauptmann (1862-1946)

Type of plot Poetic fantasy

Time of plot Indefinite, timeless

Locale A mountain, a valley, and the paths between

First presented 1897

Principal characters

HEINRICH, a bell founder

MAGDA, his wife

THEIR CHILDREN

RAUTENDELEIN, an elfin mountain sprite

OLD WITTIKIN, her grandmother, a sorceress

THE NICKELMANN, an elemental water spirit

THE VICAR,

THE SUNKEN BELL by Gerhart Hauptmann from DRAMATIC WORKS OF GERHART HAUPTMANN. Translated by Charles Meltzer. By permission of the publishers The Viking Press Inc. Copyright 1914 by B. W. Huebsch. Copyright 1942 by Ludwig Lewisohn.

THE SCHOOLMASTER, and
THE BARBER, representatives of the world

Critique

This play is the most autobiographical yet poetic of all the great Silesian playwright's efforts in that he symbolically discusses the problem of the artist against the world, the creative spirit against reality. The problem of living a personal life while maintaining standards of idealism, of making a living by artistic means, is his own very real problem—one which Hauptmann himself did not solve, having outlived his creative power. The play remains as a strange sort of masterpiece, however, expressive of the revolt from naturalism, a discarding of the "slice of life" technique for which the playwright is most famous.

The Story

In a mountain forest glade Rautendelein, a beautiful elf child, sat singing and combing her long golden hair while calling to a water spirit, the Nickelmännchen. She made fun of the croaking froglike monster who came out of a nearby well. Into that setting skipped a faun who seemed enamored of the lovely sprite and who invited her to be his love. She refused, as if this were not her destiny. When she left, the wood and water sprites discussed the intrusion of man in their hallowed realms, the former having that day forced off the road and into a valley lake a bell meant for a mountain top church. The bell founder himself appeared quite exhausted and badly injured from his fall. He collapsed before the cottage of Wittikin, a witch whom mortals in the region greatly feared. Her granddaughter, Rautendelein, strangely drawn to the thirty year old Heinrich, made him a bed of straw and gave him milk to drink.

Heinrich was also drawn to this beautiful creature whose speech was song and who made him glad to leave the life of death below. He had tried to match the musical note of her voice in his supreme creation the bell even then in the lake. He called her his sweet fantasy and the glade his real home. He begged for a dying kiss. Wittikin told the child all mortals die while they, the mountain folk, Thor's children, must go about their immortal business.

When voices interrupted a merry troll dance Rautendelein feared she would lose this strange man. A wood sprite answered the rescue party, which consisted of a clergyman, a teacher, and a barber—envoys of the outer world of spirit, mind, and body. The Vicar spirit weak, could not go on, though the Barber urged them all to leave the bewitched area and the Schoolmaster declared such an attitude mere superstition. Frightened each addressed Wittikin, who in turn ridiculed their master worker and his trade as well as their respective callings for she and her kind hated clanging bells and all human enterprise. The villagers carried Heinrich away as a group of elves and sprites danced furiously. Rautendelein also danced, though she told the Nickelmännchen her spirit was not in it. They examined in wonder a tear from her eye, a globe of human pain. Thor flashed out and mocked her with raindrops. The Nickelmännchen warned her not to live with this half man who belonged partly in their world, but she turned to the world of men.

In the meantime, the bad news had reached the bell maker's home. Magda, Heinrich's wife, told a neighbor what labor the task had cost her husband and then went off to meet her husband's body, terribly disconcerted by the pallbearer appearance of the rescuers. Heinrich revived and, speaking as one already dead to his anxious wife, begged her pardon for hurts done. He renounced his great work as a misshapen thing providentially destroyed—a work for the valley rather than for the mountain tops. Saying that he now wanted no part of this world of flesh, he refused all aid and became unconscious. The Vicar would not seek aid from Wittikin, but Rautendelein, thought to be deaf mute Anna from the wayside inn nearby, breathed life into the body while the villagers sought other help. Heinrich, recovering, recognized her as nature, essential life, beauty, he would go with her onto the mountain. He declared to the returning Magda that he would live, though he was unaware of her joyful embrace.

Heinrich's presence in the mountains irritated all the supernatural folk. Taking up quarters in an abandoned glassworks, he mined ore, cut trees and worst of all, made Rautendelein his bride. The Nickelmänn was jealous, though the wood sprite said she would never love a water spirit, at least not as long as Wittikin remained the bell founder's friend. When these creatures teased Rautendelein about her earthly lover, she replied that their accursed race could by his industry and strength become renewed.

The Vicar, now dressed in mountain costume and determined on his course, interrupted this argument. He accused the sprite of bewitching and holding Heinrich without his consent. This charge she denied. At that moment the master craftsman appeared. Misled by flattery, Heinrich declared by occult signs that he was a new man, and he drank to the Vicar's health while explaining his exuberant yet fundamental new life.

The bell founder's vision was a chime of the finest metals which would ring by itself, through God's will and for no earthly church. The Vicar, denouncing this ecstasy, recounted Heinrich's earthly obligations to the Church and especially to his bereaved wife and children. He said it would be better if Heinrich were dead than to see him sustained by supernatural and sacrilegious beliefs. When Heinrich defended Rautendelein and his new life, the minister declared that both the people and God would crush him, that the arrow of rue would pierce though not kill him. This arrow could not pierce him any more than his great bell could ever toll again, Heinrich declared.

Some time later Heinrich, desperately working his forge, drove his dwarf helpers to exhaustion in an attempt to create his beatific vision, to mold the ideal. As one dwarf whispered in his ear, another angrily shattered the piece on which they worked so furiously, it was imperfect. Heinrich gave them a holiday and declared all could go to the devil and he would garden, eat, drink, sleep, and die. Exhausted, he dreamed that the Nickelmänn ridiculed his mortality, his weakness, and his uncompleted works. He thought his old bell longed to ring out, though choked with blood and sunk so deep. He awoke in terror and called Rautendelein for comfort, she responded by calling him her God and caressing him into illusions of immortality.

Incompleteness and imperfection goaded him still, however, and he struck out proudly for work. He was warned not only by her but by the spirit of the wood, the faun of sensuality, and by distant voices which cried out from below. Though he thought himself triumphant, a half remembered tolling unsettled him as the phantom forms of his two children brought him a pitcher of Magda's tears and the news that her dead hand rang the sunken bell. Heinrich renounced Rautendelein and tore himself from her.

At midnight, near the well, the weary Rautendelein met her fate as the bride of the Nickelmänn and sank into the water. Wood and water spirits discussed the matter, and the former prophesied that a man child would soon fill a watery cradle. Meanwhile, defiant Heinrich called out for his loved one, ready to throw a stone at parson, barber, teacher, or sexton. Wittikin barred his way and pointed to a flaming, incomplete cathedral castle. Determined to go on and yet exhausted, he drank from the well before he attempted to reach the flaming ruins.

A beloved voice sang a goodbye, though the sound was only half remembered

Wittikin comforted Heinrich in his final minutes, told him he was a hardy one, and granted him a boon. He drank first a goblet of the white wine of life, which he drained to the last drop. Then he drank a second of red, of the questing spirit. Just then Rautendelem appeared, though urged back into the well by the Nickelmann. Heinrich called for the final goblet of yellow wine, which was brought by Rautendelem. This he felt was all aspiration, sun wine poured into his veins now by the evanescent one. Only now, in death, did the master bell founder, embraced and kissed by his great love, hear the chimes of the sun break through the night of life into the dawn of eternity.

THE SUPPLIANTS

Type of work Drama

Author Euripides (c. 485 c. 406 B.C.)

Type of plot Classical tragedy

Time of plot Immediately after the War of the Seven against Thebes

Locale Eleusis, not far from Athens

First presented c. 424 B.C.

Principal characters

THESEUS, King of Athens

AETHRA, his mother

ADRASTUS, King of Argos

EVADNE, Capaneus' wife

IPHIS, her father

CHILDREN OF THE SLAIN CHIEFTAINS

THE GODDESS ATHENA

HERALD OF CREON

CHORUS OF ARGIVE MOTHERS

Critique

Though The Suppliants is not a well-constructed play, it has as much tragic feeling, eloquence, and imagination as any other of the ancient Greek tragedies. The Peloponnesian War so dominated the thought of Euripides that every one of his plays set in Athens is easily seen as a lesson to his fellow citizens and a warning against the follies of war. But even though The Suppliants, like Andromache and the Herakleidae, is marred by this didactic urgency, it profoundly embodies a universal theme: the criminal folly of men who kill men and the desperate need for religion, law, and human compassion.

The Story

Adrastus, the Argive king who had led the disastrous war of the Seven against Thebes and had alone escaped with his life, brought the mothers and the children of the slain chieftains to Athens, the most democratic and hospitable city of Greece. There they gathered at the temple of Demeter at Eleusis, and when Aethra, the mother of Theseus, came to pray they formed a ring of supplication about her, begging for help in recovering the dead bodies of their sons for burial according to the prescribed rites. The anguish of the mothers so moved Aethra that she sent at once for her own son.

The powerful young king closely examined the defeated old ruler and, after discovering that Adrastus had foolishly married off his daughters to quarrelsome exiles, Tydeus and Polynices, and had even more foolishly engaged in war against Thebes despite the advice of the prophet Amphiaraus, refused to help. But Aethra discreetly reminded her son that although his logic was sound as far as it went, he was nevertheless obligated by honor and the religious customs of Attica to go to the aid of all who sought proper burial and funeral rites for the dead Theseus, recognizing the wisdom and humanity of her counsel, departed to seek a vote of the Athenian assembly on the matter

Upon his return, Theseus announced that with the support of the assembly he was ready to send two messages to Creon, King of Thebes the first a polite request for permission to bury the dead, to be followed in case of refusal with a warning that his armies were on their way But he was interrupted by the arrival of an insolent herald from Creon who demanded in the name of his despot that Adrastus be driven from Athens The herald added that courageous wisdom called for peace Theseus although he detested war, felt obligated by the ancient laws of the gods to bury the dead, by force of arms if necessary After a heated exchange of words the Theban herald withdrew and Theseus prepared for battle He rejected Adrastus' offer of aid, for he was unwilling to blend his fortunes with those of a king who had brought upon himself the wrath of the gods As Theseus marched off with his troops, the chorus chanted fear of the fickleness of heaven and prayed for deliverance

Soon a messenger, bringing news of Theseus' victory, described how the Athenians arrived at the Theban gates, expressed a desire to avoid war provided they were permitted to bury the Argive chieftains, but finally found it necessary to slaughter the Thebans But Theseus, refusing to enter the gates and sack the city, had personally gathered together the dead bodies and washed their wounds Adrastus, deeply moved, lamented that the Thebans had not learned the lesson of compromise from his own experience and wished that he, too, had died with his fellow warriors

When the bodies were brought to Athens, Adrastus delivered a eulogy over each (Capaneus, Eteocles, Hippomedon, Parthenopaeus, Tydeus, and Polynices) before they were prepared for cremation on the funeral pyre Suddenly Evadne, widow of Capaneus, appeared on a rock overhanging the burning pyre, determined to marry him in death as she had in life Her aged father, Iphis, pleaded with her in vain Dressed in festive garments, she leaped into the fire As the children of the cremated warriors carried away the ashes in funeral urns, the grief-stricken Iphis withdrew to the dark interior of his house to die

Marching in funeral procession, the children (thereafter known as the Epigoni) chanted with the chorus an oath to avenge their fathers Theseus extracted from them a promise, too, that they and all their children would always remember the kindness they had received from Athens and honor the city of democracy But before the children could carry off the ashes of their fathers, the goddess Athena appeared in mid air and called upon Theseus not to permit the ashes to be returned to Argos Instead, after appropriate animal sacrifices, they must be delivered to the safekeeping of the oracle at Delphi Then, turning to the children, Athena prophesied that when they reached manhood they would successfully sack the city of Thebes and avenge the slaughter of their fathers

I SUPPOSITI

Type of work Drama
Author Ludovico Anosto (1474-1533)
Type of plot Farce
Time of plot c 1500
Locale Ferrara, Italy
First presented 1509

Principal characters

DULIPPO the true Erostrato posing as a servant
EROSTRATO, the true Dulippo posing as a student
POLYNESTA a young lady of Ferrara
DAMON a wealthy merchant, her father
CLEANDER an ancient doctor of law her suitor
A SIENESE posing as Erostrato's father
PHILOLOGANO, a wealthy Sicilian merchant, true father of the true Erostrato
PASIPHILLO a meddlesome parasite
BALIA, Polynesta's nurse

Critique

Ariosto wrote two versions of his famous I Suppositi (The Substitutes) the first in prose, the second in poetry, the action, however, is essentially the same in each. The play stands as an excellent example of the classical influence on Italian Renaissance drama. It follows to the letter the rules for a five act structure laid down by Landino, it adheres strictly to the unities of time, place, and action, it follows a Terentian plot line and employs the favorite Plautinian theme of mistaken identity. The play is also important in the history of English drama. Translated by George Gascoigne (under the title Supposes) for production at Gray's Inn in 1566, the work had a strong influence on the development of Elizabethan comic form, as may be seen from Shakespeare's early The Comedy of Errors. Aside from these historical considerations, I Suppositi is good comedy in its own right—a fast moving, ribald, and extremely playable piece.

The Story

Balia, nurse to beautiful young Polynesta, was concerned over her mistress' practice of sleeping with her father's servant, Dulippo. Polynesta reproved Balia, reminding her that it was she who had first given Dulippo access to her bedroom but reassuring her by giving the following situation.

Dulippo was, in reality, not a servant, but Erostrato, the son of a wealthy Sicilian merchant. Having come to Ferrara to pursue his studies, he had fallen in love with Polynesta upon his arrival.

Consequently, he had taken the name of his servant Dulippo and secured employment in the house of his beloved's father. Meanwhile, the true Dulippo had assumed the identity of Erostrato and occupied the house next door.

This affair had been going on for two years but now, Polynesta observed, it was being complicated by the fact that the doddering old doctor of law, Cleander, had become a suitor for her hand, tempting her father with an offer of two thousand ducats. Dulippo was attempting to forestall him by having the false Erostrato ask for her, too, and by having him meet Cleander's offer.

The old doctor arrived in the company of his ever hungry parasite, Pasiphilo, and the two ladies retired. Cleander's eyesight was so bad that he could not tell who they were. Under Pasiphilo's prodding, Cleander boasted that he would go to any price to secure Polynesta. He had, he claimed, amassed a fortune of ten thousand ducats during the time he had lived in Ferrara, and he boasted that this was the second fortune he had made. The first he had lost at the fall of Otranto twenty years before. That loss, he recalled sadly, was nothing to the loss of his five-year old son, captured by the Turks during the battle.

After Cleander had gone, Dulippo appeared to invite Pasiphilo to dinner. The false Erostrato confronted Dulippo with bad news. Damon, Polynesta's father, doubted Erostrato's ability to match Cleander's offer for his daughter. The two connivers agreed that they must devise some ruse to convince the grasping merchant of their ability to pay

Dulippo, to alienate Cleander and Pasiphilo, told the old doctor that Pasiphilo had insulted him, illustrating the insults in an extremely comic way After Cleander had left enraged, the false Erostrato arrived, this time with good news He had met a foolish Siennese gentleman whom he had frightened with the claim that all visitors from Siena would be persecuted in Ferrara The Siennese had sought protection by agreeing to pose as Erostrato's father He would meet any sum that Cleander could offer

But the trick was never played Damon had overheard Balia quarreling with a servant over the propriety of Polynesta's conduct and had learned of his daughter's two year old affair Dulippo and Balia were thrown into Damon's private dungeon Damon, aware of the extralegal nature of this procedure, swore the servant to secrecy but, unknown to him, Pasiphilo, who had been sleeping off an attack of indigestion in the stables nearby, had awakened in time to overhear everything

Meanwhile, to complicate matters further, Philogano, Erostrato's true father, had arrived from Sicily He had written asking Erostrato to return home but his pleas had been ignored, and he had decided to come in person for his son He was conducted to Erostrato's house by a local innkeeper The false Erostrato saw him in time, however, and attempted to hide

A hilarious bit of byplay followed in which the Siennese, aided by Erostrato's servants, on the one hand, and Philogano, assisted by his servants, on the other both claimed to be Erostrato's father Finally Philogano espied the false Erostrato, whom he knew as his servant Dulippo, and called on him to substantiate his claim He was confounded when the real Dulippo declared that he was Erostrato, that the Siennese was Philogano of Sicily, and that the old man was an impostor or mad Certain that Dulippo had done away with his son, Philogano went off to seek aid from the authorities

Pasiphilo arrived to cadge a dinner from Erostrato Concerned over the affair with Philogano, for he really loved the old man who had been a father to him, the false Erostrato asked Pasiphilo if he had seen Dulippo, and Pasiphilo told him the whole story of the discovery and imprisonment Afraid that the ruse had gone too far, the servant rushed off to confess all to Philogano, leaving Pasiphilo, to the latter's delight, in charge of the dinner

Philogano returned with the lawyer he had retained—old Cleander He explained how his trusted servant whom he had saved from the Turks twenty years before had betrayed him On hearing his story, Cleander closely questioned Philogano about the boy To Cleander's delight the real Dulippo turned out to be the old man's long lost son

Next came Damon Polynesta had revealed the whole truth of her affair, and he had rushed out to check up on her claim that his servant was actually the wealthy and highborn Erostrato

Finally the false Erostrato returned to make his confession and all the entanglements were straightened out The true Erostrato was released and united with his mistress, whom his father promised to procure as his bride—thereby pacifying Damon Cleander renounced his claim on Polynesta, he had wanted a wife only to produce an heir and now he had one in the true Dulippo Even Cleander and Pasiphilo were reconciled, and Pasiphilo was given a permanent invitation to dine at Cleander's house.

SURRY OF EAGLE'S-NEST

Type of work Novel

Author John Esten Cooke (1830 1886)

Type of plot Historical romance

Time of plot 1861 1863

Locale Virginia

First published 1866

Principal characters

LIEUTENANT COLONEL SURRY the narrator

MAY BEVERLEY, later his wife

COLONEL MORDAUNT an embittered, melancholy planter

FENWICK, his enemy

MRS PARKINS Fenwick's confederate

HARRY SALTOUN, a young officer, Mordaunt's son

VIOLET GRAFTON an orphan

ACHMED, Mordaunt's Arab companion

GENERAL STONEWALL JACKSON

GENERAL J E B STUART

GENERAL TURNER ASHBY

MAJOR JOHN PELHAM

CAPTAIN WILLIAM D FARLEY, a Confederate scout

Critique

Surry of Eagle's Nest, a romantic, historical novel of 132 brief chapters by Captain John Esten Cooke of the Confederate army, purports to be 'the memoirs of a staff officer serving in Virginia.' It blends many facts and much fiction, and, even if its flavor is extremely melodramatic, in keeping with the literary style of its author's generation, it has continued to fascinate readers for nearly a hundred years. For the reader who might want to follow Surry's fortunes to the end of the war Cooke composed a sequel, which he completed three years after General Lee's surrender. Written in the same vein as Surry of Eagle's Nest, but somehow not so well known, is Mohun, "the last days of Lee and his paladins."

The Story

Cavalier Philip Surry, who rode and fought under Prince Rupert in the English Civil War, escaped to Virginia when King Charles I was beheaded. Establishing a home, which he named Eagle's-Nest, on the Rappahannock River below Port Royal, he enjoined in his will that the oldest son of the family in each generation should sign himself "Surry of Eagle's Nest."

The present Surry, who had attended the Virginia Military Institute for one session and had studied law at the University of Virginia, was in Richmond in April, 1861, when the State Convention passed its ordinance of secession. One evening at the Capitol Square he saw with rapture a beautiful girl, whose dropped handkerchief contained the initials, M B. On another day, in Hollywood Cemetery, he witnessed by chance a duel between a tall, bronzed stranger named Mordaunt and one Fenwick, the encounter ending when Mordaunt put a pistol bullet through Fenwick's lungs. Surry left Richmond the proud recipient of a captain's commission in the Provisional Army of Virginia, and in his new gray uniform he rode toward Harper's Ferry for duty under Colonel Jackson.

Losing his way in the Wilderness, which bordered the Rapidan River, he spent a night in a house where dwelt an insane woman in white, still possessing traces of youthful beauty, who was attended by her lovely young cousin, Violet Grafton, and by a harriidan, Mrs. Parkins. Surprisingly there appeared at this house Fenwick, whose duel wound had not been fatal In the night "the White Lady," tiptoeing into Surry's room, slipped into his coat pocket a package bearing the words "Read these when I am dead—and remember

Your own Frances"

Further, while en route to Harper's Ferry, Surry was overtaken by a hurricane in a forest and was knocked from his horse by a large limb He was stunned and his arm was broken A female equestrian, whom the flying branches had spared, ordered her servant to take the injured man to her father's home, "The Oaks" There he convalesced under the eyes of Colonel Beverley and his daughter May, his rescuer and the owner of the handkerchief which he had picked up in Richmond Surry's heart was fully captivated, but May was already bound by a between fathers contract and a young-girl engagement to Frederick Baskerville The fact that her new lover knew Baskerville to be a scoundrel made Surry's plight doubly bitter

Fairly near "The Oaks" was the home of Mordaunt, which Surry visited Its owner, who lived hermit like with Achmed, a faithful Arab, was destined to become one of Surry's best friends Mordaunt's air of melancholy indicated the gentleman's deeply tragic past

After long delays, Captain Surry finally reported for duty to Colonel Thomas J Jackson, who made him an aide-de camp Shortly afterward the young staff officer met Colonel J E B Stuart The two colonels, soon to be come generals, would be Surry's idols to the end of his days

Before their first battle Surry and Mordaunt, now a Confederate colonel, saw an eerie night burial in the garden of a stone house at Manassas They observed on the scene Fenwick, the Parkins woman, and Violet Grafton The dead person was the insane "White Lady" of the Wilderness Again Mordaunt tried to kill Fenwick, but without success Soon afterward Surry delivered to Violet

Grafton the package which her cousin had put in his pocket

Wounded in the Battle of First Manassas, Surry was taken to the Fitzhugh home, "Elm Cottage," where he was well nursed Mrs Fitzhugh, charmed by Violet Grafton, gave the orphan girl a home

In 1862, having recovered from his wound, Surry was with Jackson throughout his spectacular Valley Campaign and held General Turner Ashby in his arms when that "Knight of the Valley" expired on the battlefield Briefly a prisoner, he met Sir Percy Wyndham, an Englishman wearing Federal blue Also he met and admired Captain Farley of Stuart's staff, a scout extraordinary When Jackson joined General Lee near Richmond to defeat McClellan, Surry shared in that campaign, then he was back near Fredericksburg, in the Wilderness area

There one night, peering through a window shutter at the house where he had first seen "the White Lady" and Violet Grafton, Surry heard Fenwick while intoxicated, acknowledge himself to be a Yankee spy Moreover, Fenwick reviewed to Mrs Parkins the story of his and Mordaunt's enmity Years before, Mordaunt and Fenwick, youthful friends, had become rivals for the love of Frances Carleton When she married Mordaunt, Fenwick planned revenge Still posing as a devoted friend, he utilized a trip of Mordaunt's to London to forge a letter which made Frances believe that her husband had landed in New York and was requesting her to let Fenwick escort her there to meet him Aided by the easily bribed Mrs Parkins, Fenwick abducted his friend's wife to Maryland, where she gave birth to a son, who was afterwards reported dead, and where she contracted a fever which permanently affected her brain Imitating Frances Carleton Mordaunt's handwriting, Fenwick perpetrated another forgery which duped Mordaunt into believing that his wife had forsaken him Embittered, the young husband left Virginia for a long sojourn in Arabian lands After drunken Fenwick's remarkable disclosure Surry captured him, but the prisoner escaped after bribing a guard At a later date, however, in a face to face combat, Mordaunt pinned his enemy to a tree with a thrust of his sword

Surry, who, as the war continued rose to be major and later lieutenant colonel, saw old Stonewall Jackson, Longstreet, and Lee defeat Pope at Second Manassas In the Maryland campaign which followed he was captured, interviewed by McClellan, and placed aboard a prison train headed for Baltimore, but he escaped by jumping through a window while the train was in motion In December, 1862, he was present when Lee's two corps under Longstreet and Jackson repulsed Burnside at Fredericksburg There he saw the youthful artillery genius, Major John Pelham, master maneuver his guns An ardent friendship between Surry and Pelham continued until the gallant young Alabaman was killed in battle

The spring of 1863 brought Surry abundant joy When Colonel Beverley's wealth at "The Oaks" was destroyed by invading armies, Frederick Baskerville lost interest in May so completely that he released her from her engagement Consequently she married Surry, with her father's sanction

Among Surry's friends was Harry Saltoun, a young Confederate lieutenant from Maryland Fenwick, who repeatedly recovered from seemingly mortal wounds, by means of a lying anonymous letter provoked Saltoun to challenge Colonel

Mordaunt to a duel Tragedy was averted, however, when Violet Grafton sent Mordaunt the paper in which "the White Lady," Mrs Frances Carleton Mordaunt, had recorded the whole truth about Fenwick and his evil deceptions Also, through an affidavit of a Maryland woman, Harry Saltoun was proved to be Mordaunt's own son

Fenwick's ultimate villainy was the abduction of Violet Grafton, but Mordaunt's devoted Arab companion, Achmed, trailed the knave to his hiding place There Mordaunt and Fenwick had their final fight, but it was Achmed, not Mordaunt, who killed Fenwick with a gleaming dagger Sadly, however, a ball from the dying villain's pistol wounded Achmed who expired in the presence of the two persons whom he loved, Mordaunt and Violet Grafton

"Fighting Joe" Hooker, who had succeeded Burnside as commander of the Federal army of invasion, thrust at Lee in the Wilderness, on the south side of the Rapidan and Rappahannock rivers In a brilliantly conceived surprise movement Stonewall Jackson struck Hooker's right flank at Chancellorsville, to win a thrilling victory This Southern triumph was dearly bought, for in the woods, on the night of May 2, 1863, Jackson was wounded by his own men, and on Sunday, May 10, that irreplaceable hero breathed his last

Surry of Eagle's Nest survived to tell his story and that of the war years For him, only the ghosts of the past remained

TALES OF ISE

Type of work Stories and poems

Author Arihara no Narihira (825-880)

Time Ninth century

Locale Japan

First transcribed Ninth century

Both the work commonly known as the Ise Monogatari (Tales of Ise) and the identity of its author have been long disputed However, it is generally conceded that the principal author was Narihira and that, as the collection of tales and poems now stands, later hands made additions after Narihira's death

There are slight differences in text and sequence among the various hand copied versions that have survived, but in general the work consists of 125 episodes, most of which open with the phrase, 'Once upon a time there was a man

" These episodes, put together with no particular order, chronologically or otherwise, vary in length and contain poems, sometimes only one, sometimes two or more, mostly by Narihira. Almost all of these episodes deal with amorous dalliances, and in time cover the hero's life from the time of his maturity rite to his death. That many of the tales are autobiographical in nature, based on real people and events, is undeniable.

This work, although slight, has a position in Japanese literature out of proportion to its length. Its strong influence may easily be seen, for instance, in Lady Murasaki's Tale of Genji (Genji Monogatari). The hundreds of later commentaries and studies dealing with the Ise Monogatari attest to its importance. Because of its episodic and disordered nature, no synopsis is possible, but through the 125 episodes there runs the central theme of the loves of the principal author who never clearly identifies himself, but who expresses the many aspects and manifestations of love: its joys, its despair, its pain, its triumphs, its comedy. A summary of some of the episodes follows.

Not too many years after the capital has been moved from Nara to Kyoto (A.D. 794) there lived a man who loved love. Shortly after his maturity rite, which at that time was usually at the age of eleven and when the boy had grown four and a half feet tall, the youth went falcon hunting at Kasuga in the former capital. There he happened to see two beautiful sisters and sent them a poem. The poem begins the description of the love life of this "man."

The later Imperial Consort Takako was the daughter of Middle Counselor Nagayoshi; in A.D. 859 she served as one of the performers at a court ceremony. About that same time the hero of the Tales of Ise met and began to visit her. When their love affair began to be bruited about, the girl was made unavailable by the simple expediency of placing her in service at court where, in 866, she became the consort of the Emperor Seiwa.

Tiring of life in the capital, the man went on a trip to eastern Japan, but he has gone no further than the border of Ise and Owari Provinces when he became homesick and composed poems to express his nostalgia. He met an itinerant priest, saw Mount Fuji for the first time, and composed a poem. Entering the province of Musashi, at the Sumida River which runs through present Tokyo, he composed a celebrated poem of nostalgia concerning the oyster catcher birds. In Musashi he also met and was attracted to various women. Later he wandered through the region to the northeast where he made love to the local country women.

A check with the Imperial Anthology the Kokin shū (Poems, Old and New, A.D. 905)—for of the 209 poems in the Ise Monogatari, sixty-two also appear in the Kokin shū—reveals that the woman in Episode 19 is in all likelihood the daughter of Ki no Arisune, who is mentioned in Episode 16. Arisune was a close friend of Narihira, and at least one of Arisune's daughters married Narihira, perhaps the one presented in Episode 19. It has also been thought that one of the girls in the first episode is the same girl as well. Arisune had an unfortunate life according to the standards of the court nobility of the time. His younger sister was the mother of Emperor Montoku's first born son, Prince Koretaka. But in 850, the year Montoku succeeded to the throne, another son, Prince Korehito, was born to Akirakei-ko, a daughter of Fujiwara no Yoshifusa, just at the time when the Fujiwara clan under Yoshifusa was about to achieve its hegemony at the court—a power which they achieved largely by intermingling with the imperial family through their daughters' marriages to future emperors, or through becoming the mothers of future emperors. No doubt Montoku was inclined to make his older son his successor but because of pressure brought upon him, the Fujiwara mothered Korehito succeeded him. This accession left Arisune on the outer fringe of power, and his subsequent career as a courtier was not a happy one. Yoshifusa went on to become prime minister during Montoku's reign.

Friends since early childhood, this daughter of Arisune eventually married Narihira, but Narihira did not long remain faithful to her. However scattered through the earlier episodes are hints which cause the reader to believe that she managed to draw him back to her after each infidelity.

There is also the eternal triangle involving two men and one woman, with the usual tragic results. The woman in this case had been waiting three years for the return of a man who had left to make his way in the capital. Meanwhile, she was courted by a second man, who finally won her promise of marriage. The first man, returning on the wedding night, learned what had happened during his absence and left the woman with his blessing. Following him, she lost her life.

There are passages of young love between a weaking son of good family and a household maid, or the love of a young girl, too shy to make her feelings known, who dies with her love unrequited as a result, of an affair between two faithless people who send each other poems charging the other with faithlessness, of a beloved wife whose husband is so busy with his duties at court that she feels neglected, and goes off with another man to the country. Eventually the husband is appointed an imperial emissary to an important shrine and there meets the woman, who is now the wife of a country official. She realizes her mistake, and becomes a nun. There is the story of an elderly woman, the mother of three sons, who is amorously starved but too diffident to say so openly, so she tells her sons of her craving as something she had dreamed. The third son alone is sympathetic to his mother's plight, and he arranges for her relief through the kind offices of the handsome Narihira.

From the earliest times it had been the custom for the emperor to appoint through divination an unmarried imperial princess to serve as the head priestess at important shrines. In Narihira's time the head priestess of the great shrine of Ise was Princess Yasuko, second daughter of Emperor Montoku. Her appointment, made in 859, lasted until 876. Sometime after her appointment, there appeared in Ise a handsome inspector in the guise of a falcon hunter. The priestess, having received word of his arrival on official matters, greeted him with special kindness, the meeting led to their falling in love with each other. For the sake of discretion she waited until night before paying him a visit, and she left long before dawn. That same morning a messenger arrived from her with a poem, the gist of which said, "Did you come to see me last night, or was it I who went to see you? I do not remember. Nor do I know whether it was all a dream, or was real."

Narihira replied with another poem making a tryst for that evening, but the governor of the province gave an all night banquet, thus Narihira's plans were thwarted because on the following day it was necessary for him to continue his tour of inspection. The lovers parted, promising each other in poems to meet again, somewhere, sometime.

So the episodes go, to end with the poem which might be roughly translated

Long have I known
That this last journey must be made,
But little did I know
That it might be so soon

TALES OF SOLDIERS AND CIVILIANS

Type of work Short stories

Author Ambrose Bierce (1842 1914?)

First published 1891

Ambrose Bierce wrote volumes of acid, satirical prose in his long career as a journalist, and even managed to get a somewhat pretentious twelve volume edition of his collected works published. Most of it, because of its time bound nature, was doomed to oblivion by the time the edition appeared. The work that continues and promises to survive is the collection of short stories titled Tales of Soldiers and Civilians. Bierce's literary reputation rests essentially on this book.

The bland title of this collection stands in ironic contrast to the vision of life which informs the stories themselves. In deed, Bierce seems to have striven for bland, noncommittal titles to most of his stories. Titles like "Chickamauga," "An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge," and "The Mocking Bird" tell little of the macabre nature of these tales. Bierce seems to have chosen his mild titles with deliberate irony.

When this volume was reprinted in 1898, it was given a more meaningful title, In the Midst of Life. The irony is more obvious and more indicative of the true content of the book: in the midst of life is death.

Death is the sole absolute of this book, the common denominator of each story, and the final proposition in a logic of ruthless necessity. Each protagonist is part of a greater logic, each is subordinate to the plot, and each is cursed. Death is separated from life, is raised up as a separate principle antagonistic to life, and becomes an entity in its own right. Death is seen as a hostile specter, rather than a normal process of life. As such, Death seeks to conquer life rather than aid it. Death then becomes an inevitable victor which "has all seasons for his own," as Bierce was fond of remarking.

Against such a powerful antagonist the heroes become victims in a web of cruel necessity, shadow figures drawn into the Valley of the Shadow, and as such they are depicted with sharp, relentless strokes. Bierce's heroes are essentially lonely men who derive their reality from the fear they experience. These men are cursed and driven by the logic of their curse. Their strongest motivation is fear, an all pervasive anxiety that frequently annihilates them. The success of each story depends on its ability to arouse this same fear in the reader.

In consequence, Bierce places a great value on courage, fearlessness in the face of death. However, he is acute enough to see that courage is not so much fearlessness as it is a greater fear overcoming a lesser fear, in most cases a fear of dishonor overcoming a fear of death. Courage, then, is the faith that one's honor is more important than one's life. Frequently the heroes Bierce admires court death with an awesome recklessness. His heroes are inevitably damned. There is no escape, no transcendence, and no salvation from the macabre situations into which they are drawn. Their dooms are inescapable facts. But the measure of their manhood is how they meet death.

Bierce's vision of life is fatalistic, but there is more to it than that. Avenging Furies hover about his stories, but they are not the same Furies that haunted Orestes. Bierce is nihilistic, but inevitably there is a macabre humor in his nihilism. The acid, satirical touch that colors the rest of Bierce's work is present here as well. Bierce's Furies are diabolical jesters, who love irony more than they love the wretched human spirit. His Furies are divine practical jokers, who drum "Dixie" and "John Brown's Body" on the human skull for laughs. One can scarcely tell whether the shriek one senses in Bierce's prose is that of humor or horror

Bierce's grotesque wit serves as a relief from the horror of his situations. A related technique that serves the same purpose is his ironic stance, one which removes him from the petty human scene and separates him from the terror of his heroes. Bierce assumes a godlike attitude that determines the objective nature of his prose. He uses a naturalistic style that is precise in diction, spare in depiction, ironic in narration.

In effect, Bierce takes on the cruel role of the Furies in narrating his stories, and the tone of his prose is frigid, caustic, and inhuman. Yet it is precisely this emotional sterility, this godlike irony, that makes his stories so powerfully chilling. If, for example, Bierce were to sympathize with his heroes, we would have pathos rather than terror. The very lack of an appropriate emotional response in the narration stimulates to an excessive degree the proper emotional response in the reader. The fact that Bierce himself was caustic, cruel, and sharp, demanding perfection of his fellow human beings, admirably served his limited artistic abilities and enabled him to focus his talent on evoking both terror and humor.

Tales of Soldiers and Civilians is divided into two parts, as the title suggests. There are the war stories and the mystery stories, and each type develops Bierce's vision of life in a different literary direction. The war tales anticipate Hemingway, while the civilian stories anticipate modern horror tale writers like H. P. Lovecraft.

Beyond a doubt, Bierce reached his artistic peak in the soldier tales. War stories provided the perfect medium for someone of his character and experience. First of all, Bierce had served in the Civil War and undoubtedly his stories draw much of their vigor and reality from first-hand experience. His depiction of various battles and their effects have an unmistakable aura of reality. His description of war is hauntingly vivid and stands in marked contrast to the maudlin accounts given in the vast bulk of Civil War writings.

Secondly, war tales provided an acceptable outlet for his obsessions with fear, courage, and death. These leitmotifs could be presented naturally in tales of soldiers. Since war abounds in abnormal situations, Bierce could write naturally about a twin killing his twin, about a son killing his father, and about an artillery man killing his wife. In the context of their stories these plots become necessary accidents, part of some divine causality.

Thirdly, Bierce's naturalistic style was admirably suited to describing the limited vision of the soldier in war, a vision which is not permitted the luxury of feeling pity and which must avoid all contemplation. It is a vision, moreover, that must concentrate on immediate objectives and on carrying out specific orders.

Finally, the army subjugates individuals to the mass. Deeds of fear and courage are the only acts by which a soldier is individualized and judged. Bierce's characters draw their reality from the way they face death. Each hero undergoes an ordeal which means death either for him or for someone close to him, and that test determines his character. Apart from that ordeal Bierce's characters are lifeless puppets dancing to a meretricious plot.

Bierce's war stories are his best. Nowhere else did he achieve such a perfect fusion of form and content, except perhaps in his aphorisms. In quality the tales are superior to about ninety-nine percent of the short fiction that was being written during the nineteenth century in America. In many instances they anticipate or rival Hemingway's stories. Actually, many points of comparison can be drawn between Bierce and Hemingway. Both show obsession with fear, courage, and death. Both use a crisp, ironic prose to communicate their vision. Both were to find happy expression in stories of war. Both present character tested through some ordeal. And both possess a cruel, evocative power at times giving their fic tion a haunting quality as vivid as a nightmare

Bierce's war tales, particularly "Chickamauga," "An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge," "One Kind of Officer," and "Killed at Resaca," are first rate for what they attempt to do. His civilian stories, however, fall somewhat short of the high standards he achieved in his war tales.

The reason for this diminished quality is that Bierce attempted to impose on his stories of civilians the same vision of life that pervades his soldier tales, and the grafting was not always successful. Pictures of war provided the perfect literary vehicle for his outlook since war abounds in pathological situations. When he tried to impose this vision on civilian reality, however, the imperfections of plot, the implausibilities, and the grotesqueness showed up much more glaringly. The trick endings came off much worse. The characters and plots never matched those of the war stories. To inject a pathological fear into stories about civilians requires great skill.

What Bierce succeeded in doing in these stories was to extend a relatively new prose genre, the short mystery tale. In this lesser genre Bierce came off rather well when compared with writers who today create in this vein. His stories continue to hold their own in the anthologies.

That Bierce was neurotic is beside the point. Successful in turning his neuroses into fine artistic stories, he has few equals in suspense, evocative power, clarity, and irony.

TALES OF UNCLE REMUS

Type of work Tales

Author Joel Chandler Harris (1848-1908)

First published 1880-1910

An old Negro sits talking to a little boy in his cabin on a cotton plantation not far from Atlanta, Georgia. The Civil War has not yet been fought, and the old man, a slave, belongs to the family that owns the cabin, the big house a few yards away, and the fine plantation. His loyalty is boundless to the parents of the little boy, the lady he calls "Miss Sally" and her husband "Mars John." He has known them a long time and he shares their memories of earlier times. Occasionally he speaks of those old days, but it is more usual for him to tell of times far more distant, when "my great granddaddy's great granddaddy live nex' door ter whar ol' Granddaddy Cricket live at" or of "one time, way back yander, 'fo' you wuz borned, honey, en 'fo' Mars John er Miss Sally wuz borned—way back yander 'fo' enny un us wuz borned." When he talks to the little boy who sits beside him (and years later to the son of the first little boy), both he and his listener move in imagination into legendary eras which have no calendar dates and need none. For the stories which Uncle Remus tells are drawn from the legends of many lands and ancient times.

Though Joel Chandler Harris wrote the tales of Uncle Remus, he laid no claim to having invented them. He looked upon himself as a mere recorder. A shy, modest, and somewhat diffident author who once described himself as a "corn field journalist," Harris admitted, in the introduction to Uncle Remus: His Songs and His Sayings (1880), his indebtedness to the Negroes from whom he heard the tales. In a later volume, Nights with Uncle Remus (1883), he gave credit not only to the Georgia Negroes but also to the many correspondents who, having enjoyed his first Uncle Remus book, had supplied him with material which he embodied in later stories.

Harris was uncertain as to where the Uncle Remus tales originated. Readers curious about possible origins may consult the introductions to the two volumes.

cited above and a number of articles listed in Lewis Leary's Articles on American Literature, 1900-1950 (1954). Old tales like those told by Uncle Remus in the middle Georgia Negro dialect and by his less-known friend Daddy Jake in the Gullah dialect of the coastal areas of South Carolina and Georgia have been found in Africa, Europe, South America and the Orient.

Questions of origin are for specialists, however, not for lovers of the tales themselves. There are clear resemblances between the characters and the simple plots of many of the Uncle Remus tales and those in folk tales from many nations. What gives these stories their special appeal is not their content but the manner in which they are told. (Mark Twain once wrote Harris: "In reality the stories are only alligator pears—one eats them merely for the sake of the dressing.") In addition, Uncle Remus himself is one of the most lovable characters in American literature. The sly humor of the old man, his pretended gruffness followed quickly by tender concern when he sees he has hurt the little boy's feelings, his ingenious parrying of the little boy's searching questions, his moralizing on the behavior of both children and adults, and his citing of ancient authority for the particular form of the tales ("de tale I give you like hit wer' gun to me")—all make him seem a very real person. Children see in him a kindly old man who loves to entertain children, to adults he is, in addition, a philosopher of life whose thoughts are based on close observation of people over many years. As to the origin of Uncle Remus, Harris replied when he was asked about it:

He was not an invention of my own, but a human syndicate, I might say, of three or four old darkies whom I had known. I just walloped them together into one person and called him "Uncle Remus."

Though Brer Rabbit does not appear in all of the Uncle Remus tales, he is the hero of many of them. The reason was given by Harris in his first volume, when he said that "it needs no scientific investigation to show why he [the Negro] selects as his hero the weakest and most harmless of all animals, and brings him out victorious in contests with the bear, the wolf, and the fox. It is not virtue that triumphs, but helplessness; it is not malice, but mischievousness." Moralists may complain that the mischievousness sometimes becomes cruelty and that Brer Rabbit is a remarkably accomplished liar, but to most adult readers these would seem carping criticisms. Perhaps some of the children who have known the tales through three generations may have objected to a code of conduct in the tales which is very different from what they have been taught in Sunday School or at home. Most have probably thought that the world of Uncle Remus's animals and birds is simply a story world anyway, one in which many things seem all right that would not be so elsewhere. Even Uncle Remus suggests, now and then, that he does not entirely approve of what has been done in a certain tale, as when several terrapins have been used to make it seem that Brer Rabbit has lost his race with Brer Tarrypin, and the little boy objects, "But, Uncle Remus, that was cheating." The old man answers:

"Co'se, honey. De creeturs 'gun ter cheat, en den folks tuck it up en hit keep on spreadin'. Hit mighty ketchin', en you min' yo' eye, honey, dat some body don't cheat you 'fo' yo' ha'r gat gray."

The Negro dialect of Uncle Remus presents a greater hindrance to readers today than it did when the tales first appeared. Even Southern Negro children have been known to ask in public libraries for a version of several of the tales simplified and "modernized" a few years ago. They complained that they could not understand the original tales. As the educational level rises for both whites and Negroes in the Southern states and as Southern speech becomes more like that in other parts of the nation, the dialect of Uncle Remus may come to seem as foreign to Americans as the Scottish dialect of Burns, and perhaps not much more comprehensible than Chaucer's English. Uncle Remus's tales are essentially oral ones, and they are best when read aloud. But if future readers come upon the stories without ever having heard anyone talk like Uncle Remus they will find it difficult to imagine the sounds, the inflections, and the easy flow of the old man's words in such a passage as the following:

"You kin put yo' 'pennunce in ole Brer Rabbit. He wuz dere, but he shuffle up kinder late kaze w'en Miss Meadows en de balance un um done gone down ter de place, Brer Rabbit, he crope roun' ter de ash hopper, en fill Brer Coon slippers full er ashes en den he tuck n put um on en march off. He got dar atter wile en soon s Miss Meadows en de gals seed 'im, dey up'n giggle en make a great 'miration kaze Brer Rabbit got on slippers. Brer Fox he so smart he holler out he did, en say he lay Brer Rabbit got de groun'-eatch."

Another barrier to comprehension of the Uncle Remus tales by future readers has been pointed out by Jay B. Hubbell in The South in American Literature, 1607-1900 (1954). American life has become increasingly urban in the last half century, and many children now grow up with scarcely any knowledge of the ways of animals like the rabbit, the fox, and the wolf, or of what life is like on a farm. It is true that Uncle Remus does make some allowance, in several tales in Told by Uncle Remus (1905), for the ignorance of the second little boy, who has lived in Atlanta and whose actions Uncle Remus frequently contrasts with those of the first little boy a generation earlier. But most of the tales were told to the first little boy, and Uncle Remus makes no explanation, for example, of the "spring 'ouse" that Brer Fox and Brer Rabbit put some butter in, or of what the "go'd er water" is that Brer Rabbit gives Brer B'ar to keep him from "stranklin'" after he has bit all the hair off Brer Possum's tail.

It is to be hoped, however, that the reading handicaps of dialectal spelling and strange words, or of the frequent use of terms from Southern farm life before it was transformed by mechanization and electrification, will not be strong enough to prevent future generations of American children and adults from relishing the story of Brer Rabbit's escape in "How Mr. Rabbit Was Too Sharp for Mr. Fox," from secretly rejoicing at "The Awful Fate of Mr. Wolf," or from joining in the merriment at "Brother Rabbit's Laughing Place."

TARR

Type of work Novel

Author Wyndham Lewis (1886-1957)

Type of plot Psychological realism

Time of plot About 1910

Locale Paris

First published 1918

Principal characters

FREDERICK TARR, an English artist

BERTHA LUNKEN, Tarr's fiancée, a German art student

OTTO KREISLER, a German artist

ANASTASYA VASEK, a Russian

LOUIS SOLTYK, a Pole

TARR by Wyndham Lewis. By permission of Chatto & Windus Ltd. Executors of the Estate of Wyndham Lewis. Copyright 1918-1928 by Chatto & Windus Ltd. Renewed. All rights reserved.

Critique

In this novel, Lewis presents a psychological study of a group of artists in the Paris of the days before the First World War. In the main, it is concerned with the emotional effects that these characters have upon each other as they are juxtaposed in various combinations. Lewis was also concerned with the national psychologies involved—in particular, English vs. German. He detested the Germans, and on Nietzsche he placed the blame for the overinflated egos of the many nonentities who infested the artistic world of this period. The novel is largely a satire on certain German characteristics: sentimentality, solemnity, and various aspects of Prussianism. The story is grotesque, farcical, and yet tragic; it is also a warning that the famous English 'grin' can be a mask for a sentimentality as bad as that of the Germans. By making Tarr, the main character, his mouthpiece, Lewis foreshadowed some of the famous novels of the 1920's, in which the discussion of ideas was the main point of the book.

The Story

Fredenck Tarr, an English artist living in Paris, was engaged to a young German woman, Bertha Lunken, a student in the Parisian art schools. Tarr rather disliked Germans, although he knew a great many of them in Paris. It was his theory that their only use was to be very intimate with, and that the real problem was how to put up with them when one was not intimate. Not wishing to have it known that he was engaged to Fraulein Lunken, he was on the point of breaking with her, for he considered her a dolt. He justified his strange attitude on the grounds that all his finer feelings had gone into his art and had left nothing over for sex. He admitted that his taste in women was deplorable.

After a conversation with a friend, during which he explained his theory, Tarr went to his fiancée's apartment. He felt some remorse for his treatment of Bertha, but he had been attracted by her bourgeois bohemian absurdities and her Germanic floridity and had unwittingly become too involved. Now, he felt a break had to be made. But he had underestimated the intensity of feeling that Bertha had developed for him. The scene in the apartment, carefully decorated with sham art that Tarr loathed, was comic yet tragic. Tarr could not help feeling that he was treating Bertha shabbily, yet he was passionately convinced that marriage was not for him. Nor had he expected such floods of tears. But somehow the break was accomplished, and Tarr departed with the promise to see Bertha again after a few days.

Otto Kreisler, an impecunious German artist, lived on a small allowance grudgingly doled out by his father. Just returned from a trip to Italy, he was more than usually hard up. Four years before Otto had made the mistake of marrying off an old sweetheart to his father. Since he refused his father's urgings that he give up art, return to Germany, and settle down into business, the monthly check, in revenge, was sent at irregular intervals. At this point, he was concerned with pawning his portmanteau as the result of failure to borrow money from an affluent compatriot, Ernst Volker. On his return from Italy, Kreisler had discovered, to his horror, that his position as the recipient of Volker's bounty had been taken by a Pole, one Louis Soltyk, and that no more money could be expected. He already owed Volker fifteen hundred marks. It was the psychological effect of lack of money that, by indirect means, propelled Kreisler toward his final tragedy.

In a mood of discouragement—the check from home was late again—he went to the Café Vallet for lunch. By chance, he found himself at the same small table with an extraordinarily beautiful young woman who, after some preliminary conversation, explained that she was Anasztasya Vasek and that she had escaped to Paris from her parents' bourgeois home.

Kreisler was strongly attracted to her because to him women had always been a kind of emotional pawnshop where he could dump his sorrows. With German sentimentality, he thought of love as sorrowful. Determined to follow up that chance meeting, and in spite of the fact that his evening clothes were in pawn, he accepted an invitation from a member of the German colony, Fraulein Lipmann, to join her group at a dance at a club in the neighborhood.

On the afternoon before the dance he came upon Anastasya sitting with Solytk in a café. Again, he decided, the Pole was interfering in his affairs.

Driven by a kind of persecution mania, Kreisler deliberately made a fiasco of the evening. On the way to the dance, he found himself walking with Bertha and somewhat behind the other members of the party. Again, their peculiar German psychologies inter reacted, he wished to avenge himself through her on the more affluent guests, she felt that he was suffering and that she should make a sacrifice to console him. So Kreisler kissed her roughly and she permitted the kiss. They were seen by the other Germans, who were walking ahead. Arrived at the dance, Kreisler, dressed in rumpled morning clothes and still under the spell of his mania, behaved abominably. He insulted nearly every woman present and was almost thrown out. Worse, Anastasya laughed at him, turning his admiration to hate. The next morning, when the long awaited allowance arrived accompanied by a command to return to Germany, Kreisler replied to his father that he would kill himself in exactly one month.

Shortly afterward Bertha received a letter from Tarr, informing her that he had heard of the episode with Kreisler and that he was leaving for London. Further, the "Kreisler affair" had rather embroiled Bertha with her German friends. In a dreary mood, she went out to buy lunch and met Kreisler after some conversation, she accepted his in-itation to visit a café the following evening. This curious act was a defense against her friends, it was part of her theory that he was in distress and it would contradict the story, now current, that his outrageous behavior had been the result of Anastasya's snub. Also, her meeting with Kreisler would be a kind of revenge on Tarr. So she succeeded in convincing herself that she was being driven into this strange friendship. Eight days later, in Kreisler's studio, he possessed her by force, and the situation that she had created became suddenly tragic. Kreisler came to her apartment, offered to shoot himself, and finally departed after swearing to be her eternal servant. With her usual sentimentality, Bertha felt uplifted, as if together they had done something noble.

Meanwhile, Tarr had merely moved to the Montmartre district, where he felt that he could work in peace. He continued to frequent his old section with its German colony so that he could keep an eye on Bertha. Inevitably, he met Anastasya, and just as inevitably he encountered Bertha and Kreisler together. He could not resist joining this pair, their "Germanness" gave him an ironic pleasure. Kreisler was baffled by the Englishman's sudden friendship that led Tarr to join him at a café evening after evening, and he found his Teutonic solemnity not equal to the situation. Fearful of being driven mad, he threatened the Englishman with a whip when Tarr went to his room and then pushed him out the door.

During this time Tarr and Anastasya, attracted to each other, had long café conversations about life and art. But a storm was gathering. One evening Tarr, who had joined Kreisler and a Russian at a café, saw the German jump from his seat, rush across the room to a group of Russians and Poles, and slap Solytk's face. That afternoon Kreisler had met Anastasya and Solytk and, in a cold fury, had struck Solytk. Now he was challenging the Pole to a duel, after much excited conversation the challenge was accepted

The duel next morning was another mixture of comedy and tragedy The seconds were trying to effect an honorable compromise when Kreisler's mood suddenly changed he offered to forgive Soltyk if the latter would kiss him! As he leaned forward the enraged Pole leaped upon him they fell to the ground and the seconds began fighting among themselves When the dust had settled Soltyk's friends tried to lead him away, but they were stopped by Kreisler, who still held his pistol A Pole struck at him, Kreisler fired and killed Soltyk Kreisler fled Five days later, penniless and hungry, he reached a village near the border and was put in jail In a last display of his disordered temperament, he hanged himself in his cell His father paid the exact sum demanded by the town for the burial

In Paris, meanwhile, Tarr and Anastasya had rapidly become involved in an affair, and Tarr continued to see Bertha in decreasing doses," as though he were taking medicine As he was about to give her up she told him that she was pregnant and that the child was Kreisler's Out of pity Tarr married her But he lived with Anastasya Two years later, Bertha divorced him to marry an eye doctor Tarr never married Anastasya He had three children by another woman

THE TASK

Type of work Poem

Author William Cowper (1731-1800)

First published 1785

The first popular poetic success of William Cowper was The Task, which was also his first major venture in blank verse For the fifty-four-year-old recluse the reception of his poem must have had a salutary effect, for he went on to become, according to his greatest champion, Robert Southey, "The most popular poet of his generation"

Cowper's place in literary history is often in dispute Coming as he did exactly one hundred years after Dryden, he completed his best work in the year of Dr Johnson's death He neither aspired to become poet laureate nor did he wish to be the critical arbiter of his day Yet in many ways he was the successor of both men His blank verse is perhaps the best between Milton and Wordsworth, while his criticism expresses dissatisfaction with the extreme formalism of his age and anticipates in some measure the nineteenth-century revolt against neoclassicism He is usually said to be a writer of this transition toward romanticism and realism

His first work of any magnitude, Olney Hymns (1779), he undertook with his evangelical friend, the Reverend John Newton, while living at Olney with the Unwin family "Oh! for a closer walk with God" is the most beautiful of his hymns rivaling the best of both Newton and Wesley, and perhaps superior in poetical form and sentiment

Although Cowper's writing of the then fashionable couplet was not successful, his early verse was at least simple (He objected strenuously to Pope's influence, which resulted in the highly ornamented versification of that age) Several long poems in this genre, published in 1782, serve as a kind of prelude to The Task "Table Talk," written in rather abstract couplets, is a dialogue concerning the political, social, moral, and literary topics of the day Here Cowper's dislike for the artifice of the eighteenth century is quite clear, and he damns most of the literary cults with faint praise, at the same time urging a return to God and nature for inspiration "The Progress of Error" outlines the follies of high life and living as these affect the social structure in this work he suggests a return to Christianity for the solutions to vexing problems "Truth" extends Cowper's religious beliefs almost as if his distant relationship, through his mother's line with the cleric John Donne were making itself felt His thesis here is that pride is truth's greatest foe, while humility will uplift mankind In "Expostulation" he particularly denounces anti-Semitism and urges England to remove this mote from the public eye "Hope" and "Charity" celebrate God's nature (not the human nature of the Age of Reason) as the proper study, or at least reflection, of mankind Satirically, he contrasts man's ways with God's Another poem of this early group is "Retirement," an apology for his life as a recluse, his justification for giving up a life of action for the contemplative life of the poet

By happy chance, in 1783 one of Cowper's intimate friends, Lady Austen, urged him to abandon the restrictive couplet form for blank verse Cowper tells of this happening in the "Advertisement" of The Task

A lady, fond of blank verse demanded a poem of that kind from the author, and gave him the SOFA for a subject He obeyed and having much leisure, connected another subject with it and, pursuing the train of thought to which his situation and turn of mind led him, brought forth at length instead of the trifle he at first intended, a serious affair—a Volume!

This volume of five thousand lines is divided into six parts "The Sofa," "The Time Piece," "The Garden," "The Winter Evening," "The Winter Morning Walk," and "The Winter Walk at Noon" The poem's success was immediate, launching for the middle aged poet a career and a reputation

The sofa Cowper describes in the opening lines is the effete summation of man's efforts to indulge in slovenly comforts, a human failing the poet presents with evident good humor He leaves the sofa as he says "for I have lov'd the rural walk" with a good companion at his side It is immediately apparent that the poet's work is to justify man's ways to God "The task of new discoveries falls on me," he suggests as he goes abroad The next lines indicate that he will not countenance romantic illusions of the peasant's hard life or such poetic effusion of his age that tend to overlook the sordid, cruel, or ungodly In comparing country and town he sets up a dichotomy which persists throughout the poem God creates and man destroys

In "The Time Piece"—really time serving or expediency—Cowper takes a long look at institutions, especially political After a close examination of events now forgotten he remarks in a memorable line, "England, with all thy faults I love thee still" But the England he loves is the nation of an earlier, more virtuous, simpler time He examines public figures, especially ministers and finds them wanting He suggests that God must be in every heart, Christ in every act The river Ouse he describes as a symbol of immortality and ease "The Garden" brings the poet to the eternal verities of nature and causes him to celebrate family life, domestic happiness Within this poem is the parable of Cowper ("I was a stricken deer, that left the herd") who wounded by society, retired to a life of religious contemplation From this vantage point he asks men to be humane and Christian to eschew wars, to learn wisdom "Who loves a garden loves a green house too" is his plea to men to cultivate simple pleasures in a rural setting "Health, leisure, means to improve it, friendship, peace" are what he thinks worth while He concludes with a harsh renunciation of the city

Continuing his statement of conflicting interests in "The Winter Evening" Cowper compares the tragic news of the world with the simple man who delivers the post, unmoved So should man live, he says, interested and sympathetic but apart, nothing is pleasanter than a winter night spent with good friends in good talk, and before a good fire. Again the town appears as the corrupter, its poison filtering down in the form of fashions spoiling the simple folk and altering the landscape. While there are consolations in poetry, especially Milton's rural life brings more compensations and inspiration.

"The Winter Morning Walk" a bracing though aesthetic experience, restores the poet's good humor as he observes beast and man under winter's thrall. Cowper sees in winter a hope for immortality, for as the seeds and hibernating creatures wait out the ice, so man is bound in history. He next shames the great men of history as tyrants of oppression and great countries as slave holders.

'Tis liberty alone that gives the flow'r
Of fleeting life its lustre and perfume

He is a freeman whom the truth makes free and all are slaves besides

This is the substance of his argument. He concludes with an apostrophe to godly graces and offers thanks to God.

Finally in 'The Winter Walk at Noon,' William Cowper in sonorous polysyllables celebrates village bells as symbols of harmonious living—and offers also a backward glance at his own life. Here he describes the winter landscape in an ode to the cold, crisp season. In memorable passages he anticipates the spring. Finally, he justifies the life of the rambler, the contemplative life of the poet who sounds the note of God's truth, whether of castigation or exaltation.

THE TEMPLE

Type of work Poetry

Author George Herbert (1593-1633)

First published 1633

Sir Richard Herbert, an aristocrat of Norman descent, died when his son George was three years old. His ten children were reared by their mother, who is known to have been a wise, witty, generous, and religious woman. John Donne said "Her house was a court in the conversation of the best." Too frail for the family profession of soldiering, George Herbert was early guided toward the priesthood by his mother. He was not, however, ordained until 1630. Nevertheless, Magdalen Herbert seemingly influenced the course of his life as much as Donne influenced his poetry. The first sonnets he wrote were addressed to her and in them he vowed to devote himself to religious poetry.

The Latin verses that Herbert wrote at Cambridge are full of classical allusion. In The Temple, which consists of the main body of his English verse, he eschewed all archaic references and poetic rhetoric as studiously as Donne himself. From Donne he also learned to transmute thought into feeling so that the intellectual concept becomes the emotional experience of the poem. Like Donne's, his rhythms are colloquial and his imagery although not often as dramatic as that of Donne, is similarly practical, concrete and arresting.

Herbert's range was narrower than Donne's; he wrote only religious poetry and it is not turbulent or exacerbated. One should beware of calling Herbert "simple" or it can be said that he is simple rather than tortuous or complicated, and he does have a moral simplicity. His thought is varied, but evidences one central preoccupation. In his last letter to Nicholas Ferrar, to whom he sent the manuscript of The Temple, he described his poems as "A picture of the many spiritual conflicts that have passed betwixt God and my soul, before I could subject mine to the will of Jesus my master, in whose service I have now found perfect freedom." His anguish was lest he should not be a good and worthy servant to God, and not that he had lost faith or was threatened with damnation. His main temptation was worldly ambition.

At Cambridge Herbert's main relaxation was music: he played the lute and wrote accompaniments to his Latin poems. This interest is evident in the vocabulary and also in the rhythm of many of his poems. Some like his version of the Twenty-third Psalm, were written to be sung. In "Easter" the lute is an image for the body of Christ on the cross.

The cross taught all wood to resound
his name,

Who bore the same
His stretched sinews taught all strings,
what key

Is best to celebrate this most high day

This equation, in the second stanza of the crucifixion and the lute communicates the glory and pathos of Easter. The eager invocations to the poet's own heart and lute in the first stanza are found also in the third which carries the full implications of the previous image and reinforces it.

Consort both heart and lute, and twist
a song

Pleasant and long
Or since all musick is but three parts
vied,

And multiplied,
O let thy blessed Spirit bear a part
And make up our defects with his sweet art

Ambition for worldly acclaim is as recurrent in Herbert's poetry as music. In The Temple he often analyzes the delights of success and the rejection of these delights as as meaningful poetically as it was in his life. In "The Pearl" Herbert speaks of his knowledge of learning, honor and pleasure and concludes each stanza with the refrain, "Yet I love thee." In the last stanza the value of such knowledge is justified and explained: it renders his love of God significant and reasoned. "Therefore not sealed but with open eyes/I flue to thee."

This quality of quietness, certitude, and moral simplicity at the end of many of Herbert's poems gives them peculiar power. A controlled and intense late poem of rebellion contemplated, "The Collar," reflects at its close Herbert's complete humility and devotion in spite of all ambition and restlessness. The poem describes all that was lost.

Sure there was wine,
Before my sighs did dene it there was corn

Before my tears did drown it
Is the yeare onely lost to me?

Have I no bayes to crown it?
No flowers, no garlands gay? all blasted?
All wasted?

Not so, my heart but there is fruit,
And thou hast hands

Recover all thy sight bloom age
On double pleasures leave thy cold dispute

Of what is fit, and not forsake thy cage

The poem is forceful, quick and argumentative at the height of its fierceness the poet interrupts himself.

Methought I heard one calling Childe
And I reply'd My Lord

Herbert's devotion to God is usually expressed with this humility and with a sensitive awareness of personal unworthiness. The ability to love is itself a gift of God. The search for a way of service is complemented by Herbert's intense consciousness of the sacrificial nature of Christ's life. In the sonnet "Redemption," the poet records a search for Christ first in heaven, then in earth's palaces, cities, and courts. Finally He was found in a rabble of thieves and murderers.

there I him espied,
Who straight, Your suit is granted, said,
and died

The common meeting grounds of people and mundane activities and possessions are a great source of imagery to Herbert. His lyrics are probably his greatest poetry, and their structure, imagery, vocabulary, and rhythm all encompass one dominant idea, which, after the thought that inspired the lyric has been thoroughly explored, is finally, exactly, and directly communicated. These poems have total unity, and the impression of ease (in craftsmanship, not of feeling) is obtained by the logical and perceptive argument. Technically, this effect is most often achieved in the development of the images. In "Vertue," the clear and sensuous expression of the death of the day and a rose and of the spring which is composed of days and roses, "A box where sweets compacted lie," leads to an image of natural strength, where the virtuous soul "Like season'd timber, never gives", and the penultimate line, following logically from the timber image, uses a most commonplace object, coal, as a continuation of it, and reverberates with the conviction of the immortality of the soul.

But though the whole world turn to coal,
Then chiefly lives

In "Affliction (1)" Herbert's feeling of unworthiness is clearly related to his ill health. There is a carefully balanced argument at first: loving God was a joyous experience and Herbert uses the metaphor of a furnished house to express his contentment. "Thy glorious household stuff did me entwine." After the first rapture in which there was no room for fear, sorrow and sickness overcame him. This situation was partly improved when he turned from "the way that takes the town" and won "Academic praise." Then, lest he should "too happy be" in his unhappiness, God sent him further sickness. "Thus does thy power cross bias me." A note of rebellion sounds at the seemingly contradictory demands of God, but the poem concludes

Ah my deare God! though I am clean forgot,
Let me not love me if I love thee not

Herbert's poetry is a constant communing with God, and it presents a great variety of moods. The firm tone of "Affliction (1)" can be contrasted with the delicacy and gentleness of "Love (111)," in which the alternating long and short lines illustrate the hesitancy of a soul yearning for God's love and yet not able to grasp it because of its own inadequacies. The tenderness of love is implicit in the vocabulary "welcome," "sweetly," "smiling," and "quick eyed love." Flat monosyllables convey the soul's guilt: "sinne," "slacke," "marr'd," and "shame." But love made the eyes that call themselves unworthy, and love bore the blame for the sin. Love encourages the soul until it can accept these things and the gift of love itself.

You must sit down, sayes Love, and taste my meat
So I did sit and eat

Another poem in which the length of line echoes the feeling is "Easter Wings." The affected device of writing a poem in the shape of "wings"—and it was in the early editions printed vertically on the page—is effective in this instance. The first and last lines of both verses are long and each verse has middle lines of only two words each. This arrangement conveys in reading the rise and fall of the lark's song which is the image for the fall of man and his resurrection in Christ. "Easter Wings" is the best of the poems in which Herbert uses some trick to illustrate his meaning. Other examples are "The Altar" and "Paradise."

Donne's influence on Herbert's poetry can thus be seen in the variety of his lyrical forms, the directness of his language, and his less learned but equally arresting imagery. In contrast to Donne's poetry, Herbert's is essentially peaceful. His poems never end on a note of desperation. His way of thinking and his sensibility, by which he perceives the nuances in an idea and the connections between varied images and then fuses these to communicate feeling, is essentially metaphysical. The quiet tone of

Herbert's poetry with its power of persuasion by gentle argument is entirely original and something for which, as the "Jordan" poem tell us he consciously strove and beautifully achieved

As flames do work and winde, when they ascend
So did I weave myself into the sense
But while I bustled I might hear a friend
Whisper, How wide is all this long pre tence!
There is in love a sweetness readie
penn'd
Copie out only that, and save expense

Herbert had great influence on other seventeenth century poets. Vaughan borrowed from him extensively, and Crashaw called his own first volume The Steps to the Temple. He was, together with the other metaphysical poets, criticized in the eighteenth century. Pope, although disliking his poetic method, in his Essay on Man appears to have been influenced by Herbert's philosophy. Coleridge restored critical favor to Herbert, and he profoundly influenced Gerard Manley Hopkins. The delighted response of twentieth century poets to the metaphysical poets is well known.

THE TEMPTATION OF SAINT ANTHONY

Type of work Novel

Author Gustave Flaubert (1821-1880)

Type of plot Historical romance

Time of plot The fourth century

Locale Egypt

First published 1874

Principal characters

SAINT ANTHONY

HILARION his disciple

THE DEVIL

THE QUEEN OF SHEBA

TERTULLIAN

MONTANUS

APOLLONIUS

Critique

In this novel we find many indications of Flaubert's religious thought not only the conclusions of his later life but also his attempts to find in the past some hope for his day, his realization of the attractions of the heresies of history, his knowledge of the struggle for faith. It is a novel which combines vast knowledge with a romantic imagination. We see also, even in translation the results of Flaubert's careful and laborious method of writing.

The Story

Having lived the life of a hermit for over thirty years, Anthony had come almost to the point of despair. He was extremely weary of life and with the world as he saw it from the limited point of view of his cell high in the mountains. At one time people had made pilgrimages to see him and be advised by him. These same people had furnished him with whatever money and clothing he needed. But everyone had stopped coming years before and Anthony had begun to fear that his life was worthless. He then began to long for the money, women, and goods of this world through which he might regain some sort of recognition and pleasure.

One night his solitude became too much for Anthony. He remembered his early life as a monk with its adventures and successes, and he thought of the things he might have done if he had not become a hermit. At last he decided that it was merely his own stubbornness that kept him alone in the mountains. Rather than allow himself to be guilty of such a sin, he prepared to depart. But he got no farther than the cleared area before his cell. Realizing that he had almost yielded to temptation, he threw himself upon the ground. Then, in order to regain his strength and courage, he read from the Acts of the Apostles and tried to think. His mind, however, kept coming back to worldly matters that still tempted him.

Anthony then began to review in his mind the things that were a credit to him in this world, the good works of his life. He praised himself for hardships he had suffered and for the things which he had denied himself. Again he began to feel sorry for himself, the desire for the money, goods, and women that had earlier been denied became too much for him. He fell into a trance.

While Anthony lay on the ground the Devil appeared, his wings spread like those of a giant bat to reveal beneath them the Seven Deadly Sins. Anthony awoke hungry and thirsty. Taking up a scrap of bread, which was all that he could find to eat in his cave, he threw it on the ground in anger. Then there appeared before him a table laden with all manner of meat and fruit from which he might satisfy himself. As he watched, the table grew and things which he had never seen before appeared on it. Anthony almost indulged himself, but he realized, in time, that this also was the work of the Devil. When he kicked the table, it disappeared.

Soon afterward Anthony found on the ground a silver cup which had a gold coin at the bottom of it. When he picked up the coin another appeared, and then another, until the cup filled and began to overflow. As Anthony watched, he began to dream of the power that could be his because of so much wealth. He soon saw himself as second in power only to the emperor and at the same time he thought of the revenge he could take on all his enemies. He even imagined himself as the emperor, taking precedence in Church affairs over the fathers of the Council of Nicaea. During this time, however, his bodily form had become more and more degraded until at last he saw himself as a beast. At this point he awoke.

Anthony flogged himself furiously for indulging in such sinful dreams, but as he was doing so he became aware of the arrival of a caravan. Soon the Queen of Sheba presented herself before him with many promises of love and luxury, the only condition being that Anthony had to give up his solitary life and live with her. Although she used all of her feminine charms to lure him away, Anthony firmly resisted the temptation she offered.

After she had disappeared, Anthony noticed that a child, whom he supposed had been left behind by the caravan, was standing in the door of his cell. The child was Hilarion, a former disciple. As Anthony watched, the child grew to the height of a man and began accusing the saint of leading a sinful life. He charged that Anthony's abnegation was merely a subtle form of corruption, that his solitude simply freed him from the outbreak of his lusts, and that he only thought he held all the wisdom of the world because he was too lazy to learn anything new. When Anthony defended himself by saying that the Scriptures held all the wisdom necessary for mankind, Hilarion pointed out various minor contradictions in the New Testament. He then tempted Anthony by offering to lead him to a knowledge of the Unknown, the sources and secrets of life. At that point Anthony fell into another trance.

When he again became aware of his surroundings he found himself in a large congregation which included all the great heretics of history, each propounding his own theories of God and the universe. Some suggested that God was feminine. Others were devoutly following one aspect of Christianity, such as drinking the blood of Christ while completely ignoring all other aspects. Some were warning their naked bodies by an open fire in order to show the purity of Adam in paradise. Soon a man dressed as a Carthaginian monk leaped into the middle of the crowd, named them all for the impostors they were, and drove them away. Anthony, recognizing Tertullian, rushed forward to meet him but he found, instead, a woman seated alone on a bench.

The woman began to talk about Montanus, whom she believed to be the incarnation of the Holy Ghost. When Anthony suggested that he was dead, Montanus appeared before them in the form of a Negro. Then followed another succession of people, each propounding a different heresy, until a woman called Marcellina suggested that she could cause Christ himself to appear if she invoked him with the aid of a silver image. When she was put to the test, however, only a python appeared. It quickly wrapped itself around Anthony, and the people began to proclaim him the Christ. At that point Anthony swooned in horror.

When he awoke, he found himself in prison with the early Christians who had been thrown to the lions, and he found himself wishing that he too could give his life to God in such a way. Then Simon appeared before him with a woman who he claimed was the embodiment of all the infamous women of history, but who had now been cleansed through him. He offered Anthony the secret of his magic but disappeared at the mention of holy water. Apollonius and his disciple then appeared before Anthony and offered to describe the long road to salvation and immortality. Anthony was about to yield to their eloquence, but he drew back in horror when Apollonius began to describe his visions and his power of curing the sick and predicting the future. Because these proved the hardest of the temptations offered thus far, it was not until Anthony clung to the cross and prayed that Apollonius and his disciple disappeared.

But Apollonius' taunts that Anthony's fear of the gods kept him from knowing them awakened in him a desire to see them. Hilarion then caused to appear before him the gods of men in all ages. When Anthony laughed at them, Hilarion pointed out that there was an element of Truth in each one, which fact caused Anthony to grieve that these false religions could so easily lead man astray. He himself almost succumbed to the beauty of Olympus and the Greek gods, but he was able to repel their images by repeating the Apostles' Creed. Although Anthony had seen and learned enough of the false gods, the vision continued until he confessed to a desire to see the Devil. He hoped that his horror of Satan would rid him forever of such an evil. When the Devil appeared, Anthony was immediately filled with regret, but it was too late to recall his wish.

The Devil carried Anthony into space in order to show him that man and the world were not the center of the universe, that there were no limits to space and no purpose in its being. While the two engaged in a discussion on the nature of God, the Devil attempted to dispel all Anthony's beliefs in divine goodness, love, and infinite power. He tried to show that before understanding a God that had no limitations whatsoever, we must first understand the infinite. By spreading his wings to cover all space, he showed himself to be infinite and called upon Anthony to believe in him and curse God. Only by raising his eyes in a last desperate movement of hope was the saint able to rid himself of this evil.

When Anthony next awoke, the figures of Death and Lust confronted him, each begging him to come and escape the ugliness of this world. Refusing to yield, Anthony was no longer disturbed by what had seemed the disparateness of all things. As dawn began to break he no longer felt afraid, he enjoyed life once more. When the clouds rolled back, and he saw the face of Jesus Christ in the middle of the sun, he made the sign of the Cross and resumed his prayers.

THE THEBAIS

Type of work Poem

Author Publius Papinius Statius (c. 45 c. 96)

Time Remote antiquity

Locale Argos Nemea Thebes

First transcribed Last quarter of first century

Principal characters

OEDIPUS deposed King of Thebes

JOCASTA his wife and mother

ETEOCLES,

POLYNICES

ANTIGONE, and

ISMENE their children

CREON, Jocasta's brother

MENOECEUS his son

ADRASTUS, King of Argos

ARGIA his daughter, Polynices' wife

TYDEUS

CAPANEUS,

AMPHIARAUS,

HIPPOMEDON and

PARTHENOPAEUS Argive heroes of the march against Thebes

HYPSIPYLE, the former Queen of Lemnos, now a slave

The Thebais of Statius, a retelling in epic form of the Seven Against Thebes, by Aeschylus, draws extensively on the general body of material dealing with the ill-fated family of Oedipus. Statius' version of the tale of the contending brothers, Eteocles and Polynices, extends to twelve books. Written over a period of twelve years, this narrative of bloody and tragic conflict is a product of the so-called Silver Age of Latin literature. Statius' epic, produced during the reign of the Emperor Domitian, represents a falling off from a great work like Vergil's Aeneid, the model for this lesser and more melodramatic poem.

Statius himself was a native of Naples, and legend tells us that he used to visit Vergil's tomb there. His father, a rhetorician, held up to his son for admiration the great works of Latin poetry in the time of Augustus and encouraged him to make his career by continuing the tradition of measured utterance in which he had been reared.

Students of Latin poetry find, however, that a considerable gap separates Statius from the Golden Age writers whom he desired to imitate. In this epic the machinery of the gods who intervene and often direct the course of fratricidal strife are dead gods indeed, pale figures beside the lusty deities who battle and love in Homer's great works or in Vergil's national epic. The narrative line of the poem is gratifyingly simple, and the inclusive proportion is well considered, but these matters often drop from sight, hidden beneath the deliberate rhetorical effect of the parts. Angry lions, ramping bulls, ships fighting their way through a storm to a safe harbor, and rivers in full spate are used again and again as figurative devices sometimes with such facility and in such detail that the object of comparison is lost sight of. Some of the moralizing in the Thebais is telling and sincere, but much of it is quite as perfunctory as the figures of speech. The most striking defect in the Thebais is the taste for blood, both the battlefields around Thebes and the verses that describe them are gory. The aesthetics of slaughter in the contemporary Roman arena, difficult for the modern mind to grasp, are amply illustrated in the epic, in which mingle a welter of carnage and lamentation for the dead

The story, following the general line of the Greek play pits Eteocles and Poly- nices, the two sons of Oedipus and Jo- casta, against each other when after the fall of Oedipus, it was arranged that the sons would alternate as rulers. The plan was doomed to failure because Oedipus had called down the wrath of the Furies upon his unnatural sons. The first year of the kingship falling to Eteocles, Poly- nices went into temporary exile in Argos. There he quarreled with Tydeus, a great warrior and hero, but King Adrastus, obeying the prompting of an oracle, set- tled the dispute by betrothing one of his daughters to each of the young men.

At the end of a year, however, Eteocles refused to step aside in favor of Poly- nices, according to the agreement be- tween them. Argia, the wife of Polynices, then persuaded her father to aid the prince in asserting his right to the The- ban throne. Tydeus was first dispatched as an envoy to the city. Jealous of the fame of the young warrior, Eteocles set an ambush for Tydeus, who killed all his attackers except one. The survivor, Maeon, returned to tell Eteocles what had happened and then killed himself.

The march against Thebes began. At Nemea the army was halted by a great drought, but the Argives were saved from their distress when Hypsipyle, the one- time Queen of Lemnos before the great massacre there, and now a slave entrusted with the care of King Lycurgus' small son, guided them to a stream that still flowed. When a snake bit her infant charge, the Argives protected her from the king's anger and in observance of the boy's funeral instituted the Nemean games. On the arrival of the army before the walls of Thebes, Jocasta and her daughters appeared to plead with Poly- nices in an effort to prevent bloodshed. The battle was joined, however, when two tigers attacked the driver of Amphi- araus' chariot, Amphiaraus himself disappeared into the underworld when the earth suddenly opened and swallowed him alive. In an engagement with the Thebans, Tydeus fell mortally wounded, he died while gnawing the skull of his foe. The Argive heroes were killed one by one, fighting valiantly but power- less against the might of the gods. Capa- neus, who had rested from battle to chal- lenge the justice of the gods, was struck by one of Jove's own thunderbolts as he attempted to scale the wall of the city. In a hand to hand combat, Eteocles and Polynices killed each other. Only King Adrastus survived. The war ended with the intervention of King Theseus of Ath- ens, who had been moved by the prayers of the Argive women. Creon died at the hands of King Theseus, his son, Menoe- ceus had previously listened to the words of the oracle and had thrown himself from the city wall.

The materials used in the Thebais served their purpose admirably in Greek tragedy, their use by Statius in his epic suggests, however, that the convention which barred slaughter from the stage was a wise one. But in spite of its obvi- ous defects and the author's exploitation of melodrama for its own sake, Statius' work is not without its power to move, especially when the unhappy mother of warring sons pleads with them to end their strife, when Oedipus laments his banishment from the city, or when Antig- one attends the body of Polynices after it has been abandoned in death. In moments like these tenderness and psychological insight are never sacrificed to sentiment or contrived excitement.

Statius was a popular poet in his own day and throughout the medieval period. Chaucer, who ranked him with Homer and Vergil, paid him the compliment of imitation in Troilus and Criseyde. Dante, who apparently thought of the Roman writer as a Christian, told in his Purga- torio of his encounter with the author of the Thebais.

THERE ARE CRIMES AND CRIMES

Type of work Drama

Author August Strindberg (1849 1912)

Type of plot Symbolic realism

Time of plot Late nineteenth century

Locale Paris

First presented 1899

Principal characters

MAURICE a young Pansian playwright

JEANNE his mistress

MARION their five year old daughter

ADOLPHE a young Parisian painter

HENRIETTE his mistress a sculptress

EMILE Jeanne's brother, a workman

MADAME CATHERINE, the proprietress of the cr  merie

THE ABB  

Critique

There Are Crimes and Crimes was written soon after August Strindberg himself had passed through a period of profound depression and was entering into the final phase of his prolific career. Thus the play is a combination of the realism that he had mastered so well in his earlier works and the symbolism that was to mark his later triumphs. The setting is definite and the characters are actual personalities, but woven into the action is the foreboding presence of a greater meaning and a motivation that is more than human. There are crimes punishable by law, Strindberg is saying, but there are others, undetected by human eyes, that are punished by a higher power.

The Story

Early in the day that was to mark his first theatrical triumph, Maurice met Jeanne, his mistress, and Marion, their young daughter, in the Montparnasse Cemetery. He promised them that the success of his play was assured and that with the money he would make he would finally be able to marry Jeanne. Unable to leave Marion to attend the performance of the play, Jeanne presented Maurice with a tie and a pair of gloves to wear in her honor in his hour of victory.

That afternoon Maurice went to the headquarters of his set, the cr  merie of Madame Catherine. There he saw for the first time the beautiful Henriette, the mistress of his painter friend, Adolphe. Immediately attracted to her, he felt at the same time, a strange premonition of evil. Madame Catherine also sensing the evil and thinking of Jeanne and her child, pleaded with him to leave. He started to go out but ironically, collided with Emile, Jeanne's brother, as he walked toward the door. While Emile was apologizing, Henriette came up to him. Once in her presence he found it impossible to retreat. When Adolphe finally arrived he realized at once that he had lost his mistress to his friend.

Maurice's play was as great a success as he had hoped. Although his friends arranged a victory celebration for him at the cr  merie, he never appeared, he and Henriette had gone to an inn ostensibly to wait for Adolphe. Adolphe, having misunderstood the meeting place, failed to appear, and Maurice and Henriette openly declared their passion for each other. Henriette, even though she admitted her propensity for evil and acknowledged that she had once committed a crime, easily convinced Maurice that she was more worthy of sharing his triumph than the dull uneducated Jeanne. To stress her point she threw Jeanne's present tie and gloves into the fire and placed her own laurel wreath on Maurice's brow.

THERE ARE CRIMES AND CRIMES by August Strindberg from PLAYS BY AUGUST STRINDBERG, Second Series Translated by Edwin Bjorkman By permission of the publishers, Charles Scribner's Sons Copyright 1913 by Charles Scribner's Sons Renewed All rights reserved

When Adolphe finally met the pair the next morning he realized the situation that now existed. After he had discreetly retired, Henriette attempted to persuade Maurice to run away with her. Maurice admitted that it was not Jeanne who held him, but the child Marion. Henriette replied that she wished the child were dead. Maurice agreed that things would be simpler if she were, and that he would go away with Henriette if she would consent to his seeing the child once before he left. Henriette reluctantly granted this favor, and Maurice went off for his last visit with his daughter.

Later that morning the customers of the cr  merie smarting from the slight Maurice had paid them by not attending their party in his honor, were astounded by the news brought by the Abbe that Maurice's daughter was dead. Apparently she had been murdered by someone who had visited her in her mother's absence, for there was no sign of illness. A commissaire of police arrived to question the patrons as to Maurice's whereabouts. At first they protested that Maurice was incapable of such a crime as the murder of his own daughter, but as the evidence against him and Henriette began to accumulate—waiters had overheard all their remarks, the tie and gloves had been recovered from the fire—Maurice was known to have visited the little girl—even Madame Catherine and the Abbe began to waver. The Abbe maintained, however, that the whole business was the work of a higher power.

When Maurice and Henriette arrived to bid their friends adieu, the evidence against them was so strong that they were taken into custody. Presently it was decided that there was as yet no proof that the child had actually been murdered, and so they were released. But public opinion was against them. Maurice's play was taken from the stage and that of a rival put in its place. Worse still, his payments were suspended. The hero of the night before was now shunned and penniless. He and his new mistress were haunted by men they imagined detectives who were waiting for them to convict themselves with a chance word or gesture.

The situation was too much for their love. Held together only by fear, they began to hate each other, to suspect each other of the murder. Maurice was convinced of Henriette's guilt when she confessed the details of her earlier crime: she had assisted in an abortion performed on a friend, and the friend had died. She lived in terror, fearing that her dead friend's lover would, in a moment of contrition, confess his guilt and thereby reveal hers. Her wanton existence had been the result of this constant dread. Maurice suggested that since they were bound by hate and fear they should be married. Henriette would not agree.

Finally Henriette left Maurice outside the closed Luxembourg gardens near the statues of Adam and Eve and returned to the cr  merie where she made her accusations to Adolphe. The previously despised Adolphe, seeing the effect of success on Maurice, had just refused a coveted painting prize. From the newspaper he had learned the verdict that Marion had died of some rare disease and that Maurice and Henriette were exonerated. Obsessed by guilt and her hatred of Maurice, however, Henriette at first rejected the news. At last, however, Adolphe persuaded her to give up her Bohemian existence and return to her mother.

After the departure Maurice returned and made his accusation to Adolphe. Adolphe informed him of his exoneration and the consequent restaging of his play. Even the news that his payments would be resumed gave him little pleasure, for he was too strongly aware of his crime of intention He began to have some hope of atonement when Emile arrived to present him once again with the tie and gloves from Jeanne The Abbé offered him an even stronger hope He agreed to meet the Abbe at the church that night instead of attending the re opening of his play

THÉRÈSE

Type of work Novel

Author François Mauriac (1885)

Type of plot Psychological realism

Time of plot Twentieth century

Locale France

First published 1927

Principal characters

BERNARD DESQUEYROUX, a petty landowner

THERÈSE DESQUEYROUX his wife

MARIE DESQUEYROUX their daughter

GEORGES FILHOT a law student and Marie's lover

ANNE DE LA TRAVE Bernard's half sister

JEAN AZEVEDO, a young intellectual

Critique

The story and meaning of the life of Thérèse Desqueyroux preoccupied Mauriac's mind over a long period of time The book is not a novel in the conventional sense, being a series of four stories tied together by the mind of the major character rather than by incident But it is a powerful and dramatic revelation of the human condition and its relation to sin as seen through the eyes of one of the most interesting and influential of Catholic authors In Thérèse, his central character, Mauriac has caught the complex movement of guilt as it exists in everyone

The Story

In the little French town of Argelouse where she spent the first part of her life, Thérèse Desqueyroux was known not so much for her beauty as for her charm Her wit and independence of mind made her conspicuous in the stifling and inbred atmosphere of her native province, and she inspired in her friends and relatives as much disapproval as admiration Left to her own devices by a father more intent on his political career than the problems of fatherhood Thérèse had spent her girlhood in isolated brooding Her one friend was Anne de la Trave, the half sister of Bernard Desqueyroux, whom Thérèse was later to marry

Of her youth and the days leading to her marriage, Thérèse could remember little For the most part her memories were clouded over by the confusion in her own mind an intense love of life and a desire for experience joined to provincial willingness to sacrifice self to tradition Her marriage to Bernard Desqueyroux she saw as only the natural culmination of a social cycle

Before the honeymoon was over Thérèse felt acutely the loss involved in her marriage In Bernard she discovered all that was worst in provincial life a fanatical pride of family and material possessions To a fatal degree, he lacked the insight and imagination to understand his wife For her own part, Thérèse found herself disgusted by the marriage

During the honeymoon a letter came to Bernard from his family informing him that his half sister Anne had fallen in love with a penniless young man, Jean

THÉRÈSE by François Mauriac Translated by Gerard Hopkins By permission of the publishers Farrar, Straus and Cudahy, Inc Copyright 1947 by Henry Holt & Co Inc

Azévedo To preserve the family name and honor, Bernard prevailed on Thérèse to help stop the affair. Returning to Argelouse, Thérèse persuaded Anne to go off on a trip. After Anne had gone, Thérèse met Azevedo and discovered in him that intensity and individualism she missed in her own life. Azévedo told her that he was not really in love with Anne and he readily agreed to write to the girl confessing his true feelings. In the meantime he and Thérèse met from time to time and the two were drawn to each other. When Azevedo left Argelouse it was with the promise that they would be reunited in a year.

After Azevedo had gone, Thérèse settled into the normal routine of a farmer's wife. Even the birth of a child, Marie, failed to give her life meaning, for motherhood only further intensified her frustration. Almost involuntarily she decided to poison Bernard.

The attempted murder was quickly discovered and Thérèse was brought to trial. At the last moment, however, a trumped up explanation by Bernard saved her from conviction. Thérèse returned home to learn that Bernard had lied only to save the family from scandal. After telling her that divorce was impossible, he forced her, under threat of revealing her true actions, to live a life of semi imprisonment in her bedroom.

Thérèse regained her freedom however, when Bernard reconsidered and allowed her to go to Paris to begin a new but distant life.

Alone in Paris, Thérèse tried to make a new life for herself, but without success. The sense of sin she carried within her perverted all attempts to find happiness. As the years passed she retreated more and more into herself.

Fifteen years after her banishment from Argelouse, Thérèse was found by her daughter, Marie, now a young girl of seventeen, living in retirement in an apartment in Paris. Marie, who explained that she had followed to Paris a young law student from her native province, was shocked to find Thérèse broken in health and old before her time. Thérèse, hoping to extirpate the sense of her own sinfulness, decided to help Marie win the love of the student, Georges Filhot. To persuade Filhot to marry Marie and to modify his parents' disapproval, Thérèse told her daughter that she would turn over to her all her own landholdings in Argelouse. The next day Thérèse visited Filhot and invited him to dinner. At the conclusion of the evening Marie returned to Argelouse with the promise of a final reunion with Filhot in three months.

In the next few days it became painfully and thrillingly evident to Thérèse that Filhot was not in love with Marie but with herself, and in a violently emotional scene she confessed to the student not only her past crime but a whole series of crimes for which she believed herself guilty but which were not recognized as criminal by the law. Then she sent Filhot away. Rather than insist that he sacrifice himself to her daughter however, she urged him to write to Marie saying that he did not love her.

A short time later Marie returned to Paris to face her mother, who by that time was living in a confused and paranoid world in which she believed all her acquaintances were engaged in a plot to bring her to justice for her sins, both real and imaginary. Marie's anger was softened, and when she returned to Argelouse she took the sick Thérèse with her.

Returned to her birthplace, Thérèse slowly regained her sanity, the doctor predicted, however, that she would soon die. Nursed during her last days by her daughter and Bernard—for whom, by this time she felt neither pity nor disgust—Thérèse tried to put her mind in order. She awaited death hopefully, seeing it as the final deliverance from self.

THE THESMOPHORIAZUSAE

Type of work Drama

Author Aristophanes (c 448 c 385 B C)

Type of plot Satiric comedy

Time of plot Fifth Century B C

Locale Athens

First presented 411 B C

Principal characters

EURIPIDES the playwright

MNESILOCHUS, his father in law

AGATHON

CHORUS OF THESMOPHORIAZUSAE, fertility celebrants

LEADER OF THE CHORUS

A SCYTHIAN POLICEMAN

Critique

The Thesmophoriazusae, one of the liveliest and wittiest of Aristophanes' eleven extant plays, is a satiric comedy with two targets, both squarely hit Euripides, the notorious misogynist and the loose morals of the women of Athens. It is a lusty drama, fully appreciated only by the most sophisticated of audiences. The Thesmophoria referred to in the title was a fertility festival, celebrated only by women, at which the seed corn was mixed with the putrid remains of dead pigs. The time of the plot is the third day of that festival, when the Senate and the tribunals are not in session.

The Story

En route to the house of Agathon, Euripides, the celebrated dramatist, explained to his aged but lusty father in law, Mnesilochus, that he was in great danger of his life. The Thesmophoriazusae were gathered at the temple of Demeter to decide on an appropriate punishment for the playwright—Euripides—who had so consistently and so bitterly insulted their sex in his plays. Agathon would surely be able to help him. At the door of Agathon's house a servant appeared and ordered the people and the winds to be quiet because his master was seized with poetical inspiration. Mnesilochus knew at once that no real help could come from such a man.

When Agathon appeared, reposing on a bed dressed in a saffron tunic, and surrounded by feminine toilet articles, Mnesilochus insulted him roundly for his lack of manhood. As expected, Agathon refused to aid Euripides by dressing as a woman in order to mix with the fertility celebrants and plead Euripides' cause. The plan was simply too risky. Mnesilochus then offered himself and was promptly and painfully shaved, undressed, and depilated. Disguised as a woman, the old man was suddenly very reluctant to go to the temple until Euripides swore by all the gods to come to his aid if anything went wrong.

Striving to act as womanly as possible and giving his voice a feminine lilt, the old man entered the temple with a prayer to Demeter and Persephone that he would not be recognized. After certain preliminaries the women within began their deliberations concerning Euripides' fate. The First Woman, after spitting as orators do, opened with the charge that Euripides presented women in his plays as adulterous, lecherous, bibulous, treacherous, and garrulous, he caused husbands, especially old ones, to be suspicious of their wives, and he provoked them into keeping the keys to the storerooms and sealing doors upon their wives. She declared that the playwright deserved any form of death, but preferably by poison. The Second Woman explained that she, a widow with five children, had supported herself by selling religious chaplets until Euripides convinced spectators of his plays that there were no gods. Mnesilochus, unable to restrain himself upon hearing his son in law so defamed, agreed that Euripides had indeed committed two or three such indiscretions, but he urged the women to consider all their horrendous faults that Euripides had not attacked. Mnesilochus then proceeded to present a detailed catalogue of feminine failings.

The outraged women turned upon Mnesilochus in furious wrath, but before the face-slapping could lead to hair-pulling, Clisthenes arrived with the warning that a man disguised as a woman was in their midst. Unmasked, the desperate Mnesilochus seized what he thought was a woman's child and threatened to slit its throat if he were not allowed to go free. But the "child" turned out to be a wineskin and the enraged women began to gather faggots in order to roast Mnesilochus alive.

Euripides, summoned by messages scratched on wooden idols that Mnesilochus had thrown out of the temple, entered declaiming Menelaus' lines from his play Helen. Mnesilochus responded with Helen's lines, but before a rescue could be effected a Magistrate accompanied by a Scythian Policeman arrived and Euripides fled. The Magistrate, after ordering Mnesilochus to be lashed to a post, left him under the guard of the Scythian. As the women began their ceremonies, Euripides, playing Echo of his drama on Perseus and Andromeda, began to echo Mnesilochus' laments as he entered the temple in the dress of Perseus. But the illiterate Scythian refused to believe that old Mnesilochus was really Andromeda, as Euripides insisted.

During the ceremonies the guard fell asleep. Euripides proceeded to disguise himself as a procuress. He then offered the women a proposal of peace if they would release his father in law, he would no longer insult them in his plays. The women agreed, but there remained the Scythian to be outwitted. Still disguised as a procuress, Euripides offered the Scythian a good time with the little flute girl whom the barbarian eagerly purchased. While the two were away, Euripides released his father in law and they both escaped. His lust satisfied, the Scythian returned to find his prisoner gone and the obliging Thesmophora zusae sent him off in hot pursuit—in the wrong direction.

THUS SPAKE ZARATHUSTRA

Type of work Philosophical comments as parable and prophecy

Author Friedrich Wilhelm Nietzsche (1844-1900)

First published Parts I, III, 1883; 1884. Part IV, 1891

Only a philosopher with a great ego (resulting from a fear of failure) and a great passion would have conceived the idea of putting his most radical thoughts into the mouth of a Persian mystic dead over five hundred years before the birth of Jesus. Zarathustra, or Zoroaster, was a Persian religious leader whose revolutionary religious activity stimulated the growth of the religion that bears his name, Zoroastrianism. Nietzsche fancied that he found similarities between his ideas and passions and those of Zara-thustra, but whether he was justified in using the name of the Persian in order to give his paradoxical and poetic work a certain mystical quality is a problem that can be left to those who moralize about art. The important word to remember is "art." Thus Spake Zarathustra is a work of art in which a radical in version of traditional values is expressed in the guise of poetic prophetic writings.

Nietzsche's prologue, entitled "Zarathustra's Prologue," tells us that Zarathustra went up into the mountains when he was thirty and stayed there ten years. When he came down he went to the market place of the nearest town and said, 'I teach you the Superman. Man is something that is to be surpassed. What have you done to surpass man?'

The book is Nietzsche's attempt to help man surpass himself, to become Superman. Of course Superman is the author's conception, and the qualities which make Superman distinctive can most readily be understood as the opposite to whatever is enervating and spiritless in traditional Christianity. It is easy to read Nietzsche as one who condemns whatever is generally regarded as worth while and virtuous, he condemns Christianity as fostering a 'slave morality.' But what he says makes some sense, whatever its excesses, if considered as having been stimulated by Christianity at its sentimental and dogmatic worst.

Nietzsche's basic idea is that the most important feature of all existence is will, an idea he received from Schopenhauer. But, unlike the pessimistic Schopenhauer, he did not believe that man's objective should be to abolish the will and, consequently, to be nothing, on the contrary, Nietzsche thought that man should seek to surpass himself, to strengthen his will, to rise above ordinary men and to achieve greatness of will and being. For him, pride is a great virtue and so is contempt of everything that ordinary men believe and worship.

Zarathustra speaks to the spectators of a rope dancing performance and tells them to "remain true to the earth" and not to believe "those who speak unto you of superearthly hopes." He tells them that the greatest thing they can experience is "the hour of great contempt" in which they look with loathing upon their happiness, their reason, and their virtue. When the rope dancer falls and is fatally injured, Zarathustra tells him not to worry about being dragged to hell, he assures the dying man that his soul will be dead before his body is. When the rope-dancer replies that if this is so, he is nothing more than an animal, Zarathustra objects by pointing out that the rope-dancer had made danger his calling, and he adds that "therein there is nothing contemptible."

Nietzsche's ideas have sometimes been compared to those of the Nazis but it is probably more accurate to suppose that the virtues Nietzsche endorses are those which Hemingway extols in his novels. Both writers ask men to surpass themselves, to be courageous and proud, to face danger, to love action and to act, and to respect those who can kill and be killed. Both writers regard love as important only when it is biologically compelling, and even then it is regarded as something of a nuisance.

Nietzsche is famous not only for his denunciation of Christianity but also for his attacks on women. In Section 18 of the First Part, Zarathustra gives his views on women. 'Everything in woman is a riddle and everything in woman hath one solution—it is called pregnancy. Two different things wanteth the true man: danger and diversion. Therefore wanteth he woman, as the most dangerous plaything. Man shall be trained for war and woman for the recreation of the warrior: all else is folly.' Zarathustra concludes with a "little truth" which the old woman to whom he expressed his ideas gave him: "Thou goest to women? Do not forget thy whip!"

Although it is possible for the critic so to consider Thus Spake Zarathustra that it becomes sensible to speak of its philosophic content, it is more helpful to take the book as a prose poem, a passionate and sometimes incoherent injunction to men to become more than they have been and to go beyond the petty limits prescribed for them by conventional moralities.

Nevertheless, when the effort is made to extract from this curious book its philosophic claims, it soon becomes clear that for Nietzsche values make sense only if they are relative to the individual, not only in the respect that whatever is good or bad is so to a person, but also in the respect that whatever is good or bad (according to Nietzsche) is so for a person. There would be no point in telling the author that some men value the welfare of other persons such sentimental attachment to others is what keeps a man from surpassing himself, Nietzsche believes. To be great, to surpass himself, a man must consider his own power and know how he can best use that power to extend himself and to satisfy himself. "One must learn to love oneself with a wholesome and healthy love," he writes, "that one may endure to be with oneself, and not go roving about." To be more than man, to discover oneself, involves giving up the moral habits and in junctions we learned "almost in the cradle." Nietzsche claims that with the words "brotherly love" there has been "the best lying and dissembling, and especially by those who have been burdened some to every one." And he argues that "He, however, hath discovered himself who saith 'This is my good and evil therewith hath he silenced the mole and the dwarf who say 'Good for all, evil for all.' " The conclusive statement of the relativity of values comes at the end of the section titled "The Spirit of Gravity," from which the quotations of this paragraph come. "This—is now my way,—where is yours?" Thus did I answer those who asked me 'the way' For the way—it doth not exist!"

In "Old and New Tables" Nietzsche reaches the extreme point of demanding the destruction of old laws and commands. Nietzsche venerates the creator of new values and, consequently, the destroyer of old ones. The creation of new values is important, not because it rights wrongs and liberates men, but because the creative process itself is an exercise of the will's power. It is the way to Superman. Nietzsche argues that the greatest danger to any man and to mankind comes from the good and the just, that is, from the defenders of the old morality. He writes that "The good must crucify him who deviseth his own virtue!"

Again, when one considers Nietzsche philosophically, it is possible to find in Thus Spake Zarathustra many ideas which connect Nietzsche with modern Existentialism. He argues that God is dead, the old God that preached brotherly love, man faces an abyss and before the response of petty men the higher man feels nothing but disgust. The proper response to the abyss is the creative act of a man who loves himself and takes pride in his power to create new values through his acts. "Doth not—man's future strive and struggle in you?" he asks.

These ideas are presented to the reader in the midst of strange accounts of Zarathustra's wanderings and encounters with the mass of the market place and with a few eccentric persons who in one way or another suggest the Superman ideal.

To suppose that Nietzsche created the ideal of the Superman as the destroyer of old values and the creator of the new, the teacher of the virtue of pride, in order to justify a totalitarian state, is to misread him. Because of the superficial resemblance of Nazi propaganda to Nietzschean utterances, it is easy to fall into the error of taking Nietzsche as an apologist for a state controlled by self-styled "super men." Early in Thus Spake Zarathustra, Nietzsche condemns the state for its pretension to be identified with the people. Not only is it a lie to identify the state with the people, but it is destructive of men to believe the lie. Only where the state falls does man rise and make Superman possible.

Many persons dismiss Nietzsche contemptuously, knowing only that he contemptuously dismissed Christianity. But throughout Thus Spake Zarathustra and Beyond Good and Evil (q v), Nietzsche reveals a constant and impassioned concern for that part of each man which is lost, in his opinion, because of slavish obedience to a conventional, effeminate morality. His scorn of the "rabble"—"Life is a well of delight, but where the rabble also drink, there all fountains are poisoned"—is not so much a scorn of men and virtue as it is of those who pervert themselves and others in the name of virtue. He writes "And many a one who cannot see man's loftiness calleth it virtue to see their baseness far too well."

Nietzsche creates Zarathustra as a liberator, as one who brings the new word that all men might be free—not to march onward in any regimented way, but to stream outwards as individually creative beings. Much of what Emerson endorsed as "self-reliance" Nietzsche endorses as "the will of power."

If Nietzsche is to be criticized for his shortcomings, it would be better to call attention to the absence of development and order in his work. However one may sympathize with his love for the creative man, certain problems remain. How does one come to choose or to create the new law? Is it possible for a man desiring to be Superman—to surpass himself—to be free and creative in the wrong way, and thus to destroy himself?

Nietzsche's failure to clarify the procedure of value creation is his greatest fault. His work remains a paean of praise for an art he never elucidates.

TO BE A PILGRIM

Type of work Novel

Author Joyce Cary (1888-1957)

Type of plot Social realism

Time of plot Late 1930s

Locale Tolbrook, England

First published 1942

Principal characters

TOM WILCHER, an old lawyer, the narrator

SARA MONDAY, his former employee

ANN WILCHER, Tom's niece, a doctor

ROBERT BROWN, her husband, Tom's nephew, a farmer

EDWARD WILCHER, Tom's brother, a politician

LUCY WILCHER, Tom's wild sister

PUGGY BROWN, Lucy's husband, a Benjamite preacher

JULIE EELES, an actress, Edward's mistress, later Tom's mistress

BILL WILCHER, Tom's brother, a military man

AMY SPROTT, Bill's devoted wife

LOFTUS WILCHER, their son

JOHN WILCHER, another son, a car salesman

FRED, Sara's latest man

Critique

To Be a Pilgrim, the second novel in Cary's most famous trilogy, depicts events from the point of view of Tom Wilcher, the last surviving member of his generation of an old West Country liberal and religious family. He is about to die as the novel opens, and he is concerned about the future of his family, his property, his convictions, and his country. In his reflections, he considers all the events of his life, attempting to shape them into some kind of meaningful pattern. Although liberal by conviction, he wishes to conserve the values of his past and his family, and he feels unhappy because the values of the past, along with its religious and political significance, seem lost to the younger members of his own family. Through the use of this narrator, Cary is able to develop the character of Tom Wilcher—a representative of a vanishing type of Englishman—with power, sympathy, and depth. In addition, the technique of the novel allows the author to explore many of the other characters fully. Ann comes to stand as the symbol for the modern emancipated scientific young woman. Robert represents the attempt of the new farmer to get back to the soil. The novel, told with a great deal of humor and insight, is an integral part of Cary's full, varied, complex, interrelated fictional world.

TO BE A PILGRIM by Joyce Cary. By permission of the publishers, Harper & Brothers. Copyright, 1942, by Joyce Cary.

The Story

When Tom Wilcher, a lawyer seventy-one years old and the owner of Tolbrook Manor, suffered a heart attack, his niece Ann, a doctor, came down to his home at Tolbrook to take care of him. Ann was the daughter of Edward, Tom's oldest brother and a liberal politician in the early years of the twentieth century. Ann was willing to take care of the old man because the family felt that Tom should be kept away from Sara Monday, his old housekeeper.

While working for Tom some time before Sara had stolen some of his possessions and the family had sent her to jail. But Tom, who had never regarded Sara's action as criminal, wanted her found when she was released. He realized that she never had stolen things actually in use, but only old relics stored in the attic. He was also aware that she really cared for old things. He revered Sara as an example of the past as a lover of the old, humane, settled life rapidly giving way to the new society of text books and technology. He would have gone to Sara if Ann had not kept close watch over him.

Tom's nephew, Robert, visited him at Tolbrook and soon fell in love with Ann. Robert was the son of Tom's wild sister Lucy and Puggy Brown, a hypocritical preacher of the Benjamites (an evangelical religious sect), with whom Lucy had run away. Puggy Brown had been unfaithful to Lucy, though she had relinquished family and position for him because he claimed that God had told him that he should commit adultery with another of his followers. Young Robert, unlike either parent, wanted to become a farmer. The agricultural possibilities of Tolbrook fascinated him, and he soon got to work, married Ann, and became a successful farmer. Much to Tom's horror, he kept his new threshing machine in the famous and beautiful living room at Tolbrook.

Tom had never been interested in farming. He had wanted to follow a religious career, but because his older brother, Edward, the politician, had shown so little interest in the family property, Tom had felt obliged to become a lawyer and handle the family affairs and property. His reverence for the past had caused him to follow a career that did not really interest him. In spite of his objections to Robert's new scientific methods of agriculture, he was happy when he saw his nephew taking a deep interest in the land. Shortly after their marriage, Ann and Robert had a son, named after her father, but called Jan.

Tom, living in his memories, constantly tried to illustrate the value of the past to Ann and Robert. Having sacrificed his own career in order to keep his family home and property, he lived in terms of his old affections. He also had been the family messenger, running after Lucy when she had eloped with Puggy Brown and following along after Edward's mistress, Julie Eeles. Julie Eeles had been a graceful, though not very talented, actress. After Edward left her because she could not help his political career, Tom rather inherited her and she became his mistress. Tom, in other words, had always tied up after his more striking brother and sister.

Another of Tom's brothers, Bill, was a more settled individual. A stolid military man, Bill had married devoted Amy Sprott. They had two children, Loftus and John. John had been, as a boy, Tom's favorite nephew, but during World War I John became restless and cynical, so that after the war he no longer seemed to care about the family or about any of the concerns for righteous life he had shared with Tom John, with slack in difference, became a car salesman and married a woman who constantly deceived him with other men. After a while he seemed not to care about living, and one day he was run over in the street and killed. John's death left Ann and Robert the only relatives for whom Tom had any concern.

After a time Robert left Ann for a farm girl named Molly, leaving Tom depressed about the way the present generation of his family was turning out. He felt strongly that the old Victorian virtues, the old allegiance to religion, had made people happier than they were today. Yet he could not hold this point of view strongly, for his own generation had also led unhappy and unfortunate lives. Lucy's evangelist husband was untrue to her, and she, though still charming, had lived a miserable existence. Edward had finally married the woman who became Ann's mother, but she had left him when his political career failed. For all his charm and intelligence, Edward had never really achieved anything. More and more, Tom came to feel that the only person who had really understood and appreciated him was Sara

Monday (he often referred to her as Sara Jimson, for he was under the assumption that she had been married to the painter Gulley Jimson). He was still determined to find her and marry her.

Although Ann and Robert were reconciled to each other (they established a household which included Robert's farm girl), Tom escaped from them and went to London to find Sara. There he discovered that she was living with Fred, a man considerably younger than she. Sara, however, was no longer a woman devoted to Tom and to his feelings toward the past. Not as he had imagined her, she had become coarse, materialistic, interested only in herself.

When Tom suffered another and more serious heart attack, Sara called Ann and Robert, who came quickly and took the old man back to the security of Tolbrook. In his last few days Tom realized that the attempt to find and marry Sara had been a ridiculous gesture. He kept wondering to which of his descendants he should leave his money and property. He pondered about how his family and his values and his home might be most appreciated by a new generation with other concerns and values. Concerned with these matters, he died without leaving a will.

THE TOWN

Type of work Novel

Author William Faulkner (1897)

Type of plot Psychological realism

Time of plot 1909-1927

Locale Jefferson Yoknapatawpha County, Mississippi

First published 1957

Principal characters

FLEM SNOPES the shrewdest of the Snopes family

EULA VARNER SNOPES, his wife

LINDA SNOPES, their daughter

MANFRED DE SPAIN, the mayor of Jefferson and Eula's lover

GAVIN STEVENS, a county attorney

V. K. RATLIFF, a salesman and friend of Gavin Stevens

CHARLES MALLISON, Stevens' nephew

THE TOWN by William Faulkner. By permission of the publishers Random House, Inc. Copyright 1957 by William Faulkner. Copyright 1957 by The Curtis Publishing Co.

MONTGOMERY WARD SNOPEs,
WALLSTREET PANIC SNOPEs,
BYRON SNOPEs,
MINK SNOPEs,
ECK SNOPEs and
I O SNOPEs, Flem s cousins

Critique

In 1940, the novel The Hamlet introduced the Snopes family and described the Snopes invasion of the small community, Frenchman's Bend, in fictional Yoknapatawpha County, Mississippi. Seventeen years later The Town appeared, reporting further progress of the Snopes clan and of Flem Snopes's rise from restaurant owner to bank president. Faulkner's method of telling the story by means of three narrators (idealistic lawyer Stevens, shrewd and likable salesman Ratliff, and Charles Mallison, Stevens' young nephew) gives the novel unusual depth, and the characters of the book become so well known that readers who missed The Hamlet may wish to return to that novel. If Flem Snopes is the symbol of unprincipled thirst for power, then his opponents are symbols for a still existing moral force which can even make a town inhabited by the Snopeses a livable place.

The Story

The Snopes family, which came out of nowhere after the Civil War, had successfully completed the invasion of Frenchman's Bend. Now Flem Snopes, son of Ab Snopes, a bushwhacker, sharecropper, and horse thief, was ready for the next goal, the domination of Jefferson, county seat of Yoknapatawpha County.

Flem Snopes was ruthless, shrewd, uneducated, and possessed of a fanatic belief in the power of money. The townspeople, who had seen him when he took over Frenchman's Bend and then left it under control of other family members, were wondering about Flem's next move. Among those interested were Gavin Stevens, a young lawyer educated in Heidelberg, and V. K. Ratliff, a good natured sewing machine salesman, who made up for his lack of education with a great measure of common sense. Stevens felt a moral responsibility to defend the town against the Snopeses, and Ratliff was once the victim of Snopesism when, thinking that it contained a buried treasure, he bought worthless property from Flem for a high price. Another who became an assistant in the fight against Snopes infiltration was Stevens' nephew, Charles Mallison, who watched the Snopes invasion from his childhood through adolescence.

Flem Snopes realized that more subtle methods for conquering Jefferson were necessary than those he had used in Frenchman's Bend. The greatest advantage for him was his marriage with Eula Varner, daughter of Will Varner, chief property owner in that community. When Eula was pregnant, impotent Flem had married her after making a profitable deal with Varner, who despised Snopes but wanted to save his daughter's honor.

In a small rented house Flem and his wife made a modest beginning in Jefferson by operating a small restaurant of which Ratliff had been a partner before he lost his share in the business deal with Flem. Later the restaurant was transformed into a hotel. The first hint that Flem was aiming even higher came when he was appointed superintendent of the local power plant, before the people even knew that such a position existed.

As the new mayor of Jefferson, Manfred de Spain was not in favor with the town conservatives, but he had won the election in a landslide when he declared himself against an automobile ban imposed by the former mayor. Soon it became known in the town that Eula Snopes and the new mayor were lovers.

No one had seen anything, but everybody seemed to know about the affair except her husband

Shortly after the war, during which Gavin Stevens served overseas, the president of Jefferson's oldest bank was killed in an auto accident De Spain, named president on account of the bank stock he had inherited, resigned as mayor The election of a new president made necessary a routine check by government auditors, who uncovered the theft of a large sum of money by a defaulting clerk, Byron Snopes, who fled to Mexico Announcement was made that the money had been replaced by the new president and that Mr Flem Snopes had been made a vice president of the bank Flem's appointment indicated to his opponents a new phase of Snopesism the search for money power was now overshadowed by Flem's desire for respectability This new tactic also became apparent when he rid himself and Jefferson of some undesirable kinsmen, like Montgomery Ward Snopes, who might have destroyed his efforts to make the name Snopes respectable Montgomery Ward Snopes had returned from the war in France with a rich supply of pornographic pictures A short time later he opened a photographic studio and gave nightly slide shows for a large part of the male population of Yoknapatawpha County Flem, not wishing to have his name associated with this shady enterprise, put bootleg whiskey in Montgomery Ward's studio to assure his arrest When another Snopes, Mink, was jailed for murder, Flem failed to give him any assistance There was also Eck Snopes, who did not fit into the Snopes pattern on account of his weak intelligence Flem had no need to bring about his removal, for Eck removed himself He had been hired to watch an oil tank While a search was being made for a lost child, Eck, trying to make sure that the child had not climbed into his oil tank, took a lantern and went to look inside the tank After the explosion only Eck's metal neck brace was available for

burial Meanwhile, the child was found safely somewhere along the road

Flem's new desire for respectability also made him forget Wallstreet Panic Snopes, who had dared to become a self made man without his kinsman's help Wallstreet Panic, a successful grocer, introduced the first self service store in Jefferson Flem also disliked the outcome of one of his family projects with IO Snopes, who was trained to tie mules to the railroad track in order to collect money from damage law suits against the railroad When IO Snopes was killed during one of these operations, Flem hoped to collect the indemnity But IO's stubborn wife kept all the money and Flem, in order to avoid complications, was forced to pay off the man who had supplied the mules Flem also tried to live up to his new social standing by letting a professional decorator furnish his house

In the meantime Gavin Stevens, who had never been able to rid himself of the attraction Eula Snopes held for him, concentrated his reform efforts on Linda, Eula's daughter Linda, now in high school, did not know that Flem was not her real father The lawyer loved Linda and tried to influence her to attend a northern college far away from Snopesism But Flem, needing a front of outwardly solid family life for his show of respectability, was opposed to the possibility of losing his control of Linda, especially since a will existed which gave the girl a great deal of Will Varner's estate So Flem disregarded the pleas of his daughter because he still had one more step ahead of him to achieve the position he desired in Jefferson his scheme to replace de Spain as president of the bank When he failed in his first attempt to ruin the bank by instigating a run on it, he decided that the time had come to use his knowledge of his wife's adultery as a weapon Acting as if he had just learned of the eighteen year old affair, and armed with a declaration from Linda that she would leave her part of her in heritance to her father, he visited Will Varner. Once more, in order to save the honor of his daughter and in return for Flem's promise to destroy Linda's note about the inheritance, Varner helped Flem to get rid of de Spain and Flem became president of the bank. Hoping Eula would run away with him, de Spain sold his bank stock, but Eula, hoping to keep her daughter from ever learning of her affairs, remained in Jefferson. She committed suicide after securing from Gavin Stevens a promise that he would marry Linda.

Flem, having reached his goal, agreed to let Linda leave Jefferson. But for a short interval the ghost of old Snopesism came back to Jefferson, when bank thief Byron Snopes sent his four half Indian children to stay with his kinsfolk. After a series of incidents in which the children terrorized Jefferson and Frenchman's Bend, Flem himself made sure that these last reminders of primitive Snopesism were sent back to Mexico. Meanwhile, he had bought the de Spain house, and workers were busy transforming it into a mansion suitable to Flem Snopes, president of the Bank of Jefferson.

THE TRAITOR

Type of work Drama

Author James Shirley (1596-1666)

Type of plot Tragedy of blood

Time of plot c. 1480

Locale Florence, Italy

First presented 1631

Principal characters

ALEXANDER, Duke of Florence, enamored of Amideia

LORENZO, his kinsman and the next in succession

AMIDEIA, betrothed to Pisano and scornful of the duke

SCIARRHA, and

FLORIO her brothers and avengers

PISANO, enamored of Oriana, though engaged to Amideia

COSMO, his friend, engaged to Oriana

ORIANA, loved by Pisano, formerly by Cosmo

MOROSA, her mother

PETRUCHIO, Pisano's servant, in Lorenzo's hire

DEPAZZI, an informer for Lorenzo

Critique

James Shirley was one of the first playwrights to learn his trade from the printed page rather than in the theater. The Traitor displays a talent carefully nurtured on Marlowe, Shakespeare, and Jonson, but at the same time capable of original, powerful poetry. In his own day his position in the theater was that of competent journeyman playwright, yet his works graced the boards for generations. The Traitor, which remained in theatrical repertoire for over a hundred and fifty years, was attributed falsely in the late seventeenth century to a Jesuit who died in Newgate Prison. Shirley's reputation has only recently been rescued from critical neglect.

The Story

The reign of Alexander, the young Duke of Florence, began in a cloud of conspiracy, for his cousin Lorenzo had played the role of the loyal kinsman to seat the duke and was now playing the villain to unseat him, under the pretext of establishing a republic. For this purpose he appealed through pressures and persuasion to Cosmo, beloved of Oriana, to give over his suit in favor of Pisano, who had become enamored of the girl through the influence of his servant Petruccio, secretly in the hire of Lorenzo Pisano, in turn was to break his engagement to Amidea so that the duke might have her later for his lustful purposes

From a man exiled at Lorenzo's request, the duke received a message which told of the prince's treachery. Confronted with this evidence, Lorenzo denied everything and cleverly reinstated himself and even strengthened his plot by recounting the examples of his loyalty to his kinsman. Restored to favor, Lorenzo undertook to procure the beautiful Amidea for the duke. By design he attempted to accomplish his purpose through the offices of her brother, the hot-headed Sciarrha.

Sciarrha, reacting as Lorenzo had expected, renounced the duke and acting on hints from Lorenzo, agreed to murder his ruler in Amidea's chamber that night. Sciarrha, in the presence of his brother Florio, tested his sister's chastity by advocating the assignation. She rejected his proposal, however, and her other brother threatened Sciarrha's life should such degradation be visited upon them. Her devotion to virtue and Florio's threat to murder Sciarrha were greeted with great elation, but before a pact could be made, Pisano arrived to declare that Amidea was no longer paramount in his affections and that he was in love with and desired to marry another. This news was withheld from Sciarrha for fear that he would embark on a reckless course of revenge harmful to them all.

Meanwhile, Cosmo's attempts to place his friend Pisano in Oriana's affection proved unsuccessful. In spite of her mother's pleadings, Oriana remained, for the time being, loyal to Cosmo.

The plans for the assignation which was supposed to end in murder were well laid. In order to arouse the populace, Depazzi, picked because of his political innocence, was to spread the news of the ruler's death even before the murder. Lorenzo would then quiet the citizens and the uneasy nobles by consenting to act as interim ruler until the state could be delivered from tyranny and be proclaimed a republic.

Sciarrha made sure that nothing was lacking in his lavish entertainment of the duke. A masque which depicted the downfall of treachery was portrayed before the youthful ruler, but he remained unmoved, so intent was he on the lovely Amidea. When Amidea received the duke in her chambers, her brothers were concealed behind the arras as she pleaded with him to abandon his wicked pursuits. Threatened with her suicide before his eyes, the duke repented and declared his determination to be a ruler worthy of her esteem. The brothers then appeared to congratulate their revered leader and urged him to hide in order to discover the author of the traitorous plot against him.

Lorenzo, when told the duke had died according to the plans made, cleverly accused the brothers of treachery and denied any complicity in the plot. The duke attempted a reconciliation of the plotters, but without success.

After the people had been quieted by the duke's appearance before the mob, Lorenzo claimed repentance equal to the duke's, much to Sciarrha's anger and disgust. Lorenzo, continuing to play the villain, told Sciarrha that Pisano had broken off his marriage contract with Amidea and that Oriana was to be led to the altar by her mother's duplicity. Infuriated by this news, Sciarrha once again became Lorenzo's ally. Pisano would die and Sciarrha would also be a willing tool in the conspiracy against the duke. Lorenzo released the former conspirator, Depazzi, from his service.

But the duke's repentance was short-lived when he received assurances from Lorenzo that Amidea would soon be more tractable in order to save her brother, who seemed bound for his own destruction. Amidea tried in vain to persuade Pisano to take his wedding party elsewhere, that he might escape Sciarrha's fury, and she even pleaded with Oriana, who was more than willing to return

Pisano to his rightful loved one, but Pisano refused to be moved. He refused to fight back, however, when Sciarra demanded satisfaction, and so he was murdered before Lorenzo's watchful eyes and guard. Further supplication to Sciarra to deliver his sister to the duke's lust proved useless until Lorenzo pointed out that the brother's execution would only make Amidea's ruin more certain. At last Sciarra agreed to send his sister to the duke's bed that very night.

Amidea, in double mourning for a lover lost and a brother's life forfeited, begged to die rather than suffer ignominy. Sciarra again tested her chastity with his unacceptable proposals. Amidea knelt in prayer for her brother's soul when she realized he must kill her in order to protect her. Later Florio promised Lorenzo that he would bring his sister to the duke—in secret, however, to spare her shame.

After the corpse of Amidea had been prepared, the duke entered his chamber and cried out in horror when he kissed her cold lips. In Lorenzo's presence he wished that he too might die, and Lorenzo killed him with Petruccio's help. Though he protested that only his grief spoke out, the duke died in full knowledge of the treachery his kinsman had planned. He was placed in bed with his intended victim. Though Sciarra had pretended to share in Lorenzo's plans, he fought and killed Lorenzo, receiving in the struggle his own death wound. Petruccio was sent to the torture chamber. Cosmo assumed the rule of the city and promised to make what amends he could to Orana and Florio.

TRAVELS IN ARABIA DESERTA

Type of work Record of travel

Author Charles M. Doughty (1843-1926)

Time 1876-1878

Locale Northwestern Arabia

First published 1888

Travels in Arabia Deserta has been recognized, almost since its publication in 1888, as one of the greatest travel books in the English language. Doughty spent almost two years traveling, going on pilgrimages, and living with various nomad tribes in northwestern Arabia, then a land almost completely unknown to Europeans and Americans. His account is a thoroughly realized document, a comprehensive understanding and treatment of every aspect of the life of the nomadic Arabs. Written with grace, fullness, and enormous insight, Travels in Arabia Deserta has become a classic of travel literature and a necessary book of instructions for anyone interested in that part of the Moslem world. T. E. Lawrence, in his introduction to the 1921 edition of this work, acknowledged that Doughty was the first and greatest of all European writers on Arabia.

Travels in Arabia Deserta is also an objective treatment of life among the nomads. Doughty was content to observe, to understand, to record, without leveling judgments against a civilization so different from his own. This objectivity allowed him to see and report the Arabs as they lived, to understand fully their customs, their prejudices, and their attitudes.

In several ways, Doughty was extremely well equipped to be one of the first Europeans to visit the Arabian peninsula and explore it extensively. A geologist, he was able to draw geological maps of uncharted territory and determine the nature of the terrain. As a scientist he was also enormously interested in the climate of Arabia, and he filled his book with observations on climate and topography. Doughty drew, and included in his work, some of the first maps of the area he visited. He was also interested in and knowledgeable about architecture and archaeology. He captured a keen sense of Arabic design and often used one of the designs as a chapter heading. Because of his interest in many phases of scientific learning, he was able to use many of the skills of Western civilization, for the first time on the Arabian peninsula. In addition, Doughty was an able medical practitioner. He attempted to use his medical knowledge to help the Arabs among whom he lived. Although later, he did help enormously during epidemics of tropical diseases such as cholera and leprosy, the Arabs were often inclined to distrust him. Doughty points out that in their love for certainty and complete assurance they were likely to judge a medical practice by a single case and they were not appreciative of the tentative conclusions of honest medical science.

Although Doughty had great respect and affection for the nomad tribes among whom he traveled, he did not sentimentalize them or the conditions in which they lived. Long passages in Travels in Arabia Deserta describe their filth, poverty, and ignorance. Frequently they could get little food, often, even the chief of the tribe could not get enough water for his wife to make him a cup of coffee. They wore thin cotton robes even though the desert nights frequently became very cold. The Arabs met with frequent rival tribes who might steal their camels and their meager possessions, and they were suspicious of any stranger. Their life as depicted by Doughty, was not the life of romantic adventure; rather it was one of poverty, hardness, insecurity, and want.

Travels in Arabia Deserta gives a complete picture of the social life and customs of the nomad tribes. Men ruling the family tyrannically, decided also the affairs of the tribe. Women were servants, and girl children were not looked on with favor. In the tribes Doughty visited he found little evidence of the notion of the harem that Europeans and Americans have idealized. There was no moral feeling against polygamy, but most of the men, even the chiefs, could not afford to keep more than one woman. The woman, if she found the arrangement not to her liking, could run away and settle herself in a place more congenial to her. And those men who had two wives with them on their travels frequently found the jealousy between the two women not worth the extra pleasure of a second wife. Women were slaves in the family itself, but they had some choice as to whether or not to submit to slavery. Doughty also discussed the notion of justice in the Arab society. Although the men ruled the family firmly and there were frequent wars between different tribes, justice within the tribe was fairly humane and understanding. Thieves were not hanged but, rather, were forced to make amends. Doughty contrasted these notions of a merciful concept of justice with the ideas of divine wrath and fearful justice in the Old Testament.

Doughty did not simply chronicle the social customs of the Arabs. He also discussed their religion fully and attempted to relate both their religion and their customs to the kind of life, the climate and the economic circumstances forced them to lead. In their difficult desert existence, the leniency of their justice was an expression of their sympathy for others caught in the same way of life, but, according to Doughty, they would never have articulated such a feeling, for their life made such practical demands upon them that they had neither the time nor the inclination for any introspection or analysis. They simply went about the difficult task of keeping themselves alive.

They were a deeply religious people. Although the open and barren nature of their terrain made them suspicious of enemies, forthright and direct in manner and speech and little inclined to subtle thought, this same open terrain, this area that showed only earth and sky, seemed to make them feel closer to God and feel their religion with enormous intensity. They often embraced religious causes, and they followed the dictates of their religion with a fierce intensity that was not necessarily moral or reasoned but rather a product of the closeness they felt with God. They accepted death and disaster easily (too easily, at times for Doughty) for these people trying to live in the enormous barren desert, felt themselves subject to the will of an all-powerful God. When they could build structures, they built towers, expressions of their desire both to relieve the flatness of their surroundings and to approach God more closely. The towers were also useful in posting watchmen to warn the tribe of any possible enemy attack. Doughty points out also that the tower is the natural expression of the tribe used to desert existence: the natural attempt to put the relationship between God and man in a vertical sphere.

Doughty discusses too the fanatical quality of the nomad's religion, his willingness to sacrifice anything, including his life, for a cause he believes sacred. This fanaticism is, again, a product of the singleness: the open nature of his desert surroundings. Man finds little in nature to divert him, little to draw his attention from his home and his God, so in his allegiance to his cause he finds little qualification or sophistication to divert his faith.

Doughty conveyed his observations in a rich, full style. He managed to use this fullness as a splendid means of carrying the entire range of his observations and inferences about Arab life. At times, to contemporary ears, his style seems stilted and archaic. For example, he writes sentences like this: "We were to depart by times by the morrow." This style was deliberately archaic even in the 1880's, yet it helps to produce the flavor of a different and more primitive culture. The archaic richness of the style completes the contrast between our world and the world of the Arab nomad. Doughty, fully aware of the differences between these worlds, has managed to create a comprehensive and understanding portrait of the nomad world, to produce, in Travels in Arabia Deserta, a history of the beliefs, the experiences, the essential conditions of life, of the nomadic peoples of northwestern Arabia.

THE TRICKSTER

Type of work Drama

Author Titus Maccius Plautus (c. 255-184 B.C.)

Type of plot Comedy of intrigue

Time of plot Late third century B.C.

Locale Athens

First presented 191 B.C.

Principal characters

SIMO an old Athenian gentleman

CALIDORUS his son

PSEUDOLUS Simo's servant

BALLIO a procurer, owner of Phoenicium

HARPAX a messenger

SIMIA servant of one of Calidorus' friends

PHOENICIUM, loved by Calidorus

Critique

The Trickster (Pseudolus) shares both the deficiencies and the excellences of most of Plautus' plays. The comedy displays what might be called an absolute unity of place and time: the whole of the action occurs before a single house in

Athens in precisely the time it would have occupied in reality. The result, while attesting strongly to the dramatist's ingenuity, tends to violate what is perhaps the most important unity of all, that of action. The plot is crowded with irrelevant events introduced primarily to provide time for other more essential events to take place off stage, and the characters are sometimes given improbable speeches to account for their presence in this place at this time when another place and time would have appeared more suitable. Nevertheless, Plautus seems not oblivious of these incongruities, and he presents them with a sufficient hint of irony to make them entertaining, even if they are not dramatically integrated.

The Story

Pseudolus, a servant of the Athenian Simo, observed one day that his master's son Calidorus was deeply despondent about something. Questioning him on the matter, Pseudolus was given a letter from Phoenicium, a slave girl with whom Calidorus was in love. She had written that Ballio, her master, had sold her to a Macedonian military officer for the sum of twenty minae. However, the transaction was not yet complete, the officer had given Ballio fifteen minae to seal the bargain and had arranged that Phoenicium was to be delivered to a servant of his who would bring the remaining five minae and a letter bearing a seal to match the one the officer had made with his ring and left in Ballio's keeping. This servant was to arrive on the festival of Bacchus, now being celebrated.

Calidorus was naturally and thoroughly upset by this news, for he had no money with which to buy Phoenicium and no prospect of getting any. At loose ends, he appealed to the wily Pseudolus for help. With great self confidence, the servant promised to trick Calidorus' father, Simo, out of the money.

Before any plan could be formulated, Ballio appeared, cursing and beating some of his slaves. Calidorus and Pseudolus approached him and begged him to reconsider his bargain, pointing out that Phoenicium had been promised to Calidorus as soon as the young man could find the money to pay for her. But the unscrupulous Ballio remained unmoved, taunting Calidorus with his poverty and his inability to get money from his father. Before they parted, however, he craftily pointed out that today was the day on which the officer had agreed to send his final installment of the payment for Phoenicium and that if the promised money were not received, Ballio would be free to sell her to any other bidder.

As Pseudolus was revolving his plans in his mind, he overheard Simo talking to a friend and learned that the old man had already heard of Calidorus' plight and had steeled himself in advance against any plea for money that his son might make. Finding his task thus complicated, Pseudolus stepped forward and brazenly admitted his commission, telling Simo that he intended to get the twenty minae from him and that Simo should consequently be on his guard. The slave told his master in addition that he intended to trick Ballio out of the slave girl. Simo was skeptical, but Pseudolus finally goaded him into promising to pay for the girl if Pseudolus proved successful in getting her away from the procurer.

Soon afterward Pseudolus was fortunate enough to overhear a newcomer identify himself as Harpax, the Macedonian captain's messenger, come to conclude the dealings for Phoenicium. Accosting the messenger, Pseudolus identified himself as one of Ballio's servants and persuaded Harpax to allow him to deliver the sealed letter that was to identify the rightful purchaser. Then he induced Harpax to go to an inn to rest from his journey until Pseudolus came to get him.

When the messenger had gone, Calidorus appeared in the company of a friend, and in the conversation that followed, the latter agreed to lend five minae for the execution of Pseudolus' plot. He agreed, moreover, to allow his servant Simia to be used in the enterprise.

These arrangements made, the three left to conclude their preparations. Then Ballio appeared in the company of a cook, and it was disclosed that today was the procurer's birthday and that he was preparing a feast for his customers. Before Ballio went into his house, it was disclosed also that Simo had met him in the market place and had warned him to be on his guard against Pseudolus' plot.

Immediately after Ballio went in Pseudolus appeared in the company of Simia. During their conversation Simia revealed herself to be shrewd and wily and in the ensuing confrontation with Ballio he proved as apt a dissembler as Pseudolus himself. For when Ballio came out of his house Simia approached and asked directions to find the procurer. Ballio identified himself, but, suspicious, he asked Simia the name of the man who had sent him. For a moment the eavesdropping Pseudolus was afraid that his plot had collapsed, for Simia had not been told the name of the Macedonian captain. Simia adroitly evaded the trap, however, by pretending suspicion on his part and refusing to give Ballio the sealed letter until the procurer had himself identified Phoenicium's purchaser. Ballio did so, received the letter and the money and released Phoenicium into Simia's custody.

After Simia and Phoenicium had gone, Ballio, congratulating himself on having outwitted Pseudolus, chuckled at the prospect of the servant making his tardy effort to obtain the girl. When Simo appeared, the procurer expressed his certainty that Pseudolus had been foiled and declared that he would give Simo twenty minae and relinquish his right to the girl as well if Pseudolus were successful in his plot.

At that moment Harpax entered, grumbling that Pseudolus had not come to get him as he had promised to do. Confronting Ballio, he learned the procurer's identity and set about to close the bargain his master had made. Ballio, convinced that Harpax was in the employ of Pseudolus, did his best to humiliate the messenger until Harpax mentioned having given the sealed letter to a "servant" of Ballio. From the description, Ballio realized with great chagrin that he had been thoroughly duped. Simo held him to his word regarding the twenty minae and the relinquishing of his rights to Phoenicium, and Harpax, learning that the girl was no longer available, insisted on the return of the fifteen minae that the captain had already deposited.

Meanwhile, Pseudolus, Calidorus and Phoenicium were celebrating their victory with wine. Pseudolus later met Simo and demanded the twenty minae which the old man owed him for having successfully tricked Ballio. Simo gave the money with good will since it was not ultimately coming out of his pocket. Pseudolus returned half the sum and took his master off to drink to their good fortune.

TRISTAN AND ISOLDE

Type of work Poem

Author Gottfried von Strassburg (fl. late twelfth and early thirteenth centuries)

Type of plot Romantic tragedy

Time of plot The Arthurian period

Locale Northern Europe, Ireland, England

First transcribed c. 1210

Principal characters

RIVALIN a lord of Parmenie

BLANCHEFLEUR his wife

TRISTAN, their son

RUAL THE FAITHFUL, Tristan's foster father

MARK King of Cornwall, Tristan's uncle

ISOLDE THE FAIR, King Mark's bride, loved by Tristan

BRANGENE Isolde's companion

ISOLDE OF THE WHITE HANDS, Tristan's bride

Critique

Those who know Richard Wagner's opera of the same title are familiar with the basic plot of Gottfried von Strassburg's version of this widespread tale. The version Wagner chose, 19,000 or so lines of which are attributed to Gottfried, the medieval German court poet, is the finest extant and the most extensive telling of one of the most famous love stories of all times. This metrical romance, which belongs to the tradition of German Minnesang, does not follow the line of chivalric romance developed by other writers, and there is no deadly repetition of knightly deeds of valor in war and tournaments. Instead, Gottfried celebrates romantic love deeper than chivalric love with its strict but conventional code of behavior, his conception of love is more inward, at once enchanting and enthralling, bewildering and ecstatic, one that sways the soul and makes martyrs of those who have partaken of love's sacrament. The landscape against which Tristan and Isolde move often suggests an inner dream world of motivation and compulsion.

The Story

Rivalin, a lord of Parmenie tired of baiting Duke Morgan, the wicked ruler, signed a year's truce and set off for Britain where King Mark of Cornwall was establishing peace and order. Badly wounded while fighting in the defense of Cornwall, Rivalin was pitied and nursed back to health by Mark's sister Blancheffeur, whom he took back to Parmenie as his bride. Later, hearing of Rivalin's death at Duke Morgan's hand, Blancheffeur went into labor, and died during the birth of her son Rual, Rivalin's faithful steward, and his wife reared the boy out of loyalty to their dead lord and mistress and to thwart Duke Morgan's vindictiveness. The boy was named Tristan, in keeping with the sad events preceding his birth and a prophecy of grief to come.

Tristan's education was courtly, both at home and abroad, it included music, art, literature, languages, falconry, hunting, riding, knightly prowess with sword and spear, and jousting. These accomplishments he used to great advantage throughout his short life. He was loved deeply by his foster parents, his step brothers, and the people of Parmenie as well.

Kidnapped by Norwegians, Tristan managed to make his way to Cornwall after an eight day storm at sea. He immediately attached himself to King Mark's court as a hunter, later the master of the hunt. When his royal lineage was revealed, he became his uncle's knight and vassal.

Known far and wide as a doughty knight, Tristan returned to avenge his father's death by defeating and killing Duke Morgan. His lands he gave to Rual and his sons. Meanwhile, Duke Morolt of Ireland, who had exacted tribute from King Mark, demanded further payment or a fight to the death in single combat with the Cornish king. Tristan acted as King Mark's emissary to the Irish court, where his efforts to have Duke Morolt recall his demand for tribute were unsuccessful. Duke Morolt did agree, however, to let Tristan fight in King Mark's place. They met and fought in Cornwall. After wounding Tristan in the hip, Duke Morolt suggested that the young knight yield so that his sister Isolde, Queen of Ireland, could nurse him back to health. This offer was refused, and the fight waved fiercely again. Tristan finally sliced off Duke Morolt's head and hand.

Tristan, disguised as a beggar, went to Ireland to be cured. Calling himself Tantris, he ingratiated himself with Queen Isolde, who cured him of his hurt. Afterward he became the tutor in music and languages to her daughter, Isolde the Fair. When the young Isolde learned that he was the murderer of her uncle, the queen mother forgave him and allowed him to return to Cornwall.

In Cornwall, Tristan sang the praises of the Irish princess Because King Mark had made the young knight his heir, some jealous noblemen, hoping to have Tristan slain, suggested that he return to Ireland and bring Isolde back as King Mark's bride On his arrival in Ireland Tristan killed a dragon which had long ravished the kingdom In gratitude, Queen Isolde entrusted her beautiful daughter to Tristan's care

On the return voyage, Brangene, the faithful companion and cousin of Isolde the Fair, failed to guard carefully the love potion intended by the queen for Isolde and King Mark on their nuptial day Tristan and the princess drank the potion and were thenceforth enslaved by love for each other They both experienced conflicting duty and desire, turned red then white, became both depressed and exalted, and finally gave in to love To deceive King Mark, Brangene stole into Isolde's bed so that Tristan and Isolde might meet in secret

After some time had passed, Isolde grew apprehensive lest Brangene betray her, and she ordered her companion's death Fortunately, the queen relented before Brangene could die, and all went on as before until the king was at last informed of Tristan's treachery King Mark made many attempts to trap the lovers, meanwhile vacillating between trust and angry jealousy Each time a trap was set, Tristan and Isolde proved their false innocence by some cunning ruse

Finally the lovers were exiled The king invited them to return, however, when he discovered them innocently asleep in a cave, a sword between them Although King Mark urged propriety on their return to court, Tristan and Isolde almost immediately abandoned all caution, driven as they were by the caprices of love Knowing that the king would have them killed if they were discovered, Tristan set out from Cornwall after accepting a ring from his beloved as a token of their fidelity to each other

During his travels Tristan performed deeds of knightly valor in Germany, Champagne, and Normandy In gratitude for his services in Normandy the duke gave him his daughter Isolde, called Isolde of the White Hands to distinguish her from Isolde the Fair, as his bride Lovesick and dejected, Tristan accepted his bride in name only—the name Isolde

(At this point Gottfried's narrative breaks off abruptly From his source materials and from related versions, it is likely that Tristan was fatally wounded by a poisoned spear and that Isolde the Fair, summoned from Cornwall, arrived after her lover had died Shock and grief caused her death also King Mark, learning of the love potion, forgave them and ordered the lovers buried side by side in Cornwall)

THE TROJAN WOMEN

Type of work Drama

Author Euripides (c 485 c 406 B C)

Type of plot Classical tragedy

Time of plot Age of the Trojan War

Locale Before the ruined walls of Troy

First presented 415 B C

Principal characters

POSEIDON, god of the sea and patron of Troy

PALLAS ATHENA, goddess of wisdom

HECUBA, Queen of Troy

CASSANDRA her daughter a prophetess

ANDROMACHE, wife of Hector, prince of Troy

HELEN, Queen of Sparta abducted by Paris

MENE LAUS, King of Sparta
TALTHYBIUS herald of the Greeks
CHORUS OF THE CAPTIVE TROJAN WOMEN

Critique

The Trojan Women (the Troades) has more pathos and emotional tension than any other play by Euripides. It is not, strictly speaking, an Aristotelian tragedy, for it has no central tragic figure, neither is it simply a tragic pageant. The Greek warriors collectively constitute the tragic hero in that they commit hubris by defiling the Trojan temples and brutally murdering the innocent. At the end of the play their doom awaits them. This compelling presentation of the utter folly of mass warfare and genocide speaks eloquently to the twentieth century. No doubt Euripides was moved to write the play in protest against the Athenian massacre of all the males and the enslavement of the women and children of Melos in 415 B.C., when that unfortunate city sought to remain neutral in the war against Sparta. The Troades is the only surviving play of a trilogy that included Alexandros (another name for Paris), which dealt with the refusal of Priam and Hecuba to murder the infant Paris as commanded by the oracle's prediction that he would be the ruin of Troy, and Palamedes, which dealt with the treachery of the Greek leaders who murdered Palamedes before Troy. In the Troades the Greek and Trojan lines of tragedy are merged

The Story

On the second morning after the fall of Troy and the massacre of all its male inhabitants, Poseidon appeared to lament the ruins and vow vengeance against the Greeks. To his surprise, Pallas Athena, the goddess who had aided the Greeks, joined him in plotting a disastrous homeward voyage for the victors who had despoiled her temple in Troy. They with drew as Hecuba rose from among the sleeping Trojan women to mourn the burning city and her dead sons and husband. The chorus joined her in chanting an anguished lament.

Talthybius, the herald of the Greeks, arrived to announce that Agamemnon had chosen Cassandra to be his concubine and that the other royal women of Troy had been assigned by lot—Polyxena to the tomb of Achilles, Andromache to Achilles' son Neoptolemus, and Hecuba herself to Odysseus, King of Ithaca and conqueror of the wooden horse that had led to the fall of the city. Amid the cries of the grieving women Cassandra appeared, bearing a flaming torch in each hand. The chorus was convinced that she had gone mad as she danced and prayed to Hymen, god of Marriage, that Agamemnon take her soon to Argos as his bride, for there she would cause his death and the ruin of his entire family. As for Odysseus, she foretold that he would suffer for ten more years on the seas before reaching his homeland. As Talthybius led her off, he observed that Agamemnon himself must have been mad to fall in love with the insane Cassandra.

Hecuba, broken with grief, collapsed to the ground. From the city came a Greek-drawn chariot loaded with the spoils of war and bearing Andromache and her infant son Astyanax. Cursing Helen, the cause of all their woe, Andromache called upon the dead Hector to come to her and announced enviously that Polyxena had just been killed upon the tomb of Achilles as a gift to the dead hero. Drawing upon her last remaining strength, Hecuba tried to comfort the distraught Andromache and urged that instead of mourning for Hector she win the love of Neoptolemus so that her son might grow to manhood and perhaps redeem Troy. At this point the reluctant herald Talthybius announced the Greeks' order that the son of so distinguished a warrior as Hector must not be permitted to reach manhood but must be killed at once by being hurled from the battlements of Troy As Talthybius led away Andromache and her son, a fresh lament and cursing of Helen went up from the grieving women of Troy

Suddenly King Menelaus came striding in the sunlight with his retinue to demand that his faithless wife Helen be dragged to him by her blood reeking hair Hecuba pleaded with him to slay Helen at once, lest her beauty and feminine wiles soften his will, but Menelaus remained determined to take her back to Greece, where the relatives of those who died for her sake might have the pleasure of stoning her to death Helen approached, calm and dignified Her plea for the right to speak being supported by Hecuba, she argued that she was not responsible for the fall of Troy The first blame must be attributed to Pnam and Hecuba, who refused to kill the infant Paris as the oracle commanded the second to Aphrodite, who bewitched her into submitting to Paris the third to Deiphobus and the Trojan guards who prevented her from escaping to the Greeks after she had come to her senses Goaded on by the chorus of Trojan women,

Hecuba jeered at these claims, insisting that the gods would not have been so foolish as Helen would have them believe, that her own lust drove her into Paris' arms, and that she could always have escaped Troy and her own shame by way of suicide Helen, falling to her knees pleaded with Menelaus not to kill her Hecuba also knelt to beg Helen's immediate death and to warn Menelaus against taking her aboard his ship Menelaus compromised Helen would return to Greece on another ship and there pay for her shameful life As Menelaus led her away, the chorus wailed that Zeus had forsaken them

Talthybius then returned, bearing the crushed body of Astyanax on Hector's shield He told Hecuba that Andromache, as she was being led aboard Neoptolemus' ship, had begged that the infant be given proper burial The performance of that rite was more than Hecuba could bear, and she had to be restrained by force from throwing herself into the flames of the city As the captive women were led off to the Greek ships the great crash of Troy's collapsing walls was heard and the city was engulfed in smoke and darkness

THE TRUE HISTORY

Type of work Prose romance
Author Lucian (c 120 c 200)
Type of plot Satiric fantasy
Time of plot Second century
Locale The universe
First transcribed Second century

Principal characters

LUCIAN
 ENDYMION, King of the Moon
 PHAETHON, King of the Sun
 SCINTHARUS, an inhabitant of the whale's belly

Critique

Poking fun at exaggerated travel books like Antonius Diogenes' The Marvels of Ultima Thule and others now lost, Lucian, called by Macaulay "the last great master of Attic eloquence and Attic wit," wrote in The True History a two part parody that greatly influenced Rabelais and Swift Because Lucian was also known as a writer of satirical dialogues mocking many beliefs of the people, the story originated that he was torn to pieces by dogs in Egypt In an explanatory pro logue to this work Lucian declared that athletes alternate severe exercise with relaxation. Intellectuals should do the same, he maintained, and alternate serious reading with that which is witty and entertaining. And so he wrote The True History, "with a novelty of subject and excellence in design," and for the purpose of telling lies in a plausible way and parodying the exaggerations of certain writers that he "need not name because the enlightened reader could easily recognize the originals." Because the creatures he was going to describe could not possibly exist, he hoped all his readers would disbelieve him.

The Story

Heading westward from the Pillars of Hercules, Lucian in his sloop with a crew of fifty finally reached the Atlantic Ocean. Filled with a thirst for adventure and an intellectual restlessness to see what was on the other side of the world, he found the first day of the voyage delightful. Then came a terrible storm that drove the ship before it for seventy-nine days. On the eightieth day the adventurers came to a lofty wooded island and went ashore.

After resting, twenty sailors accompanied Lucian on an exploration of the island. They discovered a bronze tablet announcing that Hercules and Dionysius had been there, and they saw two huge footprints. They also discovered that the river had its source in a grape arbor and contained Chian wine. Eating the fish that swam in it made them drunk.

The inhabitants of the island were women, human from the waist up, but growing on vines. When several of the crew became too friendly with these creatures, the sailors soon found themselves tangled in the vines and taking root, and so they had to be left behind.

Filling their casks with wine and water, the survivors set sail, only to run into a whirlwind that whipped the sloop hundreds of miles into the air. A week later the ship was thrown upon the moon, which was inhabited by men riding vultures. The king, Endymion, enlisted the service of the Greeks in his war against Phaethon and his people of the sun.

The mighty invasion force was made up of eighty thousand vulture-riding cavalry and twenty thousand troops riding birds covered with grass and having lettuce leaves for wings. This vegetarian force had armor of vegetable husks, but Greek swords. Among their allies were fighters from other constellations astride monster fleas.

The army of the sun rode flying ants, gnats and mosquitoes. Some hurled radish bombs; others wielded asparagus spears. But they were no match for the lunar troops until centaur reinforcements arrived so numerous that the number could not be set down for fear of creating incredulity. When the moon army was put to flight, Lucian and his friends were captured and bound with spider webs.

To bring the Moon People to terms, Phaethon erected a cloud screen. Cut off from sunlight, the moon troops soon surrendered. The terms of capitulation were inscribed on a slab of electrum. With the coming of peace, Lucian had time to explore the moon and note its wonders.

Homeward bound, the Greeks paused at Lamptown, inhabited by lanterns, and at Cloud Cuckooland, where Lucian verified the details of Aristophanes' comedy, The Birds. Finally the travelers reached the ocean again, only to have their sloop swallowed by a huge whale. In its belly, amid a clutter of wrecked ships, they found Scintharus, who was raising vegetables on an island. He had lived there for twenty-seven years, ever since leaving Cyprus.

There were many other inhabitants, all quarrelsome and unjust. Some had eel eyes and lobster faces; others were half men and half animals. Since their only weapons were fishbones, Lucian decided to attack them. The creatures were all slain in two battles in which the

Greeks suffered only one casualty the sailing master was stabbed with a mullet spine

One day, after living in the whale for a year and eight months the Greeks heard a loud uproar in the outside world Peering between the whale's teeth, they watched a naval battle of giants who manned floating islands and fought with oysters and sponges

At last the Greeks conceived a scheme to gain their liberty They set fire to the forest inside the whale then as the creature was about to suffocate they wedged open his jaws and sailed out, with Scimitarus as pilot But they did not get far, for a north wind froze the ocean They lived in a cave they hollowed in the ice until, after a month it occurred to them to hoist the sails and let the ship glide across the smooth ice to open water

Sailing in a sea of milk, they took on provisions at a cheese island They stopped at the Isle of the Blessed and watched a lawsuit between Theseus and

Menelaus for the custody of Helen While the hearing was in progress Helen ran off with a new sweetheart, aided by some of Lucian's crew and the tourists were deported Lucian however, did have time to consult Homer on moot points concerning his life and writing, and to catalogue the famous Greeks who inhabited the isle Also, he witnessed a prison break by the damned and watched the heroic exploits of Achilles in recapturing them

Again voyaging, the travelers passed a place of punishment for liars Herodotus was there, but Lucian knew he was safe because he had never written anything but the truth The company spent a month at the Port of Dreams and also paused briefly to take Calypso a note from Odysseus Pirates attacked them several times, but the travelers finally reached safety in a land which Lucian recognized as the continent facing his world

TRUTH SUSPECTED

Type of work Drama

Author Juan Ruiz de Alarcón (c 1581 1639)

Type of plot Thesis comedy

Time of plot Seventeenth century

Locale Madrid

First published 1628

Principal characters

DON GARCIA a young man given to lying

DON BELTRAN his father

TRISTAN, his servant

JUAN DE SOSA a friend in love with Jacinta

JACINTA, niece of Don Sancho, Don Beltrán's friend

LUCRECIA, her friend

Critique

Mexican born, Juan Ruiz de Alarcón became one of the leading dramatists of the Golden Age in Spain The twenty six plays now identified as his are divided into two groups His early plays in keeping with the romantic tradition, are marked by complicated plots His later works are more concerned with the human qualities of his characters and less with dramatic situations, some critics attribute to his Mexican background this departure from the current conventions of the theater His two best plays belong to his second period Walls Have Ears attacks slander and Truth Suspected presents an excellent character study of a congenital liar The latter play inspired Corneille's Le Menteur (1643)

The Story

When Don García returned home from studies at the University of Salamanca, he learned that on the death of his brother Gabriel he had become the heir to the family estates and fortune. His father also provided him with a shrewd and cynical servant, Tristan. Don García's tutor had already reported that the young man was given to one great vice: lying. Later his discerning servant agreed. The son's habit naturally worried his father, himself a man of great honor. Though he admitted that regard for truth was uncommon at the court of Spain, he hated the vice of lying above all others, and he vowed to break his son of the habit.

During his first day in Madrid, Don García indulged in his practice after meeting two attractive women in the shopping center of the city. Taking his cue from Tristan's remark that the women of Madrid were money mad, the young gallant told them that he was a wealthy man from the New World. Though he had been in Madrid hardly a day, he assured one of the women that he had worshiped her from afar for a year. Unfortunately, he had misunderstood the information bought from their coachman by Tristan; he thought the girl he wanted to marry was Lucrecia, but the object of his attentions was really her friend Jacinta.

More lying followed when Don García met his friend, Juan de Sosa, a young man in love with Jacinta but rejected by her uncle until he acquired a knighthood. This time, falsely claiming responsibility for a serenade and banquet the preceding night, Don García found himself challenged to a duel by Juan.

In the meantime, hoping to get his son married off before Madrid learned of his habit of lying, Don Beltrán, after giving him a lecture on the value of truth, told him he had arranged for his marriage to Jacinta, niece of his old friend, Don Sancho. Since Don García thought it was Lucrecia whom he loved, he promptly invented a prodigious lie about his marriage to a lady of Salamanca. He declared that while visiting her one night, he had been discovered by the lady's father, to save her reputation and life, he had agreed to marry her.

Lucrecia, to help Jacinta decide which of her suitors she preferred, signed her name to a note inviting Don García to wait beneath her balcony. During his talk with the veiled ladies, his earlier story about a wife in Salamanca and his uncertainty as to which of the veiled women was the one he loved resulted in their ridicule and scorn. Rudely dismissed, he received from Tristan a lecture on the evils of lying.

More lying was necessary when Don Beltrán attempted to send for his son's wife. She could not travel, Don García told him, she was going to have a baby. Although he laughed at Tristan's warning that "one who lies needs a quick wit and a good memory," his punishment had already begun. When Lucrecia invited him to another meeting at a convent, he found himself trapped in a mesh of deceit, and the veiled ladies showed how unsuccessful had been his wooing. Tristan contributed to his unhappiness by many quotations from Latin and Greek writers. The servant also remarked that he could see no sense to his master's lies when they were so easily discovered.

But even Tristan was fooled by Don García's account of his supposed duel with Juan de Sosa, actually he had placated his former friend by telling more lies. It would have been better had he silenced his challenger on the dueling field, for Juan now appeared to tell Don Beltrán that no one with the name of Don García's supposed wife lived in Salamanca. So incensed was the father that he was about to disinherit his son. Even by telling the truth, Don García could not convince him without corroboration from Tristán. The word of a servant was more trustworthy than the oath of a nobleman, the ashamed father pointed out.

When Juan's attainment of knighthood cleared away that obstruction to his suit, Don Sancho gladly arranged for the young man's marriage to Jacinta, and that lady, disillusioned and dubious of a lying suitor, was happy to agree with her uncle's decision. Don Beltran, too, was won over, and he agreed to arrange for his son's delayed marriage. But when the suitors were paired off, Don Garcia saw his lady go to his rival. Even though the whole affair had been based on misunderstanding, it was now too late to correct the mistake. Don Garcia must in honor bound marry Lucrecia.

Tristan again underlined a moral when he assured his master that if he had told the truth instead of lying he would now be happy with Jacinta. However, Lucrecia was also beautiful.

TURCARET

Type of work Drama

Author Alain Rene Le Sage (1668-1747)

Type of plot Social comedy

Time of plot Seventeenth century

Locale Paris

First presented 1709

Principal characters

M TURCARET a financier, in love with the Baroness

MME TURCARET his wife

THE BARONESS a young widow and a coquette

FRONTIN the Knight's valet

THE KNIGHT a coxcomb

THE MARQUESS, another coxcomb

MARINE and

LISETTE maidservants to the Baroness

MME JACOB a dealer in toilette necessities sister to M Turcaret

FLAMAND, M Turcaret's valet

Critique

In Turcaret, or, The Financier action never lags, lines never drag. This type of French satirical comedy is marked by the main features of earthy realism, an almost didactic purpose, and photographic characterizations, and Turcaret is a classic of its kind. The satire is founded both in personalities and in national conditions. The title character is the profiteer, whose altruism is nonexistent and whose wealth is his only merit. Those who ingratiate themselves for favors from this parvenu are no more admirable than he is. Through the relationships of the various characters, Le Sage presents a clear picture of the social disintegration which began in the last years of Louis XIV, of the clumsy fiscal system of seventeenth century France, and of the demoralized attitude of the French resulting from the military disasters of the war with England and Austria.

The Story

M Turcaret lavished gifts and immense sums of money upon the Baroness, whom he had asked to marry him. The Baroness in turn poured equal amounts into the pockets of the wheedling Knight. Marine admonished her mistress to use her reasoning. The discerning Marine knew the Baroness' motivation in keeping the Knight. He had been the first to offer her, a widow love. Marine outlined a judicious pattern for the Baroness: drop the Knight, because M Turcaret might not like the idea of her having "friends" and accept M Turcaret's gifts. Then, should he not want to marry her, she would have wealth and possessions and could marry

some needy gentleman To be sure, the world might talk a little about her rejection by M Turcaret, but a husband, needy or not, could restore her reputation by marriage

An early gift was a small coffer, delivered by Flamand, M Turcaret's valet It contained two notes one a bill of exchange for ten thousand crowns and written by M Turcaret, the other a quatrain, dedicated to the Baroness Marine was anxious to read the verse of the second to see whether it was as good as the prose of the first

Enraged by her mistress' gullibility with the Knight, Marine quit her job with the Baroness She announced, in quitting, that she would report to M Turcaret that the Baroness was little more than the middleman for his money, as it passed from M Turcaret to the Knight

Frontin quipped that such a servant as Marine with all her righteousness was worse than a mother As to her exposing them to M Turcaret, Frontin added that waiting maids were like pious ladies performing their charitable deeds as a means of avenging themselves Frontin knew exactly the young woman, Lisette, to replace Marine as the Baroness' maid

To show her animosity for M Turcaret and her kind thoughts for the Knight, the Baroness gave the Knight the ten thousand crown note given her by M Turcaret to redeem her diamond ring (also a gift from M Turcaret), which she had given the distraught Knight to pawn so that he might pay a gambling debt

Frontin gave a succinct summary of the life of the times, when he traced the source of income He and the Knight had a coquette who milked the man of affairs who made his money pillaging the taxpayers It made, he thought, a diverting circumstance of trickery

The Knight returned the ring, but not the change from the note His action was timely, as M Turcaret, having heard Marine's story of the Baroness' generosity toward the Knight, appeared and asked to see the ring When the Baroness produced it, Marine's report to M Turcaret was undermined The ring incident served as prima facie evidence that the Baroness had the note also M Turcaret became putty in the Baroness' hands as she reprimanded him for believing Marine's report

M Turcaret's undisciplined character was demonstrated fully, just prior to this scene of abject apology, as he went about the Baroness' room smashing her largest mirror and her finest porcelains This outburst, he said, gave him a little relief He restored the damage with costly replacements

Taking full advantage of M Turcaret's subservience, the Baroness told him that she wished Frontin to replace Flamand in his service M Turcaret observed that Frontin's countenance was marked by honesty, he asked Frontin whether he had principles Asked what he meant, M Turcaret explained that he meant clerk's principles—such as knowledge of the single entry system Frontin stated his qualifications as adeptness at two handwritings, ability with double entry, and a knowledge of preventing frauds or countenancing them—as M Turcaret's advantage would require

When Lisette reported as the Baroness' maid, it was apparent that she would be active in the financial intrigue Frontin, having coached her in the finances and relationships among the various people, gave Lisette her cardinal responsibility to the Baroness indefatigable compliance and unceasing flattery of the Baroness' infatuation for the Knight Lisette was most capable in exercising her duties

The Knight explained to Frontin that he had not been able to find the usurer to cash the ten thousand crown note, that Frontin was to find a moneychanger to effect the transaction so that the Baroness would not learn that they had not pawned her diamond Further, the valet was to go to the restaurateur to make the arrangements for that night's dinner which the Knight was giving in honor of the Baroness and M Turcaret

Frontin's first move as M Turcaret's valet was to maneuver, with Lisette's assistance, his employer into an outlay of sixty pistoles, the amount to be payment on a coach and horses for the Baroness. His second move involved his coming to the Baroness with a bailiff who had a deed signed by the Baroness and her late husband (Frontin's handwriting ability had been put to early use), assigning ten thousand livres to a horse merchant. The visit was welltimed. M Turcaret was present and paid the sum due, rather than have the Baroness discomfited.

A countess from the country, whom the Marquess—the son of M Turcaret's former master—brought to the Baroness' dinner, was Mme Turcaret, who had not lived with her husband for ten years because of his meanness and ill manners. Mme Turcaret had come to Paris to collect five quarters' support owed her by M Turcaret. The Knight recognized her as the lady with whom he had had an affair. Mme Jacob, who came on reference from one of the Baroness' friends to sell her a fashionable headdress, was M Turcaret's sister.

In the midst of abuses and insults among the Turcaret's and Mme Jacob, M Turcaret was called away to discuss a business matter with his partners. Sensing Turcaret's fiscal embroilments, the Baroness announced that she would give up M Turcaret for his and Mme Turcaret's happiness, the Marquess followed suit in severing connections with Mme Turcaret. Frontin brought the news that the bailiffs had apprehended M Turcaret, he being responsible for a pay officer who had defaulted on two hundred thousand crowns. Mme Jacob went to her brother's aid, not forgetting she was his sister. Mme Turcaret went to him to bombard him with insults, not forgetting she was his wife.

Frontin reported that he had been searched by the bailiffs, who had confiscated the ten thousand crown note, which he had not yet been able to cash, and the ten thousand livre note which M Turcaret had issued to relieve the Baroness of her debt on the bond. The Baroness, aware then that her diamond had never been pawned and that the note would never be returned to her, put the duping Knight and Frontin out of her life forever. The Knight denied Frontin future employment with him. Then he went off with the Marquess, to resume their old comradely habit of drinking all night and sleeping all day.

Left alone with Lisette, Frontin confessed that he had not been searched by the bailiffs. He had cashed the notes and had the forty thousand francs safely put away. If Lisette's ambition were satisfied with such a sum, Frontin proposed, they should start a stock of honest children. He was taking over in finances where M Turcaret had left off.

UNDER WESTERN EYES

Type of work Novel

Author Joseph Conrad (Teodor Józef Konrad Korzeniowski, 1857-1924)

Type of plot Psychological realism

Time of plot Early twentieth century

Locale St Petersburg, Russia and Geneva, Switzerland

First published 1911

Principal characters

RAZUMOV, a Russian student

VICTOR HALDIN, a revolutionist

NATHALIE HALDIN, his sister

MRS HALDIN, mother of Victor and Nathalie

THE ENGLISH PROFESSOR, a friend of the Haldins

UNDER WESTERN EYES by Joseph Conrad. By permission of the Trustees of the Estate of Joseph Conrad, of J. M. Dent & Sons, Ltd. and of the publishers Doubleday & Co., Inc. Copyright 1911-1921 by Doubleday & Co., Inc. Renewed. All rights reserved.

Critique

In the later years of Joseph Conrad, increasing recognition accorded him as a novelist of genius tended to identify him almost exclusively as a writer of sea tales. This tendency distressed Conrad because he felt that the nature of his writing ran the risk of being obscured by only one part of his material. He himself called attention to those novels which turn away from exotic places and deal with various aspects of Europe before World War I. Occupying a conspicuous place among the latter is Under Western Eyes. Despite its initial failure to impress the public, its clearness of judgment and its picture of prewar Russia were later confirmed by its reception in that country and by the events of the Russian Revolution. Razumov is one of those lonely figures so absorbing to Conrad. In his loneliness Razumov keeps a journal which eventually falls into the hands of an elderly Englishman in Geneva, the friend and adviser of the girl Razumov loves. Under this Englishman's "western eyes" the whole episode involving Razumov is scanned and evaluated. The fictional result is an interpretation of the Russian mind and temperament which has seldom been surpassed for sharpness of perception and objectivity of treatment.

The Story

A student at the St. Petersburg University, Razumov, while not talkative or gregarious, had been generally respected by the other students. His silences were attributed to profundity of thought, and his behavior was such as to inspire confidence and good opinion. Razumov, absorbed in his studies, remained largely indifferent to the impression which he made on his fellow students. He dreamed of winning scholarly honors and he had no wish to become involved in the revolutionary activities which occupied the minds of such acquaintances as Victor Haldin, a youth in whose company he had occasionally spent some time. Razu-mov's mother was dead; his father, Prince K——, acknowledged his illegitimate son only to the extent of sending him money secretly, through an intermediary. As a result, the unspent feeling which Razumov was unable to direct toward parents or family found its way into other channels. He lavished much of it on his country and felt, in his loneliness, that if he were not a Russian, he would not be anything.

By a strange turn of circumstances the uneventful pattern of Razumov's life was abruptly altered. On a certain snowy morning in St. Petersburg, a sensational event occurred—a political terrorist assassinated a prominent government official and then escaped. An hour or two later, the unsuspecting Razumov returned to his apartment to find a visitor awaiting him. The guest was Victor Haldin. Presuming on his casual acquaintance with Razumov, Haldin had selected the latter's quarters as a place of temporary refuge. Pressed for an explanation, he confessed that he was the killer being sought by the police. He asked Razumov to help him in making his escape from the city.

Razumov, dismayed, knew he could be compromised and ruined by Haldin's visit if it ever became known. However, he went in search of a sledge driver who might spirit Haldin away, but he found the man helplessly drunk. His dismay and despair deepening, Razumov decided that he could not continue to shield Haldin. In his extremity, he broke an unwritten rule by calling on Prince K—— to ask his advice and beg his protection. Prince K—— immediately contacted the authorities, with the result that Haldin was promptly apprehended and executed. Razumov, after extended interrogation by General T—— and Councilor Mikulin, was released, but not before he had been marked down, by the councilor's sharp eyes, as a tool of great potential usefulness to the government.

Meanwhile, in Geneva, Haldin's

mother and sister waited anxiously for news of him. When word of his execution arrived, they were grief stricken and bewildered, but their efforts to find out the exact circumstances of his end were blocked by the mystery and vagueness which shrouded the whole affair. Nathalie, Victor Haldin's sister, was relieved when she heard that a Russian named Razumov had arrived in Geneva. According to the rumors which had been circulating, this man was an escaped colleague of her brother's, a fellow conspirator and revolutionist. Surely he better than any other, would be able to solve the puzzle of her brother's arrest and execution.

To the Haldins, Razumov proved to be an elusive and enigmatic quarry. He lost himself at once in a circle of revolutionists in exile, including the celebrated Peter Ivanovitch, the legendary Madame de S—, and the sinister Nikita. Among them he was admired as a hero. This role Razumov found increasingly difficult to maintain especially after he met Nathalie Haldin and fell in love with her.

Razumov finally broke under the strain of keeping up his twofold deception. Through his journal, which he sent to Nathalie Haldin, she learned his true relationship to her brother. Then on an impulse, he confessed to the revolutionists the fact that he was a government spy. Brutally beaten by Nikita, with his hearing destroyed, he stumbled in front of a tramcar. Suffering from two broken limbs and a crushed side, he was picked up by passers by and carried to a hospital.

The tragic story of Razumov might have ended there, but his will to live proved too strong. Nursed back to partial health by a motherly revolutionist, he eventually returned to his homeland. There, in the south of Russia, he shared a two room cottage with his Good Samaritan friend, the devoted Tekla. Ironically, some of the revolutionists came to regret the cruel treatment Razumov had received at their hands. Periodically they visited his cottage to be stimulated by his intelligent and original views on politics, society, and morality.

UTOPIA

Type of work Humanistic treatise
Author Sir Thomas More (1478-1535)
Time Reign of Henry VII of England
Locale Antwerp, England, Utopia
First published 1516

Principal characters

THOMAS MORE the author
 PETER GILES, a citizen of Antwerp and a friend of Thomas More
 RAPHAEL HYTHLODAY, a traveler and acquaintance of Peter Giles

How to make a better world for men to live in has fascinated the minds of thinkers in every age. From Plato to the present day, a span of almost two and a half millenniums, men have been thinking and writing about what the world would be like if men could create an earthly paradise. One of the most famous pieces of such thought and writing is Sir Thomas More's Utopia, a work so famous in Western civilization that its title has come to be symbolic in our minds for any idealized state. Originally written in Latin, the international language of medieval and Renaissance Europe, the book was widely read, and as early as 1551 a translation into English was made by Ralph Robinson, a London goldsmith.

The book is in two parts, with the second part, curiously enough, written first, in 1515, and the introductory half written in the following year. The book begins with a narrative framework in which More tells how he traveled to Antwerp on a royal mission and there met Peter Giles, a worthy citizen of Antwerp, who in turn introduced him to Raphael Hythloday, whose name means literally in Greek 'a talker of nonsense.' Hythloday proved to be more than a mere manner, for in his conversation he appeared to More to be a man of ripe wisdom and rare experience. The fictional Hythloday was supposedly a companion of Amerigo Vespucci when that worthy was supposed to have made his voyages to America. It was on one of his voyages with Vespucci that Hythloday, according to his own account, discovered the fabled land of Utopia somewhere in the oceans near the Western hemisphere.

Actually, the first part of Utopia does not deal with the legendary island in it. Hythloday tells how, during the reign of King Henry VII, he visited England, conversed with Cardinal Morton, and suggested to that Churchman, who was Henry VII's chancellor, some reforms which might benefit England. Among the reforms the fictional Hythloday suggested were the abolishment of the death penalty for theft, the prevention of gambling, less dependence upon the raising of sheep for wool, the disuse of mercenary soldiers, cheaper prices for all commodities and an end to the enclosure of the common lands for the benefit of great and wealthy landlords. Although Cardinal Morton is made to listen intently to Hythloday's suggestions, More introduces a lawyer who objects that Hythloday's reforms could not be undertaken and that they would not be deemed desirable by anyone who knew the history and customs of England.

In the first part of his Utopia, More is obviously pointing out some of the social and economic evils in sixteenth century European life. More than that, he is suggesting that only an outsider can see the faults with an objective eye. The introduction of the lawyer's objections, which are cut short by Cardinal Morton, suggest also that More discerned in sixteenth century society persons who opposed reform and who sought reasons for doing so. Part one of the Utopia is More's way of preparing the reader for the section in which his ideal realm is delineated.

In the second part, Hythloday expounds at length about the culture of the mythical land of Utopia, which he had visited during his travels. Hythloday describes Utopia as an island kingdom which is crescent shaped and about five hundred miles in perimeter, separated from other lands by a man made channel constructed by its founder, the fabulous King Utopus, who saw that the Utopian experiment, if it were to succeed, must be isolated and protected from the encroachments of warlike and predatory neighbors. The island is divided into fifty four shires or counties, each with its own town, no town more than a day's walking journey from its neighbors. The central city, Amaurote is the capital, the seat of the prince who is the island's nominal ruler.

The government of Utopia is relatively simple and largely vested in older men, in patriarchal fashion. Each unit of thirty families is ruled by one man chosen by election every year. Each ten groups of families elect a member of the island council. This council in turn elects the prince, who serves throughout his life time unless deposed because of tyranny. The council meets every three days to take up matters of consequence to the people, and no decision is made on the same day the problem is advanced, lest undue haste cause mistakes.

It is not in government alone that More introduces suggestions for reform in his Utopia. In this ideal state every one works, each man having a trade or craft, except the unusually talented who are selected for training and service in the academy of learning. The work day is six hours long, with the time divided equally between the morning and the afternoon. Each person spends a two year period working as a farmer in the shire outside the city in which he resides. Since everyone works, there is more than enough food and all other commodities for the inhabitants. All goods are community owned, with each person guarding what is given him for the benefit of the commonwealth. The tastes of the people are simple, no one, having enough for himself, desires to have more than his fellows. Even the prince of Utopia is designated only by the symbol of a sheaf of grain, symbol of plenty. Each person is garbed in durable clothing of leather, linen, or wool. Jewelry is given to children to play with so that everyone associates such baubles with childishness. Gold and silver are despised, being used for chamber pots, chains for slaves, and the marks of criminal conviction.

In the dialogue Sir Thomas More injects some objections to the communal idea, but this is the only point on which he seems to have reservations; yet even on this point Hythloday's answers to his objections satisfy him.

Violence, bloodshed, and vice says Hythloday have been done away with in Utopia. Lest bloodshed of any kind corrupt the people, slaves are required to slaughter the cattle. Dicing and gambling are unknown. The people choose instead to labor for recreation in their gardens, improve their homes, attend humanistic lectures, enjoy music, and converse profitably with one another. The sick are provided for in spacious hospitals erected in each quarter of each city. In the event of a painful and incurable illness the priests consult with the patient and encourage him to choose death administered painlessly by the authorities. Although no one is required to do so, everyone eats in mess halls where slaves prepare the meals under the supervision of the wives of the family group. At mealtime young and old eat together, except for children under five, and enlightening, pleasant conversation is encouraged.

The Utopian criminal is enslaved, rather than put to death as he was in sixteenth-century England. Adultery is regarded as a crime and punished by slavery. Marriage for love is encouraged, but also prudence in selecting a mate. Males must be twenty-two and women eighteen before marriage is permitted. The welfare of the family is a state matter, since the family is the basic unit of the Utopian state. The people are anxious for the commonwealth to be rich; for the Utopians buy off their enemies and use their wealth to hire foreign mercenary soldiers; they hope in this manner to encourage potential enemies to murder one another.

The Utopians are described as a religious people who practice toleration almost unknown in Catholic Tudor England. Some are Christians, others worship God in other ways. Atheism and militant sectarianism are alike forbidden.

Two points should be made in connection with Sir Thomas More's work. One is that his borrowings from Plato and other earlier authors did not prevent him from adding much that was his own in theory and practice. The second point is that in the four and a half centuries since the writing of Utopia some of the author's ideas have been put into effect—unlikely as they may have appeared to his contemporaries. We may never in human society come to the Utopian ideal, but surely we are closer than men were in the sixteenth century. Perhaps some of the credit should go to Sir Thomas More.

THE VILLAGE

Type of work Poetry

Author George Crabbe (1754-1832)

First published 1783

Although George Crabbe's poem, The Village, contains two books, the anthologists have been largely justified in printing Book I as a separate poem. This book is in part a bitter answer to Oliver Goldsmith's sentimental picture of rural life in The Deserted Village "I paint the cot/ As Truth will paint it, and as Bards will not" Book II continues the theme of the first book for over a hundred lines then turns into a memorial eulogy of Lord Robert Manners the brother of Crabbe's patron, the Duke of Rutland

Crabbe's long life spanned the periods of eighteenth century classicism and nineteenth century romanticism, and his work contains elements of both schools His friends included Samuel Johnson among the earlier poets and Sir Walter Scott among the later Johnson "corrected" some of Crabbe's poetry and, according to Boswell, revised lines 15 20 of The Village

On Mincio's banks, in Caesar's bounteous reign,
If Tityrus found the Golden Age again,
Must sleepy bards the flattering dream prolong,
Mechanic echoes of the Mantuan song?
From Truth and Nature shall we widely stray,
Where Virgin not where Fancy leads the way?

These lines do have a Johnsonian flavor, and although they fit into the structure of the poem, they are not entirely typical of Crabbe Francis Jeffrey, one of Crabbe's admiring later contemporaries wrote "The scope of the poem is to show that the villagers of real life have no resemblance to the villagers of poetry, that poverty, in sober truth, is very uncomfortable, and vice by no means confined to the opulent"

Jeffrey set the tone for much subsequent criticism of Crabbe "His characteristic, certainly, is force and truth of description, joined for the most part to great selection and condensation of expression With a taste less disciplined and less fastidious than that of Goldsmith, he has, in our apprehension, a keener eye for observation, and a readier hand for the delineation of what he has observed" Crabbe has frequently been compared with the Dutch realistic painters, and The Village is rich with vigorous, natural word painting A dismal landscape with infertile soil and hardy weeds, listed and described by name, serves as background for group and individual portraits of a surly, selfish, unscrupulous vicious, often miserable population Particularly notable is his interior scene of the poorhouse

Theirs is yon house that holds the parish poor,
Whose walls of mud scarce bear the broken door
There where the putrid vapors, flagging play
And the dull wheel hums doleful through the day—
There children dwell who know no parents care
Parents, who know no children's love, dwell there!
Heart broken matrons on their joyless bed
Forsaken wives and mothers never wed
Dejected widows with unheeded tears
And crippled age with more than childhood fears
The lame the blind, and, far the happiest they!
The moping idiot and the madman gay

In this miserable house one of the aged inmates is dying In connection with this death Crabbe introduces two of his most savage caricatures First, he presents the doctor

Anon a figure enters, quaintly neat,
All pride and business bustle and conceit
With looks unaltered by these scenes of woe
With speed that entering, speaks his haste to go
He bids the gazing throng around him fly,
And carries fate and physic in his eye
A potent quack long versed in human ills,
Who first insults the victim whom he kills,
Whose murderous hand a drowsy Bench protect,

And whose most tender mercy is neglect

After the departure of the doctor, the dying man asks for the parish priest. This character is a direct antithesis to the venerable vicar of Goldsmith's The Deserted Village or The Vicar of Wakefield. He is concerned with hunting in the daytime and whist at night. He not only fails to answer the summons before the death, but cannot be troubled with saying the funeral service until the following Sunday.

And waiting long the crowd retire distressed'd
To think a poor man's bones should lie unblest'd

These lines end the first book.

The smugglers and drunkards of Book I are forerunners of an equally vicious or more vicious group in the first part of Book II. In both books death is spoken of as a deliverer and equalizer. The elegy on Manners occupies the final hundred lines of the poem and is really complete in itself.

Crabbe has had warm admirers ever since The Village was published. In our time Edwin Arlington Robinson paid him tribute in a strong fibered sonnet; he felt that changing fashions in literature could not obscure Crabbe's "hard, human pulse" or his "plain excellence and stubborn skill." In his opera Peter Grimes, based on one of the tales in The Borough, Benjamin Britten has brought Crabbe to the attention of many who knew little about the old poet but The Village which first made Crabbe's poetic reputation, still best sustains it, and remains his most familiar and frequently read poem.

A VINDICATION OF NATURAL SOCIETY

Type of work: Political satire

Author: Edmund Burke (1729-1797)

First published: 1756

Edmund Burke's first important publication, A Vindication of Natural Society, subtitled A View of the Miseries and Evils arising to Mankind from every Species of Civil Society in a Letter to Lord —, by a late Noble Writer, satirically attacked the views of Lord Bolingbroke (the late Noble Writer), whose philosophical works had been published posthumously in 1754. By adopting Bolingbroke's manner, Burke hoped to give a tone of irony and satire to his own opinions on society. So well did he succeed in imitating his model's polished style, however, that A Vindication of Natural Society was generally received as Bolingbroke's own, even by such critics as Chesterfield and Warburton.

Burke's central point was to show that Bolingbroke's arguments in favor of natural against revealed religion were equally applicable in favor of natural as against artificial society. Two years before

A Vindication of Natural Society appeared, Rousseau had in fact developed the thesis that a simple society close to nature was morally superior to the refined society of Europe. Burke understood the revolutionary nature of this doctrine and its threat to the established order, and he consistently maintained that any society was preferable to the hypothetical "state of nature." To prove that he understood the implications of his opponents' arguments better than they themselves did, he assumed their position with massive irony: "In vain you tell me that artificial government is good, but that I fall out only with the abuse. The thing! the thing it self is the abuse!" His irony is so cleverly disguised that J. B. Bury commented, "A Vindication worked out in detail a historical picture of the evils of civilization which is far more telling than Rousseau's generalities."

Burke begins by distinguishing between a natural society and the political society which came into being when man, observing the advantages of the family union, assumed that larger unions would be beneficial as well. Because the society so created was artificial, man was forced to invent laws. By stating the case so baldly, Burke hoped to ridicule Bolingbroke's straightforward rationalism. He puts a major part of the blame for social corruption on religious institutions in a covert attempt to identify Bolingbroke's deism with an attack on the social order. "Civil government borrows a strength from ecclesiastical, and artificial laws receive a sanction from artificial revelations. The ideas of religion and government are closely connected and whilst we receive government as a thing necessary we shall in spite of us draw in an artificial religion of some kind or other." Although Burke's Noble Writer disavows any attack on English society, the sweeping nature of his generalizations obviously implicates him.

The state, the Noble Writer goes on, can be viewed in two different lights in its external relationship to other states, and in its internal relationship to the governed. He finds that a description of the honorable conduct between nations would not fill ten pages, but their record of war and treachery is beyond human accounting. With deliberately exaggerated concern in proving his point, Burke devotes about one sixth of his essay to the history of war. He caps his summary with the estimate that the number of men slaughtered in battle was seventy times the five hundred million then inhabiting the earth. The Noble Writer concludes that "political society is justly chargeable with much the greatest part of this destruction of the species." In this passage Burke's irony attains a subtle level of complexity. Thoughtful men could hardly deny the general truth that Burke seemingly offered to his opposition. Burke's irony is perhaps intended to demonstrate that such righteousness is easy, and that his own views were based upon principle, and not upon a justification of the status quo.

The Noble Writer finds that governments are no less cruel and unjust to those they govern. "All writers on the science of policy are agreed that all governments must frequently infringe the rules of justice to support themselves, that truth must give way to dissimulation, honesty to convenience, and humanity itself to the reigning interest." Why, he wonders, should Machiavelli be so detested for merely unveiling the mechanisms of government? The oppression of rulers can everywhere be seen in the dungeons, whips, chains, racks, and gibbets which they need to support themselves. "What sort of protection is this of the general right," the Noble Writer asks in mock triumph, "that is maintained by infringing the rights of particulars? What sort of justice is this, which is enforced by breaches of its own laws?" Burke contrives to give the Noble Writer a strong emotional argument in words that were even quoted against him. Underlying the irony, however, is the quiet conviction that man is not essentially good and that some kind of government is necessary to regulate human affairs.

The Noble Writer then divides governments into three kinds, despotism, aristocracy, and democracy, and he gives a historical sketch of each. Despotism is the simplest and most general kind. In such a system power is usually given to the weakest and most foolish. The life and welfare of all are given over to the whim of one man, such as Nero, who had a learned scholar put to death because he did not like his face. Even the sincere and virtuous despot is corrupted by servile ministers who serve their own selfish ends. Under this system the greater part of the people are considered as cattle, and, having lost all pride and dignity, they soon become no better. Such a government is actually worse than anarchy (Burke actually thought that anarchy was the worst possible civil order), yet the greater part of mankind through out history has groaned under despotism

Aristocracy has arisen whenever a society finding the rule of one man in tolerable, entrusts the public welfare to a group of leaders. Burke ironically presents the oversimplified assumptions about human nature implicit in this view. "They hoped it would be impossible that such a number [of aristocrats] could ever join in any design against the general good and they promised themselves a great deal of security and happiness from the united counsels of so many able and experienced persons." The Noble Writer finds, however, that aristocracy differs little from despotism in practice. Once in power, the aristocrats use every means possible to maintain their position. In one important respect aristocracy is worse than despotism: one ruler can be overthrown and may be succeeded by a better one, but an aristocracy clings tenaciously to its body of traditions. In actuality, Burke valued the force of tradition as a bulwark against anarchy.

The third type of government, democracy, imposes the tyranny of the majority. The ignorance and fickleness of a popular assembly leads to the same kind of abuses as those of despotism and aristocracy. Although Athens has been much admired for its democracy, it was "a city of wise men, in which a minister could not exercise his functions, a warlike people, amongst whom a general did not dare either to gain or lose a battle, a learned nation, in which a philosopher could not venture on a free inquiry." The mixed society, the union of regal, aristocratic, and popular power, is equally in supportable. At this point Burke has his Noble Writer come dangerously close to attacking the foundations of eighteenth century English society. The mixed society is represented as torn with strife over rights and powers, and as dominated by factions more interested in partisan advantage than in the general welfare.

The Noble Writer returns to a humanitarian appeal in his discussion of the rich and the poor. To him it is obvious that the whole function of the poor is to provide idleness and luxury for the rich. "In a state of nature," he says, with a simplicity that Burke intended to be ridiculous, "it is an invariable law, that a man's acquisitions are in proportion to his labors. In a state of artificial society, it is a law as constant and as invariable, that those who labor most enjoy the fewest things and that those who labor not at all have the greatest number of enjoyments." The Noble Writer is eloquent, however, in describing the horrible life of the poor. The worker in the mine and factory is little more than a slave, the rich, on the other hand, corrupt themselves with lives of idleness.

Burke's mock indictment of society is thus complete: it slaughters and enslaves and corrupts. In answer to these genuine criticisms, however, Burke attributes to his Noble Writer only a naive and dangerous sentimentality, hopelessly out of touch with man's true nature. The Noble Writer argues from lofty first principles, Burke consistently appealed for a practical, flexible, and conservative wisdom. A Vindication of Natural Society prophetically reveals the intellectual and moral debate in which Burke struggled all his life.

VISIÓN DE ANÁHUAC

Type of work Essay

Author Alfonso Reyes (1889)

First published 1917

For more than fifty years, in book after book, Alfonso Reyes has demonstrated the excellence and universality of His pano American letters. Poet, short story writer, essayist, critic, theoretician, metaphysicist, and a scholar in the best humanist tradition, he has ranged for his themes and materials from Athens in the classic age to the Indian pueblos and the history of his native Mexico. Under these circumstances it may seem somewhat arbitrary to let a single essay, even one commonly found in separate publication, represent a writer of such variety and scope. But Vision de Anahuac, written in Madrid in 1915 and published in San Jose de Costa Rica two years later, is one of those seminal works in which significance or influence bears no relationship to bulk. It is a prose poem, a landscape painting, a patriotic invocation, a study in history, an archaeological reconstruction, a literary critique, an exercise in style. The late Gabriela Mistral, Chilean poet, called it the best single piece of Latin American prose.

Anáhuac was the Nahuatl name for the Valley of Mexico, site of the great city of Tenochtitlan and the center of the Aztec civilization which fell to the rapacity of the conquistadores under Hernán Cortés in 1521. In a style that is subtle, evocative, and varied, Alfonso Reyes recreates the wonder of that place and time when two races, two societies confronted each other and the feudal barbarism of the Old World performed its act of violence upon the Indian barbarism of the New World. Later Bernal Díaz del Castillo, chronicler of the conquest, voiced his lament for a despoiled culture that was passionate and cruel but also beautiful and splendid. "Now all is lost, razed, so that there is nothing."

In the epigraph to his essay Reyes welcomes the traveler to the most crystalline region of the air. In this luminous prose and vivid imagery every object stands out, distinct and immaculate in color and form, bathed in the blue and gold intensity of sky and sun. For the sake of analogy Reyes invokes the name of Giovanni Battista Ramusio, who began to publish his collection Delle Navigazioni e Viaggi in Venice in 1550. Among the illustrations in this old work are scenes of the New World as the explorers saw them and wrote about them. These pictures, ingenuous in conception, meticulous in design, present an exotic world of nature in the vegetation of New Spain: the ear of corn, the clustered banana, the strange tropical fruits distilling their own fragrance and honey, and in stiff array the varieties of cacti, emblematic plants of a semi-arid land where the cactus, the eagle, and the serpent are the appropriate heraldic devices for a coat of arms.

To the priests and warriors of the tribe that entered the valley early in the fourteenth century—the last of such migrations into Anahuac—the legendary vision of the eagle and the serpent was the fulfillment of a prophecy. Behind that roving band lay a history of many wanderings and wars in which memory and fact faded into a primitive myth of warriors who came out of the Seven Caves to which the seven tribes traced their dim beginnings. There they built a city, a flower of stone on water, and the city became an empire, cyclopean like those of Egypt and Babylon, over which Moctezuma, the magnificent but weak, ruled in the ill-omened days that heralded the coming of the white man. The stage had been set for the last act in an ancient drama of conquest and settlement when Cortés and his followers crossed the snow-capped mountains and descended through fields of maize and maguey to the valley floor.

Ahead of them, connected with the mainland by three stone causeways, two lances in width, Tenochtitlan rose like a mirage from waters that caught and held the color of the sky. In that clear atmosphere every detail of the city and its environs could be viewed as if through crystal, an intricate pattern of temples, palaces, public squares, streets, canals, and gardens bright with flowers. Over the city loomed the bulk of the great temple, with wide streets radiating from its four corners. Smoke rose from the sanctuaries atop the holy pyramid, and through the still air came the echoing rumble of drums and the thin music of flutes

To the Spaniards the sight was like some vision of enchantment for the conqu s'adores carried in their blood the same s'rain of wonder that had produced the romantic s'ory of Amadis of Gaul "As soon as we saw so many cities and towns in the water," Diaz del Castillo wrote "we were struck with amazement and said that it seemed like things from the book of Amadis because of the great towers and temples and houses wh'ch they had built in the water and all of them of stone and mortar, and even some of our soldiers spoke of what they saw as if they were in a land of dreams "

As Alfonso Reyes poin's out, the life of the city revolved around three central poin's the temple the market place, and Moctezuma's palace In all sections of the city, the pattern was repeated in the smaller shrines, the market squares the palaces of the nobles The proud, somber Indian of Anahuac was a wor shiper of fierce gods a shrewd trader, a lover of ceremony and display

Within the serpent carved wall of the sacred enclosure stood the great temple a terraced monolithic pyramid built of basalt and porphyry slabs quarried from the surrounding hills Inside this precinct the apartments of the pries's the s'tudy halls, and rooms for the storage of sacri ficial utensils and books of ritual covered an area which could have enclosed a vil lage of five hundred persons One hundred and fourteen s'teps led to the highest platform on which were images of the gods, housed in sanctuaries decorated with carvings of men and monsters in wood and stone The giant idols made of cereals and blood were decorated with precious metals and jewels Sacred fires burned on the altars Close at hand were trumpets, censers, flutes conch shells and the flint knives used for human sacrifice There also was the ceremonial serpent skin drum which could be heard two leagues away Blood spattered the altars and floors The priests wore black robes and their hair was matted with gore They were the guardians of savage rituals the min'isters of a faith reaching downward toward that concept of earth and blood which is the dark mystery at the heart of mankind's remote origins

From the horrors of the temple the Spaniards turned to the bustle of the market place It was said Cortes, twice as large as that of Salamanca and there every day some sixty thousand people engaged in buying and selling under the supervision of inspectors and twelve presiding magistrates All the produce of the land was offered for sale each in its separate quarter under deep porticoes jewelry of precious stones and metals, collars bracelets earrings, lip plugs of jade, crystal emerald, turquoise, gold, silver, and copper beautiful featherwork, shimmering as a hummingbird poised in sunlight, flowers from Xochimilco, textiles that reminded Cortes of the silk market in Granada game of all kinds, partridge quail wild ducks rabbits deer, and small dogs bred for eating vegetables of every description onions, leeks cresses, sorrel artichokes beans, and golden thistles corn red, black, yellow and blue, sold green on the ear or dried or ground or baked into loaves and tortillas fish, fruits cacao syrups of corn and maguey, building materials stone bricks, timber, firewood and charcoal for cooking and heating pottery for every use painted and glazed eggs cakes, sweets, hides, tobacco There was a quarter for apothecaries—Indian herbalists acquainted the Spaniards with more than twelve hundred medicinal plants and roots—and another for barbers There were houses where food was cooked and served In another quarter was the slave market where traders cried their human merchandise The Indian market, according to Diaz del Castillo, surprised even those who had been to Constantinople and Rome

Those familiar with the Spanish court were equally astonished by the pomp and splendor that surrounded Moctezuma

To their awed gaze he seemed another Midas whose touch turned everything to gold, so that it was necessary for him to uncover himself to show Cortés that he was, like other men, of human flesh. As the poet has said, if there is poetry in America it is Moctezuma on his throne of gold. In his palaces he had reproduced in precious stones, gold, silver, or feathers every natural object in his kingdom. Six hundred lords attended him daily. When he dined, three hundred noble youths were needed to serve him, for he had put before him every variety of meat, fish, vegetables, and fruits in the land. Four times a day he changed his dress, and his garments, like the dishes from which he was served, were never used again. Those who approached his person wore poor clothing and abased themselves in humility. When he took his ease, dancers, buffoons, and acrobats entertained him.

In his great palace the walls were of porphyry, jasper, and marble, roofed with carved beams and richly carpeted with cotton carpets, skins, and featherwork. Fountains played in the courtyards. He had other palaces for his recreation. One contained pools of water, salt and sweet, for every kind of aquatic bird. Another section contained birds prized for the beauty of their plumage. Still another housed birds of prey, for the king was skilled in falconry. There was a palace in which wild animals and reptiles were kept. Another was given over to the raising of flowers—no vegetables or fruit trees ever grew in the Indian garden—fragrant shrubs, and scented herbs.

In a land where nature was so inseparably joined to the daily lives of the people, the flower, not the snakeskin drum or the sacrificial knife, was the symbol of their culture, a symbol of the love of art and beauty that redeemed in part the cruelty of their religion. The Aztec noble carried flowers in his hand when he walked abroad, garlands decked him on ceremonial occasions. Flowers filled the markets, the palaces, the adobe houses of the poor. Floral designs decorated the pottery of Cholula. Floating gardens covered the lakes. In the calendar codices a shower of flowers is shown descending upon the earth at the end of the fourth sun cycle. The flower also had its consecration in art. Stylized in picture writing and in sculpture it appears in place names and as the designation of the exquisite qualities of things. And as the surviving fragments or corrupted translations show, the flower provided the themes and imagery in both the secular and religious poetry of the period before the conquest.

Alfonso Reyes laments the loss of the indigenous poetry of the Indians. Although scholars may unearth portions of their hymns, rituals, or festive songs, and although others still exist in the versions of the Spanish friars, nothing can ever compensate for the loss of that body of literature which reflected the religious and social experience of the people of Anáhuac. Findings and reconstructions contain only suggestions of what that poetry must have been, for even altered and indirect in the surviving versions it exhibits a degree of sensibility not characteristic of the translating Spanish missionaries who possessed more pity than imagination. One poem, "Ninoyolonotza," is quoted as an example of man's search through the world of the senses for a concept of the ideal. Another, paraphrased in part from the Quetzalcoatl cycle, contains echoes of an ancient fertility myth similar to those of Tammuz and Adonis. The likeness becomes cause for reflection. The promise of rebirth in the Quetzalcoatl legend, if fulfilled, might have destroyed the blood-drinking gods of the Aztecs and so altered the somber history of Anahuac.

Discussion can do no more than suggest the magnificence of the writing in Vision de Anahuac. All of pre-conquest Mexico is seen here, evoked out of a vast and prodigal storehouse of history and legend, every detail viewed through the eyes of a poet conferring impressions of sense and details of fact like a radiant gift The style is in keeping with the theme, language rising from the page to the slow swing of its rhythms and the sudden thrust of its images, a mingling of grace and violence of the concrete and the hauntingly allusive It has been said that Vision de Anahuac set a standard for a new kind of poetry Certainly its auditory and visual effects have been echoed by a number of modern poets Among others, Valery Larbaud and Juan Jose Domenchina have called attention to similarities of tone and style between this prose poem by Alfonso Reyes and the Anabasis of St John Perse It should be pointed out also that Vision de Anahuac is the antecedent work

THE VISION OF WILLIAM, CONCERNING PIERS THE PLOWMAN

Type of work Poem

Author William Langland (c 1332 c 1400)

Time The fourteenth century

Locale England

First transcribed c 1362 c 1377 complete version c 1395

Principal characters

THE POET

PIERS THE PLOWMAN an English plowman who becomes an allegorical figure of Christ incarnate

LADY MEDE, an allegorical figure representing both just reward and bribery

CONSCIENCE

REASON,

THOUGHT,

WIT,

STUDY,

CLERGY,

SCRIPTURE,

FAITH,

HOPE,

CHARITY and other allegorical figures

Like Geoffrey Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, William Langland's The Vision of William, Concerning Piers the Plowman is one of the great vernacular works of the fourteenth century Unlike Chaucer's poetry, however, Langland's work is apparently of and for the people, rather than the court That the poem was popular is attested to by the meter in which it was written and by the fact that more than fifty manuscripts of the poem are still extant Within the manuscripts are three different texts, the second and third being revisions containing additions to the first and earliest The three versions have been dated respectively by scholars at about 1362, 1377, and 1395

Langland's poem is in part a work of social protest, written from the viewpoint of the common man The last half of the fourteenth century was a period of disaster and social unrest the time of severe visitations of the plague (with accompanying moral, social and economic upheavals), of the Peasant Revolt of 1381, and of John Wycliffe's Lollard movement Langland often inserted, on behalf of the common folk, protests against unfair dealings by the crown, the courts, the clergy, and even the tradesmen Being of the common folk himself, the poet recognized the trouble visited upon them, and he cried out bitterly against the cheating of the poor by the butcher, the baker, the miller, and others

Most authorities now grant that the poem was probably written by one man, although some doubt had been expressed in the past on this point Internal evidence indicates the author to be William Langland a recipient of minor orders in the Church and a married man living in London Despite allusions and references to himself and to happenings of the times, however, the author has retained the anonymity typical of the medieval author The alliterative verse much like the metrical structure used in Beowulf and other Anglo Saxon poems was the native style of versification lost when the conventions of our present metrical system were popularized by the court poetry In the hands of medieval writers including Langland the Old English alliterative verse had not the subtlety and power it had once had in the ninth and tenth centuries As used by Langland the measure consisted of lines of any number of syllables divided into half lines Each half line was given two heavy beats in important words with the heavy beats accentuated by alliteration as in such a line as "And wo in winter tyme—with wakyng a nyghtes"

To emphasize the social or metrical aspects of Piers Plowman seems totally unfair to the poem for it is essentially a religious work filled with the religious doctrines, dogma, views, and sentiments of medieval Catholicism In the poem the poet has a series of visions which he relates to the reader each vision concerned with man's relationships to God, relationships which concerned every aspect of life according to medieval thought In the first vision which is probably the best known, the poet dreamed of a vast field of people going about all the tasks and activities of the poet's world The vision was explained to him by a lady named Holy Church, who informed him that the castle at one end of the field was the home of Truth, or God and that in the dungeon in the valley dwelt the Father of Falsehood or Satan When asked by the poet how he might save his soul, the lady replied that he should learn to accept Truth, along with love and pity for his fellow man The poet

then envisioned a long involved sequence in which appeared Lady Mede representing at the same time just reward and bribery A king proposed to marry Lady Mede to Conscience after her rescue from False but Conscience proclaimed against her and refused Bribery it is implied cannot be reconciled with conscience Reason, sent for by the king, promised to serve him too if Conscience would be another counselor One interesting part of this sequence of the poem is Conscience's explanation of Latin grammar, with its declension and agreement of noun and adjective as a symbolic representation of the relationship between man and God The king in the vision demanded a full explanation because as he pointed out, English the only language he knew had no such grammatical relationships

In another vision the poet viewed the seven deadly sins After a sermon by Conscience Piers Plowman offered to show the company the way to Holy Truth but only after he had plowed a half acre field Mentioned in this section are Piers' wife and children Dame Work while I am Able Daughter Do this or thy Dame shall beat thee, and Son Suffer thy Sovereigns to have their Wishes Dare not Judge them for if thou Dost thou shalt Dearly Abide it At the end of this vision Piers Plowman was granted a pardon for himself and his heirs forever

In the next sequence the poet took up Piers Plowman's quest for Truth This quest is divided somewhat ambiguously into three parts searches for Do Well, Do Better, and Do Best To achieve the state of Do Well the poet learned one must fear God, be honest, be obedient, and love one's fellow man this seems to be the task of the ordinary man Do Better the seeming lot of the priest, represents the teaching of the gospel and helping everyone Do Best the seeming lot of the bishop involves everything in the first two categories, as well as the wise administration of the Church to save all souls

Piers Plowman appears again and again in the poem each time being more clearly an incarnation of the Christ. Seen at first as a hardworking sincere and honest plowman Piers later shows up in the poem as the figure who can explain to the poet the Tree of Charity and the nature of the Trinity of God. He appears also as the Good Samaritan and later, as the builder of the Church and the one who will joust in God's armor against Satan. These appearances serve to hold the poem together without them the work would be a too loosely coupled series of episodes and digressions.

Much Biblical lore is presented both from the Old and New Testaments. The events in Eden, Job's trials, the perfidy of Judas, Jesus suffering and crucifixion, along with many other familiar and traditional Christian elements are recorded in the poem. There are digressions on sin and virtue on the nature and value of learning and on the activities of laity and clergy some good and some bad. These individual portions of the poem are beautifully executed and deeply moving. They are probably of more worth when considered by themselves insofar as a present day reader is concerned. To read Piers Plowman in its entirety is tedious, largely because of its rambling qualities, and few general readers will have the patience to do so nowadays even with the help of a translation into modern English.

THE VITA NUOVA

Type of work Poetry with prose comments

Author Dante Alighieri (1265-1321)

First transcribed c. 1292

In that part of the book of my mind before which there would be little to read is found a chapter heading which says: Here begins the new life. It is my intention to copy into this little book the words I find written there if not all of them, at least their essential doctrine.

So begins Dante's Vita Nuova, a celebration in prose and poetry of the great poet's love for Beatrice Portinari. Perhaps it is revealing to realize that this love was a poet's love—that is, Dante's love was not ordinary and practical, leading to forthright pursuit, engagement, marriage, and children. When Dante first saw Beatrice he was nine and she was eight. He was so affected by the sight of her that his "vital spirit" trembled, his "animal spirit" was amazed, and his "natural spirit" wept. At least, this is how it was if we may trust the Vita Nuova.

Dante realized that, whatever a poet's passion, such early love could hardly be convincing to anyone save the victim. After a few more sentences of praise the Vita Nuova proceeds to a description of an encounter nine years after the first, when Beatrice stood between two ladies and greeted Dante. It was the ninth hour of the day and nine had already become a symbol of their love. We do not know what Beatrice said and it probably does not matter; the important thing is that her greeting inspired Dante's first poem of love for Beatrice. We are told that in a dream after being greeted by Beatrice, Dante had a vision of Love holding Beatrice in his arms "nude except for a scanty crimson cloth." Holding forth a fiery object, Love said, "Behold your heart," and shortly thereafter persuaded Beatrice to eat the heart. Then Love wept and ascended toward the heavens with the lady in his arms. This dream is the subject of the poem.

We know from other sources that the poem, a sonnet, was sent to Guido Cavalcanti, who wrote a sonnet in return, initiating a strong friendship between the poets. In the Vita Nuova Dante merely refers to "my first friend" and quotes the beginning of Cavalcanti's sonnet "I think that you beheld all worth"

Dante reports that love so weakened him that everyone noticed that he was not himself. When his glances at Beatrice were misinterpreted as being directed at another lady, Dante, seizing upon the opportunity to disguise the true object of his love, pretended that the other lady was his love, and he wrote several "trifles" for her. When the lady who served as his screen left Florence on a journey, Dante knew that he should pretend to be dismayed. In fact, he was, but not from love: he was upset because his lover's scheming had been frustrated. Despite the complications, the resultant sonnet satisfied Dante, and it is included in the collection. A comparison of the first part of the sonnet with the translation by Mark Musa will give even those ignorant of Italian a sense of Dante's poetic genius.

O voi che per la via d'Amor passate,
Attendete e guardate
S'elli è dolore alcun, quanto 'l mio, grave
E prego sol ch'audir mi sofferiate,
E poi immaginate
S'io son d'ogni tormento ostale e chiave

O you who travel on the road of Love,
Pause here and look about
For any man whose grief surpasses mine
I ask this only: hear me out, then judge
If I am not indeed
Of every torment keeper and shade

Despite the attraction of Dante's poetry, it would be a mistake to take the Vita Nuova as primarily a collection of poems, leaving the prose passages for those interested in biography and the poet's comments on style and intent. The prose passages are charming in themselves, and they reveal an intelligent, sensitive man who is always the poet. Perhaps it is truer to say that Beatrice was for the poems, rather than the poems were for Beatrice. But we cannot say the same of the prose: it is not merely an instrument to provide a setting for the poetry, but together with the poetry it forms an organic work of art. Dante's account of his love is so clear and ingenuous in style that it is only the cold analyst looking back on what he has read who can say that the entire affair was largely a matter of the poet's imagination extravagantly at work. Although it may have been the imagination or the animal spirit that stirred Dante, the effect created convinces that the passion was genuine (as it probably was, however engendered) and under poetic control.

Upon observing the body of a young lady who had died and was being mourned by weeping ladies, Dante suddenly realized that he had seen her in the company of the lady whom he pretended to love in order to hide his love for Beatrice. Although this knowledge means that the departed lady is two times removed from Beatrice, Dante is moved to write two sonnets about death. The first begins, "If Love himself weep, shall not lovers weep / Hearing for what sad cause he pours his tears" and the second begins "Brute death, the enemy of tenderness, / Timeless mother of grief / My tongue consumes itself with cursing you."

Since the lady who had served as Dante's screen had left the city, Dante imagined that Love directed him to another lady in order that, pretending to love her, he might hide his love for Beatrice. This device, celebrated in a sonnet, was so effective that Beatrice herself must have believed the stories concerning him—rumors which he himself initiated—and one day she refused to greet him as he passed by. In the midst of Dante's grief, described in long prose passages, Love again appeared to him and told him to write a poem explaining that it was Love's idea, not Dante's, that he pretend to love someone other than Beatrice.

Several poems which follow work out the implications of Beatrice's refusal to greet him. He explains in a sonnet that

Love is both good and evil—the poet's way of saying that the lover, especially a poetic one like Dante, has difficulty in staying out of trouble

A long canzone, directed to ladies "refined and sensitive in Love," contains some of Dante's most effective passages. Even Love says of Beatrice, "How can flesh drawn from clay/Achieve such purity?" and Dante adds, "She is the highest nature can achieve/And by her mold all beauty tests itself."

After a canzone on the nature of Love ("Love and the gracious heart are but one thing") Dante wrote a sonnet explaining that the power of Love is awakened by Beatrice. This comparatively pleasant and romantic interlude was interrupted by the death of Beatrice's father. Two sonnets recount, with fine poetic elaboration, how Dante wept for her sorrow but it was only after these poetic tasks and after a serious illness during which Dante realized how frail his own existence was that he finally thought, "Some day the most gracious Beatrice will surely have to die." In his delirium he imagined that Beatrice had died and that he called upon Death to take him, then the ladies at his bedside woke him. The result is a long, dramatic canzone in which the events of the dream are told.

One of the most entertaining of the prose sections of the Vita Nuova is Section XXV, in which Dante defends his speaking of Love as if it were a thing in itself, a bodily substance. The defense is as charming as it is sophisticated. He explains that as a poet writing in the vernacular, not in Latin, it is his duty to make what he writes understandable to ladies. Since the vernacular was invented in order to talk about love, poets using the vernacular to write about love enjoy the same privileges granted to the Latin poets. Also, because Latin poets often spoke of inanimate objects as if they were beings—and Dante gives examples from Vergil, Lucan, Horace, and Ovid—Dante, as a vernacular poet writing of love, has the same right to speak of Love as if it were a human being.

In subsequent poems and prose passages Dante celebrates Beatrice's capacity to delight all persons by her presence, he explains how a word from her revives his spirit when it is overcome by Love, and he argues that her power is such that even remembering her is enough to make one feel her influence.

In Section XXVIII Dante reveals that Beatrice has died. He explains that it would not be proper in this book to discuss the canzone he was writing at the time, and he then devotes Section XXIX to a rather involved discussion of the significance of the number nine in connection with Beatrice. We know that Beatrice—who in 1285 had married Simone de' Bardi—died on June 8, 1290. How, then, can Dante read the number nine into the time of her death? He argues that, counting in the Arabian fashion, she departed "during the first hour of the ninth day of the month," and using the Syrian calendar which has a first month corresponding to our October, she departed in the ninth month. Other ingenious calculations are used to argue that Beatrice was a miracle since nine was her number and three is its root and the Trinity is the sole factor of all miracles.

A lengthy canzone tells of Dante's grief, after which he presents a sonnet cleverly devised to express a brother's sorrow in the first half—for Dante later sent the poem to Beatrice's brother—and the poet's own sorrow in the second half. As he tells us in the remarks prefacing the sonnet, only a person examining the sonnet carefully can tell that the dramatic speaker changes.

Dante writes that he was observed while weeping and that the young woman who observed him did so with such compassion that he wrote a sonnet to her. The sonnet was followed by another, and the second by a third, the third a self chastisement for taking such pleasure in writing poetry for the compassionate lady

After a few more sonnets Dante decided that he had better cease writing about Beatrice until he could honor her in his writing as no other lady had ever been honored. We know that this hope was not mere sentiment or poetic falsehood, for Beatrice appears again as one of the most favored of Heaven guiding Dante through the Paradise of The Divine Comedy

The Vita Nuova leaves the reader with an impression of Dante the poetic artist, constructing in his walks about Florence the ideas and lines so charmingly used in his book. Although one may be convinced that much of Dante's love was created by the artist for the sake of his poetry, there is so much skill and poetic grace in his work that the distinction between man and artist no longer seems important.

VOLUPTE

Type of work Novel

Author Charles Augustin Sainte Beuve (1804-1869)

Type of plot Psychological romance

Time of plot Early nineteenth century

Locale France

First published 1832

Principal characters

AMAURY the narrator a man of sensibility

THE MARQUIS DE COUAEN a royalist

MADAME DE COUAEN his wife

AMELIE DE LINTERS a girl in love with Amaury

MADAME R, wife of a royalist sympathizer

Critique

Volupte is partly autobiographical not in its material details but in its psychological content. Sainte Beuve had met with little success in his attempts to write poetry, and he suffered from a lack of self-confidence in spite of his literary friendships with such men as Victor Hugo and Alphonse Lamartine. In addition an affair with Madame Hugo had left him uneasy and confused. The result was that at thirty he experienced a feeling of complete failure. A harsh self-critic he was analyzing himself to discover the causes of his failure. Volupte is actually the transposition in fiction of his process of introspection. The novel baffled Sainte-Beuve's contemporaries, thereby increasing his feeling of insecurity. From that time on he devoted himself exclusively to criticism, in which field he achieved fame.

The Story

On the ship that was taking him to the United States, probably forever, Amaury undertook to tell the story of his life to a young friend. Having renounced his past life to live a new one abroad he was afraid that he might find more pleasure than he should in those past memories but he felt that his experience could prove useful to the young man, in whom he had recognized so many of his own tendencies.

Amaury, having lost his parents had been reared by an uncle in Brittany. In his youth he had been sheltered from the outside world, which at that time was slowly recovering from the effects of the French Revolution. He spent most of his time studying and, prone to dreaming, he was actually more concerned with the adventures of Cyrus, Alexander, and Constantine than he was with the men and events of his own day His Latin teacher was Monsieur Ploa a man abso- lutely devoid of personal ambition only a misinterpretation of Vergil or Cicero could momentarily get him excited Monsieur Ploa had Amaury translate the voluptuous passages of the Aeneid or the odes of Horace with a complete candor which his disciple did not share

When Amaury was about fifteen he spent six weeks at a neighboring castle His life there no longer checked by his regular schedule helped to develop his tendency to melancholy, he would disappear into the woods reciting poetry with tears in his eyes, and he would forget to come back for meals

At the age of eighteen he began visiting friends in the neighborhood He would often visit Monsieur and Madame de Greneuc in whose household lived two granddaughters orphaned during the revolution The older Amélie de Liniers was a charming girl who soon considered herself engaged to him Amaury however, did not feel like settling down in life without first learning something of the world

During a hunting party Amaury met the Marquis de Couaen an influential figure in royalist circles who invited the young man to his castle There Amaury met Madame de Couaen, the Irish wife of the marquis

One day as Amaury, lost in his thoughts, was emerging from the woods, Madame de Couaen called to him from the window and asked him to pick up an ivory needle she had lost When he took it up to her, she asked him if he would, in the absence of her husband, accompany her to the little chapel of Saint-Pierre de Mer before the sun set As they were walking along she explained to Amaury that she was making a pilgrimage for her mother in Ireland from whom she had received bad news

That walk was more or less the beginning of a hopeless love relationship between Amaury and Madame de Couaen, an affair in which his respect for the marquis and the true love of Madame de Couaen for her husband left him with the sole possibility of platonic adoration To escape such a situation he attempted to retire as a hermit on a nearby deserted island which had been once inhabited by Druids but after spending only one night there he abandoned that project He then decided to go to Ireland on a boat that had brought the marquis some secret dispatches he would see Madame de Couaen's mother and possibly establish some useful political connections for the marquis As he was embarking, having left a letter of explanation in his room Madame de Couaen came running to the beach with word that her mother had just died While he was trying to comfort her she tearfully begged him never to get married but to stay with them help her husband and understand her as no one else could

The Marquis de Couaen, having to go to Paris for some political meetings took his wife son and daughter with him in order to avoid raising suspicions, and Amaury accompanied them When they returned to Couaen they found the coast occupied by soldiers

Amaury went to see Amélie who was preparing to follow her grandmother to Normandy When he insisted they ought to delay for two years before making a decision concerning their future, Amélie simply asked him to be prudent

On his way home Amaury learned that the marquis had been arrested in Paris he rushed immediately to Couaen to destroy some papers before the police officers would arrive there Without objection or thanks, Madame de Couaen accepted his help, and the next day they left for Paris with the two children There Amaury communicated with Monsieur D and Monsieur R in an effort to secure their help

Meanwhile, the marquis was allowed to receive visitors, and his wife went to see him every day Amaury spent every evening with her At the same time he was beginning to feel attracted to Madame

R, a lonely and disillusioned woman who often visited Madame de Couaen. Having decided also to experience physical love with a prostitute, Amaury accomplished his purpose but with no real pleasure.

In the midst of these circumstances Amaury could see no future for himself. He became involved in a royalist conspiracy, more to find self fulfillment in a chivalric cause than to satisfy any political convictions. Faced with imminent action, he realized that his position might endanger the future of the marquis, bring grief to Madame de Couaen, and show ingratitude toward Monsieur R and Monsieur D. Fortunately, his secret political involvement was never disclosed.

When the marquis was sent to Blois, Amaury did not accompany his friends, although they had wanted him to come with them. Left in Paris, he visited Madame R and wrote to Blois, where the royalist political leaders were being tried. Madame R, while refusing to become his mistress, liked to be seen with him in public and demanded the most foolish proofs of his attachment. They never really trusted one another, and she was always jealous of his love for Madame de Couaen.

A letter from the marquis having announced the death of his son and the alarming state of his wife's health, the nobleman asked for a two week pass to bring her to Paris for medical attention. Madame de Couaen, who considered the death of her son a punishment for her own weakness, was unhappy to discover the relationship between Amaury and Madame R.

On a day when Amélie came to visit Madame de Couaen, Madame R was also present, and Amaury realized that his instability had caused the unhappiness of three women. Caught in his youth in the web of illegitimate love, he had been unable to choose either true virtue or carefree disorder. He never saw Amélie again.

Back in Blois Madame de Couaen sent him a medallion of her mother and a souvenir of her son. Shortly afterward he ended his affair with Madame R. Years later he was to hear that Monsieur R had received a post of importance and that Madame R had become the mother of a son.

Having thus reached the bottom of a moral abyss, Amaury enlisted in the army with the idea of finding death on the battlefield. He arrived at Austerlitz only after the battle had been won. Convinced that there was no place for him in society, he decided to become a priest.

Several years later, after he had taken holy orders, he decided to visit again his uncle's farm and the castle at Couaen. Having received no news from Blois for several weeks, he was afraid that Madame de Couaen's health had not improved. On his arrival at Couaen he was surprised to find a flurry of activity. His friends had returned the day before. Although Madame de Couaen was very weak, she welcomed him warmly, adding that someone might soon need his assistance. As her condition became worse, Amaury administered the rites of absolution and extreme unction. Madame de Couaen died soon afterward and was buried in the chapel of Saint Pierre de Mer.

This experience and the emotions it called forth proved extremely trying on Amaury, who immediately left Brittany and, a short time later, France. He hoped to find abroad some peace in obscure but useful activities.

WAITING FOR GODOT

Type of work Drama
Author Samuel Beckett (1906)
Type of plot Tragi comedy
Time of plot The present
Locale A country road
First presented 1952

Principal characters

VLADIMIR, a tramp
ESTRAGON another tramp
POZZO a success blinded materialist
LUCKY, Pozzo's servant
A Boy a messenger from Godot

Critique

In this play Beckett expresses his personal view of the human condition through symbolism which has its roots in Freudian psychology, the Christian myth and Existentialist philosophy. Although the action is negligible and there is no development of character, this play, when sensitively produced, is excellent theater. The two tramps are continually aware of pain, hunger, and cold yet they joke about these things. They vacillate between hope and despair, they are obsessed by uncertainty and dominated by the absurd. Their lives, and we infer all life, is somehow meaningful because of their persistence, despite seeming hopelessness, and because of their refusal to be destroyed.

The Story

Estragon tried to take off his boot but failed. Vladimir agreed with him that it sometimes appeared that there was nothing one could do. They were glad to be reunited after a night apart. With Vladimir's help Estragon succeeded in removing his painful boot. Vladimir, also in pain, could not laugh in comfort, he tried smiling instead but it was not satisfactory.

Vladimir mused on the one gospel account that said Christ saved one of the thieves. Estragon wanted to leave. They could not leave because they were waiting for Godot. They became confused about the arrangements and wondered if they were waiting at the right time, in the right place, and on the right day. They quarreled briefly but were, as always, reconciled.

They considered hanging themselves but decided that it would be safer to do nothing until they heard what Godot said. They did not know what they had asked Godot for. They concluded they had foregone their rights.

Vladimir gave Estragon a carrot which he ate hungrily. They decided that although they were not bound to Godot, they were in fact unable to act.

Pozzo entered, driving Lucky, who was laden with luggage, by a rope around his neck. Estragon and Vladimir mistook him for Godot but accepted him as Pozzo. Although he attempted to intimidate them he was glad of their company. After ordering Lucky to bring him his stool and his coat, he gave Lucky the whip. Lucky obeyed automatically. Vladimir and Estragon protested violently against Pozzo's treatment of Lucky. Pozzo deflected their outburst and the subject was dropped.

After smoking a pipe Pozzo rose. He then decided he did not want to leave, but his pride almost prevented him from reseating himself. The tramps wanted to know why Lucky never put down the luggage. Pozzo said that Lucky was try-

WAITING FOR GODOT by Samuel Beckett. Translated by the author. By permission of the publishers, Grove Press, Inc. Copyright 1954 by Grove Press, Inc.

ing to make him keep the fellow When Pozzo added that he would sell Lucky rather than throw him out, Lucky wept but when Estragon tried to dry his tears, Lucky kicked him away Then Estragon wept Pozzo philosophized on this and said that Lucky had taught him all the beautiful things he knew, but that the fellow had now become unbearable and was driving Pozzo mad Estragon and Vladimir then abused Lucky for mistreating his master

Pozzo broke into a monologue on the twilight, alternating between the lyrical and the commonplace and ending with the bitter thought that everything happened in the world when one was least prepared He decided to reward Estragon and Vladimir for praising him by making Lucky entertain them Lucky executed a feeble dance which Estragon mocked but failed to imitate

Estragon stated that there had been no arrivals, no departures, and no action, and that everything was terrible Pozzo next decided that Lucky should think for them For this Vladimir replaced Lucky's derby hat Lucky's thought was an incoherent flood of words which resembled a dissertation on the possible goodness of God, the tortures of hell fire, the prevalence of sport, and the vacuity of suburbs He desperately upset his listeners, who attacked him and silenced him by seizing his hat Having restored Lucky to his position as carrier, Pozzo and the tramps said many farewells before he and Lucky finally left

The Boy called to Vladimir and Estragon He came with a message from Godot, who would come the next evening The Boy, a goatherd, said that Godot was kind to him, but that he beat his brother, a shepherd Vladimir asked the Boy to tell Godot only that he had seen them

By the time the Boy left, night had fallen Estragon decided to abandon his boots to someone else Vladimir protested and Estragon said that Christ had gone barefoot Once again they considered and rejected the idea of separating They decided to leave for the night They stayed where they were

The following evening the boots were still there and the tree had grown some leaves The tramps had spent the night separately Vladimir returned first When Estragon came back he said he had been beaten again and Vladimir felt that he could have prevented such cruelty Vladimir began to talk of the previous day, but Estragon could remember nothing but being kicked Then they were overwhelmed by the thought of the whispering voices of the dead around them They tried to break their silence but succeeded only in part By a great effort Estragon recalled that the previous day had been spent chattering inanities He reflected that they had spent fifty years doing no more than that

They discovered that the boots left behind by Estragon had been exchanged for another old pair After finding Lucky's hat, which assured them that they had returned to the right place they started a wild exchange of the three hats shifting them from hand to hand Finally Vladimir kept Lucky's hat and Estragon kept his own

Once more Estragon decided to leave To distract him, Vladimir suggested that they 'play' Pozzo and Lucky Puzzled, Estragon left but he returned almost immediately because some people were coming Vladimir was jubilant convinced that Godot was arriving They tried to hide but there was nowhere for them to go Finally Lucky entered with Pozzo, who was now blind Lucky fell and dragged Pozzo with him Pozzo cried for help Vladimir passionately wished to act while there was the opportunity—to do one good thing as a member of the human race, a species that appalled him Pozzo was terrified, and Vladimir also fell in his attempts to raise him Estragon fell too while trying to lift Vladimir As they fought and argued on the ground, they called Pozzo "Cain" and "Abel" When he responded to both names they concluded that he was all humanity Sud denly they got up without difficulty

Pozzo prepared to leave, but Vladimir wanted Lucky to sing first. Pozzo explained that Lucky was dumb. They wanted to know when he had been afflicted. Angry, Pozzo said that all their lives were merely momentary and time did not matter. He left with Lucky.

While Estragon slept, the Boy entered to say that Godot would come, not that night but the next. The message for Godot was that the Boy had seen Vladimir. The Boy left and Estragon awoke. He immediately wanted to leave Vladimir insisted that they could not go far because they must return the next night in order to wait for Godot, who would punish them if they did not wait.

Estragon and Vladimir remarked that only the tree in the landscape was alive and considered hanging themselves again. Instead, they decided that if Godot did not come to save them the next night, they would hang themselves. At last the tramps decided to go. They remained immobile.

THE WANDERING SCHOLAR FROM PARADISE

Type of work Drama

Author Hans Sachs (1494-1576)

Type of plot Farce

Time of plot Sixteenth century

Locale Nuremberg, Germany

First presented 1550

Principal characters

THE FARMER a crude peasant

HIS WIFE an ignorant dreaming hausfrau

THE STUDENT a quick-witted young man, more adventurer than scholar

Critique

This bucolic farce is a Fastnachtspiel, a type of short play given about the countryside on the night before fasting, or the night before Ash Wednesday. Its form is rhyming couplets and it is presented in one act with scene changes indicated only by momentary closing and opening of the curtain. The typical subjects treated in this sort of play, written specifically for simple, rough production by wandering players, were burgher life, infidelity and peasant stupidity. Some were uncomplicated comedy; others, artful satire. Plot was negligible. The humor in this play is both bold and fine. Almost every line, if read separately, has at least a double or hidden meaning. Throughout most of the play the humor is so broad that few, if any, readers or listeners can miss it. Hans Sachs was an artist in this form of writing. His characters were delineated by exaggerations easily recognizable by the audiences of his day. With economy of words, characters, properties, and scenery, he was able to establish and sustain a mood. His manner of expression, not the story, makes his writing palatable to the modern reader. A prolific writer, he wrote more than four thousand master songs for the Nuremberg school, about two thousand fables and tales in verse, and 208 plays. His stature as a writer is reflected in his being one of the principal characters in Wagner's Die Meistersinger.

The Story

A wife of Nuremberg claimed to all and sundry that her deceased first husband was still her true love and her second husband no lover at all. She described him as scrumpy, mean, and sour of disposition. One day, while she was voicing her complaints, a wandering Student came by, doffed his hat in a polite gesture, and begged for alms. Rightly guessing that boasts about his successes in Paris would impress the dame, he quickly used the advantage the Wife gave him when, hearing incorrectly, she thought that he had said he came from Paradise.

THE WANDERING SCHOLAR FROM PARADISE by Hans Sachs from LITTLE THEATER CLASSICS, edited by Samuel Eliot, Jr. Translated by Samuel Eliot, Jr. By permission of Samuel Eliot, Jr. Published by Little Brown & Co. Copyright 1922 by Little Brown & Co. Renewed. All rights reserved.

The Wife's mind still rambling among her dreams of her first husband, she asked the Student if he knew the departed one. The Student granted that he did not, but he thought that perhaps on his return to Paradise the acquaintance would be effected. The Wife accepted the Student's offer to take gifts back to her husband, after the Student had caught her sympathy with his description of how ill clothed, ill fed, and completely destitute her late husband was.

As the Student prepared to leave, the Wife inquired when he might come again, bringing word of her first love. He earnestly assured her that the road was long and difficult and that he would not be likely to pass her way again. Without delay and with a minimum of ceremony, the Student took her gifts and strode off—and none too soon, for the Farmer appeared just as the young man was taking his departure.

The Wife again sang the love song that she had been singing just before meeting the Student, but this time she sang happily, as her husband noticed. Naively she told him of the visitor who had brought her happiness and of her having sent gifts to her first love. Craftily concealing his anger at her simplicity, the Farmer sarcastically ordered her to prepare more gifts that he might take them to the Student as additional presents to the man who, though dead, retained her devotion. Laden, he went off in search of the Student.

In a rough slough the Student was quickly stuffing his booty into the bushes when he heard the Farmer approaching. With cunning and a veil of innocent helpfulness, he directed the Farmer deeper into the furze, where he claimed help the Farmer by holding his horse while he went on his search. When the Farmer was out of sight, the Student rode off on the horse, with the Farmer's and the Wife's contributions across the saddle. Meanwhile, the Farmer stumbled through the slough, muddier and more scratched with each step in his vain effort to find the offending traveler from Paradise.

At the cottage, the Wife was peering into the distance for some sign of the Farmer. Her chief concern was that her husband might be lost in the mist on the moor and unable to overtake the Student to add to her gifts. Her doubts vanished as the Farmer trudged in slowly and wearily, hoping against hope that his horse had run home ahead of him. Not seeing the animal, he accepted the rude truth that he had been duped. What could he do or say to the Wife—the stupid one, the gullible one—whom he had intended to beat for giving away a few farthings and some worn out clothes? She was indeed a lesser fool than he who had lost his swiftest horse.

Stirred to activity in an effort to ease her husband's anger, the Wife carried in the milk pails and asked about the success of his search. The Farmer mumbled a halting explanation about his altruism, he had decided, he said, to make a gift of his horse to the Student, since the young man was tired and had far to go.

The Wife was overwhelmed by her husband's unexpected kindness. For his thoughtfulness in behalf of her first husband, she promised that were he to die that night, she would send him all manner of presents in Paradise. Such a generous husband should have the good will of his neighbors, she declared, and she proceeded to circulate the story of her husband's generosity throughout the parish.

But man is not to be pleased. The angry Farmer decided that it was bad enough to be burdened with such a wife, it was unbearable, however, to think that his neighbors considered him the same ned people were to get along, they must let others see a flaw in the bonds of wed cover for each other's weaknesses and not lock

WASHINGTON SQUARE

Type of work Novel

Author Henry James (1843 1916)

Type of plot Psychological realism

Time of plot About 1850

Locale New York City

First published 1881

Principal characters

DR SLOPER a prominent New York doctor

CATHERINE SLOPER his daughter

MRS PENNIMAN his sister

MORRIS TOWNSEND, Catherine's suitor

Critique

The publication of Washington Square marked the end of what has been called the first period of its author's work. At that time Henry James was still twenty or more years away from the three great novels which climaxed his artistic efforts: The Wings of the Dove (1902), The Ambassadors (1903), and The Golden Bowl (1904). In spite of its early date and its differences from these later and more ambitious books, however, Washington Square has been called a work of great genius. The plot of the book, simple as it is, still appeals to a considerable audience. Nor are its merits visible, as in some other novels of James, only to readers of intellectual pretensions. A short novel, with a style much less involved than that which James was later to develop, Washington Square can be read in two or three hours. It is one of the few of the author's earlier works with scenes laid in America. It is also one of the few which are not preoccupied with the contrast existing between the civilization of Europe and that of America. Laid in New York City around the middle of the nineteenth century, it explores a family situation ruffling the peace of a rich and respected New York physician.

The Story

Peace, especially of the domestic variety, was becoming increasingly important to Dr. Sloper as he entered his fifties. Intelligent, poised, distinguished in his profession, he was accustomed to meeting life on his own terms. Not entirely unscarred by fate, he had suffered the loss of his wife and a young son many years before, but the passage of time had helped to soften even this blow. Now he dwelt quietly and comfortably in his mansion on Washington Square with his only remaining child, his daughter Catherine, and his widowed sister, Mrs. Penniman.

Neither of these companions, oddly enough, inspired the doctor with any great fondness. His sister had just the sort of nature, incurably romantic and deviously feminine, to set his teeth on edge; he saw her presence in his establishment as merely an inconvenience to be overlooked in the interest of providing female supervision of his growing daughter. Nor, regarding the daughter herself, was Dr. Sloper any less candid in his private appraisal. Catherine was a good girl, he thought, but incurably dull. Entering her twenties, she had never had a romantic interest or a prospect of any. She was shyly fond of her father and very much afraid of him, especially when an ironical tone crept into his voice. However, he was generally kind and courteous to her, even if more self-contained than an adorning daughter might always wish.

Catherine's taste for ornate dress was one of the characteristics which her father found especially trying. She had long cherished this taste without venturing to express it, but when she reached the age of twenty she bought a red satin gown trimmed with gold fringe. It made her look like a woman of thirty, and her father inwardly grimaced at the thought that a child of his should be both ugly and overdressed.

Catherine was wearing her red gown on the evening when she first met Morris Townsend. The occasion was a party, given by her aunt, Mrs. Almond. Catherine became quickly convinced that she had never met a young man so handsome, clever, and attentive. When his absorption with Catherine began to attract notice, Townsend quickly shifted his attentions to Mrs. Penniman, whose romantic sensibilities were soon af flutter with delight and anticipation. Before the evening ended, she had managed to intimate to this agreeable young man that he would be welcome to call in Washington Square.

The visit soon occurred, to be quickly followed by another, and presently young Townsend was in regular attendance upon Catherine. This development was far from unobserved by the other two members of the household, though their reactions were entirely different. Mrs. Penniman, undertaking the role of a middle-aged Cupid, pressed Townsend's claims and assisted his cause as ardently as she dared. Dr. Sloper, on the other hand, became first skeptical and then concerned. An interview with the young man strengthened his conviction that Townsend's charming manner was only a mask for irresponsibility and selfishness. He suspected that Townsend was living off the meager resources of the latter's sister, a widow with five children, and the doctor determined to investigate the matter. Before he could do so, however, Catherine brought him word that Morris Townsend had proposed to her and that she was anxious to accept him.

His suspicions confirmed by a talk with Mrs. Montgomery, Townsend's sister, the doctor came away from his call more convinced than ever that Catherine's young man was a fortune hunter. For once, however, his objections failed to sway the infatuated girl. As a last resort Dr. Sloper declared that if Catherine married Townsend he would disinherit her. This measure would not leave her penniless by any means, since an inheritance from her mother would still supply her with a comfortable income. Nevertheless it would reduce by two thirds, the amount Catherine could eventually expect, and the doctor's announcement gave both Townsend and Mrs. Penniman, also the object of her brother's displeasure, something to think about.

Mrs. Penniman, alarmed, counseled delay, and Townsend agreed to part with Catherine while she accompanied her father to Europe. Both Townsend and Mrs. Penniman hoped that the passage of time would soften the doctor's obdurate opposition to the match. Catherine, while agreeing to make the trip, cherished no such illusions. After several months the travelers returned, but the situation remained unchanged. Catherine was determined to go ahead with the marriage, Townsend kept putting her off. Suddenly he vanished from New York altogether.

Years passed before she saw him again. In the meantime Dr. Sloper had died, and, fearful to the end that Townsend might re-enter Catherine's life, had left his own fortune to charity. One night while Catherine was sitting quietly at home, there was a ring at the door. Morris Townsend had come back, secretly encouraged by the unwearied Mrs. Penniman. Bearded, heavier, and forty-five years of age, he was still fluent and personable. His whole manner made it clear that he expected to be made welcome in Washington Square. The lapse of twenty years might have taken much from him, including the European wife of whom Catherine had vaguely heard, but he had not lost the bright assurance with which he now waited for his words to work their old-time magic on Catherine's heart.

He stood, hat in hand, murmuring his warm phrases, but Catherine did not ask him to sit down. She looked at him as if he were a stranger, repelling all advances and brushing off all explanations with a cool imperturbability which would have been worthy of the old doctor himself.

With Catherine there was no longer any question of yielding to his charm; she had suffered too much. This time it would be she who sent him away, and she gave him his dismissal with a finality which he had no choice but to accept and understand.

THE WASPS

Type of work Drama

Author Aristophanes (c. 448 c. 385 B.C.)

Type of plot Social satire

Time of plot Fifth century B.C.

Locale Athens

First presented 422 B.C.

Principal characters

PHILOCLEON, an Athenian

BDELYCLEON, his son

SOSIAS, and

XANTHIAS, slaves of Philocleon

CHORUS OF WASPS

Critique

Although not generally considered one of Aristophanes' best plays, The Wasps does afford a very good example of the wit and artistry of Greek comedy. Here the author satirizes the abuses of the jury courts of Athens which, through the charging of admissions, provided the chief means of support of a large number of citizens. The subject matter is foreign to the modern reader, however, and the play necessarily loses some of the comic charm and sharp humor that it must have held for the Athenians. It was imitated in more modern times by Racine, in his Les Plaideurs.

The Story

Because he was afflicted with a constant desire to judge and to convict the people brought before the courts of Athens, Philocleon was locked up in his own house by his son, Bdelycleon, who had previously tried all rational means of persuading his father to give up his mania and become a gentleman. Bdelycleon now resorted to a net cast around the house in order to keep his father from leaving. Two slaves, Sosias and Xanthias, were set to guard the house, and Bdelycleon, as an added precaution, watched from the roof.

The three men were kept busy thwarting Philocleon's attempts to escape. He tried to crawl out through the chimney, threatened to chew his way through the net, and, at last, was almost successful when he crawled beneath the belly of his ass, in the manner of Odysseus, and then insisted that the beast be taken out and sold. The ass moaned and groaned so intently, however, that Xanthias noticed the concealed burden. Philocleon was caught and thrust back into the house just before the other jurymen, the Wasps, arrived to escort him to the courts.

When the Wasps arrived, Philocleon appeared at an upper window, told them of his plight and begged them to help him find some means of escape. Between them they decided that his only hope was to gnaw through the net and then lower himself to the ground. In this manner Philocleon had all but regained his freedom when Bdelycleon, who, worn out with watching, had fallen asleep, awoke and again detained him. Although the Wasps quickly came to the aid of their friend, they were no match for the stones and clubs used against them by Bdelycleon and the two slaves, and they were soon driven back.

In the argument that followed Bdelycleon explained that he simply wanted his father to lead the joyous, easy life of an old man, rather than concern himself constantly with the tyranny and conspiracy of the courts. He argued convincingly enough to force Philocleon into a debate on the merits of his profession. Philocleon agreed that if Bdelycleon could convince the Wasps, who were to act as judges, that a public career was disreputable then he would give it up. The old man, speaking first, defended the jury system on the basis of the pleasures and benefits that he personally derived from it. Bdelycleon, on the other hand, proved that the jurists were no more than the slaves of the rulers, who themselves received the bulk of the revenue that should have gone to feed the hungry people.

Philocleon, along with the Chorus, was converted by Bdelycleon's persuasive argument. Because Philocleon felt that he could not live without judging, however, Bdelycleon consented to allow him to hold court at their home: he was to be allowed to judge the slaves and all other things about the house. This solution had the added advantage, as Bdelycleon carefully pointed out, of allowing the judge to eat and drink and enjoy all the comforts of home at the same time that he was following his profession.

Philocleon agreed to this solution and all the paraphernalia of a court were quickly assembled and the first case was called. Labes, one of the household dogs, was accused of stealing and devouring a Sicilian cheese all by himself, having refused to share it with any other animal. Bdelycleon himself undertook the defense of Labes and pleaded for mercy, but Philocleon felt it his duty as a judge to convict everyone and everything that was brought into his court. His son, however, tricked his father into acquitting the dog, an act that was foreign to his very nature.

Philocleon then felt that he had betrayed the one thing sacred to him and that he was, therefore, no longer capable of judging. Bdelycleon's problems were apparently solved at this point, for his father agreed to live a happy and carefree life. But such a plan entailed changing Philocleon's whole mode of being. His manner of dress, his speech—everything about him had to change, in short, he needed to acquire at least some of the elementary social skills. He was to learn how to walk, how to recline at dinner, what to talk about in order to appear a gentleman of leisure.

After a short period of training Bdelycleon took his father to a dinner party where Philocleon quickly proved that he was as much a hard-headed old man as ever. He drank and ate too much, he insulted both his host and the other guests, he beat the slaves who waited on him, and, finally, he ran off with a nude flute girl. On his way home with the girl he struck everyone that he encountered.

By the time Philocleon arrived home, he naturally had a large following, all anxious to accuse him and bring him before those very courts he had so recently abandoned. He tried to appease the people by telling them stories that he had just learned and by using his other social skills, but to no avail, everyone clamored for justice. Philocleon, paying no attention to their cries, continued to talk and act as if he were far above such plebeian concerns. Bdelycleon, who had hurried after his father, finally caught up with him and again used force to get him into the house. This time Bdelycleon was unable to keep the old man there. Philocleon immediately returned to the streets, now determined to prove his dancing skill, and led off the Chorus in a licentious, drunken dance.

THE WASTE LAND

Type of work Poem

Author T S Eliot (1888)

First published 1922

By the early 1920's the "New Poetry" or the "Poetic Renaissance" usually dated from 1912, had spent much of its initial force. The Imagists had come and gone, the reputations of Frost, Masters and Sandburg had been established. What ever was original in the new poetry—and, viewed in retrospect, this originality was not nearly so great as it then seemed—had been accomplished. It was time for American poetry to take a new direction.

T S Eliot had already published two small volumes in 1917 and 1920 but he had not attracted a great deal of attention—not so much as had Amy Lowell or Vachel Lindsay for example. In the early editions of Louis Untermeyer's Modern American Poetry, a book which was then very influential and which well represented the critical evaluations of that period, he was briefly dismissed as a "brilliant expatriate" whose work lacked "the exaltation which is the very breath of poetry." He was allowed "a certain per verse brilliance", but his work was finally summed up as merely "mordant light verse, complex and disillusioned vers de societe."

The Waste Land first appeared in The Dial and having won that magazine's poetry award for the year, was published in book form in 1922. It may truthfully be said that seldom has a poet created such a sensation in the American literary world. To many readers, it seemed a deliberate hoax, perhaps the appearance, in 1916, of Spectra, by "Morgan and Knish," had left some critics with an abiding fear of again being caught out on a limb. The most common charge hurled by those who took the poem seriously was that of willful obscurantism—that the poet was deliberately making his work difficult for his readers when he could have written in a simpler fashion. The eleven pages of notes appended to a poem of but 430 lines only made matters worse, surely Eliot was pulling the reader's leg or he was piling obscurity on obscurity.

The truth of the matter was that the "New Poetry" of 1912 had not prepared the average reader for Eliot's peculiar style. The poets of the preceding decade had expanded the subject matter and vocabulary of poetry and they had substituted free verse for traditional poetic forms but they had not greatly altered the conventionalities of poetic statement. To put it simply, their verse was not hard to understand, even though its form might be unusual. But Eliot, influenced by the English metaphysicals and the French Symbolists, had broken more sharply with nineteenth century poetry than had any of his contemporaries and had achieved a genuinely new, though very difficult, style. The recent remark of A Alvarez applies particularly to him: "a great deal of modern poetry seems often as specialized as modern science, both require a degree of single minded preparedness to which the general public is neither willing nor able to attain."

Eliot's verse has been subjected to such exhaustive critical analysis that the interested reader will find ample exegesis of almost every line, including translations of the phrases in half a dozen foreign languages and identifications of the quotations and echoes of English verse, all of which the poet used for their evocative effect. Eliot himself explained in his notes that the "plan and a good deal of the incidental symbolism of the poem"

THE WASTE LAND by T S Eliot Excerpts from COLLECTED POEMS 1909-1935 by T S Eliot copyright 1936, by Harcourt Brace & Co., Inc. Used by permission of the publishers Harcourt Brace & Co., Inc.

came from the Grail Legend and Sir James Frazer's The Golden Bough. This anthropological material deals with certain vegetation fertility rites in which the god—Adonis, Attis, Osiris—must be slain each year so that by his death the land can again become fruitful, hence, the prevalence throughout the poem of images of drought and of water: the “dry sterile thunder” contrasted with the rain that restores life to the parched earth. This theme of sterility is applied to modern civilization which is dying of spiritual drought.

The poem opens with a picture of this modern world, a picture made up of broken fragments of idle conversation. And

What are the roots that clutch, what branches grow
Out of this stony rubbish?

Nothing can grow from this sterile civilization, from these unreal great cities where the living seem already dead, where “I had not thought death had undone so many”—Dante’s exclamation on first seeing the crowds of the Futile, rejected by both Hell and Heaven, for they had lived “without blame and without praise.” This is the modern mass man. We then are given one of the several sharp contrasts between the past and the present: the deliberately rich description (with its echoes of Antony and Cleopatra), perhaps of the Renaissance, set against the equally deliberately banal scene in a pub. In the third section the same device is employed: the vulgar seduction of the typist by the “small house agent’s clerk” (love in the modern world reduced to a meaningless mechanical act) contrasted with the glimpse of Elizabeth and Leicester sailing on Spenser’s “sweet Thames.” All of this is seen by Tiresias who, Eliot tells us, is the most important personage in the poem because, having experienced life as both a man and a woman, he can unite all the characters. In the last section, according to the author’s notes, the themes are “the journey to Emmaus, the approach to the Chapel Perilous and the present decay of eastern Europe”—that is, the disintegration of secular society which can be saved only by the King who sacrifices himself that his land may revive (“Shall I at least set my lands in order?”), the Risen Christ who, having died for his people, will bring them to a new life. Thus the poem ends on a profoundly religious note.

Just as one critic will write of the irony of the poem and another claim that its method is the obverse of irony so there are many interpretations of individual lines and, indeed, of whole passages. Yet clearly the “Waste Land” is the modern great city inhabited by those for whom contemporary life provides only “a heap of broken images” and “fear in a handful of dust.” It is a civilization dying of spiritual drought. The poem is an enormously complex one, making great demands upon the reader, yet the importance of its theme and the brilliance of its technique give it rank as one of the most significant literary works of our time.

THE WEALTH OF NATIONS

Type of work Economic treatise
Author Adam Smith (1723-1790)
First published 1776

The classic statement of economic liberalism, the policy of laissez faire, was written over a ten year period by Adam Smith, a Scottish professor of moral philosophy, and published under the title

An Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations. Its power derived from its ideas which were useful in encouraging the rise of new business enterprise in Europe, but the ideas could not have taken hold so readily had it not been for the scope of Smith's work and the effectiveness of his style

As a philosopher, Smith was interested in finding intellectual justification for certain economic principles which he came to believe, but as an economist and writer he was interested in making his ideas prevail in the world of business. He was reacting against oppressive systems of economic control which were restricting the growth of business but although he concerned himself with general principles and their practical application, he was aware of the value of the individual, whether employer or laborer. There is no reason to believe Smith would have sanctioned monopolistic excesses of big business or any unprincipled use of the free enterprise philosophy.

Smith began his work with the assumption that whatever a nation consumes is either the product of the annual labor of that nation or what is purchased with the products of labor. The wealth of the nation depends upon the proportion of the produce to the consumers and that proportion depends partly upon the proportion of those who are employed to those who are not, but even more on the skill of the workers and the efficiency of the means of distribution.

Book I of The Wealth of Nations considers the question of how the skill of the laborers can best be increased, II is a study of capital stock, since it is argued that the proportion of workers to non-laborers is a function of the amount of capital stock available. III explains how Europe came to emphasize the industry of the towns at the expense of agriculture, IV presents various economic theories, some stressing the importance of industry in the towns, others, the importance of agriculture, and V considers the revenue of the sovereign, or commonwealth, with particular attention paid to the sources of that revenue and the consequences of governmental debt.

In Smith's view, the productive power of labor is increased most readily by the division of labor, for by giving each worker a specific job to do he becomes more skillful, time is saved, and machinery is invented which further speeds the rate of production. Smith believed that as a result of the increase in production which followed the division of labor, a well governed community was able to enjoy a "universal opulence which extends itself to the lowest ranks of people."

Smith regarded the division of labor as a necessary consequence of the human propensity to trade or exchange one thing for another. The propensity to trade is itself a consequence of a more fundamental human trait: self-love. Thus for Smith the basic motivating force of any economic system, including successful ones, is the self-interest of each person involved in the system.

Money originates as a means of facilitating exchange when the products of those who wish to barter are not desired by those with whom they choose to trade. To use Smith's example: if a butcher has all the bread and beer he needs, he will not accept more bread or beer in exchange for meat. But if the man with bread or beer can exchange it elsewhere for money—whether it be shells, tobacco, salt, or cattle, or the most favored medium of exchange, metal—he can then use the money to buy meat from the butcher.

Among the most important ideas in The Wealth of Nations is Smith's claim that labor is the real measure of the exchangeable value of commodities. Commodities have a value in use, but for the producer this value becomes unimportant, and he seeks to exchange what he has made for something that he needs. The amount of work he can purchase with his commodity is the real exchangeable value of that commodity. Thus, Smith defines wealth as the power of purchasing labor. The nominal, as distinguished from the real, price of commodities is their money value.

Smith defined natural price as the average price of a commodity in a community, and market price as the actual selling price. He presents the familiar principle of supply and demand by stating that market price increases when the quantity of a commodity brought to market falls short of the demand.

Wherever there is perfect liberty the advantages and disadvantages of different uses of labor and stock must be either equal or tending to equality, according to Smith. However, there are counterbalancing circumstances which affect equality: the agreeableness of the job, the cost of learning the business, the constancy of employment, the amount of trust that must be put in the employee, and the probability of success.

Smith makes a distinction between productive and unproductive labor. Labor is productive when it adds to the value of something, unproductive when it does not. The labor of a manufacturer adds to the value of the material which is used, but the labor of a menial servant adds nothing to the value of the employer whom he serves. This distinction is important because it is by reference to the proportion of productive to unproductive labor that capital is explained.

There are four ways of using capital: for purchasing raw materials, for manufacturing, for transportation, and for distribution.

Adam Smith was confident that he could discover the natural order of economic matters, but to later critics it has appeared that he was mistaking his own preferred kind of economic situation for that which would prevail if economic relations among men were in no way affected by social habit. His inclination was to regard what would prevail in a civilized community free from governmental restraint as the natural state of affairs. This view is acceptable when he says, for example, "According to the natural course of things, therefore, the greater part of the capital of every growing society is, first, directed to agriculture, afterwards to manufactures, and last of all to foreign commerce", but the following account of rent is more provocative: "Rent, considered as the price paid for the use of land, is naturally the highest which the tenant can afford to pay in the actual circumstances of the land." However, Smith wrote without any obvious interest in supporting one economic class against another, and his definitions of "natural" price, rent, and other economic factors are couched in neutral terms.

Smith's experiences as a teacher and philosopher are reflected most clearly in his account "Of the Expence of the Institutions for the Education of Youth." He is rather bitter about the quality of education when the teacher is not driven by economic necessity to do his best. In situations where the professor is responsible only to his colleagues, they are likely to allow one another to neglect their duties as teachers. The result is that "In the university of Oxford, the greater part of the public professors have, for these many years, given up altogether even the pretense of teaching." Smith favored giving the student a considerable part to play in the selection and retention of teachers, and he warned that if this were not done, the professors would devise ways of giving "sham lectures" and would force their students to attend regularly and keep silent.

Smith thought that the wealthy and wellborn could see to the education of their young, but that the state should support education for those who could not otherwise afford it. He argued that it was important, particularly in free countries, that the public be educated in order to exercise the art of judgment.

In considering the revenue of the state, Smith proceeded on the principle that whatever expense was beneficial to the whole society could justly be defrayed by the general contribution of the whole society. Thus defending the society, supporting the chief magistrate, administering justice, maintaining good roads and communications, supporting state institutions or public works, and, under certain circumstances, defraying the expenses of educational institutions and institutions for religious instruction are all properly supported by general contribution of the whole society

Support of the institutions and activities of the state must come either from some fund belonging to the state or from the revenue of the people. Smith considers three sources of the revenue of individuals: rent, profit, and wages. His discussion of taxes is based upon four maxims: 1. The taxpayer ought to be taxed according to his ability to pay as determined by his revenue. 2. The tax should be certain in the sense that there should be no question as to the time, manner or quantity of payment. 3. Taxes should be levied in a convenient manner, e.g., taxes on consumer goods are paid for when the goods are bought. 4. The tax should be economical in the sense that it should not be expensive to collect.

Adam Smith's The Wealth of Nations is a temperate, thorough, and even engrossing analysis of the economic facts of life in a free industrial society. In so far as it is to some extent a proposal, it is not surprising that it has not won universal approval, but it is a masterpiece of its kind, and its influence on modern thought and practice has been historically significant.

WHAT MAISIE KNEW

Type of work Novel

Author Henry James (1843-1916)

Type of plot Social morality

Time of plot 1890's

Locale London, Folkestone, Boulogne

First published 1897

Principal characters

MAISIE FARANGE the daughter of divorced parents

IDA FARANGE her mother

BEALE FARANGE her father

MISS OVERMORE a governess, later the second Mrs. Beale Farange

MRS. WIX a governess

SIR CLAUDE, Ida Farange's second husband

Critique

This novel, one of the greatest of Henry James's middle period, is the story of the growing moral and intellectual perception of the neglected daughter of divorced and irresponsible parents. The story is told as Maisie herself lived it. Her view of the events caused by her parents' second marriages and the final affair between her step parents, is both droll and deeply moving. There is much of Henry James's characteristic and profound irony in this story. The moral core of the novel is Maisie's incorruptible innocence. Although in self defense she often was forced into deceit, she always willingly gave her love to her mentors. In the end she was able, with the perceptive awareness that James gave to all his major characters, to make freely a morally responsible decision about her future.

The Story

Beale and Ida Farange were divorced with much publicity. At first each fought to possess their daughter Maisie, but at last it was arranged that the girl should spend six months with each in turn. The first period was to be spent with her father.

Maisie was confused by the divorce. At first she truthfully reported to her parents what they said about each other, but finding that her candor provoked furious outbursts and that she was being used as an innocent messenger, she soon became silent on the subject of the absent parent and appeared to absorb no knowledge during her visits

Ida engaged Miss Overmore, a pretty governess, for Maisie, and Maisie was unhappy to leave her when she returned to her father. Soon, however, Miss Overmore went to Beale Farange's house where she was, to Ida's fury, also engaged as Maisie's governess. Upon her subsequent return to Ida, Maisie was placed in the care of Mrs Wix. She learned no lessons from Mrs Wix, but adored her conversation and felt comfortable and secure with her.

During Maisie's next stay with Beale he went for a few days to Brighton with Miss Overmore. When the governess returned, she found Mrs Wix waiting for her. Mrs Wix alone was preoccupied with Maisie's welfare, and was outraged by the child's environment. She announced to Miss Overmore that Ida was about to remarry and she gave Maisie a photograph of Sir Claude, her future stepfather. Miss Overmore outdid her as it were, by announcing that she had just married Beale Farange.

Some time after his marriage Sir Claude called and was received by the new Mrs Beale Farange. Maisie was delighted by their apparent understanding and declared that she had brought them together. Sir Claude won Maisie's love by his gentleness toward her and by his declared intent to make her his responsibility. In spite of the pain of leaving the new Mrs Farange, the girl was pleased to go home with him. But Ida's love for her new husband soon waned and she had several lovers. When she accused Sir Claude of basely stealing Maisie's affections, and threatened to drive Mrs Wix out of the house for supporting him, Maisie felt that she belonged nowhere. In this disturbed situation Mrs Wix was determined to meet her responsibility for Maisie, and she desired to "save" Sir Claude from Mrs Beale Farange, whom he frequently visited. Also, fearing the loss of her livelihood, she wished that Sir Claude would take a house for himself where she and Maisie would also live.

On one outing Sir Claude took Maisie to her father's new house, which she was afraid to enter for fear of losing him if she remained there. Once in the house, however, she was again enthralled by Mrs Farange's beauty and was interested to learn that Beale mattered no more to his wife than Sir Claude did to Ida. Maisie remained happily with her stepmother after Sir Claude had assured her that he would provide for Mrs Wix and visit her frequently.

After a long absence Sir Claude visited Maisie again. While they were walking in the park they met Ida with an unknown military appearing man. Ida and Sir Claude were immensely angry at their meeting and Maisie was sent to talk with Ida's escort whom her mother had called the Captain while they finished their argument. Maisie, who was by that time thoroughly aware that neither parent loved her, wept when the Captain praised her mother highly and was eager to agree that she was good. After this episode Sir Claude, unable to learn from Maisie what the Captain had said to her, sent her home alone in a cab.

Mrs Farange told Maisie that she met Sir Claude away from her home but that he was reluctant to visit them and thus compromise Maisie. The three hoped to meet at a London exhibition, instead, they unexpectedly encountered Beale Farange. After a subdued but violent quarrel, Maisie was whisked away by her father to the house of his mistress. There he offered, in such a way that Maisie could only refuse, to take her to America with him.

Sir Claude, encouraged by Mrs Wix, took Maisie to Folkestone as the first step toward making a home for them in France. There Ida arrived suddenly and surrendered Maisie to Sir Claude's guardianship. The following day they crossed to France, where Mrs Wix joined them. Sir Claude was to return to England and to

Mrs Beale Farange, when Maisie's father had finally left Sir Claude confessed that he feared Mrs Farange as he had formerly feared Ida Mrs Wix still strongly opposed to Mrs Farange asked to be sent to England to sever their relationship This request was refused by Sir Claude who went off to England alone

While he was away Mrs Wix explained to a bewildered Maisie that she refused to condone the immorality of Mrs Farange and Sir Claude in living together with them Also she declared that she would never again leave Maisie After several walks and much thought the full implications of what this situation might mean became apparent to Maisie She realized too that she had no moral "sense" and having rapidly absorbed the idea of such a sense from vague but emphatic conversations with Mrs Wix she decided to show in her future responses that she did indeed possess it

When they returned to their hotel after a morning walk, Maisie was unexpectedly greeted by her stepmother

Mrs Wix's own "moral sense" was nearly destroyed by Mrs Farange's charm and her determination to have the governess-companion as an ally According to Mrs Farange now that the girl's father had left, Maisie was her own daughter In this way she intended to hold Sir Claude, through his devotion to the girl Mrs Wix wavered, but Maisie declared that she would stay with Sir Claude only if he were alone

The next morning Mrs Wix awakened Maisie with the news that Sir Claude had arrived When Maisie breakfasted alone with him, he asked her if she would leave Mrs Wix and live with him and Mrs Farange She asked to see Mrs Wix before deciding Later, while walking with Sir Claude, she said she would give up Mrs Wix only if he would give up Mrs Farange Maisie made her decision when the four people confronted one another in a final struggle at the hotel After she had failed in her appeal to have Mrs Farange give up Sir Claude, Maisie decided to stay with Mrs Wix

WHEN WE DEAD AWAKEN

Type of work Drama

Author Henrik Ibsen (1828 1906)

Type of plot Psychological symbolism

Time of plot Nineteenth century

Locale A coastal town of Norway

First presented 1900 published 1899

Principal characters

ARNOLD RUBEK a sculptor

MAIA RUBEK his wife

IRENE VON SATOW his former model

ULFHEIM, a landed proprietor and hunter

Critique

When We Dead Awaken departs from the principles of art to which Ibsen's earlier social and later psychological dramas conform, and for this reason it is sometimes considered inferior to them It delves into the realm of pathology, dealing with improbabilities rather than probabilities with symbolic motive rather than actual motive Solely as an artistic creation however, the play has enduring merit Because it is Ibsen's last production we may read in it the intention of the dramatist to express some deeply felt final message which could be clothed

WHEN WE DEAD AWAKEN by Henrik Ibsen from THE COLLECTED WORKS OF HENRIK IBSEN Translated by William Archer By permission of the publishers Charles Scribner & Sons Copyright, 1906, by Charles Scribner & Sons Renewed All rights reserved.

only in poetically suggestive and symbolic language

The Story

Professor Arnold Rubek, a noted sculptor, and his young wife Maia, had returned to their home on the coast of Norway after four years abroad. At the baths and the hotel they admitted to being bored, and to break the summer tedium they planned to sail northward around the coast. Rubek had become world renowned with the fashioning of his masterpiece, "The Resurrection Day," and success had brought him worldly riches.

Other visitors at the baths were a sportsman named Ulfheim, called the bear killer, and a strange pale woman, Madame von Satow, who, with a companion dressed in black like a Sister of Mercy, had taken the nearby pavilion for the summer. As Rubek and Ulfheim conversed, the dark Sister passed from the pavilion to the hotel, and Ulfheim said her passing was a portent of death. Maia accepted his invitation to see his sledge dogs fed, but Rubek remained seated on the lawn. The lady in white emerged from the pavilion. Rubek felt strangely drawn to her. Years before he had wanted to create a sculpture which would represent Woman awakening from the Dead on the Resurrection Day after the sleep of Death. After he had found Irene he saw in her the perfect model for his composition and she became his great inspiration. Irene had wanted his human love but he had felt that if he touched her his soul would be profaned.

Now Rubek recognized the strange woman in white as Irene. When he questioned her about her life since she had left him, she declared that she had died then and was not really alive now though she had married a South American diplomat who later committed suicide, and then a Russian who owned gold mines in the Urals. Rubek admitted that after she left him he had made no marble creations of lasting beauty but had begun doing portraits which were really double faceted works of art for behind the visible face he hid the face of an animal which he maliciously considered the real person. He told Irene that he and Maia were leaving the next day on a sea voyage. She suggested that he might prefer the mountains where she was going. At that moment Maia returned and announced that she would not make the sea voyage instead she wanted to go to the mountains with the bear killer. To her surprise Rubek did not object. Maia ran out to inform Ulfheim. Meanwhile, unseen near the pavilion door, the Sister of Mercy watched intently.

The next day the bear killer went off to hunt with his dog trainer Lars and his dogs, and Maia accompanied them. Before they left, Rubek told Maia that he could no longer live a life of indolent enjoyment with her.

Rubek found Irene near a brook. She said she had returned from the dead and had made the journey for the sake of the statue, which she called their "child." She loved it and wanted to see it. When Rubek implored her not to, saying he had altered it since she had left, Irene covertly unsheathed a knife, but stayed her hand as he explained the changes he had made and told how he also was in the altered sculpture—a man eaten by remorse, imprisoned in a hell from which he could never rise. At this she sheathed her knife, rejoicing that he suffered. But she bitterly reminded him that when he had finally finished the statue he had shrugged off their years together.

Together they stood and watched the sun go down. He then asked her to return and live with him in his villa, to help him find his real life again, but Irene said that for the life they had led there was no resurrection. Suddenly Irene challenged Rubek to dare the mountain heights and spend a summer night with her. Joyfully he agreed. As he did so a face stared down at Irene, the face of the Sister of Mercy.

On the wild mountainside, cut by sheer precipices and overhung with snow clad peaks, Maia and Ulfheim quarreled, but made up as they told each other of the disappointments of their youth. When the dangerous mountain mist began to close in, they decided to journey down together, but as they made ready to descend they saw Rubek and Irene climbing up. Ulfheim warned them of the impending storm and the dangers ahead and urged them to take shelter in a nearby hut. He said that he would send them help, he himself could assist only one person at a time down the precipice.

After Ulfheim and Maia had gone, Irene, terrified not by the approaching storm but that she might be taken away, that the woman in black might seize her and put her in a straitjacket, showed Rubek her knife ready for such an emergency. She added that the knife had been intended for him the previous evening. Startled, he asked why she had not used it, she told him she had then realized that he was already dead. But Rubek passionately assured her that their love was not dead, for he realized with glaring certainty that she was the woman of his dreams. Irene said that such a love came too late, that desire for life was dead in her, and that she looked on him, too, as dead.

With his whole soul Rubek called on her, even if they both seemed dead to awaken and live life to its fullest before they were forever put away in the grave. Exalted, they spurned the safety of the hut and joyously fought their way up to the peaks, through mist and storm, toward the sunrise. Far below the voice of Maia sang out free as a bird. The Sister of Mercy suddenly appeared. As Rubek and Irene were carried along and buried in the snow, she made the sign of the cross and wished that peace be with them.

WHERE ANGELS FEAR TO TREAD

Type of work Novel

Author E. M. Forster (1879)

Type of plot Social criticism

Time of plot Early twentieth century

Locale England and Italy

First published 1905

Principal characters

LILIA HERRITON a young English widow

GINO CARELLA an Italian

PHILIP HERRITON Lilia's brother-in-law

HARRIET HERRITON her sister-in-law

MRS. HERRITON Lilia's mother-in-law

IRMA HERRITON Lilia's daughter

CAROLINE ABBOTT, a friend

Critique

In this novel Forster again shows himself to be a slightly satiric observer of the world and the affairs of mankind. As usual, the characters are perfectly ordinary and commonplace, in fact, it should be noted that no really admirable person appears in any of his novels. Here he is primarily concerned with the gulf that is normally found between the northern temperament of an overcivilized Englishwoman and the natural impulses of the South which are personified in the Italian whom she marries.

The Story

Lilia Herriton, a widow of several years who had been living with her husband's family since his death, cheerfully

WHERE ANGELS FEAR TO TREAD by E. M. Forster. By permission of the publishers Alfred A. Knopf Inc. Copyright 1920 by Alfred A. Knopf Inc. Renewed. All rights reserved.

left Sawston, England, with her friend Caroline Abbott for an extended visit in Italy. The Herriton family had encouraged such a visit because of their concern over Lilia's growing relationship with a man whom they considered unsuitable for her, and also because they welcomed a chance to train her daughter without the mother's interference. The trip, which had been Philip's idea, had been quickly agreed to by everyone concerned. Fortunately, Caroline Abbott, a woman ten years younger but much more level-headed than Lilia, was also planning such a trip and needed a companion.

The winter passed peacefully for everyone and the tour seemed to be a success. Lilia was apparently gaining some degree of culture and taste under the guidance of Miss Abbott, and her daughter Irma was being tremendously improved by Mrs. Herriton. In the spring, however, the Herriton plans were upset. Mrs. Herriton heard from Lilia's mother that Lilia was engaged to an Italian, supposedly some one she had met in a hotel. She immediately wired Miss Abbott for details, but was answered only by the terse comment that Lilia was engaged to an Italian nobleman. Thus she instinctively knew was a lie, she insisted that Philip go at once to Italy and stop the marriage.

Miss Abbott met Philip's train when he arrived at Monteriano, the village in which Lilia and Miss Abbott had been staying for a month. Nervously she agreed to tell him everything according to her story, Lilia and the man had both professed love for each other so she had rather offhandedly suggested marriage. Unfortunately, Signor Carella, some twelve years younger than Lilia, was the son of a dentist in that provincial village, and he had no money. His social position, therefore, was little better than that of a peasant. Philip was even more appalled when he saw the man, for his manners and everything about him except his physique were extremely vulgar. Philip's attempts to stop the marriage were thwarted, however, for the couple had been married as soon as they heard he was coming. There was nothing for him to do but return home, taking Miss Abbott with him.

The Herriton family naturally refused to have anything more to do with Lilia, but they kept Irma with them, to be brought up as one who bore the Herriton name. It was some time before Lilia realized that she did not love her husband and could never be happy with him, or that he had married her only for her money. And she never understood that as an Italian wife she could neither expect nor receive from her husband the things that English wives received from theirs as a matter of course. By the time she realized her unhappiness she had been cut off from everything in England and there was nothing she could do. Once at a time when she was particularly upset she did write to her little daughter, telling of her unhappiness and the reasons for it, but the letter was intercepted by Mrs. Herriton and nothing ever came of it.

Lilia often thought that if she could present her husband with a son they might eventually gain some happiness. His one ambition was to be the father of a man like himself. Finally Lilia did have a son, but she died in childbirth. The Herritons decided that they must tell Irma about her mother's death, but that it would be best if no one knew about the child who was, after all, no real relation of theirs.

Irma soon found out about the child when she began receiving post cards sent her by the father. Her childish pride prevented her from keeping such an event a secret and soon all Sawston knew of it. Much to the chagrin of the Herritons, Miss Abbott, who still considered herself partly responsible for all that had happened, began to insist that something be done for the child, either by them or by herself. Mrs. Herriton, whose pride would not allow anyone else to do something that would in any way reflect on her family, immediately began negotiations which she hoped would enable her to adopt the boy

When letters resulted only in praise and polite refusals she decided that Philip must again go to Montenano and gain the custody of the child at any cost. Harriet was to go along to see that he accomplished his mission. On their arrival, however, they found that Miss Abbott had preceded them and was also intent on seeing that the child was taken back to England. Unfortunately Philip and Miss Abbott soon began to be affected by the romantic and charming atmosphere. They were still determined to carry out their mission, but they quickly lost all feeling of urgency in the matter.

On their second day in the village, when the interview with Signor Carella was to take place, Miss Abbott went to the house early and alone. She was afraid that Philip would fail. While there she was completely won over by the father's devotion to the son and soon found herself on the Italian's side and against the Herritons, even though she knew she could do nothing to hinder their plans. Philip also saw Carella that day in the morning and in the afternoon and he, although he would not openly admit that the Italian was right, found himself completely indifferent to the outcome of his mission, and on friendly terms with his adversary. Success in the affair was left to Harriet, who, after apparently accepting Philip's failure, prepared to leave the village. Shortly before it was time for them to catch the train she sent a note to Philip telling him to pick her up just outside the gate to the village. When he got there he found that she had also visited the Carella household and, not finding Carella at home, had simply picked up the baby and walked away.

On the way down the mountain to the train their carriage was accidentally overturned and the baby was killed. When Philip told Carella what had happened, the Italian almost killed him. Miss Abbott, whom Carella had always revered as something of a goddess, was the only person who could calm him and prevent more pain. By the time the English group had recuperated enough to leave Italy the two men were again good friends.

On the way back to England, however, Philip received another disappointment. Because of the romantic atmosphere and of the close association, he and Miss Abbott had somewhat ignored the normal English coldness and he had fallen in love with her. He almost proposed to her when they were talking about love and their futures but she, thinking he had suspected it long before, told him of her passion for Carella. Philip, who had for years thought that he understood the world and who had considered himself merely a spectator of life, discovered that he really understood nothing.

THE WHITE DEVIL

Type of work Drama

Author John Webster (? Before 1635)

Type of plot Revenge tragedy

Time of plot Sixteenth century

Locale Rome and Padua, Italy

First presented c 1612

Principal characters

VITTORIA COROMBONA a Venetian lady

PAULO GIORDANO URSINI Duke of Brachiano

FRANCISCO DE MEDICIS Duke of Florence

CARDINAL MONTICELSO his brother

CAMILLO Vittoria's husband

FLAMINEO Vittoria's brother, secretary to Brachiano

MARCELLO, another brother, attendant on Francisco de Medicis

COUNT LODOVICO a banished nobleman
ISABELLA sister of Francisco de Medicis Brachiano's wife
GIOVANNI, son of Isabella and Brachiano

Critique

The White Devil, or, Vittoria Corom bona is as tumultuous a melodrama as any written during the Elizabethan Age. Filled with violent deeds performed by heroic personages, its plot, involving love, treachery, and revenge, seems incredible but it is based on actual events which took place in sixteenth century Italy.

The Story

Antonelli and Gasparo courtiers of Francisco de Medicis, Duke of Florence, brought to Count Lodovico in Rome the news that he had been banished because of his notorious intrigues and bloody murders. Lodovico could not understand why he had been singled out for punishment when other noblemen, especially the Duke of Brachiano, were guilty of crimes just as heinous.

Brachiano was trying to seduce Vittoria Corombona, wife of the aging Camillo. Helping Brachiano in his scheme was Vittoria's unscrupulous brother Flamineo, who convinced Camillo that the best way to keep Vittoria virtuous was to give her unlimited freedom. This privilege granted, Vittoria kept an assignation with Brachiano. Through the transparent symbolism of a dream which she had fabricated, Vittoria urged her lover to murder Isabella, his wife, and Camillo, her husband. Just as Brachiano was declaring his love for Vittoria and his understanding of her design, Vittoria's mother, Cornelia, disclosed herself to denounce the two and to announce the arrival of Brachiano's wife in Rome.

Isabella's brothers, Francisco and Cardinal Monticelso, summoned Brachiano to remonstrate against his philandering. When their appeal to Brachiano's sense of virtue resulted only in mutual recrimination, the brothers produced Giovanni, Brachiano's son, whose youthful innocence, they hoped, would inspire Brachiano with a sense of family duty. Confronted alone by Isabella, Brachiano proved the folly of such a hope by betraying his wife and vowing never again to sleep with her. To forestall the war which would surely ensue if Francisco learned of this vow, Isabella pretended that she was unable to forgive her husband and declared that she was abandoning her husband's bed. Her ruse and Brachiano's acquiescence in it fooled Francisco so completely that he denounced Isabella for mad jealousy.

Disgusted by their sister's vow but convinced that she would soon retract it, Francisco and Monticelso turned their attention to Camillo and Marcello, another of Vittoria's brothers whom they had decided to appoint joint commissioners in charge of combating the pirates reportedly led by the banished Lodovico. Camillo objected because he feared he would be cuckolded during his absence from home, but Monticelso's promise to keep an eye on Vittoria quieted him. Actually Monticelso and Francisco were giving Camillo the commission to get him away from Rome so that Brachiano might have free access to Vittoria. By this scheme the two brothers hoped to plunge Brachiano into a shameful scandal.

Brachiano, however, had made his own plans, having arranged for Flamineo to murder Camillo and for Julio, a physician, to kill Isabella. Through the magic of a conjurer, Brachiano was able to watch the murders, Isabella dying from kissing a poisoned portrait of her husband, and Camillo, from being pushed off a vaulting horse in a gymnasium.

Monticelso and Francisco immediately brought Vittoria to trial for the murder of her husband, though they knew they had no evidence other than her ill repute. At her trial before the ambassadors to Rome, a hearing presided over by Monticelso, Brachiano admitted that he had stayed at Vittoria's house the night of the murder This testimony, along with other incriminating but circumstantial evidence of her prostitution, was sufficient to convict Vittoria, although she protested her innocence and denounced the conduct of the trial Monticelso sentenced her to confinement in a house of reformed prostitutes

Immediately after the pronouncement of this sentence, Giovanni arrived to tell his uncles of his mother's death Accompanying him was Lodovico, who secretly had been in love with Isabella and who, in fact, had witnessed her death Francisco and Monticelso realized that Brachiano was responsible for the murder of their sister but disagreed on how to avenge it Fearing that a war might result from an open attack on Brachiano, yet unwilling to defer vengeance, Francisco, inspired by a vision of Isabella's ghost, devised a trick He wrote a letter to Vittoria, professing his love for her and instructed his servant to deliver it when some of Brachiano's men were close by

As Francisco hoped Flammineo intercepted the letter and gave it to Brachiano, who was, of course, enraged by Vittoria's apparent infidelity A violent quarrel ensued between the two, refereed by the pandering Flammineo It ended in a reconciliation so sweet that Brachiano resolved to have Vittoria stolen away from the home for convertites and then to marry her To trick Brachiano into marrying a prostitute was exactly what Francisco had hoped for, but his lust for revenge was not yet satisfied He engaged Lodovico, who had been pardoned, to murder Brachiano

Monticelso, who had just been elected Pope, excommunicated Brachiano and his bride, then, learning of the plotted murder, he forbade Lodovico to commit it Monticelso's command was ignored, how ever, when Francisco sent Lodovico a thousand crowns in Monticelso's name, a gift which convinced Lodovico that the Pope had been craftily insincere

Francisco apparently decided to oversee the murder himself, for he disguised himself as Mulinasser, a Moor, and proceeded to Brachiano's palace in Padua accompanied by Lodovico and Gasparo, who were disguised as Knights of Malta Welcomed by Brachiano, the trio planned a horrible death for him

Before they could carry out their scheme another murder was committed A quarrel between Marcello and Flammineo over the latter's amorous attentions paid to Zanche, Vittoria's Moorish maid, resulted in Flammineo's killing his brother While Brachiano was passing judgment on the murderer, Lodovico sprinkled Brachiano's helmet with poison The poison drove Brachiano mad Soon thereafter, Lodovico and Gasparo, dressed as Capuchins, entered the room where the count lay raving they revealed their true identity and strangled him

After his lord's death, Flammineo sued to Vittoria for a reward in payment of his long, treacherous service Rebuffed, he produced two pairs of pistols, claiming that he had promised Brachiano to kill himself and Vittoria after Brachiano's death Vittoria persuaded Flammineo to die first, but when she and Zanche fired the pistols at him they learned that Flammineo, to test Vittoria, had not loaded the weapons Before he could murder the women, however, Lodovico and Gasparo rushed in and killed all three Giovanni and a group of ambassadors discovered the murderers standing over the corpses Wounded, Lodovico confessed and then disclosed the part Francisco had played in these bloody deeds Giovanni swore vengeance on the Duke of Florence

WITHIN THE GATES

Type of work Drama
Author Sean O Casey (1884-)
Type of plot Morality play
Time of plot Twentieth century
Locale In a London park
First presented 1933

Principal characters

THE DREAMER a young poet
THE YOUNG WOMAN Jannice a prostitute
THE OLD WOMAN her mother, a drunkard
THE ATHEIST foster father of Jannice
THE BISHOP, Jannice's father

Critique

This expressionistic morality play, the least produced play of a seldom produced playwright, has had a very mixed reception by audiences and critics alike. It belongs to the Devon period of plays by an expatriate, though still very Irish, writer who followed Shaw into English exile and who became in part his successor in the theater. The play, in four parts or seasons, is a kind of war cry against the modern, impoverished spirit of man, weighed down by mass conformity, though protested against by the poet-dreamer. In its simplest outline the play is a modern Everywoman—O'Casey's great concern for the life force is brought to focus here—who turns in her final days on earth, to family, church, social agency lover, and finally, poet. Though she dies making the sign of the cross, he alone sustains her with love and compassion.

The Story

It was spring within the gates of a London park where a war memorial stood in strong contrast to the surrounding spring flowers. A group of young people, costumed like the spring vegetation, sang and danced to a poem newly written by The Dreamer. His song expressed hope for the world through the earth mother's renewal of old promises. Contrasted with this lively group were The Down and Outs, those bowed by the master classes and the prejudices they spawn.

The Dreamer, who sensed the independent spirit disguised by her conventional street walker's appearance, followed The Young Woman, only to be rejected by her. His friend The Atheist urged the poet to leave her adrift. As the girl's foster father, he explained to the interested young man that she had a fine mind which forever darted first to the left, then to the right. A young divinity student named Gilbert had fathered and forgotten her. Her housemaid mother, turned away from the college gate, had placed her child in a church orphanage, where the nuns treated her as a child of sin and impressed fancifully on her mind the hell for which she was probably destined. The Atheist, smitten with the good looks and fierce spirit of the mother, took them both in, only to be deserted when the daughter became a prostitute and the mother a drunkard. Both were beset by their own vision of sin and full of hate for each other.

Since the godless man gave the girl no poetry but only intellectual exercises, The Dreamer suggested that The Atheist had taken her from one darkness into another. He begged the foster father to take her home again while there still was loveliness in her, but The Atheist was too fond of his independent life of rabble-rousing through speechifying and pamphleteering.

Within the park appeared vested interests represented by nursemaids and their aristocratic charges, a policewoman, The Bishop and his sister, chair attendants, a gardener, a Salvation Army officer, evangelists, and politicians in various types of hats which corresponded to their points of view. The Dreamer moved among them all and urged them to throw off their worldly bonds for them he wrote the Song of the Down and Outs, a lament for those who whine through life with dread and who are sick with apprehension, the victims of dead traditions.

WITHIN THE GATES by Sean O Casey. By permission of the publishers The Macmillan Co. Copyright, 1934 by The Macmillan Co.

The Young Woman, in spite of a heart condition, ran after her foster father. Rebuffed, she still persisted in disclosing her dreams of hell and heaven. She turned next to a young Salvation Army officer who offered her the minimum security of the body though he was interested in her for other reasons of the flesh. The Gardener, in love with physical love and unresponsive to her claim for affectionate understanding, rejected her and refused to marry her when he learned she was ill. The gates then closed on this satirical spring idyl.

Summer found the gates opening on the people's sensuous enjoyment of the lovely day, bellowing summer's deceptive pleasures. Conventional morality was the topic of discussion among the Down and Outs, The Bishop guiltily avoiding his sister, who disliked the commoners, was their leader while on a kind of pilgrimage among the "lower classes." His morality was tested by chair attendants wanting charity and by The Young Woman, who wanted redemption. She vigorously parried dogma against dogma—to his chagrin, for he urged her to return to her mother and the church, only to discover himself as the guilty lover and irresponsible father. After this disjointed, highly emotional reunion, The Dreamer rescued The Young Woman from the mother's violence and the passivity of the priest father (as yet not identified by anyone but himself), who could only give her money clandestinely. She again rejected the poet, who offered her a song, and departed with the somewhat guilty acting Salvation Army officer. She mocked the priest who saved only himself but complimented the poet on his song as the gates closed on the departing couple.

On a lovely autumn day, the park gates opened on The Dreamer and The Young Woman, he ecstatic and she drunk with wine and joy. She begged him not to leave her because in his absence she might return to her Salvation Army lover. The young poet insisted that the officer could give her neither peace nor joy, for his peace brought a measured joy, whereas she needed joy to find peace.

The political forces came together armed with newspapers and debated the origin of God and the universe. The Young Woman ended the argument by stating that their combined knowledge could not fill a spoon. She, uneasy in her soul, sang the poet's song of love to the background chanting of despair. Her panic mounted as she felt death's clutch and she shouted for help, but the only solace she found was the conventional responses of The Bishop; responses she rejected with telling arguments against his stringent denial of life. Nor could The Atheist or Salvation Army arguments win her, only the kiss and embrace of man for woman took her through the gates.

Winter came through the gates into the desolate park as the bugle call, The Last Post, set the mood. The Bishop had returned with his sister, he now strongly moved to compassion, the desire to do the right thing, and she determined to prevent it.

The Old Woman, also touched by conscience, went looking for her daughter but presented her wreath to the war memorial because her one week of happiness had been spent with an Irish soldier killed later in a senseless battle. She accosted The Bishop, a thin thought of recollection assailing her, but he denied her and the girl and, prompted by his sister, reverted to his worship of self.

The men of argument proposed the riddles of modern psychology, again not filling a spoon with knowledge

The Young Woman now wished to reject the poet lover for The Bishop, knowing as she did so that life was fast going out of her. She reviled long enough to revile her sob saying mother, who in turn reviled The Bishop's sister in garbled ritual for oaths.

A great struggle for supremacy over the dying woman's thoughts ensued. The Bishop with Latin comfort, the Down and Outs with conventional sympathy, but the poet with song and dance of an Old Testament elegiac sort—a defiance of the world and a praise of God. The priest intoned as she haltingly made the sign of the cross, the hymn of Down and Outs praised oblivion, and the poet sang his song of praise to The Young Woman who was dying within the gates.

WOLF SOLENT

Type of work Novel

Author John Cowper Powys (1872)

Type of plot Psychological realism

Time of plot Twentieth century

Locale Devon, England

First published 1929

Principal characters

WOLF SOLENT

ANN SOLENT, his mother

GERDA TORP, his wife

MR. TORP, Gerda's father, a stonecutter

LOB TORP, his son

SELENA GAULT, Wolf's father's mistress

DARNLEY OTTER, Wolf's friend

JASON OTTER, Darnley's brother, a poet

SQUIRE URQUHART, a wealthy historian, Wolf's employer

CHRISTIE MALAKITE, Wolf's spiritual mate

MR. MALAKITE, her father, a bookseller

BOB WEEVIL, Gerda's friend

MATTIE SMITH, Wolf's half sister

ALBERT SMITH, a hatter

OLWEN, a child living with the Smiths

Critique

In this novel Powys presents against a contemporary setting some of his ideas on the mystical power that shapes all men's actions. The hero, Wolf Solent, attempts to find himself and his place in the universe, but he is constantly caught between the dictates of his own nature and the conventions of the world in which he lives. This world is not merely conventional, for Powys' Dorset is a mystic place of powerful spirits affecting human beings and conducive to strange nocturnal wanderings, as well as a community haunted by incest, disturbing graves, and sinister suggestions of murder. The powerful spirits are reflections of the animal nature of human beings, forces springing from man that defy his best efforts to impose a rational order on himself and his world. Many of the names of the characters, such as Wolf Solent and Jason Otter, suggest this idea of the animal nature of man. At times Powys has his characters dwell at great length on their own personalities and on the symbolic nature of all they have discovered in experience. Despite the turgidity of some of these reflections and the loose structure of the novel, Wolf Solent is not without forceful appeal. For many modern readers it is too prolix to carry deep tragic meaning. For others it is a powerful demonstration of man's essential loneliness and lack of control.

WOLF SOLENT by John Cowper Powys. By permission of the publishers Simon & Schuster, Inc. Copyright 1929 by Simon & Schuster, Inc. Renewed. All rights reserved.

The Story

Wolf Solent, a thirty-five year old history master from London, decided to accept a post in the Dorset village that he and his mother had left when he was ten years old. His father, a teacher in the village school, had carried on several affairs with local women and had died in disgrace years before. When Wolf arrived in the village Ramsgard, he had the promise of a job as secretary to Mr. Urquhart, the local squire, who was engaged in writing a history of the area. Wolf, haunted by the misery and poverty of the city and anticipating a peaceful existence in the area of his origin, looked forward to establishing himself in Ramsgard, where he planned to have his mother join him.

On his first day in Ramsgard Wolf called on Selena Gault, his father's old mistress. She took him to his father's grave, which she tended with reverence, and praised his father's force and vitality in contrast to the rigid control. Wolf's mother had always maintained. Wolf went to live with the Otters. There he found himself attracted to Darnley's sane kindness but repelled by Jason's erratic conversation and worship of mystic symbols.

When Wolf began to work for Squire Urquhart, he soon discovered that the Squire's proposed history was simply a chronicle of all the scandals and salacious stories of the county. About the same time Wolf met Gerda Torp, the beautiful daughter of the local stonecutter. Attracted by her beauty and worked on by all the natural symbols emerging in the long walks that he and Gerda took, he soon yielded to his own animal nature and seduced the girl in a bed of yellow bracken. Soon, following the conventions of village society, they made plans to marry. In the meantime Wolf had also met Christie Malakite, the daughter of the local bookseller. He often went to tea in Christie's small, book-filled sitting room. The spiritual attraction Christie held for him was as powerful as his physical attraction to Gerda.

Wolf had been in Ramsgard only a short time when his mother arrived. Because he could find no place for his mother to stay on her first night in Ramsgard, he accepted Selena Gault's suggestion that he take his mother to the home of Albert Smith, a local hatter. At the Smith cottage Wolf felt a sudden strong kinship with Mattie, apparently the daughter of Albert Smith. He later discovered that Mattie was, in fact, his half sister, the illegitimate daughter of his father and Albert Smith's late wife. A young girl, Olwen, was also living at the Smiths. Olwen was the offspring of Mr. Malakite and his own oldest daughter. This knowledge of the animal spirit infusing so much of Ramsgard's past made a deep impression on Wolf about the same time that he became aware of the conflict between his physical feelings for Gerda and his spiritual ties with Christie. In spite of his conflict he married Gerda.

As time passed he became more conscious of strange hints and references to the sudden death of Squire Urquhart's former secretary. He even bought Jason Otter's Mukalog, a God figure that Jason associated with mystical and devilish powers. Wolf knew that he could not really afford the purchase, but he hoped that through ownership of the image he could rationally control the strange force of experience around him. Control, however, seemed to be breaking down for Wolf. His marriage with Gerda, a silent and impassive beauty, was not working out well and he still felt impelled to call on Christie frequently. He suspected that Gerda was having an affair with a former suitor, Bob Weevil, a flashy young man who helped run his father's sausage shop. Only Wolf's mother seemed in full control of her destiny as she made careful plans to open a tea shop in the neighbor hood

Albert Smith died suddenly After a great deal of discussion among the Otters, the Solents, and Selena Gault Mattie and Olwen went to live with the Otters There, Mattie and Darnley fell in love and eventually married, while Olwen, having come close to her sister, Christie, eventually went to live with her

Wolf revolting against Squire Urquhart's pornographic project, had quit his job on the history and with Darnley Otter's help, secured a job as a teacher In need of money, however for he and Gerda lived in a fairly shabby house Wolf returned to Squire Urquhart and agreed to finish the history by working evenings Throughout the winter Wolf worked hard on the project One evening, having been told that Christie would be alone for the night, he went to visit her Although she was fully prepared for his visit, Wolf discovered that, bound as he was to keep Christie in the spiritual category he had created for her, he could not transform his spiritual passion into the physical He realized then that their relationship would always remain spiritual

When Wolf finished the history and delivered it to Squire Urquhart he felt that he ought not to cash the check because the work had been so cheaply pornographic Gerda, wanting the money for household improvements could not see his point and became furious with him In her anger she confirmed Wolf's jealous feelings and had an affair with Bob Weevil Wolf later decided to cash the check and keep the money but his decision came too late to heal the rupture with Gerda However, after a few months they did achieve a kind of peace without love

One evening, while drinking tea with Gerda, Wolf suddenly received a telepathic message from Christie He hurried to her house to discover that old Mr Malakite had fallen down the narrow stairs Wolf stayed with Christie until after her father's death, comforting her and making the necessary arrangements A short time later Christie having no further reason to remain in Ramsyard since Wolf's love for her was simply spiritual, took Olwen and moved to Weymouth Wolf stayed with Gerda, even though he realized more and more that she was a woman still attractive to men and that, having lost her loyalty to Wolf, she was probably having affairs with other men Wolf realized his failure to master his feelings Unable to control the forces within him in a sane and meaningful way, he would always struggle in his loneliness to know himself and the world of confusion around him

THE WOMAN HATER

Type of work Drama

Authors Francis Beaumont (1585? 1616) and John Fletcher (1579 1625), sometimes attributed to Beaumont alone

Type of plot Romantic comedy

Time of plot Early seventeenth century

Locale Milan

First presented c 1606

Principal characters

ORIANA a beautiful, witty young girl

THE DUKE OF MILAN, in love with Oriana

COUNT VALORE Oriana's brother

GONDARINO, general of Milan, the woman hater

ARRIGO, a courtier

LUCIO, a lord

LAZARILLO, a glutton

A MERCER
A PANDERER
JULIA, a prostitute

Critique

In this play Beaumont possibly with some assistance from Fletcher, attempted to do more than could be successfully accomplished in one work. The result is a comedy which has some good moments, but which contains much undigested material. Gondarino, who gives the play its title, is a character of Jonsonian humours who is motivated solely by a pathological hatred of women. Little is done with him, however, at the end of the play he remains unregenerate, a speaker of satirical truth in his anti-feminine attitude. Lazarillo, whose only aim in life is the consumption of rare delicacies of the table, is a Gondarino on a different level. In spite of his foolishness, he carries about him such an air of genial absurdity that his punishment marriage to a prostitute seems unduly harsh. Oriana is an emancipated woman—beautiful, witty, bold, yet honest as well. However, with an almost incredible stupidity she allows Gondarino to maneuver her into a highly compromising position. In addition, the play also presents satirical glances at the stupidity of middle-class citizens, the affectations of courtiers, and the dishonesty of the lower class. The plot unfortunately, is not constructed with sufficient care to carry all the burdens placed upon it.

The Story

Wandering the streets late at night with Arngo and Lucio, the Duke of Milan discussed various affairs of state and talked about his personal life. That day he had been presented with the head of an umbrana, a rare and delicious fish, and he had ordered it sent to Gondarino. More important, he confessed his love for Oriana, a maiden whom he had seen but never spoken with.

Although the Duke's passion was still a closely guarded secret, the news of the umbrana's head had spread abroad. It was of particular concern to Lazarillo, a courtier whose consuming passion was food. Every day Lazarillo's boy scoured the court for information concerning novel dishes to be served at the various tables, and Lazarillo exercised his wits to secure an invitation to share the most appetizing. When Lazarillo learned that umbrana was available, he was beside himself. Unfortunately, however, he did not know that the Duke had already given away the fish's head.

Valore, meanwhile, was doing everything in his power to persuade his sister Oriana not to present herself at court. Because she was only fifteen and had no experience in the world, Valore feared that the temptations of the court would override her good judgment. But Oriana was determined, and after hearing her brother's warnings, she set out. Valore, left at loose ends, was glad to see Lazarillo approaching because he could count on being amused by the glutton's foibles.

Lazarillo quickly declined Valore's invitation to dine—he was after a bigger game. His real business was to ask Valore to present him that morning to the Duke, from whom he hoped to extract in some manner an invitation to dinner. Valore was quite willing to make the presentation, but in order to increase the sport he ordered a professional intelligencer who happened to be at hand to shadow Lazarillo and to report any of his treasonable utterances to Lucio. While Valore was giving the spy these secret instructions, Lazarillo's boy learned that the fish's head was now to be found at Gondarino's house. Agreeing to meet Valore there later, Lazarillo hurried off in pursuit of a dinner invitation.

But Gondarino, having no use for the delicacy, had sent it off to his mercer, to whom he owed money, as a mollification. Gondarino, like Lazarillo, was ruled by one consuming passion, in his case a complete aversion to women. He was horrified therefore, when a sudden hailstorm caused Oriana to take refuge in his house. He cursed her, reviled her, insulted her, not realizing that Oriana, who knew his reputation as a woman hater, had sought out his house deliberately in order to plague him. She answered his violence only with pleasantness. Oriana was not the only one who had been caught out doors in the hailstorm, however, before long the Duke, Arrigo, and Lucio also made their way to Gondarino's house. Gondarino immediately petitioned to have Oriana removed, but the Duke, startled to find Oriana present, began to suspect that she had visited Gondarino for no virtuous purpose and that his host's bluster was feigned in an attempt to conceal a clandestine love affair. After a prolonged consultation with Arrigo and Lucio, the Duke decided to reserve judgment.

Meanwhile, Valore and Lazanillo also appeared, Lazanillo having sent his boy into the kitchens to inquire after the umbrana's head. Valore presented Lazanillo to the Duke, who received him cordially and even did him the honor of inviting him to dinner. Lazanillo declined not wishing to be separated from the delicacy he had his heart set upon. Soon after the Duke's departure, however, Lazanillo was informed that the head was again missing. Once more he set out to track it down, Valore going with him. Oriana remained behind, vowing that she would dine with Gondarino, the more he protested, the more she resolved to pretend love for him in order to torment him.

Oriana was using all of her wiles on the woman hater when her campaign was interrupted by the return of the Duke, who was much distressed by his suspicions. After Oriana had left the room, he began to question Gondarino closely about his relationship with the girl. Gondarino, taking this opportunity to be revenged upon the troublesome baggage, swore to the Duke that all of his suspicions were true—that Oriana was a prostitute who had forced him to yield to her after she had pursued him for a long time. Believing yet wishing to disbelieve, the Duke rushed out, but Gondarino's plans for Oriana were not yet terminated. When she reappeared he pretended to have fallen in love with her. Having revealed that he had slandered her to the Duke, he swore to set matters straight again and offered her a private house to which she could retire until the Duke should once more regard her with favor. Completely taken in, Oriana agreed.

During this time Valore and Lazanillo had reached the court, where they discussed the matter of the missing umbrana in detail and at last received a report from the boy that it was to be found at Gondarino's mercer's house. Lazanillo hurried off again. Unknown to him, Valore's intelligencers had copied down bits and snatches of his words in such a way that they constituted evidence for high treason. They, in turn, hastened to Lucio to report.

In the meantime Gondarino's mercer, a man with a foolish respect for learning but not the slightest idea of what true learning was, discussed with a panderer the possibility of obtaining a bride for himself. The panderer, who had disguised himself as a scholar, had convinced the mercer that he could, by means of his art, arrange a match with an heiress. That very afternoon, he promised, the mercer's bride would be compelled by magic to appear at the panderer's house, and in order that she should be the less noticed as she was drawn irresistibly through the streets she would be dressed in a white waistcoat and torn stockings. Actually this woman was to be one of the panderer's stable of prostitutes. Just as the man was about to depart, the umbrana's head arrived from Gondarino, and the mercer, as a mark of favor, gave it to the panderer. Lazanillo, arriving a few moments later, learned the fish's new destination and set off after it again.

At the court Valore, closeted with the Duke, defended his sister's reputation while Gondarino waited outside the Duke's chambers with more lies to blacken it still further. When the two confronted each other Gondarino offered to take Valore and the Duke to a place where Oriana's unchastity would be proved. Thus all parties began to converge upon a bagnio to which Gondarino had sent Oriana without her knowledge—the mercer to claim his bride, Lazarillo to seek the umbrana's head, and Gondarino, Valore, and the Duke to find out the truth about Oriana.

The mercer was the first to arrive. Having been assured by the panderer that the heiress waited within, he entered. Lazarillo next appeared upon the scene, he recognized the house for what it was, but, his appetite being stronger than his virtue, he also entered. He had just secured from Julia, a prostitute, an invitation to a supper at which the coveted fish's head was to be served when he was arrested for treason by the intelligencers. As he was dragged away he promised Julia marriage if she would only save the umbrana until his return. Finally, the Duke, Valore, and Gondarino arrived and caught sight of Oriana at an upper window of the house. The sight of her was almost enough to convince the Duke. When Gondarino hailed her, however, she replied by asking leave to write Valore for her release.

The three noblemen returned to the palace, where a hot argument ensued. It was ultimately decided that Oriana's virtue would be put to a final test, if she failed it, she would die. As the Duke, Valore, and Gondarino watched from a concealed gallery, Arrigo confronted Oriana with the information that she was held guilty of unchastity and had been condemned to death. Oriana protested her innocence, but Arrigo was firm—she had been judged and she must die. Yet there was one way in which she could preserve her life, she could lie with Arrigo, who had the power to save her. When Oriana indignantly refused, declaring that she preferred death to dishonor, the Duke emerged from his hiding place to claim her for his bride. Gondarino was punished by being bound in a chair, helpless while, under Oriana's supervision, he was kissed and fondled by the ladies of the court.

Lazarillo, meanwhile, had been condemned by Lucio but pardoned through Valore's intervention. He returned to the bagnio, took Julia to the priest, and finally feasted on the umbrana's head. The mercer married the woman the panderer had produced. Thus he was taught the lesson that no man can be learned without labor.

THE WOMAN'S PRIZE

Type of work Drama

Author John Fletcher (1579-1625)

Type of plot Farce

Time of plot Sixteenth century

Locale Italy

First presented c. 1604

Principal characters

PETRUCHIO the wife tamer

MARIA, Petruchio's bride

LIVIA her sister

BIANCA their cousin

MOROSO an old man in love with Livia

SOPHOCLES a friend of Petruchio

TRANIO, another friend

PETRONIUS, father of Maria and Livia

ROWLAND, a young gentleman, in love with Livia

JACQUES, Petruchio's servant

Critique

Attempting no doubt to capitalize on the earlier success of Shakespeare's The Taming of the Shrew, Fletcher in this play turns the tables on Petruchio by having a new wife bring him to heel. Although it is by no means a failure, The Woman's Prize or, The Tamer Tamed is considerably inferior to the comedy on which it is based. To cite only one point of difference, Shakespeare manages very skillfully to have Petruchio show Katharina her shortcomings by subtly mirroring her meanness and perversity, she is tamed, as it were, with love and emerges reformed but with her spirit unbroken. Fletcher is incapable of this kind of finesse. Maria, Katharina's successor, completely humiliates Petruchio by means of a series of extravagant tricks, all of which are ultimately made possible by taking advantage of her husband's unsatisfied desire for her. The resulting comedy of situation is, however, very tightly constructed, the subplot, which deals with the love affair between Livia and the rather ineffectual Rowland, is skillfully interwoven with the main plot. Much broadly comic business is introduced more or less for its own sake—notably the invasion of the townswomen—but the pace of the action is so fast and the matter so high spirited that the whole play comes off successfully.

The Story

As they gathered in Petruchio's house after the wedding, Moroso, Sophocles, and Tranio discussed the match that had been made between Petruchio, the shrew tamer, and the soft and yielding Maria, daughter of Petronius. Although Moroso, an ancient dotard who was infatuated with Livia, Petronius' second daughter, held that Petruchio was not so terrible as some believed, the others agreed that his first wife, now dead, had so inflamed his ill humor that Maria was in for a very bad time indeed. As a man's man Petruchio left nothing to be desired, but as a woman's man he was fiery and unpredictable.

A different conversation occupied two other wedding guests. Young Rowland was half afraid that Livia, enticed by Moroso's gold, would renounce the love she had secretly sworn to him, and he was attempting to induce her to elope with him. But Livia, who was as practical as she was beautiful, was unwilling to sacrifice her marriage portion by marrying without her father's permission. Vowing that she had a plan which would make her legitimately his, she sent Rowland from her. She was immediately joined by the new bride Maria and her cousin Bianca.

Influenced by Bianca, Maria had undergone such a change that Livia was shocked. Gone were her soft and gentle manners, in their place Maria urged on by Bianca, exhibited a firm resolution. She would fight a holy war for the salvation of all womanhood. Never would she yield herself to her husband until his spirit was broken, until the wife tamer was himself tamed. This she proclaimed in so imperious and immodest a tone that Livia left offended, but Maria's plans remained unchanged. When Jacques entered to inform her that Petruchio was ready to come to her, she replied that Petruchio could sleep elsewhere—he would share no bed with her. Dumbfounded, Jacques sought the impatient bridegroom.

Jacques interrupted Petruchio's boasts of his sexual prowess with the news that Maria and Bianca were firmly entrenched in the bedchamber with a month's rations and the determination that no man should enter until he had come to terms with them. Just then the window opened above the courtyard where Petruchio was standing, and Maria appeared to announce that she would remain barricaded until Petruchio signed the articles she proposed. Petruchio began to reason with her, gently at first but with increasing fire, but for every one of his arguments she had a counterargument of greater weight Finally, in a blind rage, Petruchio swore that he would starve her into submission Thus the engagement ended, with the bride inside and the bridegroom firmly locked out

Livia, meanwhile, began to put her plan into action With Moroso looking on, she purposely offended Rowland and bade him what seemed to be a final farewell as the young man stalked away, cursing women and all their works Moroso took this as a sign that his suit had prospered, yet when he attempted to kiss Livia, she gave him a box on the ear Somewhat discomfited, Moroso complained to Petronius, who assured him that within two hours the girl would be married to him But Livia had other ideas Approaching the sealed chamber, she begged to become a member of the women's party Her admission was assured when Maria learned that she was laden with provisions

Outside the siege continued Sophocles argued for a peaceful settlement, but Petruchio was adamant, he would assert his rights as a husband—no woman could daunt him But Petruchio had reckoned without the townswomen who had learned of Maria's stand Armed with pot lids, ladles, and other household utensils they formed a relief column and forced their way into the women's stronghold The victory was celebrated with dancing and wine and several of the victors drank rather more than they should have The siege was lifted and the vanquished men agreed to a treaty Petruchio yielded to Maria's terms, liberty and clothes and Moroso agreed to Livia's, that she should be forced to marry no one for a month Then victors and vanquished celebrated at a supper attended by all the townswomen

Although the women had temporarily called a truce, the war was not yet over As Rowland sulked and swore that he was forever through with love, Petruchio, attempting to bed his bride met another cold rebuff Once more in a rage, he offered half his land to the one who could make him stop loving her Continuing to press her advantage, Maria first ordered an elaborate gown, then new horses and hawks for hunting, and new hangings for the house Finally she considered having the house torn down altogether and rebuilt in a more pleasant location Hard pressed Petruchio again attempted to reason with her as sweetly as he could, however, he once more flew into a rage when Maria began to flirt openly with Sophocles In despair, Petruchio resolved simply to die, he declared that only his death could shame his shrewish wife

In the meantime Rowland was still having difficulties Tranio had induced him to show how little he cared for Livia by attending her forthcoming wedding to Moroso He returned to her the various favors she had given him during their courtship and gave her a parting kiss Suddenly, his resolution beginning to weaken, he had to hurry from the scene to prevent love's stealing upon him again

At the same time all was in confusion at Petruchio's Declaring that her husband was sick of the plague, Maria was having the house stripped of all its furnishings In spite of his protests that he was as healthy as anyone else, Petruchio was put under guard, and all of his friends deserted him for fear of infection Left alone except for some members of the watch, the supposedly dying man burst open the door and put his guardians to flight by threatening them with a fowling piece Only then did he realize that Maria had executed another maneuver in her campaign to humiliate him, but this blow was not the final one Soon Maria returned and belabored him soundly for casting her off during his sickness Stung beyond endurance, Petruchio nearly struck her, but caught himself because she vowed to repay any mistreatment by cuckolding him with the first man she met

Moroso also was feeling the pangs of despised love, and Petronius again promised him that he should enjoy Livia soon. However, Bianca and Tranio were hatching a plot to aid Livia in her efforts to thwart her suitor. Tranio's task was to persuade Rowland to return to Petronius' house while Livia, under Bianca's tutelage, feigned illness. After she was safely abed and Tranio had lured Rowland to the scene, Bianca informed Moroso that although Livia was suffering an emotional upset she had renounced Rowland forever and would accept him instead. When the entire party had gathered around her bed, Livia, speaking in the weak voice of one desperately sick, contritely begged Moroso's pardon for the many tricks she had played upon him. She then sadly took her final leave of Rowland and had him sign a paper which she produced, a document in which he formally renounced any claim he had upon her. After Moroso and Petronius had affixed their signatures, the party left the ailing maid to recuperate. But as Rowland sadly walked toward his home, he looked more closely at his copy of the paper. To his delight, he found that it was not a renunciation at all, but a marriage contract. Livia's strange actions then became clear to him, she had tricked Moroso and her father into giving her and her dowry to the man she loved.

Petruchio, during this time, was at tempting to meet Maria's strategy with some ruses of his own. Pretending that her treatment of him had killed any love he had felt for her, he threatened to set out on a journey. She took the announcement calmly and encouraged him to do so. This scheme failing, he had himself carried home in a coffin surrounded by mourners who lamented that his wife's evil ways had killed him. On seeing his body, Maria wept, but not for his death. Rather, she grieved that he had led such a misguided and foolish life.

This was the last straw. Petruchio sat up in the coffin. But at last he had to admit himself outwitted and defeated. Maria now had her wish, her campaign had been an unqualified success. Embracing her husband, she announced that from that moment she was entirely his to do with as he chose. With the tamer tamed, she vowed to be a humble and dutiful wife. And Petruchio, his lesson learned, forgave her.

WOMEN BEWARE WOMEN

Type of work Drama

Author Thomas Middleton (1580-1627)

Type of plot Tragedy of revenge

Time of plot Early seventeenth century

Locale Florence, Italy

First presented c. 1621

Principal characters

LEANTIO, a Florentine clerk

BIANCA, his wife

FABRICIO, a Florentine gentleman

ISABELLA, his daughter

LIVIA, Fabricio's sister

HIPPOLITO, brother of Livia and Fabricio

THE DUKE OF FLORENCE

A CARDINAL, the Duke's brother

THE WARD

GUARDIANO, his uncle and guardian

Critique

This Jacobean drama is set in Italy, the conventional background which in tragedies of the period implied luxury, vice, and violence. Within this framework Middleton dispassionately and ironically recorded human—especially feminine—motivation and passion The moral ending is also conventional The lasting impression left by the play is one of the movement of characters from deliberate scheming to uncontrollable involvement and destruction The dramatic structure of the play is unbalanced, and the slow entanglement of destructive passions is abruptly changed to the final, almost farcical, holocaust The tragedy is memorable not for its moral ending but for the nightmare quality of human passions revealed by the force of richly dramatic verse

The Story

Leantio, a Florentine merchant's clerk, married Bianca, a beautiful and well born Venetian, and brought her to his mother's house On her arrival there, she responded graciously to his mother's words of welcome and spoke of her love for Leantio He in turn informed his mother of Bianca's luxurious background and of his inability to equal it He explained also that Bianca was a great prize who must be kept hidden from other men's eyes His mother feared that Bianca would be discontented with her new and poorer home

In a richer house, Livia was entertaining her brother Fabricio the father of Isabella, and Guardiano the uncle of a rich and foolish boy called the Ward They discussed the proposed marriage between the Ward and Isabella Livia, protesting against loveless marriages, lectured Fabricio on man's unfaithfulness and woman's obedience, and declared that she would never remarry When Isabella was sent for, Fabricio declared that her uncle Hippolito would surely follow her in her married state because they were as inseparable as links in a chain Isabella's ideals, especially her ideas on marriage, were in marked contrast to the Ward's foolishness and vulgarity She dreaded marriage to him and regarded it as slavery This was her explanation to Livia, who sent Hippolito to comfort her At that time Isabella's conscious feelings toward her uncle were those of deep friendship Unaware at the time of any sexual attraction toward him, she was horrified and sadly left him when he told her he loved her as a man loves his wife

When Leantio finally left Bianca at his mother's house and returned to his work, Bianca wept bitterly She was distracted from her grief by the noise and excitement of the annual religious procession to the cathedral Deeply impressed by the noble bearing of the Duke of Florence, Bianca was sure that he noticed her as she watched him passing by

Meanwhile, Hippolito had told Livia of his love for Isabella and of her reaction, and Livia promised to procure the girl as his mistress When Isabella confided her unhappiness to Livia, her aunt took the opportunity to tell her that Hippolito was not her uncle, that she was in fact the child of Fabricio's wife by a Spanish nobleman She insisted, however, that Isabella keep this matter a secret because Fabricio and Hippolito were ignorant of it Thus Isabella welcomed Hippolito with a kiss when he returned and he marveled at Livia's skill Isabella decided that she would still marry the Ward in order to conceal her love affair with Hippolito

While with Livia, Guardiano told her that the Duke of Florence was enamored of a girl he had seen on the balcony of Leantio's mother's house Accordingly, Livia undertook to win her for the Duke and summoned Leantio's mother for a game of chess Under pressure, the mother admitted that she had a daughter in law in her home, and Bianca was sent for She was taken on a tour of the house by Guardiano, who thus led her to the Duke

While the Duke spoke of his passion for her, Bianca pleaded for her honor, virtue, and safety The Duke, continuing his token pleading, intimated to Bianca, however that she did not have the power to refuse him When she returned to the two chess players, Bianca was half pleased

by the Duke but also eager to have revenge on Livia

At home, Bianca's ensuing frustration and discontent infuriated her mother-in-law and she was glad that Leantio would soon return. On his arrival Leantio, delighted to be home, anticipated an ecstatic reunion with his wife, but he was greeted coldly by Bianca and angrily repulsed. Before long, sent for by the Duke, she went to the palace with Leantio's mother. Left alone, Leantio abandoned himself to jealousy, but he failed to realize the extent of his betrayal until he too was summoned to dine with the Duke.

When offered the command of a distant city, Leantio was as powerless to refuse as he was to disrupt the affair between his wife and her noble lover, and he was forced to stand by when Bianca, bored by the banquet, left with the Duke.

In the meantime Livia, who had fallen in love at first sight with Leantio, was determined to woo him from his grief. When she indirectly offered herself as his mistress, he accepted because of the wealth and luxury she promised. Some weeks later Leantio visited Bianca in her apartment at the court and they jeered at each other's finery and new place in the world. Later Bianca told the Duke of her husband's visit and disclosed that he had become Livia's lover. Jealous of Leantio, the Duke informed Hippolito, who, as the ruler expected, threatened to kill his sister's lover in order to preserve publicly Livia's honor.

The Duke's pleasure at the idea of Leantio's death was increased when his brother, the Cardinal, threatened him with the fires of hell if he continued to live adulterously. Having vowed that he would reform, he decided that with Leantio dead he could lawfully marry Bianca. And so Leantio was murdered. Livia, finding Hippolito with her lover's body and driven almost to madness by grief, fury, and malice, betrayed him and Isabella and admitted that she had lied to Isabella about her parentage in order to make her Hippolito's mistress. Isabella, who had transgressed, unlike the others, through ignorance, resolved to leave Hippolito and in turn to avenge herself by destroying Livia.

The separate revenges plotted by these people resulted in their own deaths. At a masque held ostensibly in honor of the Duke's marriage to Bianca, poisoned in cense, killed Isabella and Livia. Hippolito stabbed himself, and Bianca had the Duke poisoned and then drank also from the poisoned cup.

THE WOMEN OF TRACHIS

Type of work Drama

Author Sophocles (c. 496-406 or 405 B.C.)

Type of plot Classical tragedy

Time of plot Remote antiquity

Locale Trachis

First presented Before 408 B.C.

Principal characters

HERAKLES

DEIANIRA, his wife

HYLLUS, their son

LICHAS, herald of Herakles

IOLÉ, captive wife to Herakles

CHORUS OF TRACHINIAN MAIDENS

Critique

The Women of Trachis (Trachiniae), recounting the last crisis in the life of Herakles, is of interest for several reasons.

It is the only surviving tragedy of Sophocles which ends in death for both of the chief characters. Also, though they are constantly in the mind of spectator or reader, neither appears on the stage at the same time. The gods, as in the Sophoclean drama, take an active part, but in this painful play they are unseen, though from beginning to end it is their will that is done, their oracles that are fulfilled. The tragedy is of universal interest because it emphasizes the devotion and love inherent in womanhood while in the awful agonies of Herakles are embodied the heroic endurance and strength representative of ideal masculinity. Appropriately, the title is not derived from either hero or heroine but from the Chorus of Trachinian Maidens who are on the stage from beginning to end.

The Story

Fifteen long months had passed since Deianira had received word from Herakles her husband who, when he left on his last journey had given her a tablet setting forth the disposition of his estate and stating that it had been decreed that after a year and three moons had passed he would either die or live happily there after in untroubled peace. The fated day had arrived, and Deianira was filled with foreboding.

However, before she could send her son Hyllus to get accurate news of her husband a messenger outstripping the herald Lichas, arrived to announce that Herakles was living and would soon appear. Lichas himself followed shortly with a group of captive maidens and answering Deianira's question assured her that her husband, alive and sound of limb, was at that time sacrificing the fruits of his victories to great Zeus in fulfillment of a vow made when he took from towered Oechalia the captive women. Deianira was touched by the plight of the captives. Lichas told her they were from the city ruled by Eurytus, selected by Herakles as chosen possessions for himself and the gods but, he added, it was not the taking of the city that had delayed the hero this long time. He had been detained in Lydia. Sold into bondage, he had passed a year as servant to Omphale, the barbaric queen. Before this bondage Eurytus, an old friend, had taunted and so incensed him that Herakles encountering Iphitus, one of Eurytus' four sons, without warning hurled him from a cliff. This act roused the ire of Olympian Zeus who, because Herakles had slain a foe by treachery and not in fair fight, drove him out to be sold as a slave to Omphale. But those who had reviled Herakles had been conquered, and now Lichas brought these virgins by Herakles' order to Deianira.

A strange pity came over Deianira as she gazed at the captives. One in particular, Iole, held her attention but Lichas pretended not to know who she was, and Iole herself spoke no word, bearing in silence her grief and suffering. The messenger however, informed Deianira that Lichas had not told the truth, which was that Herakles for love of Iole had destroyed Eurytus, the maiden's father, that it was not his adventures in Lydia, his serfdom with Omphale nor the death of Iphitus which had held him these many moons but love for this maid. Failing to persuade her father to give up his daughter, Herakles had attacked Oechalia, sacked the city, slain Eurytus, and taken Iole for his concubine. Deianira, cruelly hurt, called upon Lichas to tell her everything. He confirmed the news. Sorrowfully she asked the herald to wait while she had suitable gifts prepared for Herakles in return for those he had sent.

But Deianira could not bear the thought of having another share her husband's affections. Judging it unwise to give way to anger she thought of another course. In an old urn she had long hid a keepsake of Nessus, the centaur whose work it was to ferry wayfarers across the river Euenus, carrying them in his arms. When Deianira, as a bride, was on her way to Herakles, she too was carried across by the centaur but in midstream he lewdly sought to take her. Her screams brought from the waiting son of Zeus an arrow that pierced the centaur's lungs. Dying, he told Deianira that as the last to be ferried across the river she should profit by receiving from him a love philter made by taking the curdled gore from his wound. This would act as a charm so that Herakles would never find any other woman fairer than she. Now, recalling these words, Deianira selected a festal robe and smeared it with the magic ointment. Then she presented the robe to Lichas, telling him he was to instruct Herakles to put it on immediately, before sun or light struck it, and stand before the people with it on as he made his sacrifices to the gods.

No sooner had Lichas departed how ever, than Deianira felt uneasy because she had resorted to magic to win back her husband's love. Quickly her fears were realized. She had faithfully followed the instructions of the centaur by preserving the drug unexposed to light or fire or sun until the moment of application. Secretly, indoors, she had spread the unguent on the robe with some wool and, folding the gift, had placed it securely in a chest. Now, by chance, she threw the tuft of wool on the flagstones in the blazing sun, whereupon there boiled up from it clots of foam as it consumed itself and disappeared into nothingness. In consternation Deianira realized that the black venomous gore, instead of winning anew her husband's love, had been dying Nessus' trick to cause his death, and she would be his murderer. Overwhelmed, she determined to end her own life.

Hyllus returned. He had seen Herakles receive from Lichas the robe and put it on. Then, when the fierce rays of the sun had melted the venom with which the deadly garment was coated, it clung to his body, the sweat burst out, and, before the assembled company, he writhed in dreadful pain. Herakles in his agony called out to Lichas, who told him the robe was Deianira's gift, whereupon the unhappy man seized the messenger by the foot and dashed out his brains against a rock. When, shouting and shrieking, Herakles called on Hyllus to carry him away to die where no one might see him, they had placed him on a ship and brought him to his home.

Hyllus now accused his mother of her vile deed and called down on her the vengeance of the Erinyes. Silently Deianira went indoors and in the bedchamber of Herakles bade farewell to her bridal bed. Then with a sword she pierced her heart and died. Hyllus, told by others that his mother's gift of the robe to Herakles had been instigated by the centaur, realized too late her innocence, and he grieved to lose in one day both mother and sire.

Hyllus, still lamenting, left, but returned with attendants bearing his father on a litter. Herakles, fighting off the deadly spasms that shook him, entreated his son to end his miserable life. He recalled his great labors and the fact that he had never met defeat. But now death had come by a woman's wile. Hyllus told him that Deianira had been innocent of murderous intent in her act; that she had wished only to win back his love, that it was the centaur's venom that had brought about his undoing, and that Deianira, not wishing to live without him, now lay cold and dead.

Herakles admitted that it had been foreshown him that he would perish not by any living being but by a dweller in the realms of the Dead. Because the prophecy had also promised him release from his toils, he had misinterpreted it as meaning a happy life. Instead, it had portended death, for with death comes the end of toil.

Knowing thus that it was the will of the gods, Herakles faced death nobly. He bade Hyllus bear him to the peak of Oeta, place him on a great funeral pyre of oak and olive, and ignite it. Hyllus consented to carry his sire to his destination and prepare the pyre, but he refused to light it. Herakles, not pressing him, asked as one other boon that Hyllus take Iole to wife and care for her. Unwillingly, but moved by filial obedience, Hyllus assented. In these dread matters he saw the will of immortal Zeus.

WORKS AND DAYS

Type of work Poetry

Author Hesiod (fl c 735 B C)

First transcribed Eighth century B C

Proof of the existence of a writer who flourished about 2,500 years ago is hard to find. Herodotus, liking to exaggerate the antiquity of people, wrote that Hesiod lived "not more than 400 years before my time," putting him about 850 B C. Most scholars, however, are inclined to place him a century later. Some, believing that the author of Theogony, a genealogy of the gods (from which Aeschylus took his Prometheus Bound), could not have written Works and Days because of different concepts and styles, solve the problem by guessing at two writers with the same name.

At any rate, Homer and Hesiod have left the only Greek writing of the Epic age. Hesiod, in his Theogony, shows his indebtedness to the Homeric concept of Zeus, his power and his family life as set forth in the Iliad. Working with some of Homer's earlier material, Hesiod the traditionalist tried also to combine the concepts of his own times. In Works and Days, he is no longer concerned with the past. To him the gods are contemporary, directly influencing life in Boeotia. He was talking about his own environment, and not writing a story of the past.

From internal evidence (lines 636-640), it is assumed that the author's father migrated across the Aegean from Cyme in Aeolia on account of poverty. He settled at Ascra, a village of Boeotia, at the foot of Mt. Helicon. Ovid, in referring to Hesiod, used the adjective "ascraeus." The poet himself, heir to the traditions of minstrelsy in this colony of Hellas, says that he once sailed to Chalcis in Euboea, where he competed in a poetry contest held by Amphidamas, and won the prize, a tripod with handles, which he gave to the Muses of Helicon.

The poem also contains details of a lawsuit brought against Hesiod by his brother Perses. Apparently by bribery of the judges, Perses was awarded Hesiod's sheep. But the diligent Hesiod accumulated another fortune while Perses lost all he had and was forced to beg further help from the poet. Without hard feelings, Hesiod gave him assistance with the warning not to ask again, and put his admonitions in a poem of 828 lines, of which the title well sums up its content: Rules for work and days on which luck is favorable.

Works and Days is neither a scientific treatise on farming nor a lesson on economic recovery through diligence, but rather a combination of moral precepts and an agricultural almanac. Under the symbols of Prometheus and Epimetheus (Forethought and Afterthought), Hesiod epitomized himself and his brother.

In epic style, Hesiod begins Works and Days with an appeal to the Muses of Pieria, to sing of their father Zeus, who determines man's fame or dishonor, provides the good and the bad, destroys the mighty, and rewards the humble. The poet adds that there are two kinds of Strife on earth, one good and one bad. The good Strife, the elder daughter of Dark Night and of Zeus, the Son of Chronos, makes men industrious so that they strive to imitate and surpass their neighbors.

Then, addressing himself to his brother Perses, Hesiod begs him not to follow the other Strife, in market place or court house. First lay up food for a year, he advises, and then, if necessary, enter disputes of law. This section contains references to Perses' unbrotherly lawsuit to get more than his rightful share of their father's possessions.

Prometheus by craft recovered the fire that Zeus had taken from men, and in revenge Zeus created a woman of water and earth Pandora ("The All Endowed") received all the lures provided by the gods to deceive men. She was eagerly accepted by Epimetheus, who had forgotten his brother's warning against gifts from the gods.

Before her advent, men lived on earth free from wearying toil and death bringing diseases. But Pandora removed the great lid from the jar and all the evils flew out and scattered over the earth.

Hesiod then tells another tale about the way gods and men came from the same seed. In the time of Chronos there existed a golden race of mortals, living like gods and ignorant of sorrow or old age. Everything good belonged to them: abundant flocks, fruits, the blessings of the gods. After the earth covered them, the gods created an inferior race of silver. After a hundred years of idiotic childhood, they came of age only to kill one another off in warfare. A third race followed whose delight was war; they died and went to chill Hades. Then came the demi-gods, the heroes of Thebes and Troy, preceding the present race of iron, whose daily lot is weariness and woe. To them, might is right. They have no reverence for justice and oaths.

At this point in the poem Hesiod tells the first animal fable in Greek literature, the tale of a hawk who flew high into the sky with a nightingale, lecturing her against the folly of trying to compete with stronger people. To Perses, he adds a warning that violence is a bad quality in a poor man. For him, justice is better.

A city that provides honest judgments, says Hesiod, is blessed by Zeus who protects it from war and famine. Its citizens never have to make sea voyages (which Hesiod hated), their earth provides their living. But an insolent city, even one with a single insolent citizen, is plagued by the gods because justice, the daughter of Zeus, is quick with rewards or punishment.

Then follows a series of homilies as encouragement to the lazy and improvident Perses: "Work is no disgrace; it is idleness that is disgraceful." "The idle envy the wealth of the hard worker and try to seize it violently. God-given wealth is better."

After these homilies the poet rhymes a sort of farmers' almanac. Plow when the Pleiades set (in November). After forty days they come back. Then sharpen your sickle. When the autumn rains come, cut your wood. Choose oak for ploughbeams, and bring home two, in case one breaks. Get two nine-year-old oxen to plow. A forty-year-old slave is most reliable in the fields. Have everything ready to start plowing when the cry of the crane is heard. If the cuckoo sings, plant quickly, for it will rain in three days. When winter comes, your slaves will need twice as much food; your oxen half their regular ration. Prune your grapes before the return of the swallow, sixty days after the sun turns. When Orion is overhead, it is time to harvest your grapes. Sun them for ten days, cover them for five, and then press out the wine.

His theories on husbandry extend into domestic life. The ideal time for a man to marry, he says, is at the age of thirty, for a woman, the fifth year after puberty. Marry a neighbor, but be sure the others will not laugh at your choice.

Finally, the poet records holy days and the lucky days for different tasks. He concludes that the wise man is the one who works blamelessly before the deathless gods for he knows the propitious omens and avoids sin.

Works and Days served Vergil as the model for his Georgics.

WORKS OF JONATHAN EDWARDS

Type of work Essays and sermons

Author Jonathan Edwards (1703-1758)

First published 1731-1758 (Collected Works 1808-1809)

Jonathan Edwards, Calvinist preacher and philosopher, was America's first eminent philosopher. Metaphysically, he was an idealist like Berkeley, but his primary concern was not with the traditional problems of philosophy but with theological issues that had a direct bearing on the religious practices of his time. He used his philosophy to assert the absolute sovereignty of God and to reaffirm the doctrine of original sin. He argued that reason and natural goodness are not enough to make a man virtuous; man needs revelation and disinterested benevolence if he is to be worth while as a religious person. Showing the influence of Locke and Newton, Edwards argued that every event has a cause; he then went on to maintain that man is free, nevertheless in that he can do as he wills and is therefore responsible for his actions.

The effect of Edwards' work was a strong revival of idealism and Calvinistic pietism. His own congregation responded with a surprising number of conversions as he reports in his essay "Narrative of Surprising Conversions" (1736). Edwards attributed what he called the "awakening" to God's influence, but it is clear that his efforts were at least instrumental. The Puritan revival grew to such proportions that the phrase "The Great Awakening" was devised to describe the period between 1740 and 1742.

Edwards' earliest philosophical efforts are preserved in his "Notes on the Mind," an early product of his reading of Locke's Essay Concerning Human Understanding. Edwards went beyond Locke in much the same critical manner as Berkeley, pointing out that the primary qualities of extension, motion, and figure, are as much dependent on the senses as are the secondary qualities of color, taste, sound, and odor. Like Berkeley, Edwards decided that objects are combinations of ideas and that the "Substance of all Bodies, is the infinitely exact, and precise, and perfectly stable Idea, in God's mind." Edwards identified perceptions with ideas and attributed all ideas to the influence of God. Like later idealists, he defined truth as the consistency of ideas with themselves: to know that a proposition is true one perceives the relations between ideas, but to have a false idea is to suppose that certain relations obtain among the ideas which, as a matter of fact, do not so obtain. The essay also presented an analysis of value in terms of "the inclination and disposition of the mind." In Notes on the Mind we also find the claim that "all Virtue, which is the Excellency of minds, is resolved into Love to Being" an idea which was later developed in more detail in the essay titled A Dissertation on the Nature of True Virtue.

In the essay on true virtue, written in 1755, Edwards wrote that "true virtue," by which he meant actual, as distinguished from merely apparent, moral excellence, "consists in benevolence to Being general. Or perhaps to speak more accurately, it is that consent, propensity and union of heart to Being in general that is immediately exercised in a general good will." Edwards argued that all sin is the result of self love which resists the directives of the "natural conscience." True virtue is the actual consent to Being, the acceptance of God, and must be distinguished from the natural conscience which approves of true virtue, although it is not itself the virtuous response to Being.

For many outside of Edwards' faith, the problem has always been that of reconciling the idea of God's sovereignty with the idea that God, as Being, should be the object of disinterested benevolence, or love. In his sermon, "Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God," for example, Edwards spoke from the pulpit of the imminence of hell for the wicked: "There is nothing that keeps wicked men at any one moment out of hell, but the mere pleasure of God. By the mere pleasure of God, I mean his sovereign pleasure, his arbitrary will, restrained by no obligation." He went on to warn that

"natural men are held in the hand of God over the pit of hell they have deserved the fiery pit, and are already sentenced to it" He declared that the wrath of God is "everlasting" and that the torments of hell will continue for 'millions and millions of ages' Finally he concluded that "it would be a wonder if some that are now present should not be in hell in a very short time, before this year is out And it would be no wonder if some persons, that now sit here in some seats of this meeting house in health and quiet and secure should be there before tomorrow morning"

In his Personal Narrative (1765) Edwards wrote that the doctrine of God's sovereignty "used to appear like a horrible doctrine to me," but he had come to regard the doctrine as "exceeding pleasant, bright, and sweet" For a man who had learned to consent to Being the change of attitude was inevitable But how was Edwards to reconcile for his congregation the idea of a sovereign God whose nature and grace are beyond discovery with the idea of a God worthy of love? To understand the answer, one must consider in turn, two such famous sermons as "God Glorified in Man's Dependence" delivered in 1731, and "A Divine and Supernatural Light, Immediately Imparted to the Soul by the Spirit of God, Shown to be Both a Scriptural and Rational Doctrine," delivered in 1734

The former sermon was enthusiastically received by Calvinist ministers who sought, through its publication, to defend their faith from attack In his sermon Edwards argued that the redeemed are absolutely dependent on God, that His grace is entirely free, that all good is in God, and that the fact of man's dependence glorifies God To have any hope of an eternal life, a man should "abase himself, and reflect on his own exceeding unworthiness of such a favor, and to exalt God alone" Although Edwards insisted that the redeemed have spiritual joy because of their dependence, the emphasis was more on the fact of dependence and on God's glory than on the satisfaction of being redeemed

In the sermon 'A Divine and Supernatural Light,' Edwards used the psychology he had learned from reading Locke to emphasize his claim that there is no natural way of coming to know and love God The blessedness of some men their spiritual happiness resulted from God's having given them a spiritual light whereby they could come to be convinced of God's reality and excellence Such a spiritual light cannot be explained in any of the ways by which we understand natural faculties of the understanding and will it must be imparted by the Spirit of God Edwards offered the doctrine as both scriptural and 'rational' The sermon concluded with a reassuring statement of the value of the spiritual light "It draws forth the heart in a sincere love to God, which is the only principle of a true gracious and universal obedience and it convinces of the reality of those glorious rewards that God has promised to them that obey him"

By alternatively emphasizing the sovereignty of God and the joy of loving Him, Edwards achieved a balance between the harsh and the comforting aspects of his Calvinistic views

Of his essays the most famous is the essay on the freedom of the will a book length study entitled "A Careful and Strict Inquiry into the Modern Prevailing Notions of that Freedom of the Will, Which is Supposed to be Essential to Moral Agency, Virtue and Vice, Reward and Punishment, Praise and Blame" The will is quickly and simply defined as the power to choose Edwards then agreed that Locke was correct in distinguishing between will and desire, the latter being restricted to what is absent, but he argued that the distinction was not important in the problem of free will The will is determined, he wrote, because in consequence of some influence a choice is made The will is always determined by the strongest motive, i e., by the prevailing inclination Whether one considers natural or moral necessity in either case one is considering the connection of cause and effect By freedom is meant the power to do as one pleases or wills Thus, even if the will is determined by the strongest motive there is no contradiction involved in saying that a man is free if he can do what he wills If a person is forced to do something then he is not free, but even if the will is determined by cause, a man is free if he can do as he chooses

Edwards would have rejected the question of the freedom or determination of the will For him the answer was that the will is both determined and free it is determined in that it acts from causes it is free provided the person who wills is able to act as he wills

Edwards concluded that whenever an act results from the exercise of a man's will, the agent is morally responsible for his act By his philosophical resolution of the problem of free will Edwards was able to relate moral necessity to

God's necessarily choosing the best He rejected Arminian criticisms which attempted to support a conception of liberty as 'indifferent' i.e., a conception of the will as capable of acting entirely without determination

Other important essays by Edwards are "The Great Christian Doctrine of Original Sin Defended" (1758) "True Grace" (1753) "Dissertation Concerning the End for which God Created the World" (1755), and "Treatise Concerning Religious Affections" (1746)

Edwards brought all of his philosophical powers to bear on the issues which kept Calvinism in the midst of religious controversy and although few modern philosophical critics would grant that he in any way proved his case it is generally conceded that he played a major role in the "Great Awakening" and gave American philosophy an initial impetus and influence that continued until realistic and pragmatic ideas effectively displaced religious idealism

THE WORLD AS WILL AND IDEA

Type of work Philosophy

Author Arthur Schopenhauer (1788 1860)

First published 1818

In his massive masterpiece The World as Will and Idea (Die Welt als Wille und Vorstellung), Schopenhauer goes to great lengths, following Kant, to argue that everything that exists is a manifestation of will Man's life should be an attempt to see this fact clearly and to recognize that the will brings nothing but suffering The most satisfactory life, then, is one that finally succeeds in extinguishing itself, not by suicide but by an elimination of will

It might be supposed that his philosophy made Schopenhauer a pessimist, but it is probably nearer to the truth to say that the pessimist Schopenhauer made his philosophy If his mother, whom he hated, had not had a strong will, perhaps

Schopenhauer would not have come to the conclusion that everything is will, but if he had not developed his philosophy, not only would there have been no great work for the melancholy Romantics, but there would have been no adequate stimulus for Nietzsche's idiosyncratic extension of Schopenhauer's ideas

To persons who are not philosophers it is very difficult and sometimes impossible to imagine how anyone could suppose that the world is nothing but will But there is a simple way of succeeding at this task one has only to suppose that the philosopher's will is so strong and his preoccupation with his own ideas so great that he soon comes to believe that all talk about a physical world that is in no way will or idea must be nonsensical. Of course, he finds reasons for what he claims, but his reasons usually turn out to be ingenious academic constructions designed to disguise the limited concern which the philosophical view expresses.

Schopenhauer prefaces his work with an expression of indebtedness to Kant, Plato, and the Upanishads. He was in debt to Kant for the idea that the world as we know it is conditioned by our way of seeing and understanding it, and from Sanskrit literature and Indian philosophy he derived the basic belief that suffering is the inevitable consequence of the exercise of will and that Nirvana, the eternal calm that follows the elimination of will, is all that man can hope for. He modified Kant radically in claiming that the ultimate reality is will, and he did not share any positive conception of Nirvana but chose to emphasize the value of total extinction, coming to be nothing.

"The world is my idea"—this is a truth which holds good for everything that lives and knows, though man alone can bring it into reflective and abstract consciousness." So the book begins. The initial line of justification is acceptable to almost anyone, Schopenhauer argues that we do not know the sun and earth, for example, in any direct way but only in relation to our own experience. Put it another way: all that we ever know is known by means of the ideas we have about objects. But then Schopenhauer makes the typical idealist leap. From the proposition that we know only by our ideas he passes to the claim that we know only our ideas. He writes, "All that in any way belongs or can belong to the world is inevitably conditioned through the subject, and exists only for the subject. The world is idea."

The subject is "That which knows all things and is known by none." Consequently, no one knows himself as subject. Everyone knows his body, for his body is an idea and can exist only for a subject, but no one knows that subject. The subject is not in space and time, for space and time (following Kant) are forms in which the subject knows objects. The subject's mode of understanding is such that only by perceiving objects spatially and temporally can he perceive them at all, but it would be a mistake to suppose that objects themselves, considered as something other than ideas, are in space and time. It would be a mistake on two counts. First, it would be a confusion of the object of our knowledge, an idea, with what could never be an object of knowledge, viz., something 'outside,' a thing in itself. Secondly, it would be an instance of the fallacy of attributing to the objects of our perception the conditions of our perception, that is, it would be like holding seriously that everything is green when the fact of the matter is that we are looking at everything through green glasses. (This is not Schopenhauer's analogy.)

Schopenhauer's way of making the point that space, time, and causality are features given to objects by the subject because of its way of understanding objects is by saying that 'the essential and hence universal forms of all objects, space, time, and causality, may, without knowledge of the object, be discovered and fully known from a consideration of the subject ie, in Kantian language, they lie a priori in our consciousness."

Schopenhauer explicitly rejects realism and calls it a "grave error" to suppose that physical objects are the cause of our sensations. His basic argument in support of his rejection of realism consists in the claim that since causality is a condition of perception (we must understand objects as causally related to each other) it can hardly be a principle by reference to which one explains objects.

It is only because we, as knowing subjects, have bodies that we can come to have knowledge of the content of our ideas. Schopenhauer decides that what objectifies itself as body is will. The body is like other objects in being known as an idea, but it is different because we understand it 'from the inside,' so to speak, as a manifestation of will Schopenhauer insists that he is not using the word 'will' to mean force, he desires "that every force in nature should be thought of as will." He refers to insect and animal life in order to defend his point. "The bird of a year old has no idea of the eggs for which it builds a nest, the young spider has no idea of the prey for which it spins a web."

For Schopenhauer then, everything that is known to us is known as idea, and all ideas are conditioned by the knowing subject. Yet if the knowing subject were eliminated, there would still remain the "thing in itself," which Schopenhauer identifies as will.

Schopenhauer then goes on to argue that in recognizing will as the inner reality of the world he is agreeing with Plato who maintained that the Ideas or unchangeable forms constitute that reality. He contends that the Platonic idea is the object of art, that art affords pleasure because it presents the 'purely knowable side of the world' and allows the artist and the spectator to escape, for moments at a time, from the intimate knowledge of will as suffering.

The philosopher's interest in art as a way to the knowledge of Idea the highest objectification of will leads Schopenhauer into a number of chapters concerning the theory of art, drama, architecture, music, poetry, and beauty. The constant effort to explain art in terms of the will results, on occasion, in some interesting, if not acceptable, observations. For example, Schopenhauer claims that the beauty of a landscape derives from the 'truth and consistency' of nature. He argues that wherever nature is left alone natural beauty results. "Every neglected plant at once becomes beautiful," he assures us. The English garden allows the will of nature to express itself but the French garden imposes man's will on hedges, plants, and trees, so that it is difficult, if not impossible, for a French garden to have any natural beauty.

If we consider the world as the objectification of will then we must consider it as having no end of suffering. If the will were entirely content, it could not exist. Will is a striving, and a striving or effort is a sign of defect. As long as there is striving there is suffering and satisfaction is always short lived and only partial. Having made these points Schopenhauer then draws the conclusion that recognition of will as the only reality leads to a recognition of the value of denying the will. If man denies the will, he denies painful striving although in eliminating will he eliminates the world, everything that exists he escapes from suffering and attains a kind of peace. At that stage "only knowledge remains, the will has vanished." Even though the denial of the will results in nothingness—for if every thing is will, the elimination of will is the elimination of everything—Schopenhauer prefers nothingness to the ceaseless striving and suffering of the will. In any case, he argues that nothingness is always relative to something, and that to achieve nothingness is nothing more than to be rid of something namely, suffering.

One can understand how a pessimist who was at the same time a philosopher might come to prefer the peace of willing nothing to the pain of willing what always escapes or changes, or dies. But why did Schopenhauer take the trouble to write several volumes on the subject, objectifying will at great length, rather than commit suicide and achieve nothingness in one fell swoop? His answer is that "suicide is a phenomenon of strong assertion of will." The suicide wills life, and is only dissatisfied with the conditions under which it has presented itself to him. "Schopenhauer's objection seems to be that since suicide is not a denial of the will but an affirmation of it, the death of an individual in no way eliminates will but only the place and time of its objectification. If a man bent on suicide were to argue that forcing the will to objectify itself elsewhere is the point of suicide, since in that way suffering is eliminated for him, Schopenhauer would reply that the suicide overemphasizes the value of the individual, forgetting that only will is real

The World as Will and Idea is important as a philosophical expression of Western man's discontent as a result of falling away from the comforting dogmas of religion. Its weakness as a solution to the fundamental problem of life—finding a reason for being—is that it borrows an Eastern faith and tries to convert it into a Western metaphysics. The result is not only an endorsement of nothing through sanctioning the denial of the will to live, but also a philosophy in which other philosophers, for the most part, find nothing to endorse.

THE YEARS

Type of work Novel

Author Virginia Woolf (1882-1941)

Type of plot Domestic chronicle

Time of plot 1880-1937

Locale London

First published 1937

Principal characters

COLONEL ABEL PARGITER

ELEANOR,

EDWARD,

MORRIS,

DELIA,

MILLY,

MARTIN and

ROSE his children

CELIA, Morris' wife

NORTH, and

PEGGY children of Morris and Celia

PATRICK, Delia's husband

SIR DIGBY PARGITER, the colonel's brother

EUGENIE, his wife

MAGGIE and

SARA their daughters

RENE (RENNY), Maggie's husband

LADY KITTY LASSWADE the Pargiters' cousin

NICHOLAS POMJALOVSKY, Eleanor's friend

CROSBY, a servant

Critique

The entry in Virginia Woolf's diary for November 2, 1932, contains a reference to the novel eventually published as The Years. In the beginning it was to be called The Pargiters, an essay novel into which she planned to pour the total sum of her experience in telling of the experiences of a single family through several generations. The pattern was not to follow that of family chronicles such as John

Galsworthy and Hugh Walpole had written, instead it was to jump chamois like across gaps in time between 1880 and the present. A domestic story, lacking the bold technical brilliance of To the Lighthouse and The Waves, the work may appear at first reading like a reversion to the method employed in earlier books like Night and Day. Nothing could be farther from the truth. The Years is more than the story of a middle class family in all its frustrations, ambitions, triumphs, joys, tragedies, and defeats. In its episodic pattern it represents an effort to capture and record the process of time passing and to catch in fiction that sudden flash of recognition or the moment of perception which in earlier periods was the function of poetry alone. In the separate divisions of the novel, descriptions of the seasons and the flowing movement of the prose convey that sense of change and recurrence which in her later novels Mrs. Woolf tried to dredge from the depths of human consciousness.

THE YEARS by Virginia Woolf By permission of the publishers Harcourt, Brace & Co. Inc. Copyright 1937, by Harcourt, Brace & Co., Inc.

The Story

On a blustery April afternoon in 1880, Colonel Abel Pargiter sat at the window of his club looking out over Piccadilly. Everyone in the street seemed to have somewhere to go, some end in view. The colonel felt that there was nothing for him. At home, in the shabbily genteel house on Abercorn Terrace, his wife was dying of cancer, he had a family of three sons and four daughters to provide for, he was retired, and he was not rich. He thought of his mistress, Mira, who lived in a side street near Westminster Abbey. He would visit her. When he arrived dusk was already falling, filling the dingy rooms with the secret, furtive atmosphere of lust.

In the same dusk, in the house on Abercorn Terrace, Milly and Delia Pargiter were boiling the water for tea. Because their younger sister Rose was wearing a green smudged pinafore, Milly tried to be severe with her in grown-up fashion. Twelve-year-old, red-haired Martin came home from school. When the colonel arrived and asked for Eleanor, his oldest daughter, Milly reminded him that it was her day for social service. Eleanor appeared dropping her books on the table. Since her mother's illness she had become the family's mainstay, the keeper of accounts, the soother of hurts, the arbiter of quarrels. Delia went to sit with her mother. She resented Mrs. Pargiter's illness, the ties of sickness and home, in her imagination she saw herself on the platform at a political meeting, the great Parnell beside her. Morris Pargiter, a young barrister, came home for dinner. The family was at the table when Crosby, the servant, brought word that Mrs. Pargiter had suffered a relapse. She died later that same rainy night.

Rain also fell in Oxford. Edward Pargiter put aside the Antigone and daydreamed of his cousin, Kitty Malone, a don's daughter with whom he was in love. His friend Hugh Gibbs came in with talk of horses and women. Another friend, Ashley, appeared but Ashley was jealous of Gibbs and Edward, unhappy and bored, went off to bed. Kitty Malone, reading history with eccentric Miss Craddock, admired Jo Robson, he reminded her of a young farmhand who had once kissed her under a rick. Mrs. Malone, reading the letter which told of Mrs. Pargiter's death, thought of her cousin as a young girl. Edward, she decided, would not do, young Lord Lasswade would make a more suitable match. Mrs. Pargiter was buried on a day of shadows and sunshine.

It was cool in England in the autumn of 1891. In the north, Kitty, Lady Lasswade, shivered on the terrace where she sat with her husband. In Devonshire, Hugh Gibbs told his wife Milly—she had been a Pargiter—that the leaves on the trees were still too thick for good hunting. At Oxford, Edward Pargiter, now a don, walked in the crisp air and thought of poetry. Morris, the lawyer, recalled his childhood as leaves crisped under his feet on the flagstones of the Law Courts. Martin was a soldier in India. Delia had left home to lead a life of her own, and Rose had gone too. Only Eleanor remained, tied to her aging father and the house on Abercorn Terrace, keeping accounts, doing social service work, going to the Law Courts with Celia, Morris' wife, buying children's presents that the colonel would give to his nieces, Maggie and Sara, when he went to dine with his brother, Sir Digby Pargiter Sir Digby was in politics his wife Eugénie was pretty and frivolous The colonel had dinner with Digby and Eugénie on the day Parnell died

By midsummer, 1907, Martin was back from India, still Captain Pargiter but no longer in the army Sara Pargiter thought of her cousins as she lay in bed and read Edward's translation of Antigone Her mother and father had gone out to dinner and Maggie with them, it was Maggie's first grown up party Sara's back was crooked, for she had been dropped as a child She read Edward's book and listened to the music of a dance down the street Finally she fell asleep

A year later Sir Digby and Eugénie were both dead, and their house had been sold Colonel Pargiter had suffered a stroke Sometimes Eleanor, who still looked after him reflected on what a terrible thing old age was Sir Digby and his wife had been fortunate, she thought, dying in their prime Rose, forty, man-nish, returned from suffragette meetings she had been attending in the north Meeting at the Abercorn Terrace house, she and Martin recalled the time they had quarreled and Rose had cut her wrist with a knife

After their parents' death Maggie and Sara went to live in Hyams Place, a crescent of shabby old houses Maggie and Rose met in a shop and Rose went to have lunch with her cousins on a day in 1910 Delia had married an Irishman For a brief time some of the family—Eleanor, Martin, Kitty, Rose, and Sara—came together at a suffragette meeting That night, while Sara was telling Maggie about the meeting, they heard shouting in the street outside The king was dead

After her father's death Eleanor went on a holiday in Spain and Greece She was fifty five, too old to begin a new life She went to visit Morris and his wife Celia, they had two children, North and Peggy Maggie was also married, to a Frenchman The Abercorn Terrace house was sold in 1913, and Crosby went off to live in lodgings in Richmond Still loyal to the Pargiters, she looked after Martin's laundry and socks

Martin, coming from his stockbroker's on a spring day in 1914, ran into Sara at St Paul's and took her out to lunch They talked about Rose who had been jailed after breaking windows during a suffragette demonstration Later they met Maggie and her baby in Kensington Gardens That night Martin dined with the Lasswades Sitting beside a young girl at dinner he suddenly felt that he was old his life empty

The war came One night in the winter of 1917 Eleanor went to have dinner with Maggie and her husband Renny There were other guests, Nicholas Pomjalovsky, a Pole and Sara In the middle of dinner a German air raid began Later Nicholas tried to explain his hopes for the new world to come after the war Eleanor felt that here was the man whom she might have married Maggie confided that he loved only other men Eleanor, Sara, and Nicholas walked across London in the cold darkness Eleanor had forgotten the air raid and the wail of the sirens They wailed again and guns boomed on a November day in 1918 Crosby was waiting in the queue at a grocer's shop Someone said that the war was over

In 1937, Eleanor, now over seventy and just back from a trip to India, went to Delia's party, a gathering of the Pargiter clan, with her niece Peggy, now a doctor in a London hospital Peggy's brother North, who had sold his farm in Africa, took Sara, who had invited him to dinner at her shabby flat Maggie and Renny, on their way from the theater, went with them Delia was old Patrick, her Irish husband, was handsome but hard of hearing Peggy, looking at Delia and Patrick, wondered how people married, had children She talked to Martin, who was never at ease with her, she was his doctor and knew his dread of cancer Rose came in, she had grown stout and deaf Milly waddled in her fat beside big, jovial Hugh Gibbs North thought of animals munching in their stalls Morris, the barnster, was there, and Edward the distinguished bachelor scholar Kitty Lass wade now the widow of a governor general, appeared in time for supper Nicholas tried to make a speech and healths were drunk The young looked at the old and the old looked at the young

Eleanor wondered if there had been a pattern behind these lives, a theme, like a motif in music Then it was time to go Eleanor stood at the window and watched a taxi drive up to a nearby house and a young man and young woman get out The young man was fitting his latch key to the door The sun was shining, it was a bright new day

YOU KNOW ME AL

Type of work Epistolary novel
Author Ring Lardner (1885-1933)
Type of plot Humorous satire
Time of plot c 1915
Locale Chicago
First published 1916

Principal characters

JACK KEEFE, a ballplayer
 AL BLANCHARD his correspondent
 FLORRIE Jack's wife
 ALLEN Jack's brother in law, also a ballplayer
 MARIE, his wife

Critique

Although Ring Lardner's reputation is based on the high level of achievement in his short stories, You Know Me Al, his first novel, is a major document in American humor Several streams of American comic tradition merge in this work the comic letter, the wisecrack, the braggart character, the use of sporting vocabulary and fractured English, and the general debunking mood The letters, all written by Jack to Al, are hilarious for their verbal wit, but Lardner also achieved comedy through his use of character and situation The novel, more than a loosely organized series of humorous letters, achieves unity through the characterization of Jack Keefe As he egotistically describes his experiences he inadvertently exposes himself The bitterness of this portrait is foreign to American humor Apart from the later works of Mark Twain, its parallels must be sought in Swift or Smollett Lardner does not appear to hate Jack, however, instead, he despairs for him and perhaps pities him

The Story

When Jack Keefe, a pitcher, was brought up from the minor leagues by the Chicago White Sox, he began writing a series of letters to his hometown friend, Al It was a peculiar friendship, however, for Jack was basically incapable of any of the emotions real friendship requires He patronized Al and used him Jack was a braggart and a chronic self excuser, and the letters gave him a chance to exercise his ego Al apparently never saw through Jack

So sublimely self confident that he felt every trifling detail of his life was important, Jack wrote full accounts of his adventures Having neither modesty nor shame, he even included episodes in which he appeared foolish

When Jack reported to training camp

YOU KNOW ME AL by Ring Lardner By permission of the publishers, Charles Scribner's Sons Copyright 1913 by The Curtis Publishing Co Copyright 1916, by Charles Scribner's Sons Copyright renewed 1941 1942 1944 by Ellis A. Lardner

on the West Coast, he immediately annoyed the manager by his overeating, refusal to take orders, laziness. Though a powerful right handed pitcher, he was an indifferent fielder and careless about base runners. The manager tried to handle Jack with irony, but it was lost on him. Whenever he had a bad day, he alibied that his arm was sore. Any hit made against him was the fault of the fielders, the umpires, or the scorers. Jack also believed that he was irresistible to women. In training camp he met a girl from Detroit named Violet, and he planned to romance her when the White Sox were playing Detroit.

Jack did well enough in spring training to be included on the White Sox roster. In his first starting assignment against the Tigers he played miserably. The manager left him in the game as punishment, and sixteen runs were scored against him. Ty Cobb stole four bases. As usual, Jack complained that his arm was sore. By now the manager was thoroughly disgusted with him, and Jack was sent to San Francisco. He sulked and said he would quit baseball, but he went. Violet called him a bushier.

In San Francisco he won eleven straight games and became engaged to a girl named Hazel. Recalled by the White Sox at the end of the season, he pitched well enough to be used in the City Series between the White Sox and the Cubs. Hazel asked him for one hundred dollars to pay her fare to Chicago for their wedding. He sent her thirty, and she married a boxer instead. Jack then attempted to marry Violet, but she married another ballplayer. Jack married Florrie, the sister in law of a White Sox left-hander named Allen.

When Florrie refused to spend the winter in Bedford, Jack's home town, they rented an apartment across the hall from the Allens. There were many quarrels between the two families most of them occasioned by Jack's stinginess. Jack had always been convinced that all left handers were crazy, his trouble with

Allen only served to strengthen his conviction. Allen was taking his wife Marie along to spring training. Florrie wanted to go too but Jack felt that he could not afford to take her. Since he felt that he was underpaid, he tried to get a raise from the club, even though he had already signed a contract. Charles Comiskey the owner of the White Sox, had already had contract trouble with Jack and refused to grant him any concessions. Jack then tried to join the Federal League, a third major league that was hiring players away from the American and National Leagues; however, the Federal League would have nothing to do with him because he had signed a contract with the White Sox. Then his team learned about this attempted defection. Hog fat after gorging himself on food and liquor all winter he was sold to Milwaukee as a disciplinary measure. Florrie left him. Jack, protesting that he would not go to the minors again, borrowed money from Al to return to Bedford. The White Sox were forced to keep him, however, because of a technicality in the waiver rule.

The manager limited Jack's diet and he got into shape good enough to be given another chance with the White Sox. Florrie and Jack were reconciled because she was pregnant, and she soon presented him with a son. At first Jack worried because the baby appeared to be left handed. Florrie named the baby Allen after her brother in law, but Jack insisted that the baby was named for Al. Though he continued to display the same old bragging and complacency, Jack turned out to be a doting father in his own fashion.

After a successful season he was selected to pitch in the City Series a cause of fresh strife with Florrie because she wanted to attend the games and he wanted her to stay home with the baby. Jack was not concerned about the money for a baby sitter as much as he was worried about the welfare of his son. When the team bribed Florrie to stay home, she used the money to hire a baby sitter Jack then decided to leave her, but changed his mind when he learned that she would have custody of the child After another argument with the Allens, Jack moved his family out of the apartment which they shared and for which Allen paid the rent

The White Sox wanted Jack to join the world tour the team was making with the Giants but he did not want to be away from the baby The real reason for taking him was to keep him in shape, but

Jack believed that baseball fans in other countries wanted to see him They coaxed him to Canada because Christy Mathewson was going that far Then they told him that President Wilson was afraid Japan would declare war if Jack did not go there to play Convinced at first, he later began to worry about the dangers of the ocean voyage and backed down, but when he was told that Allen would be taken in his place, his vindictiveness triumphed over his fear He sailed away boasting of triumphs to come

YVAIN

Type of work Poem

Author Chretien de Troyes (c 1150 c 1190)

Type of plot Chivalric romance

Time of plot Sixth century

Locale Britain

First transcribed After 1164

Principal characters

YVAIN a knight of King Arthur's Round Table

LAUDINE DE LANDUC whom he married

LUNETE a damsel in Laudine de Landuc's service

KING ARTHUR

QUEEN GUINEVERE

SIR GAWAIN Yvain's friend and King Arthur's nephew

SIR KAY the cynical seneschal

HARPIN OF THE MOUNTAIN, a giant slain by Yvain

Critique

Yvain, ou le Chevalier au Lion is the most complicated of the chivalric romances written by Chretien de Troyes Episodic in structure, rather conventional in moral theme, it derives from various sources Ovid's Metamorphoses and the Art of Love, Vergil's Aeneid, and the Arthurian materials presented in the Historia Regum Britanniae, by Geoffrey of Monmouth The remarkable aspect of the work is the fact that the parts make up the whole fabric as a pattern and not as a patchwork, giving the modern reader almost as great a sensation of exhilaration from the tribulations and triumphs of the hero as the work must have given the court of the Countess Marie de Cham pagne, for whom the poet wrote to rather exact specifications

The Story

At the season of Pentecost, King Arthur held his court at Carduel in Wales After dinner on that feast day a knight named Calogrenant told a tale of adventure which was not altogether to his credit, and for which he was mocked by Sir Kay the Seneschal

Calogrenant revealed that seven years before he had journeyed beyond the forest of Broceliande After a night's lodging in the tower of a courteous vavasour he continued on his way until he encountered a giant seventeen feet tall who was guarding some wild bulls in a clearing. The giant told the knight that if he sought some marvel he was to look for a spring in a mysterious wood, for water from the spring poured on a nearby stone would bring down upon him a storm such as few men had ever seen, with bolts of lightning that would blind him and thunder that would shake the earth. All befell as the giant had foretold. After the storm had ceased a knight appeared and challenged Calogrenant to a duel because of the great damage caused in his demesne by wind and rain. The two fought and Calogrenant was overthrown. So shamed was he in that encounter that he had never told the story before.

YVAIN by Chrétien de Troyes, from ARTHURIAN ROMANCES by Chrétien de Troyes Translated in prose with introduction, notes and bibliography, by W W Comfort From EVERYMAN'S LIBRARY By permission of the publishers E P Dutton & Co Inc All rights reserved.

One of those who listened to his tale was Yvain, a valiant knight who swore to avenge the shame of Calogrenant, his cousin german. Yvain was also mocked by Sir Kay. While they spoke King Arthur came from his chamber and to him Queen Guinevere told the tale as she had heard it. The king thereupon swore an oath that he must see these wonders for himself and that any of his knights who wished could accompany him on the venture. But Yvain, thinking that the quest should be his alone, left the court secretly and rode over mountains and through valleys until he came to the forest of the magic spring. When he poured a basin of water on the stone, a great storm arose. After the storm the strange knight appeared and he and Yvain battled until their lances splintered and their armor had been pierced in many places. At last Yvain dealt his enemy a blow that shattered his helmet and split his skull, but even then the knight did not fall down at once but galloped off to take refuge in his castle. Yvain, riding in close pursuit of his foe, was trapped when a portcullis fell before him as well as behind him when he rode through the gate. There the maid Lunete found him and saved his life with the gift of a magic ring which made him invisible while the nobleman's vassals searched for the knight who had given their lord his mortal hurt. While he was thus protected, Yvain saw the Lady Laudine de Landuc, the mistress of the castle, a lady so fair that he fell in love with her on the spot. The maid Lunete, seeing how matters stood, concealed Yvain and ministered to him, and between times she spoke to her lady, urging her to put aside her anger and grief and to take a new husband who would be master of her domain and defender of the magic spring. Lunete was so cunning in her speech that her lady finally agreed to do as the damsel suggested. Then Yvain was brought from the chamber where he was hidden. Falling on his knees before the Lady Laudine he begged forgiveness for killing her lord in fair fight. The lady, impressed by Yvain's comeliness and bravery, was soon reconciled, and the two were wed with great rejoicing.

As he had sworn, King Arthur came with his knights to see the magic spring, and Sir Kay again mocked the absent Yvain, who had sworn to avenge his cousin's name. Then the king poured a basin of water on the stone and immediately the rain began to fall and the wind to blow. When the storm had subsided Yvain appeared to challenge King Arthur's knights, and Sir Kay begged the first encounter. But Yvain quickly unhorsed the braggart seneschal and then revealed himself to King Arthur and the other knights. All were delighted to find Yvain safe and hale. For a week there after Yvain and his lady entertained the royal party with feasting and entertainment of all kinds.

At the end of that time, as the king was preparing to depart, Sir Gawain urged Yvain to return to Britain with them and to take part in all tournaments so that none could say that so brave a knight had grown weak and slothful in marriage. The Lady Laudine agreed, but on the promise that Yvain would return to her a year hence. Before he left, she gave him a ring set with a stone that would keep its wearer from all harm as long as he would keep his sweetheart in mind

So successful was Yvain in all the tournaments that were held throughout the land that he forgot his promise until the Lady Laudine sent a damsel to denounce him as a hypocrite and liar and to demand the return of the ring Yvain, overcome by remorse at the thought of losing his lady's love, went mad and lived, naked and distracted, like a wild beast in the forest A hermit living there gave him bread and water and so succored him until one day the noble lady of Noroison and her two damsels found the naked man asleep under a tree The lady and her maids attended the knight and anointed him with a soothing, magic ointment to restore his wits On his recovery Yvain pledged himself to the lady's support and to champion her against Count Alier, who was plundering her lands So fierce was his attack on the marauders that the count yielded himself and gave his oath that he would live in peace from that time on Afterward, having refused to accept the lady's hand or to take her as his mistress Yvain rode away in search of new adventures

As he was wandering through the wood he came upon a lion and a fire-breathing serpent that held the beast by the tail Yvain drew his sword and slew the scaly monster From that time on the grateful lion became the knight's inseparable companion

At last Yvain returned to the magic spring where all his adventures had begun There he found the maid Lunete held a prisoner in a nearby chapel by orders of the Lady Laudine The damsel was to be burned the next day, and she wept that she had no one to defend her against charges brought by a wicked seneschal who had persuaded her mistress that the maid had acted falsely in the sad affair of the Lady Laudine's marriage to Yvain The knight, without revealing himself, promised to act as her champion before he rode away to find lodgings for the night At last he came to the castle of Sir Gawain's brother-in-law, only to learn that the baron was threatened with the death of his four sons, prisoners of a dreaded giant, Harpin of the Mountain, unless the father would give his daughter over to the lewd embraces of the ogre's lackeys In spite of the fact that Yvain had not much time, he rode out and slew the giant, with the help of the lion, because of his friendship for the baron's kinsman, Sir Gawain Refusing to give his name, he said he wished to be known only as the Knight with the Lion Then he rode as fast as his horse would carry him to the chapel in the forest, where the pyre had already been prepared on which the maid was to be burned Although wounded in his encounter with the giant, Yvain fought the seneschal and his two brothers Again, with the lion's help he was victorious and the false knights whom he slew were burned on the funeral pile prepared for Lunete When confronted by the Lady Laudine he again refused to reveal his identity so ashamed was he of his inconstancy, but called himself the Knight with the Lion Lunete had recognized him, however, and she accompanied him for some distance when he rode away Although she promised to keep his secret, she declared that she would bring about a reconciliation between him and his lady if it were ever in her power to do so

Disconsolately, Yvain departed to seek other adventures, but he was unable to travel far because of the wounds he and the lion had suffered in their battles with Harpin of the Mountain and the three false knights At length he came to a fair castle where the lord's retainers helped him from his horse and attended gently to the lion, which Yvain was carrying on his shield There they stayed, attended by maidens skilled in surgery, until both the man and the beast were completely healed Then they continued on their way

About that same time the lord of Noire Espine died and his older daughter claimed the whole of his estates, saving that she would give no share to her sister. When the younger daughter went to King Arthur's court to plead her case she learned that her older sister had been there before her and that Sir Gawain had promised to act as her champion. Granted forty days in which to find a champion of her own, the maid set out in search of the famed Knight with the Lion.

Along the way she fell ill, but the quest was taken up by a friend whose search brought her at last to the magic spring while Lunete was saying her prayers in the chapel close by, and the Lady Laudine's damsel was able to point out to the traveler the road Yvain had traveled many days before. So the maid came finally to the castle where the knight and the lion had been nursed back to health. Told that the two had departed only a short time before, she rode after them as fast as she could. Overtaking the knight and his beast companion, she told her story, and Yvain promised to help the younger sister in her need.

Before he could act for the maid, however, he was to engage in still another desperate adventure. Toward nightfall he and the damsel came to the town of Pesme Avanture, where, as they approached the castle, all the people called out to them to turn back, but Yvain paid no heed to their warnings. Entering the castle, the knight found three hundred maidens working at all kinds of embroidery, they were, they told him, hostages for the king of the Isle of Damsels, the ransom he had paid to escape doing battle with two half devils born to a mortal woman and an imp. Yvain and the damsel were courteously received by the lord of the castle, however, and that night everything was done in their honor. But when Yvain prepared to depart the next morning, the owner of the castle told him that he could not go without fighting the black sons of evil. The prize, if he won, would be the hand of the baron's beautiful daughter and suzerainty of all her father's demesne. Although Yvain tried to refuse the terms of the offer, the lord assured him that no knight who had lodged in the castle could avoid or renounce the battle. Although the lion was shut away from Yvain, the beast managed to scratch his way beneath the threshold of the room where he was confined, and he arrived on the scene of the conflict in time to save sorely wounded Yvain by rending one devil outright and so disconcerting the other that the knight was able to lop off the evil creature's head.

With this victory Yvain released the wretched hostages from their imprisonment. Over the protests of the lord of the castle, he renounced the hand of the daughter and rode away with the damsel to the court of King Arthur.

Great was the joy of the younger sister when the Knight with the Lion arrived in time to champion her cause against her avaricious sister, defended by Sir Gawain. The struggle lasted all day and into the dusk. By that time both knights were exhausted, but neither knew the identity of the other until Yvain at last proposed postponement of the contest until the next day. Then Sir Gawain, recognizing his friend's voice, granted him the victory, while Yvain, in turn, refused this boon and reversed the decision. King Arthur finally solved the problem by granting them equal prowess in arms and conferring upon the younger sister her rights after the older one had incautiously admitted her attempt to dispossess her sister.

As soon as Yvain was cured of his wounds, he set out once more for the magic spring, accompanied only by his faithful lion. Again he poured water on the stone and brought down such a storm that the Lady Laudine feared her castle and the town would be washed away. Meanwhile, the damsel Lunete spoke to her mistress in such winning fashion that the lady, losing all the resentment she held against her husband, promised to restore him to her favor and love So many troubles and trials, to the great Yvain and his lady were reconciled after happiness of Lunete and all their vassals

ZADIG

Type of work Novel

Author François Marie Arouet de Voltaire (1694-1778)

Type of plot Social satire

Time of plot Remote antiquity

Locale Babylon

First published 1747

Principal characters

ZADIG, a wealthy young man

MOABDAR King of Babylon

ASTARTE, his queen

SÉMIRE Zadig's first betrothed

AZORA, Zadig's first wife

CADOR Zadig's best friend

ARIMAZE, "The Envious," Zadig's enemy

MISSOUF an Egyptian woman

SETOC an Arab merchant

ALMONA Setoc's wife

NABUSSAN, King of Serendib

ARBOGAD, a happy brigand

ITOBAD, a rich lord

OGUL, another lord, a voluptuary

Critique

Voltaire's most famous satirical tale criticizing the manners, beliefs, and philosophical views of his times is, of course, Candide. Yet Zadig makes many of the same critical comments and in much the same comic style. The difference is partly one of style and partly one of direction. In Candide Voltaire chose a simple, ingenuous youth whose misadventures, ridiculously exaggerated, brought out by a kind of refreshing contrast the difference between innocence and false sophistication. Because of the extreme hyperboles used to describe Candide's adventures, the work is sometimes grandly amusing, but also on this account it is sometimes unconvincing, even as an obviously fanciful tale. Zadig, on the other hand, is the story of an educated, sensible young man who escapes from great difficulties by continuing to be calmly sensible. The humor, consequently, is more restrained, it resides more in the subtle inversions of style and thought than in the grosser inversions of plot. Both tales convey Vol-taire's naturalistic disdain of the religious and philosophical dogmas of his times and his preference for a rational and compassionate consideration of the problems of society.

The Story

Zadig, a charming young man with a good education and great wealth, lived in the time of King Moabdar in Babylon. Despite the fact that he was a very sensible young man, or perhaps because of it, he never boasted of his own abilities or tried to find fault in others. He expected that with the advantages he modestly enjoyed he would have no difficulty in being happy. But he was mistaken in this belief.

In rescuing the beautiful Sémire from kidnappers, Zadig was injured by an arrow in his left eye. The great doctor Hermes predicted that he would lose the eye because wounds in the left eye never heal. When Zadig's eye healed, the doctor wrote a book proving that it could not have happened Unfortunately, Sémire, to whom Zadig had been betrothed decided that she did not like one eyed men and, in her ignorance of Zadig's recovery, married Orcan, the young nobleman who had sent the kidnappers to seize her

Zadig married Azora, the wisest girl in the city, who took a frivolous interest in handsome young men When she chastened a widow for changing the course of a stream in order to escape from her vow to stay by her husband's tomb as long as the stream flowed there, Zadig arranged to have Azora told that he had died He then had a friend named Cador make friendly overtures to Azora and, having done so to complain of a pain in the spleen for which there was but one cure rubbing the place with the nose of a man dead no more than twenty four hours When Azora came to the place where Zadig presumably was buried he leaped up to keep her from cutting off his nose with a razor He said that her act proved she was no better than the widow she had criticized Finally, when Azora became too difficult to live with, he left her

One day the queen's dog and the king's horse were lost Zadig was able to describe the missing animals and tell where they were, but when he said that he had never seen them he was imprisoned It turned out that he had been able to tell from marks on the ground what the animals were like and where they had gone When he explained this he was released He had learned his lesson, however, when he saw an escaping prisoner, he kept quiet But he was fined for looking out from his window

A rich and jealous neighbor named Arimaze and called "The Envious" found a broken tablet on which Zadig had written a poem Half of the tablet could be read as a poem criticizing the king But just as Zadig was about to be condemned for insulting the monarch, a parrot dropped the other half of the tablet in the king's lap Both the king and the queen, and especially the queen, began to hold Zadig in high esteem Zadig was awarded a goblet for having been generous enough to speak well of a minister who had incurred the king's wrath such an act was new in the king's experience, and he valued Zadig for it

Zadig became prime minister of Babylon and by sensible decisions won the hearts of the people He cured a great lord who was too conceited for his own good by having a band, an orchestra and a choir sing his praises all day long until the lord in desperation called a halt to the chorus of praise He also settled a religious dispute that had gone on for fifteen hundred years concerning the question whether one should enter the temple of Mithra with the right foot or the left foot He jumped in with both feet

Zadig was popular with the ladies of Babylon, but he succumbed only once and did so without pleasure He was too much in love with Queen Astarté The wife of Arimaze enraged because he rebuffed her, allowed her husband to send her garter to the king so that he might be deceived into believing that Zadig and the queen were already lovers The queen warned Zadig that the king meant to kill him Zadig escaped to Egypt

Upon arriving in Egypt, Zadig found an Egyptian beating a woman When Zadig intervened the jealous Egyptian assumed that Zadig was a rival lover, and a fight ensued, ending in the Egyptian's death The woman, Missouf, far from being grateful, screamed that she wished Zadig had been killed instead When four men seized her, he allowed her to be taken, not realizing that the four men were couriers from Babylon who had mistaken Missouf for the queen, who had also disappeared

Since Zadig had killed a man, the Egyptians condemned him to be a slave, and he was bought by an Arab merchant named Sétoc At first the merchant valued Zadig's service more than he did Zadig, but he finally came to see the value of Zadig's intelligence and common sense. The incident which proved Zadig's ability concerned an attempt to prove a Hebrew guilty of not returning a loan made to him by Sétoc. By pretending that he would bring into court the stone on which the loan was transacted, Zadig trapped the Hebrew into a description of the stone, thereby proving that he really was the man to whom the loan had been made.

Zadig next convinced an Arabian widow that she should not leap upon the burning funeral pyre of her husband. He did this by making her realize that there were still attractive young men in the world.

By pointing out that they all admitted the existence of a Superior Being, he settled a dispute between an Egyptian, an Indian, a Chaldean, a Celt, and others concerning the nature of the universe and its operation. He was saved from execution by the priests when Almona, the young widow, pretended that she would allow the priests to make love to her if they signed a pardon when the priests came to her; they were greeted by judges who condemned them. Sétoc was so much impressed by her cleverness that he married her.

Zadig showed that one can judge an honest man by making candidates for the comptroller's position engage in a dancing contest. Only one candidate resisted the money Zadig had placed in a passageway, and only he danced lightly and with grace, the others being fearful of jostling the money from their pockets.

Having done this service for King Nabussan of Serendib to whose kingdom Zadig had been sent by Sétoc, Zadig then undertook to show which of the king's hundred wives were faithful. Only one resisted the temptations of money, youth, and power to which Zadig exposed them.

After settling a revolt of the priests against Nabussan, Zadig, guided as always by the sayings of Zoroaster, set forth to find news of Queen Astarté. He met a happy brigand, Arbogad, who reported that King Moabdar had been killed in an uprising, but the robber had no news of the queen. Zadig then met an unhappy fisherman who had lost his money, his wife, and his house during the revolt in Babylon. Since some of the money owed the fisherman was for cream cheese which he had sold to Zadig and Queen Astarté, Zadig, without revealing his identity, gave the fisherman half the money he had.

Zadig then met some women hunting for a basilisk which was to be used to cure Ogul, their lord and master. Among the women Zadig was overjoyed to find Queen Astarté. She told him that Zadig's friend Cador had helped her to escape from the king, that the king had married Missouf, and that she had frightened the king out of his wits by speaking to him from within a statue in the temple in which she was hidden. The revolt in Babylon had resulted from the king's madness, and he had been killed. Queen Astarté had then been captured by the Prince of Hyrcania. She had escaped from him only to be captured by the brigand Arbogad, who sold her to Ogul.

By curing Ogul, Zadig then managed to free Queen Astarté and to win more honor for himself. He told Ogul that a bag contained medicine that would go through his pores only if he punched it hard enough. The resultant exercise cured the lord.

Returning to Babylon, Zadig entered a jousting tournament and a battle of wits in order to win Queen Astarté as his wife. Despite the trickery of Itobad, who stole his armor and pretended to be the victor after Zadig had won the tournament, Zadig managed to win both contests—partly through the encouragement of the angel Jesrad who was disguised as a hermit—and he married Queen Astarté. As king, Zadig was a just and compassionate ruler under whom Babylon became a prosperous and happy empire.

ZAIRE

Type of work Drama

Author François Marie Arouet de Voltaire (1694 1778)

Type of plot Historical tragedy

Time of plot During the reign of Osman, Sultan of Jerusalem

Locale Jerusalem

First presented 1732

Principal characters

OROSMANE (OSMAN) Sultan of Jerusalem

LUSIGNAN a prince in the line of the kings of Jerusalem

ZAIRE and

FATIME slaves of the sultan

NERESTAN, and

CHATILLON, French gentlemen

CORASMIN, and

MELEDOR, officers of the sultan

Critique

In Zaire, Voltaire the sardonic skeptic is absent, only Voltaire the tragic dramatist remains. In this play the great French writer gives human dimensions to a grand theme of jealousy, and although the drama is not ordinarily regarded as the equal of Othello, to which it bears a sometimes startling resemblance, it has merits of its own which are worth considering. Othello presents a hero noble in character, who is made jealous by the lies of Iago, his lieutenant. Othello and Desdemona form two points of a triangle that involves Cassio only by innuendo. In Zaire, on the other hand, the triangle has three strong corners. Orosmane the proud and noble Turk, is one; his betrothed, Zaire, is another and, as a combined but none the less actual protagonist, the Christian God and Zaire's Christian family is the third. Orosmane's suspicions of Zaire's brother Nerestan resulting from his ignorance of Nerestan's relation to Zaire and from his knowledge of Zaire's change of heart, is a well-founded although misplaced, jealousy. Here East meets West in mortal struggle, and the passion reflects itself in the personal lives of the lovers.

The Story

Fatime and Zaire were slaves of Orosmane, Sultan of Jerusalem, but their lot was not an unpleasant one. Although Orosmane had the power to treat them as mere chattels and to use them for his pleasure in his seraglio he treated them with respect and consideration. Nevertheless Fatime was disturbed to find that Zaire was not only resigned to her fate but giving the appearance of actually enjoying it. When she asked Zaire to explain why she no longer wept or looked forward to the return of Nerestan, who had gone to France to seek ransom for them, Zaire replied that she found it difficult to yearn after a mode of life she had never known. Since childhood she had been confined to the seraglio under the care of Orosmane and she had grown fond of her life and even of her master.

Fatime then reminded Zaire that Nerestan, who had conducted himself so nobly in the battle of Damas as part of the Christian army fighting against the Turks, had been captured by Orosmane but, because of his courage, was later released on his word to return with ransom for the Christian prisoners, including Fatime and Zaire.

Zaire replied that two years had passed since Nerestan's departure and that perhaps Nerestan had made the promise to return with ransom for ten slaves only because there was no other way for him to escape a similar servitude. She admitted that she had admired Nerestan at the time of his promise, but she had decided to think of the matter no longer.

Zaire then confessed to Fatime that Orosmane was her slave, that he loved her and that she loved him. She quickly added that this love did not mean that she had consented to become his mistress. The truth was that Orosmane's love for her was so strong and pure that he planned to wed her.

Fatime, delighted to hear that Zaire would be elevated from the place of a slave to that of sultana, had one misgiving—she wondered whether Zaire had forgotten that she was a Christian. Zaire replied that she did not even know who her parents were, she had only Nerestan's surmise, because of the cross she had worn since childhood, that she was a Christian. Since she had been a slave from her childhood it was only natural that her faith reflected the customs of the place where she was reared. With Fatime Zaire admitted, the situation was different. Fatime had been captured in adulthood and had deliberately embraced Christianity before becoming a slave. Although Zaire regarded herself as a Muslim, she admitted that she was impressed by the Christian faith, but she assured Fatime that her love for Orosmane was so strong that she no longer considered becoming a Christian.

Orosmane then entered and expressed his love for Zaire and his intention to marry her. As he professed his love, a servant entered and announced the arrival of Nerestan.

Nerestan entered and told the sultan that he had come with ransom for the prisoners and that he was willing to remain as Orosmane's slave. The sultan, impressed by Nerestan's honor, replied that he would release not merely ten but a hundred prisoners. The only ones who would have to remain were Lusignan, a French nobleman who claimed the hereditary right to rule in Jerusalem, and Zaire.

Nerestan protested that Orosmane had promised to release the prisoners, and Zaire in particular, if the ransom money were brought from France. But Orosmane permitted no discussion of his decision. He dismissed Nerestan and ordered Zaire to prepare to assume her place as his sultana.

After the others had gone Orosmane remarked to Corasmin, one of his officers, that Nerestan had sighed and fixed his eyes on Zaire. When Corasmin warned his master against jealousy, the sultan replied that he could not be jealous of Zaire since she was truth itself.

Chatillon, a French gentleman released at Orosmane's command, praised Nerestan for having arranged the release of the prisoners, but Nerestan refused to be gratified by Chatillon's praise because of Orosmane's refusal to release Zaire and Lusignan. Chatillon agreed that without Lusignan, the great Christian leader and soldier who had fought so valiantly in defense of Caesarea, there was no joy in his own release.

Nerestan then told Chatillon how, as an infant, Nerestan had been carried from the smoking ruins of the city of Caesarea to the seraglio. Zaire had been a fellow captive.

Chatillon tried to encourage Nerestan by suggesting that Zaire might charm Orosmane into releasing Lusignan, but Nerestan knew that Lusignan would not accept liberty under such circumstances.

Zaire then entered and told Nerestan that she regretted not being able to return to France with him, but her love for Orosmane made that impossible. She assured him that she would use her new status to protect the Christians and to relieve the wretched. As evidence of her intentions she offered Lusignan's freedom, granted at her request by the sultan.

After Lusignan's release Nerestan told him how Nerestan, almost from his birth, had been a slave in Solyma, and how he had been able to escape to fight with Louis against the Turks. Lusignan, greeting Chatillon, an old friend who had been captured with him at Caesarea, reminded the Christian knight that he, Lusignan, had seen his own wife and two sons die there, and that another son and a daughter had been taken from him Chatillon remembered that he had baptized the daughter just before the Saracens swept her and her brother away

When Nerestan remarked that he had been captured at the age of four, the age of Lusignan's son when he was taken, and when Lusignan noticed that Zaire wore a cross that he had given to his wife as a present, it was revealed that Nerestan and Zaire were Lusignan's long lost children Zaire, deeply moved by this discovery, vowed to be a Christian from that moment

Believing them to be friends from the time they were slaves together, Orosmane permitted Zaire to meet with Nerestan Unknown to the sultan, however, Zaire's declaration as a Christian had inspired Nerestan to urge her to give up Orosmane altogether, even after Nerestan learned that Zaire had hoped to wed the Turk Zaire was torn by emotional conflict she knew Orosmane's virtues and loved him as a person, but she could not tolerate disappointing the hopes and faith of her brother and father, particularly after learning from Nerestan that her father was near death

When Zaire asked Orosmane to defer their nuptials, the sultan was amazed, her excuse, that Lusignan was dying, seemed to him insufficient After Zaire left in tears, Orosmane raged to Corasmin and revealed his fear that he had cause to be jealous of Nerestan He resolved not to allow himself to be governed and deceived by Zaire

Orosmane confronted Zaire again and told her that he no longer loved her, but when she wept and protested her love, he repented Yet, when she left him, he wondered again about her virtue When guards intercepted a letter sent to Zaire by Nerestan, Orosmane interpreted the references to secrecy and to faithfulness as signs of a lover's passion, and he accepted Corasmin's suggestion to send the letter on to Zaire in order that they might observe her behavior In suppressed fury and jealousy he once more confronted Zaire and asked her for the name of his rival Although she insisted that she had no other master, he could no longer believe her

Orosmane had one last faint hope that the romance was one sided, instigated by Nerestan but his slave's report that Zaire had received the letter with trembling and weeping and that she had promised to meet Nerestan that night, confirmed his fear that she loved another Zaire, trying desperately, in the meantime, to reconcile her duty to her family and Christianity with her love for Orosmane, hoped that he would understand and pity her

Orosmane intercepted Zaire at the place of her meeting with Nerestan and, calling out that she had betrayed him, stabbed her to death When Nerestan arrived and revealed that Zaire was his sister, the Turk was overcome with grief and remorse After ordering Corasmin to free all the Christians, he killed himself with his dagger Nerestan, aware of the depth of Orosmane's remorse and sensing the love that became perverted by jealousy, admitted his respect for Orosmane and lamented the sultan's death

EL ZARCO

Type of work Novel

Author Ignacio Manuel Altamirano (1834-1893)

Type of plot Romantic tragedy

Time of plot 1861-1863

Locale Province of Morelos, Mexico

First published 1901

EL ZARCO by Ignacio Manuel Altamirano Translated by Raymond L. Grismer By permission of the translator Published by W. W. Norton & Co. Inc. All rights reserved

Principal characters

NICOLAS an Indian blacksmith
EL ZARCO, a bandit
MANUELA in love with El Zarco
DONA ANTONIA her mother
PILAR Dona Antonia's godchild, in love with Nicolas
MARTÍN SÁNCHEZ, a rancher, El Zarco's enemy
EL TIGRE, El Zarco's lieutenant

Critique

Ignacio Manuel Altamirano is the first Mexican who may truly be called a novelist, working with an awareness of and within limitations imposed by a clearly defined literary form. A patriot and a veteran of the War of Reform, he found the materials of his fiction in the life of that turbulent period. El Zarco illustrates his expressed intention to present Mexican life and to interpret faithfully the spirit of the people. It is a somber work, historical in background, deeply probing in psychological depth, and suffused with the beauty of the Mexican landscape. Two characters stand out from the background against which they move: Manuela, an impulsive headstrong girl brought to folly and ruin by infatuation and greed, and Nicolas, an Indian representative of the class in which Altamirano saw a bright promise for the future of his nation. Completed shortly before the writer's death, the novel appeared posthumously eight years later.

The Story

During the War of Reform, and after, bands of robber outlaws took advantage of the troubled times to overrun those districts of Mexico where the local authorities, in a land still disturbed by civil war, were powerless to make effective reprisals against them. Roaming the countryside in armed bands, the plateados, as they were called, waylaid and murdered travelers, kidnapped wealthy estate owners for ransom, and levied tribute on the villages and haciendas. For their amusement they often wantonly burned the canefields and inflicted brutal tortures on their prisoners.

A town terrorized in this fashion was Yautepec, a pleasant village of the tierra caliente in the province of Morelos. By day the people maintained lookouts in the church towers to give warning of approaching marauders; at night they barricaded themselves in their houses, so that after sunset the little town in the middle of its circling orange groves resembled a place of the dead. The bandits, some five hundred strong, had their headquarters at Xochimancas, a nearby ruined hacienda from which they made forays to ravage the whole district. Their leader was El Zarco, a man of savage temper and cruel disposition whose bloody exploits caused all respectable and decent people to fear him. The bandits sometimes entered the town and rode boldly through the streets.

On an evening in August, 1861, Doña Antonia sat in the inner courtyard of her house with her daughter Manuela and Pilar, her godchild. The two girls were plaiting flower garlands for their hair. After a time Manuela began to tease Pilar because her friend was making a wreath of orange blossoms, the flower of weddings. Manuela was twining a circlet of roses. When Manuela complained pettishly of her dull life, her mother rebuked her sharply, saying that the girl ought to forget fiestas and dances, and take a husband who would protect her. Doña Antonia's choice was Nicolas, the sober and industrious blacksmith of the estate at Atlahuayan. At this suggestion Manuela began to speak scornfully of the Indian, as she called him, and declared that she would rather have El Zarco as a suitor. She added that Nicolas might be good enough for Pilar, but she herself would never have him Pilar blushed but said nothing

Before Doña Antonia could reprove her daughter further, Nicolas a nightly caller, arrived with the news that the night before the plateados had robbed and killed an English family traveling to Acapulco and that a cavalry detachment was being sent from Cuernavaca to pursue the bandits Alarmed at this latest outrage, Doña Antonia decided that she and Manuela would go to Mexico City until times grew better, they would travel with the troops as their escort for part of the dangerous journey Nicolas thought her decision a wise one for Manuela's sake

Later, while Nicolas was on his way back to Atlahuayan another rider was traveling toward Yautepec The horse man was El Zarco In the village he turned down a dark lane that led to a stone wall surrounding Doña Antonia's orange grove Drawing rein beneath a giant sapota tree, he whistled twice An answering whistle came from the darkness under the tree where Manuela was waiting for her lover

El Zarco had met Manuela in Cuernavaca during a brief period when he and his men were aiding the government forces, and the two had been strongly drawn to each other After he had established himself at Xochimancas, the bandit learned that the girl and her mother had returned to Yautepec Through his spies in the village he had arranged to see her regularly El Zarco found her whole hearted devotion flattering to his vanity Manuela, refusing to believe the stories of his violence and cruelty, saw him only as a handsome, brave caballero Now, unwilling to leave Yautepec, she told him of Doña Antonia's plans and asked him to take her away Before they parted that night they had arranged for him to carry her off to Xochimancas In parting, El Zarco gave her several small boxes for safekeeping After his departure she saw that one was bloodstained The boxes contained a diamond ring, two bracelets and earrings Putting them on, she went to a pool in the garden and looked at her reflection by the light of a lantern She buried the jewels with other gems and money that El Zarco had already entrusted to her

The next night Manuela fled with El Zarco to his hideout, leaving behind a note in which she told her mother goodbye Heartbroken, Doña Antonia asked Nicolas to go with her to beg that the cavalry troop from Cuernavaca would hunt down the bandits and rescue Manuela When the commander refused, Nicolas charged the officer with shirking his duties The blacksmith was placed under arrest and ordered held for trial

Pilar, upset by the news of Nicolas' arrest, tried to visit him in prison but was turned back by his guards Nicolas, hearing her pleas, realized that it was Pilar and not Manuela whom he truly loved The authorities of Yautepec and the manager of Atlahuayan were all indignant over the treatment Nicolas had received When the commander set out to take his prisoner to the capital, a large party accompanied the troops to see that the blacksmith received full justice Through the intercession of the owner of Atlahuayan, Nicolas was finally released He returned to Yautepec in time to see Doña Antonia on her deathbed, for the poor woman was dying of grief over her daughter's disgrace After her death Nicolas continued to ride into the village each evening, but now he went to visit Pilar

Meanwhile, at Xochimancas Manuela lived a different and sordid life of lawlessness and violence Forced to associate with the disreputable women of the plateados, ogled and showered with lewd compliments from the men, she was at first terrified by her new surroundings She realized at last that she had been attracted to El Zarco by infatuation and greed, not love In particular, she was horrified by the condition of a French prisoner, tortured daily to extort from him a greater ransom At a fiesta to cele brate one of El Zarco's raids she was forced to dance with El Tigre, a repulsive creature who told her that El Zarco would tire of her eventually and turn her over to one of his lieutenants. El Tigre intended to be the man.

A short time before, El Zarco had killed the father and son of a rancher named Martín Sánchez. Swearing revenge, Sánchez sold his property and bought arms and equipment for twenty men he recruited to track down the bandits. After he had made several successful raids on the outlaws, other men were roused from their apathy and fears to join him. In an encounter at La Calavera, in which Nicolás took part, El Zarco was wounded and taken prisoner. With him was Manuela.

In spite of Martín Sánchez' protests, El Zarco cleverly arranged to have his trial held in Cuernavaca. While the prisoners were being taken there, bandits fell on the escorting troops and set El Zarco and Manuela free. Sánchez, determined to end lawlessness in the region, obtained from President Juárez authority to hang without trial any bandit who fell into his hands.

The wedding day of Pilar and Nicolás arrived at last. After the mass had been said, they started by coach for Atlahuayan with friends invited to the feast to be held there. On the way they met a troop of horsemen led by Martín Sánchez, who asked the party to drive on without stopping. At that moment Manuela appeared from behind the horsemen and begged help of Nicolás and his bride. El Zarco and El Tigre, she said, had been captured and were to be executed. Martín Sánchez told how he had saved the wedding party from an ambush. Pilar, filled with pity for Manuela, wanted to take that unfortunate creature into the coach, but the distraught girl cried out that she would rather die with El Zarco than see Pilar in her wreath of orange blossoms. Saddened, the wedding party rode on.

Shot down by a firing squad, El Zarco's body was then hung from the branch of a tree. Manuela, seeing her lover dangling there, gave a loud cry and fell to the ground. Blood ran from her mouth. Several men tried to lift her but she was already dead.

AUTHOR INDEX—THIRD SERIES

- ABELARD PIERRE
Historia calamitatum 464
- ADAMS JOHN
Defense of the Constitutions A 263
- ADDISON JOSEPH
Sir Roger de Coverley Papers The 988
- AESOP
Aesop's Fables 15
- ALTAMIRANO IGNACIO MANUEL
Zarco El 1170
- AMMERS KULLER JOHANNA VAN
Rebel Generation The 865
- ANOUILH JEAN
Rung Round the Moon 896
- AQUINAS THOMAS
Summa Theologica 1033
- ARETINO PIETRO
Courtesan The 234
- ARIHARA NO NARIHIRA
Tales of Ise 1044
- ARIOSTO LUDOVICO
Suppositi I 1039
- ARISTOPHANES
Acharnians The 7
Ecclesiazusae The 322
Peace The 726
Thesmophoriazusae The 1068
Wasps The 1119
- ARISTOTLE
Poetics The 774
- ARNOLD MATTHEW
Sohrab and Rustum 1002
- ARTSYBASHEV MIKHAIL
Sanne 921
- AUDEN W H
Poetry of Auden The 777
- AUGUSTINE SAINT
Confessions 213
- BACON SIR FRANCIS
Essays 357
New Atoms 685
- BALE JOHN
King John 543
- BARCLAY JOHN
Argenis 59
- BASHO MATSUO
Poetry of Bashō The 779
- BAUDELAIRE CHARLES
Flowers of Evil 399
- BEAUMONT FRANCIS
King and No King A 541
Scornful Lady The 940
- BEAUMONT FRANCIS and
FLETCHER JOHN
Coxcomb The 236
Woman Hater The 1138
- BECKETT SAMUEL
Waiting for Godot 1113
- BELLOC, HILAIRE
Path to Rome The 722
- BENAVENTE JACINTO
Passion Flower The 718
- BIERCE AMBROSE
Tales of Soldiers and Civilians 1047
- BLAKE WILLIAM
Poetry of Blake The 781
- BOCCACCIO GIOVANNI
L Amorosa Fiammetta 550
- BOETHIUS ANICIUS MANLIUS SEVERINUS
Consolation of Philosophy The 225
- BOIARDO MATTEO MARIA
Orlando Innamorato 703
- BOILEAU DESPREAUX NICOLAS
Dialogue des héros de roman 275
- BOSWELL JAMES
Life of Samuel Johnson LL D The 579
- BROCH HERMANN
Death of Virgil The 258
- BROME RICHARD
Jovial Crew A 531
Northern Lass The 689
- BRONTE ANNE
Agnes Grey 16
- BRONTE CHARLOTTE
Shirley 968
- BROWNING ELIZABETH BARRETT
Sonnets from the Portuguese 1007
- BRYANT WILLIAM CULLEN
Poetry of Bryant The 784
- BUNYAN JOHN
Life and Death of Mr Badman The 575
- BURKE EDMUND
Vindication of Natural Society A 1099
- BURNEY FANNY
Cecilia 163
- BURNS ROBERT
Poems Chiefly in the Scottish Dialect 769
- BURTON ROBERT
Anatomy of Melancholy The 39
- BUTLER SAMUEL
Hudibras 492
- CABELL JAMES BRANCH
River in Grandfather's Neck The 898
- CAESAR GAIVS JULIUS
Commentaries 204
- CALDERÓN DE LA BARCA PEDRO
Devotion of the Cross The 270
It Is Better than It Was 517
It Is Worse than It Was 519
Mock Astrologer The 669
- CARDUCCI GIOSUE
Poetry of Carducci The, 787
- CARLETON WILLIAM
Emigrants of Ahadarra The 328
- CARLYLE THOMAS
French Revolution The 404
Sartor Resartus 925
- CARY JOYCE
Herself Surprised 459
To Be a Pilgrim, 1072

AUTHOR INDEX—THIRD SERIES

- CASANOVA DE SEINGALT,
C'IOVANNI JACOPO
 Memours 646
- CATULLUS GAIUS VALERIUS
 Carmina 156
- CERVANTES SAAVEDRA MIGUEL DE
 Exemplary Novels 370
- CHAPMAN GEORGE
 All Fools 22
 Gentleman Usher The 413
 Monsieur d Olive 674
 Revenge of Bussy d Ambois The 881
- CHAPMAN GEORGE with JONSON BEN and MARSTON JOHN
 Eastward Ho! 317
- CHAUCER GEOFFREY
 Legend of Good Women The 557
 Parliament of Fowls The 716
- CHESTERFIELD PHILIP DORMER
STANHOPE LORD
 Letters to His Son 565
- CHIKAMATSU MONZAEMON
 Sonezaki Shinjû 1006
- CHRETIEN DE TROYES
 Cliges 195
 Erec and Enide 348
 Yvain 1161
- CHURCHILL WINSTON S
 Second World War The 947
- CIBBER COLLEY
 Apology for the Life of Colley Cibber
 Comedian An 52
- CICERO MARCUS TULLIUS
 Cicero's Orations 188
- COCTLAU JEAN
 Holy Terrors The 483
- COLETTE SIDONIE GABRIELLE
CLAUDINE
 Cheri 176
 Other One The 709
- CONFUCIUS
 Shih Ching The 965
- CONRAD JOSEPH
 Heart of Darkness 447
 Secret Agent The 949
 Under Western Eyes 1093
- CONSCIENCE HENDRIK
 Lion of Flanders The 583
- CONSTANT BENJAMIN
 Adolphe 12
- COOKE JOHN ESTEN
 Surry of Eagle's Nest 1042
- COOPER JAMES FENIMORE
 Chainbearer The 166
 Redskins The 870
 Satanstoe 927
- CORNEILLE PIERRE
 Cinna 190
 Horace 490
 Menteur Le 656
 Polyeucte 839
- COUPERUS LOUIS
 Small Souls 1000
- COWLEY ABRAHAM
 Miscellanies 663
- COWPER WILLIAM
 Task The 1054
- COZZENS JAMES GOULD
 Guard of Honor 435
- CRABBE GEORGE
 Village The 1097
- CRANE HART
 Bridge The, 131
- CREBILLON PROSPER JOLYOT DE
 Rhadamistus and Zenobia 888
- CREVECOEUR MICHEL GUILLAUME
JEAN DE
 Letters from an American Farmer 560
- DANTE ALIGHIERI
 Vita Nuova The 1107
- DARWIN CHARLES
 On the Origin of Species 700
- DAVENANT SIR WILLIAM
 Siege of Rhodes The 979
- DEFOE DANIEL
 Captain Singleton 154
 Memours of a Cavalier The 649
- DEKKER THOMAS
 Honest Whore Part One The 485
 Honest Whore Part Two The 487
 Old Fortunatus 696
 Satromastix 933
- DE LA MARE WALTER
 Collected Poems 198
- DEMOSTHENES
 Philippics The 738
- DICKINSON EMILY
 Poetry of Emily Dickinson The 798
- DIDEROT DENIS
 Rameau's Nephew 863
- DINESEN ISAK
 Seven Gothic Tales 958
- DONNE JOHN
 Poetry of Donne The 793
- DOUGHTY CHARLES M
 Travels in Arabia Deserta 1079
- DRAYTON MICHAEL
 Poetry of Drayton The 796
- DREISER THEODORE
 Bulwark The 142
 Genius The 409
 Jennie Gerhardt 526
 Stoic The 1020
- DRYDEN JOHN
 Absalom and Achitophel 5
 Marriage à la Mode 634
 Spanish Friar The 1009
- DUMAS ALEXANDRE (FATHER)
 Chevalier of the Maison Rouge The 179
 Countess de Charny The 230
 Memours of a Physician 651
- EDWARDS JONATHAN
 Works of Jonathan Edwards 1150
- ELIOT GEORGE
 Daniel Deronda 249
 Felix Holt Radical 388
- ELIOT T S
 Ash Wednesday 72
 Four Quartets 401
 Waste Land The 1121
- EMERSON RALPH WALDO
 Essays First and Second Series 359
- ERASMUS DESIDERIUS
 Praise of Folly The 846
- EURIPIDES
 Andromache, 40
 Children of Herakles The, 182
 Cyclops The 245
 Helen 452
 Herakles Mad 454
 Ion 513
 Phoenician Women The 753
 Suppliants The 1038
 Trojan Women The 1085

AUTHOR INDEX-THIRD SERIES

- EVEIYN, JOHN
Diary 281
- FARRELL, JAMES T
Studs Lonigan A Trilogy 1028
- FAULKNER, WILLIAM
Fable A 375
Intruder in the Dust 511
Town The 1074
- FENG MENG I LUNG
Lieh Kuo Chih 572
- FERREIRA, ANTONIO
Inês de Castro 506
- FITZGERALD, EDWARD
Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam The 907
- FITZGERALD, F. SCOTT
Last Tycoon The 552
- FLAUBERT, GUSTAVE
Bouvard and Pecuchet 121
Temptation of Saint Anthony The 1059
- FLETCHER, JOHN
Faithful Shepherdess The 383
Rule a Wife and Have a Wife 909
Sir John van Olden Barnaveit 985
Woman's Prize The 1141
- FLETCHER, JOHN and
MASSINGER, PHILIP
Beggars Bush The 96
- FONTANE, THEODOR
L'Amant 323
- FORSTER, E. M.
Longest Journey The 593
Room with a View A 905
Where Angels Fear to Tread 1129
- FRANCE, ANATOLE
Gods Are Athirst The 420
- FRANKLIN, BENJAMIN
Autobiography of Benjamin Franklin The 74
- FREDERIC, HAROLD
Copperhead The 227
- FREEMAN, DOUGLAS SOUTHALL
R. E. Lee 874
- FRENEAU, PHILIP
Poetry of Freneau The 801
- FREUD, SIGMUND
Interpretation of Dreams The 508
- FREYTAG, GUSTAV
Debit and Credit 261
- FROISSART, JEAN
Chronicles of Froissart 185
- FROMENTIN, EUGENE
Dominique 294
- FROST, ROBERT
Poetry of Frost The 803
- GALSWORTHY, JOHN
Country House The 232
Patman The 724
- GARLAND, HAMLIN
Main Travelled Roads 615
- GEORGE, STEFAN
Poetry of Stefan George The 831
- GIBBON, EDWARD
History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire The 474
- GIRAUDOUX, JEAN
Amphytrion 38 30
Madwoman of Chaillet The 606
- GOETHE, JOHANN WOLFGANG VON
Elective Affinities, 326
- GONCOURT, EDMOND AND JULES DE
Charles Demailly 171
Manette Salomon 628
Sister Philomène 990
- GORKY, MAXIM
Artamonov Business The 69
Mother 676
- GOTTFRIED VON STRASSBURG
Tristan and Isolde 1083
- GRANVILLE BARKER, HARLEY
Madras House The 604
- GRAY, THOMAS
Poetry of Gray The 805
- GREGORY, LADY
Seven Short Plays 963
- GRILLPARZER, FRANZ
Jewess of Toledo The 528
Sappho 923
- GUNNARSSON, GUNNAR
Guest the One Eyed 437
- HÄFIZ
Divan The 285
- HAMILTON, ALEXANDER MADISON,
JAMES and JAY JOHN
Federalist The 384
- HARRIS, JOEL CHANDLER
Tales of Uncle Remus 1049
- HARTE, BRET
Luck of Roaring Camp The 597
- HARTMANN VON AUE
Arme Heinrich Der 63
- HAUPTMANN, GERHART
Beaver Coat The 94
Sunken Bell The 1035
- HAZLITT, WILLIAM
Liber Amoris 570
- HEINE, HEINRICH
Book of Songs 118
- HELLMAN, LILLIAN
Little Foxes The 588
- HENRY, O.
Short Stories of O. Henry 972
- HERBERT, GEORGE
Temple The 1056
- HERODOTUS
History of the Persian Wars, The 479
- HERRICK, ROBERT
Hesperides 461
- HESIOD
Works and Days 1149
- HOBBS, THOMAS
Leviathan 567
- HOFFMANN, ERNST THEODOR AMADEUS
Devil's Elixir The 267
- HOLMES, OLIVER WENDELL
Autocrat of the Breakfast Table The, 76
- HOPKINS, GERARD MANLEY
Poetry of Hopkins The 807
- HORACE
Ars Poetica 65
Poetry of Horace The 810
- HOUSMAN, A. E.
Shropshire Lad A 974
- HUME, DAVID
Enquiry Concerning Human Understanding,
An 339
- HUXLEY, THOMAS HENRY
Physical Basis of Life The 754
- HUYSMANS, JORIS KARL Down There 300

AUTHOR INDEX—THIRD SERIES

- IBARA SAIKAKU
Five Women Who Loved Love 398
- IBSEN HENRIK
Brand 126
When We Dead Awaken 1127
- IRVING WASHINGTON
Chronicle of the Conquest of Granada A 183
History of New York A 469
- JAMES HENRY
Spoils of Poynton The 1013
Washington Square 1117
What Maisie Knew 1125
- JAMES WILLIAM
Pragmatism 843
- JAY JOHN see HAMILTON MADISON
AND JAY
- JEFFERSON THOMAS
Notes on the State of Virginia 692
- JIMENEZ JUAN RAMON
Platero and I 764
- JIPPENSHA IKKU
Huza Kunge 481
- JOHNSTON MARY
Great Valley The 428
- JONSON BEN (also see CHAPMAN
JONSON AND MARSTON)
Catiline 161
Sejanus 951
Silent Woman The 980
- JOYCE JAMES
Exiles 373
Finnegans Wake 395
- JUVENAL
Satires 931
- KANT IMMANUEL
Critique of Pure Reason 240
- KAO TSE CH ENG
Story of the Guitar 1022
- KELLER GOTTFRIED
Grüne Heinrich Der 432
- KIERKEGAARD SOREN
Sickness Unto Death The, 976
- KLEIST HEINRICH VON
Broken Jug The 135
Prince of Homburg The 854
- LACLOS PIERRE CHORERLOS DE
Dangerous Acquaintances 246
- LA FONTAINE JEAN DE
Fables 378
- LAGERKVIST PAR
Barabbas 85
- LAMB CHARLES
Essays of Elia and Last Essays of Elia 362
- LANDOR WALTER SAVAGE
Imaginary Conversations 499
- LANGLAND WILLIAM
Vision of William Concerning Piers the Plowman The 1105
- LANIER SIDNEY
Poetry of Lanier The 812
- LARDNER RING
You Know Me Al 1159
- LA ROCHEFOUCAULD FRANCOIS
Maxims The 642
- LAWRENCE T E
Seven Pillars of Wisdom 961
- LAYMON
Brut, The 140
- LERMONTOV MIKHAIL YURIEVICH
Hero of Our Time A 456
- LE SAGE ALAIN RENE
Diable boiteux Le 271
Turcaret 1091
- LESSING GOTTHOLD EPHRAIM
Emilia Galotti 333
Nathan the Wise 683
- LEWIS CECIL DAY
Poetry of Lewis The 815
- LEWIS WYNNDHAM
Tarr 1051
- LINCOLN ABRAHAM
Addresses 9
- LINDSAY VACHEL
Poetry of Lindsay The 817
- LINS DO REGO JOSE
Dead Fires 254
- LIVY
Annals of the Roman People 47
- LO KUAN CHUNG
Romance of the Three Kingdoms 903
- LOBEIRA VASCO DE
Amadis de Gaul 27
- LOCKE JOHN
Essay Concerning Human Understanding
An 354
- LONGSTREET AUGUSTUS BALDWIN
Georgia Scenes 416
- LONNROT ELIAS
Kalevala The 535
- LOVELACE RICHARD
Poetry of Lovelace The 819
- LOWELL JAMES RUSSELL
Biglow Papers The 111
- LUCIAN
True History The 1087
- LUCRETIUS
De rerum natura 252
- LYLY JOHN
Campaspe 148
Endymion 337
Euphues and His England 366
Euphues the Anatomy of Wit 368
- MACAULAY THOMAS BABINGTON
History of England The 466
- MACHIAVELLI NICCOLO
Prince The 852
- MACLEISH ARCHIBALD
Conquistador 223
- MADISON JAMES see HAMILTON
MADISON AND JAY
- MALLARME STEPHANE
Poetry of Mallarmé The 821
- MALLEA EDUARDO
Bay of Silence The 89
- MANN THOMAS
Confessions of Felix Krull 218
- MANSFIELD KATHERINE
Short Stories of Katherine Mansfield 970
- MARAN RENÉ
Batouala 87
- MARCUS AURELIUS
Meditations 644
- MARIVAUX PIERRE CARLET DE
CHAMBLAIN
Marianne 631
- MARSTON JOHN (also see CHAPMAN
JONSON AND MARSTON)
Malcontent The 619

AUTHOR INDEX—THIRD SERIES

MARTIAL

Epigrams of Martial 344

MARTINEZ SIERRA GREGORIO

Kingdom of God The 545

MARVELL ANDREW

Poetry of Marvell The 823

MARX KARL

Kapital Das 538

MASSINGER PHILIP (also see FLETCHER AND MASSINGER)

Bondman The 116
Maid of Honour The 613
Roman Actor The 901

MASTERS EDGAR LEE

Spoon River Anthology 1015

MATHER COTTON

Magna Carta Americana 608

MAURIAC FRANCOIS

Thérèse 1066

MELVILLE HERMAN

Benito Cereno 98
Confidence Man The 221
Israel Potter 515

MENANDER

Arbitration The 54

MENCKEN H L

Prejudices Six Series 847

MIDDLETON THOMAS

Chaste Maid in Cheapside A 174
Spanish Gypsy The 1011
Women Beware Women 1144

MIDDLETON THOMAS and

ROWLEY WILLIAM

Changeling The 169

MIKSZATH KALMAN

St Peter's Umbrella 914

MILL JOHN STUART

On Liberty 698

MILLAY EDNA ST VINCENT

Harp Weaver and Other Poems The 445

MILTON JOHN

Comus 210
Paradise Regained 711
Samson Agonistes 920

MITCHELL MARGARET

Gone with the Wind 424

MOLIERE

Doctor in Spite of Himself The 289
Don Juan 296
School for Husbands The 938

MONTAIGNE MICHEL EYQUEM DE

Essays 352

MONTESQUIEU CHARLES DE

Persian Letters 736

MOORE THOMAS

Lalla Rookh 548

MORE SIR THOMAS

Utopia 1095

MULTATULI

Max Havelaar 639

NEWMAN JOHN HENRY

Apologia pro Vita Sua 49

NEWTON SIR ISAAC

Philosophiae Naturalis Principia
Mathematica 743

NIETZSCHE FRIEDRICH WILHELM

Beyond Good and Evil 108
Thus Spake Zarathustra 1069

NIEVO IPPOLITO

Castle of Fratta, The, 158

O CASEY SEAN

Juno and the Peacock 533

Purple Dust 857

Within the Gates 1134

OEDTS CLIFFORD

Golden Boy 422

ORTEGA Y GASSET JOSE

Revolt of the Masses The 886

OTWAY THOMAS

Orphan The 707
Soldier's Fortune The 1004

OVID

Metamorphoses The 658

PAINE THOMAS

Crisis The 238

PASCAL BLAISE

Pensées 732

PEPYS SAMUEL

Diary 283

PEREDA JOSE MARIA DE

Pedro Sanchez 728
Penas arriba 730

PEREZ GALDOS BENITO

Angel Guerra 42
Dona Perfecta 298

PERSE ST JOHN

Anabasis 32

PETRARCH FRANCESCO

Rime of Petrarch Le 893

PINDAR

Epinicia The 346

PINERO ARTHUR WING

Mid Channel 661

PIRANDELLO LUIGI

Right You Are—If You Think So 891
Six Characters in Search of an Author 993

PLATO

Dialogues of Plato The 277
Republic The 876

PLAUTUS TITUS MACCIUS

Braggart Soldier The 123
Menaechmi The 654
Slipknot The 997
Truckster The 1081

PLUTARCH

Parallel Lives 713

POLITIAN

Orfeo 702

POPE ALEXANDER

Dunciad The 310

POUND EZRA

Cantos 151

POWYS JOHN COWPER

Wolf Solent 1136

POWYS LLEWELYN

Ebony and Ivory 320

PRESCOTT WILLIAM HICKLING

History of the Conquest of Mexico 471

P U SUNG-LING

Strange Stones from a Chinese Studio 1024

RACINE JEAN BAPTISTE

Bérénice 101
Britannicus 133
Mithridate 667
Plaideurs Les 763

RADCLIFFE MRS ANN

Italian The 521

RANSOM JOHN CROWE

Selected Poems 954

AUTHOR INDEX—THIRD SERIES

- REYES ALFONSO
Visión de Anáhuac 1101
RICE ELMER
Street Scene 1026
RICHARDSON DOROTHY M
Pilgrimage 757
RICHARDSON SAMUEL
Sir Charles Grandison 983
RIGGS LYNN
Green Grow the Lilacs 430
RILKE RAINER MARIA
Duino Elegies 307
RIMBAUD ARTHUR
Season in Hell A 944
ROBINSON EDWIN ARLINGTON
Man Against the Sky The 622
RONARD PIERRE DE
Poetry of Ronsard The 826
ROSSETTI CHRISTINA
Poetry of Christina Rossetti The 789
ROSSETTI DANTE GABRIEL
Poetry of Dante Gabriel Rossetti The 791
ROUSSEAU JEAN JACQUES
Confessions 215
Emile 330
ROWLEY WILLIAM see MIDDLETON
AND ROWLEY
RUIZ DE ALARCON JUAN
Truth Suspected 1089

SACHS HANS
Wandering Scholar from Paradise The 1115
SAINTE BEUVE CHARLES AUGUSTIN
Volupté 1110
SAINT EXUPERY ANTOINE DE
Night Flight 687
SANDBURG CARL
Abraham Lincoln 2
People Yes The 734
SANTAYANA GEORGE
Scepticism and Animal Faith 935
SANTO KYODEN
Inazuma byōshū 503
SAPPHO
Ode to Aphrodite 694
SCHOPENHAUER ARTHUR
World as Will and Idea The 1153
SCOTT SIR WALTER
Bride of Lammermoor The 128
Fair Maid of Perth The 380
St Ronan's Well 916
SCUDERY MADELEINE DE
Artamène 67
SHAW BERNARD
Back to Methuselah 82
Caesar and Cleopatra 145
Candida 150
Heartbreak House 449
Major Barbara 617
Man and Superman 624
Pygmalion 859
Saint Joan 912
SHIH NAI AN
All Men Are Brothers 24
SHIRLEY JAMES
Hyde Park 497
Traitor The 1077
SHUDRAKA
Little Clay Cart The 586
SIDNEY SIR PHILIP
Arcadia 56

SMITH ADAM
Wealth of Nations The 1122
SOPHOCLES
Philoctetes 741
Women of Trachis The 1146
SOUTHEY ROBERT
Life of Nelson 576
SPENDER STEPHEN
Poetry of Spender The 828
SPINOZA BENEDICTUS DE
Ethics 364
STATIUS PUBLIUS PAPINIUS
Thebais The 1062
STEINBECK JOHN
East of Eden 315
STEVENS WALLACE
Harmonium 442
STEVENSON ROBERT LOUIS
Beach of Falesa The 91
STRACHEY LYTTON
Eminent Victorians 335
STRINDBERG AUGUST
Comrades 208
Link, The 581
Red Room The 868
There Are Crimes and Crimes 1064
STUART JESSE
Man with a Bull Tongue Plow 626
SUETONIUS TRANQUILLUS GAIUS
Lives of the Caesars 590
SWEDENBORG EMANUEL
Divine Love and Wisdom 287
SYNGE JOHN MILLINGTON
Deirdre of the Sorrows 265

TACITUS CORNELIUS
Annals of Tacitus The 44
TAINÉ HIPPOLYTE
Philosophy of Art 745
TAYLOR EDWARD
Poetical Works of Edward Taylor The 771
TERENCE
Brothers The 138
Self Tormentor The 956
THEOCRITUS
Poetry of Theocritus The 834
THOMAS DYLAN
Collected Poems 1934-1952 201
THOMAS A KEMPIS
Imitation of Christ The 501
THUCYDIDES
History of the Peloponnesian War 476
THURBER JAMES
My Life and Hard Times 678
TOLSTOY COUNT LEO
Death of Ivan Ilyich The 256
Power of Darkness The 841
Resurrection 879
TOMLINSON H M
Sea and the Jungle The 942
TOURNEUR CYRIL
Revenger's Tragedy The 883
TOYNBEE ARNOLD
Study of History A 1030
TROLLOPE ANTHONY
Phineas Finn 748
Phineas Redux 750
TSAO HSUEH CHIN
Dream of the Red Chamber 302

AUTHOR INDEX—THIRD SERIES

UNKNOWN

Abraham and Isaac 1
Bevis of Hampton 105
Circle of Chalk The 193
Epic of Gilgamesh The 342
Finn Cycle The 392
Guy of Warwick 439
Huon de Bordeaux 494
Mabinogion The 600
Mahabharata The 611
Pilgrimage of Charlemagne The 760
Poem of the Cid 766
Star of Seville The 1018

VALMIKI

Ramayana The, 861

VERGA GIOVANNI

Mastro don Gesualdo, 636

VERLAINE PAUL

Fêtes galantes and Other Poems 390

VERNE JULES

Mysterious Island The 681

VILLON FRANCOIS

Great Testament The 426

VOLTAIRE FRANCOIS MARIE AROUET DE

Zadig 1165

Zaire 1168

WALPOLE HORACE

Letters of Walpole The 563

WALTON IZAAK

Compleat Angler The 206

WAST HUGO

Black Valley 113

WEBSTER JOHN

White Devil The 1131

WEDEKIND FRANK

Awakening of Spring The 79

WEST NATHANAEAL

Miss Lonelyhearts 664

WHARTON EDITH

Custom of the Country The 243

Fruit of the Tree The 406

WHITMAN WALT

Leaves of Grass 554

WILDER THORNTON

Skin of Our Teeth The 995

WILLIAMS TENNESSEE

Glass Menagerie The 418

WILLIAMS WILLIAM CARLOS

Paterson 720

WOOLF VIRGINIA

Between the Acts 102

Years The 1156

WORDSWORTH WILLIAM

Prelude The 849

WU CH ENG-EN

Monkey 671

WYCHERLEY WILLIAM

Gentleman Dancing Master The 411

Love in a Wood 595

XENOPHON

Anabasis The 36

YAÑEZ AGUSTIN

Al filo del agua 19

YEATS WILLIAM BUTLER

Poetry of Yeats The 836

ZOLA EMILE

Doctor Pascal 291

Drnk 305

Earth 312

